"Happy!" repeated the clerk, warmly; "how can you suppose anything so ridiculous, improbable, and unnatural? The mother pines for her lost son."

"Ah! true, true," murmured Mr. Bently.

"And the daughter for her father's forgiveness!" added the speaker. "There, don't look so angry. I have done. But mark my words: you will one day repent of your unnatural conduct to your only child."

"I thought, Peter," said his employer, placing his hand familiarly upon his shoulder, "that we had come to an understanding not to speak upon this subject any more. By the result," he added, seriously, "let the wisdom of our conduct be judged."

"Certainly," replied the old man, seating himself at his desk, and commencing to write very quickly.

"I have no fear."

"Nor I," said Mr. Bently.

An inarticulate "Humph" from Peter Mangles was the only reply to this assertion.

The merchant reflected upon their conversation long after the clerk had forgotten it; and more than once he asked himself whether he had not acted unwisely by his son-in-law, and suspected him unjustly in the affair of the securities.

If so, who could be the thief?

This was a question he daily became more anxious than ever to elucidate. It must have been some one connected with the firm. George Markham had started in business on his own account; and the thousand pounds he had received with his wife appeared, even with his acknowledged talents for business, a ridiculously small sum to have kept him afloat so long.

The reformed drunkard had not been many weeks in his new situation, in which his conduct proved most exemplary, when a second and far more important change took place in his prospects. Mr. Thornton, whose connection with the firm of Bently and Company was of many years' standing, called upon Peter in the city; and in the course of conversation informed him that it was his intention to establish a branch business in London.

"Glad to hear it," observed the clerk, who still continued to write.

"It will require a considerable outlay of capital," added the manufacturer; "but that is not my principal difficulty; the greatest one is to find a man of talent, combining business habits with strict integrity, to conduct it in my absence."

Peter Mangles laid down his pen; rubbed his ear—a habit with him when undecided; thought of George, hesitated, was about to speak, suddenly stopped and thought of Rachel and little Mary. That decided him.

"I know the very man," he said.

"And can recommend him for talent?"

"Yes!"

"I ask no better," said Mr. Thornton, "provided he combines honesty with the other requisites."

"I can vouch for his integrity," answered the old man; "for he was brought up under my own eyes; and never, when he was a mere boy, did I detect an error in his petty-cash book. Richard thinks nothing of that; but you and I know what a temptation it is to youngsters," he added, confidentially.

The manufacturer heard him with a smile, for he had long been acquainted with the speaker's crotchets on the subject of petty cash.

"Is he sober?" he inquired.

"Very sober, now; but he has been a drunkard; in fact, it is no other than George Markham."

"Bently's son-in-law!" exclaimed Mr. Thornton.

"Who never treated him wisely, or in a business-like manner, poor fellow," answered Peter; "and I can't tell you how it grieves me."

He proceeded to relate, for the satisfaction of his visitor, the sad story of Rachel's marriage, and the anger of her father; how George, with only a thousand pounds, had commenced business on his own account, had failed, given way to drink, till he lost one situation after another, and scarcely a friend would look upon him.

"And is it possible," said his hearer, "that you can seriously recommend me to engage such a man?"

"Hear how he has redeemed himself," replied the clerk, "before I reply to that question."

The wealthy manufacturer listened with benevolent interest whilst the speaker proceeded to describe the loss of our hero, and the effect it produced upon the conscience-stricken father. As for the mother's sufferings, no words, however eloquent, could paint them.

"I feel for him," he observed, when Peter had concluded, "and am disposed to serve him, but as a man of the world, cannot intrust my new establishment to him without security."

"Security for what?"

"His honesty."

"I mean, what sum?"

"Five thousand pounds."

Peter Mangles took up his pen and very deliberately wrote half a dozen lines, read them carefully over twice to assure himself he had made no mistake—for it was the most important piece of paper he had ever signed in his life—seeing that it held him responsible, in the sum of five thousand pounds, for the honesty of George Markham.

"There is the security," he said, handing the document to Mr. Thornton; "and the situation—"

"Is his," replied the gentleman, placing the guarantee in his pocket-book; "you have acted nobly by your friend."

"Pshaw! I run no risk," exclaimed the old clerk, modestly; for he had a great objection to receive either thanks or praise. "I know my man."

Never in the whole course of his life had the speaker felt so anxious to escape from business, as on that important day. He even went so far as to indulge in the extravagance of a cab on his return, the omnibus being too slow for his impatience; but instead of driving to Blackheath, he proceeded at once to the cottage of the Markhams.

Nothing could exceed the joy and gratitude of both husband and wife, when informed of their brightening prospects, and the generous confidence of their friend.

Rachel's thanks were interrupted by her tears.

"Never can I merit so much kindness!" exclaimed George, deeply touched by the noble conduct of the old clerk. "The future must thank you, sir, not present words. I have no fear of myself. For with all my faults," he added, "a thought of dishonesty never tempted me yet."

"I believe you, my dear boy," murmured the old man.

"Nor will it now, sir."

"Should it," replied Peter Mangles, looking with childlike confidence in his face, "remember one thing—that you will only be robbing your wife and Mary."

It was a happy night for all of them. When we say all, we ought to except the mother, whose satisfaction had one bitter alloy: she thought of her lost son, and though smiles were on her lips, sadness still dwelt within her heart.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Oh, what a tangled web we weave,
When first we venture to deceive.—SCOTT.

No sooner was the funeral of little Fanny over, and everything pleasantly settled, than Mike, who had carefully calculated his proceedings, began to make arrangements for an interview with Lady Boothroyd. Being unable to write, and far too cautious to employ any one to do so for him, it was necessary to see her himself.

With the prospect of five hundred pounds before him, and by far the greater portion of the sum he had already received still in hand, the returned convict considered that he could prudently afford some outlay on the occasion; and he proceeded to order a suit of clothes, in order to appear respectable.

By a caprice, which had a sly touch of humour in it, he directed them to be made as nearly like the steward's as he could describe them, and even went so far as to copy his white cravat.

When dressed, the likeness—a point Mike had always insisted upon—appeared so extraordinary, that a comparative stranger might easily have mistaken one brother for the other.

"I don't think Andrew need feel ashamed of me now," he exclaimed, with intense satisfaction, as he contemplated his ungainly person in the piece of broken looking-glass before which poor Jack used to wash his ruddy face. "It's the feathers as makes the difference between the goose and the swan. How surprised her ladyship will be!" he added, with a chuckle. "Only to think of a real ladyship's character being at the marcy of old Mike. She must bleed pretty freely, I can tell her, to keep him quiet. I have often heard that words are valuable, sometimes more valuable than gold.

"Now I know it!"

"I shall soon quit this place," he exclaimed, musingly, and at the same time casting a dissatisfied look around him. "It was all very well; but somehow, since Jack has left me, I feel quite lonesome in it. It was a deep scheme of Andrew to rid himself of the boy," he added. "I hope the captain won't use him very badly."

Considering the share he had taken in the transaction, the wish was rather a singular one; but Mike had lately got rather nervous. He could not sleep well at night; and when he did sleep, was haunted by disagreeable dreams. He frequently saw little Fan lying on the bed, with only one thin covering over her, and the skylight open to admit the pitiless frost. Then he heard the cough; and it sounded so hollow and distinct that it startled him from his slumber, and caused him to bury his face in the pillow, to avoid the gaze of the large, lustrous eyes which imagination pictured peering at him through the surrounding darkness.

An uneasy conscience is a bad companion for a sleepless pillow.

It created quite a sensation in the neighbourhood when the inhabitants of the Belvedere-road first saw Mike—who had hitherto worn knee-breeches, high-lows, and a pea-jacket—issue from his den dressed in a suit of black, and a white neckcloth. The comments were as varied as his appearance was singular.

"His clothes," observed one, with a sneer, "are not the blackest part about him."

The speaker was thinking of his heart.

"Where can his nephew be?" exclaimed a second.

"Perhaps he is mourning for him too."

"How about the child?"

These observations were heard by Mike as he walked past the groups of men and women gathered round the doors of the different beer-houses in the Belvedere-road; but he took no notice of them. Everything was straightforward and safe. He had the certificate of the doctor who attended Fan that she died a natural death; and in his heart—if he had such a thing—the man of many crimes fancied he might defy the prying eye and iron hand of human justice. As for that of heaven, he thought not of it. The idea that, by a means secret and inscrutable, it prepares the punishment of sin, never once entered his imagination.

It was a little past noon when he knocked at the residence of Sir Norman Boothroyd in the Park.

The porter was so startled by the resemblance to the steward, that he could only look at him, instead of answering his inquiry, whether her ladyship was at home.

Mike had to repeat the question. Receiving no reply, he began to lose his temper.

"What are you a-starin' at?" he demanded, roughly. "Ain't you never seen a gentleman afore?"

The servant had seen a great many in his time—in fact, was more accustomed to that class of persons than any other; hence his astonishment at the arrival of a person who appeared too well dressed to be seeking charity, and far too vulgar to suppose for an instant that he could be on the visiting list of his aristocratic mistress.

"Why, yes, my man," he replied, recovering himself, for the tone and manner of the speaker had quite dispelled his doubts.

"Can't yer answer me, then?"

"What can you want to see her ladyship for?"

"That's my business," growled the convict.

"Charity, I suppose."

"Charity!" repeated Mike, indignantly, and, at the same time glancing complacently at his new clothes. "I ain't no kite-flyer—never wor: not in my line of business."

"You had better write," suggested the porter.

"I can't write."

This was an admission which lowered the speaker very much in the opinion of the pampered menial. He could.

"Then get a friend, my good man, to do so for you."

"I ain't got no friends," answered the ruffian; "and if I had," he added, with a knowing wink, "I am too wide awake to trust 'em with my business."

"Send up your name, then," said the servant.

"She won't know it."

"You are a stranger to her ladyship?"

"No, I ain't. She knows me. Tell her so."

"I can't take any such message," replied the man, eyeing him with an air of contempt.

"You can't?"

"No."

"Very well," said the visitor, advancing further into the hall, and seating himself in the speaker's own chair, certainly the most comfortable one in the place; "then here I sits till I sees her ladyship. You may stare, but I means it. And do you hear, Mr. Jack-in-office," he added, menacingly, "take care your impudence does not lose you your place. If my twin brother was here he'd soon tell you who I am, and send you to the right about face, and no mistake."

"Your twin brother!" repeated the astonished domestic.

"Yes, Andrew Silex."

The steward was a person not only disliked, but dreaded by the whole establishment of Sir Norman, for they knew the unbounded influence he possessed over him—an influence, by-the-by, never exercised for any good or benevolent purpose. Scarcely one of them but at one period or other had occasion to prove its ill effects.

"If you will wait a few minutes"—said the porter.

"I told yer I intended to wait," growled Mike.

"I will send up a message by my lady's own maid."

"Send it by whom yer will, only send it, and quickly, my fine feller."

Whilst the porter was speaking with the waiting-woman, whom he had sent for, Alice, who had just returned, attended by her governess, from her morning walk, passed through the hall. The convict stared at her very hard; the likeness to Lillian struck him forcibly.

"Perhaps," he mentally observed, "her ladyship was right after all, and Lilly is ill—ill—I know what she meant; the best on 'em ain't to be trusted. But that is nothink to me, pervided she pays."

And then he thought on the sum promised.

Lady Boothroyd listened to the message which the waiting-woman brought her, and the description of the person and singular conduct of her visitor, with secret terror, for she guessed at once who it was that demanded to see her. Before she could make up her mind how to act, Alice and her governess, Mademoiselle Jaulain, entered the drawing-room.

"Oh, mamma!" exclaimed the child, running to her, "there is such a strange man in the hall. He is so like Silex!"

"Horribly like to him," added the Frenchwoman.

There was no longer any doubt upon the mind of her ladyship, for she too had noted the resemblance on her visit to the convict's abode.

"He says he is Mr. Silex's brother, my lady," said the waiting-maid.

"Oh, why did you not tell me so before!" exclaimed the guilty woman. "Show him into the breakfast-room. I will see him directly; and if your master should inquire for me, inform him that I am particularly engaged."

"Certainly, my lady."

"Mademoiselle, pray see that Alice practices the last exercises her master set her. He complained on his former visit that they had not been learnt."

By this direction the speaker freed herself from the observation both of her daughter and the Frenchwoman.

Mike had been seated nearly an hour in the breakfast-room, before Lady Boothroyd made her appearance. She had required time to collect herself for the interview. The contre temps of the man's finding her out, and calling, annoyed her exceedingly, after the decidedly clever scheme she had planned to avoid it; neither did the fact of his claiming brotherhood with the steward tend to reassure her. A vague suspicion had haunted her mind for some days past, that the astute Mr. Silex had been playing a double game with her.

It was but a suspicion, and she had no other resource but to continue to trust him, for Mr. Silex was one of the few persons she did not care to measure her strength with. The web which crime and ambition had woven began to draw in its meshes.

"He can never have been fool enough," she thought, as she descended to the breakfast-room, "to confide even to a brother the real name and parents of Lillian."

Then she reflected on the habitually cool and cautious proceedings of the steward, and dismissed her fears as ridiculous and groundless.

Mike had expected to see the lady confused, and totally unprepared to meet the discovery of her name and abode. To his astonishment, she entered the room with a calm, collected air, as if the transaction which had passed between them had been one of the most common occurrences of everyday life, and coolly asked him the purport of his strange visit, and still stranger conduct to her servants.

"They wouldn't let me see you," added the man, somewhat abashed.

"I am not in the habit of seeing strangers," was the reply.

"But I ain't no stranger."

"Nearly so," observed her ladyship; "but we will pass that over. You have not come without a cause, I presume, and I reserve my opinion of your conduct till I have heard it."

Mike glanced at the crape upon his hat in a most significant manner, and tried to look like one very much afflicted.

The guilty woman turned deadly pale.

"The child!" she faltered.

"Dead, my lady," replied the ruffian, "but it worn't my fault. I grewed as fond on her as if she had been my own; she had such pretty engaging ways with her."

"By accident?"

"No, my lady; cough—consumption, the doctor called it, for I had a doctor—very expensive; but I knoved you would see me paid."

"Certainly," answered Lady Boothroyd, still more astonished, especially at the cause of Lilly's death, for never had a child appeared less likely to fall a victim to the fatal disease he named; "and so the doctors said she died of consumption?"

"I've got the certificate."

"And when did her death take place?"

"A week ago. We buried her last Thursday. I could not well do it afore, seeing as the doctors opened her. That was my wish. I wanted everything all straight and right."

Hardened as she was, his hearer shuddered. The tale of consumption did not deceive her for a single instant. She remembered too well how the eyes of the speaker had sparkled with cupidity when she vaguely hinted at the five hundred pounds. The feeling of remorse, however, was but momentary, and quickly vanished as the stronger one of satisfaction, on hearing that the object of her fear was removed from her path so cleverly.

Mike took from his pocket two crumpled pieces of paper. One was the certificate of the burial of a child named Lillian, family name unknown, it having been placed at nurse by strangers with Michael Silex, residing in the Belvedere-road.

Lady Boothroyd received it with a firm hand, and perused it attentively.

The second was signed by the parish doctor, certifying the cause of her death and the post mortem examination of the body.

Nothing could be more regular; and yet she began to feel anything but assured. The event appeared so sudden—so improbable.

"I will cause the affair to be inquired into," she observed.

"You will find it all right," replied her visitor, whose eye never flinched from her keen gaze; "the child took a cold, and went off like a flower. When shall I touch the money?" he added, anxiously. "I am a poor man, and can't afford to wait."

"What money?"

"The five hundred pounds."

"And do you imagine, my good man," inquired Lady Boothroyd, "that I am such a simpleton as to part with so large a sum upon the faith of two documents like these, without previous inquiry to convince me of their authenticity? Certainly not. Besides, the money was promised on certain conditions, that you treated the child well."

"I treated her as you wished me," muttered Mike.

"That remains to be seen; and in the expectation that she would remain years with you. I see," she added, glancing at the first paper, "that your name is Silex."

"No mistake about that, my lady."

"The brother of my steward."

"His twin brother."

"I will write for him to come up to town instantly," said his mistress; "as he recommended you to me, he must investigate the affair; and on proof—the fullest proof—that the child has been properly treated by you, and is really dead, I will reflect on my inconsiderate promise, and come to some arrangement."

"I can't wait."

The well-arched eyebrows of Lady Boothroyd became slightly elevated.

"I won't wait," added the man.

"In that case, I must refer you to my solicitor," observed the former.

"You dare not."

"That remains to be seen," continued the speaker, rising. "Do you imagine you can terrify me, or that you have a child to deal with? From your insolent looks and tone of menace," she added, "one would imagine a crime had to be paid for, instead of one of the simplest transactions in the world—a child whose birth was a misfortune put out to nurse."

Mike regarded her with a certain amount of admiration, despite the rage he felt at being put off. He liked pluck, as he termed it, especially in a woman. This feeling, however, did not prevent his playing his last card—the trump, as he considered it. "In that case, my lady," he said, "I shall see your husband."

The mistress of the house coolly rung the bell. "See if Sir Norman is in his study," she said to the footman who answered it; "here is a person who desires to speak with him."

"No, I don't," hastily exclaimed the convict, completely cowed by her coolness; "what you say is quite satisfactory."

"As you please."

"Then I won't trouble Sir Norman."

With a wave of her hand his mistress dismissed the servant from the room. It was a bold stroke of finesse on her part; but the danger was worthy of the risk; which, after all, was not very great, since, sooner or later, her husband must be intrusted with the secret.

"I will write to your brother this very day," said the lady, when the footman had quitted the breakfast-room, and she once more found herself alone with her visitor. "Directly he arrives you shall hear from me."

Mike pleaded hard for a portion of the money. He would have so much liked to have received something on hand; but Lady Boothroyd firmly refused, although she fully intended to fulfil her promise, provided everything turned out to have passed as he stated. Only she did not choose to show the slightest sign of fear. It would have been impolitic, unworthy a woman of her tact; a quality on which, like most cunning persons, she particularly prided herself.

Mike left the house in the Regent's Park with far less confident feelings than he had entered it. As the cards were dealt at present, the game did not appear quite so certain; but then he consoled himself with the reflection that the best trump, Lillian, was still in the pack.

"What a precious fool I should have been," he thought, as he plodded his way back to the Belvedere-road, "had I really run any risk, and done what that fine-spoken madam wished me to do, only she would not speak out. She'll consider over it, will she?—umph! I'll consider over it too; and we shall see whose considerations will prove the best. I must see Fiddler Dick, and get back the gal agin; then I'll talk to 'em if they try to rob me of my dues. I don't think," he added, "they will find Mike half so simple as they take him for."

Shortly after his return home, the convict received a visit from Bet, who told him of her husband's misfortune, as she called it, of course concealing her own share in the transaction;—how Dexter had taken the children and business out of her hands, and concluded by hoping that Dick's old pal would act honourably and pay her the twenty pounds.

"Twenty devils!" repeated the man; "why, I ain't got it yet."

"But you will have."

"Can't say; but where is Lilly?"

His mortification and rage on hearing of her loss nearly drove him frantic. As he figuratively expressed himself, it was the ace of trumps against him in the game he had to play against two such experienced hands as his brother and Lady Boothroyd.

"Find her, Bet," he said, "and you shall have the money; but unless you do, not a silver from me; so now you know what to expect."

The woman promised. The twenty pounds were an additional incentive to renew her search for the victim that had escaped her.

Three days after this important transaction, Mike was seated, in no very amiable humour, in his cottage, when the steward made his appearance. Mr. Sillex was evidently both annoyed and excited. In the first place, his brother had broken faith with him in seeking a personal interview with Lady Boothroyd; and in the second, contrived to mystify him.

Before calling, he had seen both the parish doctor and the clerk; inspected the registry. Nothing could appear more clear upon the surface; and yet Mr. Sillex continued to doubt. The medical man described the child; the colour of her eyes and hair; her age; her answering to the name of Lillian: still Andrew was not convinced of her death. The only conclusion he came to was that Mike was a much cleverer rascal than he had ever given him credit for.

"Well," he said, seating himself, "you" have managed it nicely."

"Managed what nicely?" demanded the convict.

"The death of the child."

"I ain't a managed it; it came naturally. The poor thing couldn't stand the damp and cold; the cough settled on her lungs, and it was soon over. Ask the doctor," he added; "he knows that it was all straight-forward and right."

"I have asked him."

"You can see the register."

"I have seen it."

"What do you talk about managing it for, then?" exclaimed Mike; "but I know you and your fine mistress thinks to do me out of my rights; but I won't stand it. If I ain't paid I'll go before a magistrate, and make oath of the whole affair. If the police and the newspapers gets hold on it, they'll soon ferret the truth out."

"There is nothing, Mike, to ferret out; the child was a poor man's child."

"But its mother worn't poor," retorted his brother, who had firmly made up his mind to the fact, that Lady Boothroyd was the parent of Lillian. "Besides," he added, "if she wor poor, why did her ladyship promise me the five hundred pounds?"

The steward reflected for a few instants. He saw that the proceeding the speaker threatened might be followed by great inconvenience; and angry as he felt with him for his breach of faith, made up his mind to seeing him paid.

"You shall have the money," he said.

"All on it?"

"All."

"And when?"

"In a few days."

The countenance of Mike brightened. It was a much better termination to the affair than he expected.

"Ah! Andrew," he said, "if you had only acted like a brother and a twin, we might have done well together, played into each other's hands. Her ladyship—since she is one—hasn't deceived me with her coolness and indifference, though she is uncommon clever; there was a fortin' hanging to that child, and I ought to have had at least half of it."

Mr. Sillex disclosed his remarkably white teeth, and laughed very heartily. The idea tickled his fancy; it was exactly the sum he had secretly fixed upon as the price of his own co-operation.

"I ought," added the speaker, "and you knows it. Didn't you tell me Lilly would one day be worth her weight in gold to you?"

"If she lived," observed the steward.

A very peculiar sneer flitted over the features of his brother. Andrew saw it, and all his suspicions returned.

"Look you, Mike," he said, greatly excited, "we know each other fully at last."

"Pretty well," answered the amiable twin.

"If Lilly is not really dead—and I have my doubts—let me know the truth, and the five hundred shall be doubled."

"It will be time," answered the convict, cautiously, "to enter upon that affair when the first is settled—not a word till then."

"And then?"

Mike gave a knowing wink, but not another word could the clever Mr. Sillex succeed in extracting from him on the subject.

THE THREE BELLS.

FIRST BELL.

See the golden sun
From the east ascending,
Hear the matin bells
With the wood notes blending.
The thrifty bee hath gone to work;
The fish are sporting in the brook;
Birds their nests are busy building;
Hark the bells again are pealing;
Awake—arise—and earnestly
Begin the duties of the day.

SECOND BELL.

Now like a fount of fire
The sun at mid-day seemeth.
Bright and warm rays
Down on earth he beameth.
From the hardy labourer's brow
Streams of sweat are falling now.
But hark! again the bells do call.
Cease from labour, rest ye all,
Partake of that which strength imparts,
With simple, joyful, grateful hearts.

THIRD BELL.

Golden light is spread
O'er the western billows;
Stars are glancing out
From the ether o'er us;
Pearly dew is hanging
On the little dowers;
The whippoorwill is singing
In the leafy bowers;
And hark the bells again do call,
Cease from labour, rest ye all!
Let each one's footsteps to his home be bent,
Refreshed, the evening sacrifice present.
Then as the Lord to his beloved gives,
Such be your sleep:
And angels loving, bright, and strong,
Guard o'er you keep.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

MENTAL IMPROVEMENT AN AID TO BUSINESS.

To succeed in business, to get on in the world, and to establish a reputation for something or other, are laudable incentives to industry. Aut Caesar aut nullus, may be called ambitious and sound heathenism, but the desire to be first-rate in the profession we have adopted is only honourable ambition, and no one need blush to own such a feeling. There is no doubt that in some way we were all intended for workers. Paupers and pensioners, in a palace or a poor-house, are rather to be pitied than envied by any right-thinking person. All men or women who work, whether they labour with body or brain, are really useful members of society; but the do-nothings are worth nothing, whether their position be high or low.

Now there are some highly industrious people who, admitting the truth of this, acknowledging the importance and the value of labour, contrive to fall into a very serious error. They seem to suppose that "sticking to business"—being early and late in the shop or warehouse, allowing nothing to interfere with their professional pursuits, devoting all the energies of their mind and body to their regular employment—is the practical exemplification of all industrial precepts. So, to some extent, it really is; but trade or business is not the only thing which should engage the attention. Very rare are those professions which call forth all the latent qualities of the mind and heart. The majority of us have to toil in pursuits that occupy our mental faculties to a limited extent only. Our trades do not sufficiently improve our minds, and if we singly devote our attention to our trades, we fail in a very essential and important duty. Mental improvement is a duty. It is a relaxation also, but it is equally incumbent on us as the exercise of industry and diligence in our calling. Supposing that an enterprising laborious tradesman sets to work to make a fortune, and succeeds. Suppose he does this by means the most upright and honourable. Suppose he faithfully discharges every duty as a servant and a master—in his business. Suppose that, with integrity for his foundation-stone, he builds up a thoroughly good reputation—but has failed to cultivate his intellect, or to aid others in their efforts at mental improvement—his success in business will never make amends for his failure in this particular.

We cannot too forcibly impress the duty of self-improvement on the youthful readers of this journal. The amount of dormant energy we have within us is really surprising. This slumbering power must be awakened. There is no limit as to what we can accomplish for our own mental improvement. We do not know what we can do till we try. But even in a business sense, we do not know how useful our mental acquisitions may be to us in our common occupations.

Notice some few things which, if properly acquired, would materially assist in our business progress: a good hand-writing, to begin with.

In a former article I drew attention to this important branch of education. My readers will pardon me for alluding to it again when I explain my reason. Scores of letters reach the editor asking, "How can I improve my writing?" "Is my writing good enough for a merchant's office?" "Would my writing pass muster at a civil service examination?" and so on. Many of these letters are so badly written that they would never obtain a tolerable situation for the writer. It is clear enough that sufficient attention has not been paid to the style of writing, that slovenly habits have been acquired, and that to improve the one and overcome the other is a difficult and perplexing work to the individual. Now we believe that anybody may write a good, clear, business hand. We would not say to them, "take six lessons;" we would rather say, set to work and teach yourself.

The other day I noticed a little work, entitled "The Model Copy Book," published by Messrs. Ward and Lock, of Fleet-street, and selling at threepence a number; eight numbers we believe complete the series. The object is that of "insuring a good, fluent, and rapid handwriting," and the plan seems to us so excellent that we have no doubt of its success. I have recommended this Model Copy Book to all who have any real desire to improve their handwriting. The directions are plain and practical. The copies are bold and free, combining the advantages both of the old and new style. The old-fashioned plan of regular set copies of words is abandoned, and has been abandoned by most teachers of penmanship for a long time. That of setting ovals and other forms before the pupil, so as to give freedom and elegance to the writing, while really useful to a certain extent, fails to train the hand for a good business style. The plan adopted in the Model Copy Book is that of affording equal "gymnastic practice" in a more useful form. Lines connecting the termination and the beginning of the forms actually used in writing are given; and, judging from the specimen, I have no hesitation in saying that from their use a careful student would sooner acquire a good business hand than by any other method. The forms or models are so graceful, and the pupil is so simply and naturally conducted from the use of one form to that of another, that failure can only result from the want of proper care or that of steady application.

To write well is of the greatest importance to business men. It is one of those things which affect their interest, and therefore I would urge upon my readers—those of them, at least, who are resolved on self-improvement—to set about the acquisition of a bold, free, legible handwriting.

Letter-writing is another subject to which due attention should be given. Chesterfield says:—"The first thing necessary in writing letters of business is extreme perspicuity. Every paragraph should be so clear and unambiguous that the dullest fellow in the world may not be able to mistake it, nor be obliged to read it twice in order to understand it." A letter is only useful in so far as it is understood. A letter which requires to be read and re-read several times before its object can be clearly made out is a disgrace to the writer. In writing business letters, understand clearly what you have to state, and then state clearly what you would have your correspondent understand. The use of plain words in the statement of plain facts is all that is desirable in a business letter. Omit nothing that is necessary to a proper understanding of the subject, put in nothing but what strictly bears upon it, and let every particular be concisely stated. Every business man should thoroughly master this description of correspondence. It is not necessary that he should write poetically, eloquently, or even gracefully; but it is essential that he should be able to make a clear statement.

It is frequently the case that the correspondence of an extensive establishment is not confined to England. Useful as it is to be competent to the writing of letters in English, the ability to correspond in French, or German, or both, is of more value still. And the ability to do this is within the reach of all who have but an ordinary education, a good share of common sense, and a proper amount of industry. A young man, with a grammar and a dictionary of the language he wishes to acquire, may do as much for himself as schools or universities could do for him. Thousands have become proficient scholars by their own unassisted exertions. They have set to work in earnest, have said to themselves, "I will do such or such a thing;" and, little by little, step by step, inch by inch, they have accomplished their purpose.

The art of acquiring a foreign language is not so difficult as many people suppose. Lessons in French or German, if plainly put before an intelligent reader, are perfectly easy; though the pronunciation can only be acquired by intercourse with natives of the two countries, or from those who have had the advantage of a long residence in France and Germany. The biography of many a distinguished man is most encouraging to the young student of language. Such an experience as that of Dr. Alexander Murray or Archibald Campbell is worth hundreds of didactic essays on the subject. Better even than the history of what great men have accomplished is the fact that an astonishingly large number of hard-working operatives have acquired a knowledge both of German and French by studying the lessons in a widely-circulated periodical. I have had opportunities of observing this; I know it for a certainty; and the letters which have been written by those men in the respective languages indicated have been lucid in style, and grammatically correct.

I urge upon my readers to study the modern continental languages, especially German and French. It has been said that there are three purposes for which languages may be studied, independently of their gratifying that general desire of information which makes both the acquirement and the possession of all knowledge delightful. These uses are said to be the study of that intellectual mechanism by which they have been formed, and of which they present us, as it were, with the impress or picture. Another department is that relating to the early history of our race, and the origin of the different nations by which the earth is peopled. A third motive is, of course, that we may be able to read the books written in them, and thus obtain access to worlds of intellectual treasure from which we should otherwise be entirely or almost entirely shut out. But the business man finds it frequently a positive necessity that he should correspond in a foreign language, that he should be able satisfactorily to conduct his trade; and the ability to do this becomes of the utmost value. A business man who can do this is doubly useful to himself; a clerk who can do this is doubly useful to his employer.

Another thing very important to those engaged in business is, a philosophical knowledge of their trade. There are thousands of sharp business people, who, with all their sharpness, have but a very limited knowledge of their trade. There are thousands of operators who never extend their inquiry beyond the particular branch of their trade with which they are immediately connected. They have been taught how to do that, and they go on doing it mechanically, never at all disposed to inquire, "Why is it done so?—might it not be done by some better or speedier method?" A skillful mechanic is no small portion of a country's wealth. It is by this class mainly that every improvement in mechanical production has been made. Those who have these things constantly before them ought, of course, to know best what is likely to render their operations more free, and what is most calculated to abridge human labour. The amount of interest attaching to the philosophy of our mechanics and manufactures cannot be overestimated. And yet there are many practically connected with these things who turn away from them as if they had no interest at all.

It is sometimes objected that such a course as that which I propose would make any individual one-sided—that thinking only of his own trade, he would be a fit companion only for men of his own craft. But I think this is a mistake. The trades and manufactures are so connected one with the other, that it is impossible fully to understand one and to remain ignorant of the rest. They grow out of one another. You cannot find any trade that is isolated from its fellows; neither can you discover any one on which a scientific knowledge of the laws of matter, of mechanics, and of chemistry, may not be advantageously employed. Once begin to think, and the circle of thought widens, expands into larger circles, and touches the remotest bounds of scientific investigation.

From this it appears to me that simply regarded in a business light the improvement of the mind is of the highest importance. The work of improvement once fairly begun, is generally carried on. A man who cultivates a little patch in his garden ground is not willing to allow the rest to remain a wilderness. He labours away and cultivates it all. And it is just the same with the human mind.

In every sense of the word intellectual culture improves the business man. Of course, there are higher considerations than success in business; but business necessarily occupies so much of our attention that it requires much consideration. It has been said that mental improvement rather interferes with a working man or a tradesman—unfits for common avocations. It is a grievous error—nothing can be further from the truth. We want more self-improvement, more education—and the more we obtain the better it is for us all—in our social, political, and religious relations.

LET THEM TELL IT.

The celebrated Dr. Johnson used to say it was an excellent thing to encourage children to repeat to some brother, or sister, or playmate, whatever of importance they had seen or heard told. He said the very attempt to tell it to others, would fix it most indelibly on their own mind, and related that his mother, after having described to him the future joys of the blessed, directed him to go to the gardener and tell it over to him.

Parents will find this a most interesting and profitable effort. Let them be encouraged to tell to others the sermon to which they have listened, the exercises of the Sabbath school, or whatever they have seen or heard, that is worthy to be impressed on their own minds, and the effect will be good in various ways. It will fix the thing more firmly in their own mind—it will cultivate a habit of observation and attention to all that is transpiring about them; it will give them an intelligent interest in each other's society, always to listen to, or relate, what may be interesting; besides, it will help to bind parents and children in a more intimate bond of social affection, by mutually repeating to each other what each may suppose would be of interest to the other.

Children should be encouraged to tell freely their own thoughts and feelings to parents, with the assurance of sympathy on the part of the parent. Let the child know that you feel a tender interest in him, and that you will not meet even his faults with harsh rebukes, but will, with gentle solicitude, seek to mould and guide his heart to virtue and goodness. —Let him tell it.

THE PIONEER'S DAUGHTER.

A TALE OF THE AMERICAN BACKWOODS.

It was a rude log tenement, in the centre of a clearing, bordered on all sides by a dense forest, that Hugh Staunton had provided as a home for his delicately bred wife and daughter. But it was the best he could do, poor man! for a series of losses had reduced him to straitened circumstances; therefore, he emigrated to America, then, as now, the refuge of the unfortunate and the persecuted.

Two years had passed since they had settled in the wilderness; and, despite the hardships and privations to which all pioneers must submit, they found much enjoyment in this wild frontier life.

They had been accompanied by two servants, Thomas and Joanna Keeble, whose parents had died in the service of Mr. Staunton's father. Thomas had been married, but his young wife died within a year after her marriage; and he had left her sleeping in the shadow of a yew beneath the turf of her own native land. Joanna was an elderly maiden, crooked and sour in disposition, "too contrary ever to marry," Thomas declared, yet faithful to the interests of her master, whom she refused to leave when fortune took its flight.

Hugh, the only son of Mr. Staunton, had been enabled, through the assistance of a wealthy friend of his father, to remain in England at school. Ten days previous to the commencement of our story, the inmates of that humble cabin had been thrown into a tumult of delight by the arrival of Hugh Staunton and Charles Leigh, the betrothed husband of Amy Staunton. It was in the glorious autumn time; the leaves were yet thick upon the trees, crowning them in colours of gorgeous beauty. The harvesting was nearly finished. The young men had that day assisted in husking the last "stooks" of corn that remained in the harvest-field. The furniture of the cabin was primitive to the last degree. The chairs and table had been made by the ingenious Keeble, whose skillful hand had also fashioned the case that held the slender stock of books the pioneer possessed. Pieces of meat, strings of corn, muskets, powder-horns, coats, and dresses graced the walls of the cabin.

A curtain make of bed-quilts formed the partition for the sleeping-room of Mrs. Staunton, while the loft above was similarly divided.

The family had just finished their supper of corn-cakes, dried venison, butter, and milk, and, collected around the cheerful, open fireplace, were merrily chatting about friends and doings at home, when suddenly Hugh said: "Oh, Amy, you must beware of Charles! He has a wonderful gift, and will frighten you to death if you do not prove a meek and submissive wife."

A beautiful blush flooded the face of Amy at this unexpected burst.

"Pray explain yourself, my son," said Mrs. Staunton, with some interest.

"He is a ventriloquist, mother. He used to cure me of home-sickness and sea-sickness too, sometimes, on our voyage, by the mere exercise of his power."

Leigh was embarrassed by the grave, inquiring looks that were fixed upon him, for he well knew the prejudice that existed in many minds against the art to which Hugh had alluded, and which was but little known at that time. He had discovered, by accident, that he possessed the power, and only practised it for the amusement of himself and friends. It was destined, however, to be of very great service to them, as well as himself, at no distant day.

Upon the present occasion, the party begged him to give them a sample of his ventriloquial skill. He shook his head, and before he could speak, the feeble wail of an infant was heard at the door, followed by the voice of a woman appealing for charity. The family started in surprise, for never before had a mendicant appeared in that secluded place.

Joanna rushed to the door with a plate of corn-cakes in one hand and a large pewter platter in the other, too much astonished to set them down. By a wave of the hand, Hugh initiated the family into the mystery of the matter, for it was Charles who spoke.

Old Joanna, finding no one at the door, stepped back in dismay; but her vinegar face gained a fresh coat of acidity when she discovered, by the smiling faces at the hearth, that a trick had been played her.

"It's Satan's own gift. No good can come of letting that harum-scarum lad into the family," she muttered; and, without more ado, she finished clearing the supper-table.

"You see, Amy, he is a dangerous fellow. Humour him as much as is consistent with your woman's will, or he may call up a blood-thirsty Indian to murder and scalp you."

Amy shuddered at this careless remark, for she was dreadfully afraid of their savage neighbours, of whom, however, she saw but little; and they appeared well disposed towards the white people.

The following morning the family was astir before the stars had faded from the clear blue sky. They were going down to the settlement, four miles distant, to the mill and to the shop to make some few purchases for the wedding of Charles and Amy, which was to take place the following day. The wedding guests, also, were to be invited.

Hugh went, with his parents and Keeble, in a large row-boat down the river, which was but a short distance from the house.

Amy and Joanna were very much engaged in executing the work they had planned; while Charles sauntered around an hour or two; and, finding Amy too busy to accord him more than an occasional perplexed smile in the midst of her duties, he took Mr. Staunton's fowling-piece from its niche in the wall, and set off in the pursuit of game.

The cross Joanna muttered quite audibly her approval of his intention to rid them of his presence; but the pair were too happy to take offence at her bitter words.

"You know, my sweet Joanna, you would give the world if it was yourself who was to be married to-morrow," said Charles, looking over his shoulder with a provoking laugh, and dodging out of sight in time to escape the hemlock broom which the exasperated maiden despatched after him. He was absent several hours, when the declining sun warned him it was time to return home.

When he reached the edge of the dense growth of underwood that skirted the clearing, Charles took the precaution to reconnoitre before advancing. A sight that stopped the very beating of his heart met his eyes. A painted savage stood over Joanna, who lay as if dead. The savage was brandishing a tomahawk, and had one hand in her long gray hair; while Amy was half way between the cabin and the woods where he was concealed, running with the speed of a deer, and followed by a warrior, who appeared desirous of securing her without injury. With lightning speed, Charles sent a bullet crashing through his brain; and the next instant the flying girl fell fainting into his extended arms.

The report of the musket brought several warriors from the house, where they were plundering; and, after securing a covert, they soon came round upon our hero, who, impeded by his insensible companion, found it impossible to escape.

Some of the party, with flaming eyes and angry gestures, were for avenging their comrade's death without delay; but one of the number, a gaily decorated chieftain, obliged them to desist.

They hastily constructed a litter from the boughs of green trees, and placed the body of their dead brother upon it. They bound the hands of Charles with thongs of untanned deer-hide; while the passive Amy was suffered to move along unfettered, though guarded by a powerful savage. They then took up their line of march, casting looks of ominous import upon Charles, who met their glances with a smile of haughty defiance, well knowing it was impossible to conciliate them after what he had done.

In a short time darkness settled around them; but the red men pressed rapidly on, hurrying their prisoners before them. Amy, although much terrified, was busy in devising some expedient to aid their friends in the pursuit she knew would ensue on the morrow. A pair of moccasins had been drawn over her shoes in order to conceal the trail; but she contrived to slip them off unobserved, and in every moist place was careful to imprint her steps as deeply as possible.

Towards midnight, they encamped in a deep, rocky dell, inaccessible save on one side. After refreshing themselves with parched corn and dried meat, accompanied by copious draughts of water brought in birchen vessels from a crystal spring which glistened in the firelight, beneath the brow of a large rock, they bound the feet of Charles, and composed themselves to sleep. One of the red men was stationed by the side of Amy, who was not bound, as a guard, while the others slept. The fire was a source of keen enjoyment to poor Amy, who would have suffered intensely from cold but for the warmth of a large woollen apron which she wore when captured, and which now served as a shawl.

Her anxiety to escape drove all thought of sleep from her mind, as she sat upon a moss-covered log and watched the dusky guard, in the hope of seeing him slumber at his post; but the keen black eyes were kept warily open; and, did she but move a finger, the unerring hatchet was half raised, showing her that any attempt to escape would be followed by instant death. Discouraged by the wakefulness of the guard, Amy rested her head upon one hand, and remained an hour or two brooding sorrowfully over the unpromising dawn that was to usher in her bridal morn. She thought of the anguish of her parents at her loss, if, indeed, they were alive; and the tears coursed down her cheeks. She looked sadly towards Charles, who was reclining in an uneasy position several feet from her; and by the waning light of the fire, she saw his eyes glance expressively towards the guard. She glanced that way, and saw, with delight, that he was sleeping profoundly.

"Now," thought the resolute little maiden, "now, Amy Staunton, strive for freedom, if you die in the attempt."

She slipped her hand into her pocket, and drew forth a small penknife. Having opened it, she stepped lightly over the body of the savage, and in a moment had severed the cords that bound her lover. The thongs had been drawn so tightly that he was unable to move at first. In the meantime, Amy expressed, by signs, her determination to secure the fowling-piece, which she knew to be loaded. Amazed by such an exhibition of daring in a timid, delicate girl, Charles endeavoured to detain her; but, without heeding his entreating looks, she went into the very midst of the savages and seized the gun, then, with step as soft as the fall of a flower, made good her retreat.

In another moment they were beyond the pass; but Amy inadvertently trod upon a dry stick, which broke with a loud crackling noise, and instantly every Indian was upon his feet; then followed hasty questionings; and the fugitives knew they were searching for the trail by the light of the fire.

In the tumult they crept into a clump of alder-bushes, and concealed themselves. It is possible they might have escaped but for the keen scent of a gaunt Indian dog, which led their pursuers to the spot where they nestled, scarcely daring to breathe. They were dragged from their hiding-place, and this time Amy too was bound; but her mild gray eyes flashed with unwonted fire; and she told them, in strong English—of which, however, they could not understand one word—that she defied them, and would yet escape their toils. Despite his anguish, Charles smiled at the indomitable spirit of his lady-love; and though his will was as undaunted as hers, he suffered himself to be bound without resistance.

After a brief consultation, the red men composed themselves to sleep once more; and all was silent again. The drowsy guard, evidently in disgrace, sat moodily apart, regarding the captives with looks of vengeful ire; while another had taken his post at the pass.

(To be concluded in our next.)

CORSETS.

WHEN I was over in your town,
Some months ago, or more,
I saw a very singular thing
I never saw before.

'Twas hanging in a window-case,
Upon a string a-straddle;
Looked something like an hour-glass,
And something like a saddle.

I asked of several city gents
Who chanced to be at hand,
What was it? But their gibberish
I could not understand.

One fellow called it "a restraint,"
On certain parties placed,
Like a decree in Chancery,
To stay the tenant's "waste."

Another said—the greenest chap
Of any in the swarm—
"It warn't the glass of fashion," but
It was the "mould of form."

Another said "'twas a machine"
A lady used to "rig her,"
To bring her life and form into
The very smallest figure.

At last a little girl came out—
And think of my amazement—
She asked me if I wouldn't please
To buy a pair of stays!

Of course I'd heard of "stays" before,
But strike me deaf and dumb
If ever I, until that hour,
Suspected "them was um!"

Well, isn't it exceeding strange
That any maid or wife,
Just for a "little taper" should Put out the "lamp of life?"

I know that lunatics must have Strait-jackets "put about" 'em;
But women in their wits should make
A shift—to do—without 'em.

MR. SCOTT RUSSELL, F.R.S.

THE art of ship-building is one of peculiar interest to Englishmen. The development of the chief characteristic of the race—the love of mercantile pursuits—is so intimately connected with the progress of this branch of industry, that we naturally feel deeply interested in its advance. The geographical position of the country would make us an isolated people but for our taste and aptitude for the navigation of the waters. Hence every progressive step in naval architecture is watched with marked attention.

The application of steam-power to ocean navigation is one of the most important achievements of the age. The first Atlantic steamer, the Great Western, crossed in 1838. She was 236 feet long, and 36 feet broad. She was followed in 1844 by the Great Britain, which measured nearly one hundred feet longer, and some fifteen feet wider. The next great step in ship-building was the construction of the Himalaya, in 1853. This magnificent vessel is 370 feet long by 44 in breadth. Three years after the advent of the last-named ship, the Persia, as yet the largest paddle steamer afloat, was launched, and astonished the world by her noble proportions, and eventually by her splendid speed. She has made the journey to America in less than ten days, the quickest passage on record.

The great fact of the present day, however, is the monster vessel just constructed in the yard of Mr. Scott Russell at Millwall. This ship seems destined to work an entire revolution in steam navigation. Assuming that the calculations of the engineer of the Leviathan are correct, our present notion of ship-building is certainly in its infancy. Indeed, a few years hence, we shall in all probability look upon our Himalayas, our Great Britains, and our Persias, as we now look upon the ordinary boats running between Hull and London.

The Leviathan has been constructed expressly for the Australian traffic. The distance between England and Australia is some twelve thousand miles, and the reason small steamers cannot perform the passage quickly, is the necessity of stopping on the way—in fact, to diverge considerably out of the direct course—to renew their supply of coals. The Leviathan will carry sufficient fuel for the entire journey—namely, 12,000 tons. Her passenger accommodation will be 800 first class, 2,000 second class, and 1,300 third class—in all 4,100. The crew will number about 400, in addition to which she will carry many thousand tons of cargo. For the accommodation of the passengers, the vessel has whole streets and squares of apartments fitted up in superb style. One of the saloons is 100 feet long, 36 feet wide, and 13 feet high. It is estimated that the Leviathan, running with paddle, screw, and sail, and going in a direct line to her destination, will make the journey to Australia in little more than thirty days.

The length of the Leviathan is 680 feet, and her breadth 83 feet.

The projector of this gigantic undertaking is Mr. Scott Russell, and to him belongs the responsibility of her merits or defects as a piece of naval architecture. Long before the building of monster ships was thought of, Mr. Scott Russell had done the state good service in improving its style of building passage vessels. Knowing that faulty construction was one of the greatest impediments to speed, Mr. Scott Russell, as far back as twenty years ago, suggested the plan, and built ships on the principle, now known as the "wave line"—i.e., tapering in front so as to cut a passage for the body and stern of the vessel with the least possible amount of resistance from the waves. The principle has been since carried out to the fullest extent both in England and in America. The "clipper" built sailing ships are constructed on the same model. We learn from Mr. Scott Russell that at the present time there are two ships running between Newhaven and Dieppe which are identical in shape with the Leviathan. They were built by Mr. Russell, and are found to answer exceedingly well, having run at the rate of nineteen miles an hour.

Mr. John Scott Russell was born in the vale of Clyde, in 1808. He studied at the University of St. Andrews, and graduated with honours at the early age of sixteen. His father was wealthy, and encouraged him to pursue his studies in mechanics, physics, and the higher branches of mathematics. In these studies he attained considerable proficiency, and made such advances, that when Sir John Leslie, the distinguished philosopher, left the professorship of natural philosophy vacant by his lamented and unexpected death in 1832, the young student, Scott Russell, was selected to fill his place. He was found to be singularly efficient for the post; he delivered a course of lectures on natural philosophy with entire success, and to the surprise of the students, who, being mostly older than the lecturer, scarcely expected to find a mind so richly stored. In the meantime Mr. Scott Russell was studying the practical duties of an engineer, and worked for a considerable time in one of the largest engineering firms in Scotland; from thence he came to London, and settled down as a ship-builder; this was in 1844. As a man of science he began to investigate the laws by which water opposes resistance to the motion of ships and floating bodies. As a result he established the existence of the "wave of translation," and so far improved the form of ships that they possess the quality of the least possible resistance. These important improvements were brought before the Royal Society of Edinburgh in 1837, and gained for Mr. Russell the distinction of the large gold medal. He was also elected Fellow of the Society, and voted to a seat in the council. A still greater distinction, however, awaited him from the practical introduction and marked success of the new system of construction. Ten miles an hour, the ordinary rate of speed across the ocean, at once advanced to sixteen or seventeen; and, in later days, the application of the principle to sailing vessels, under the name of "clipper," has been attended with such success, that on long journeys, where steamers have to diverge for coaling, the sail has sufficed to propel the vessel as quick and even quicker than steam. In 1847 Mr.

Scott Russell obtained the higher distinction of being elected F.R.S. of London; he was also elected member of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and member of the Society of Arts.

Mr. Scott Russell was actively employed in the Great Exhibition of 1851, having taken a principal part in planning and organizing that undertaking. Like every well-educated man, he is exceedingly modest, and kind and affable to all men. As a lecturer he is not without merit. He speaks clearly and to the purpose, evidently understanding how to touch upon the salient points of his subject, and to convey his meaning without appearing verbose or tedious.

Our portrait is from an admirable photograph, recently taken by Mr. Mayall, of Regent-street.

BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF RHODES, IN 1480.

THE SIEGE OF RHODES IN 1480.

THERE is much that is attractive to the traveller and to the scholar in the Mediterranean Sea. Its coasts and its islands are famous in the annals of the past. The language of Dr. Johnson does not exaggerate the interest of this remarkable locality, for on "those shores were the four great empires of the world, the Assyrian, the Carthaginian, the Grecian, and the Roman; all our religion, almost all our laws, almost all our arts, almost all that sets us above savages, have come to us from the Mediterranean."

The islands of the Mediterranean are as interesting as its shores. Of these islands that of Rhodes is one of the most famous. It lies off the south-west coast of Asia Minor, and is about five-and-forty miles in length, and eighteen in breadth. Its population is estimated at about 25,000, of whom a large number are Greeks, but in its present condition, even in this respect, it bears no comparison to its former state. The opulence and renown of the island are things of the past, and its once famous fertility is not now to be seen. More than two thousand years ago it was described as—

"A region fragrant with fertile seed
Of plants, and herbs, and fruits and foodful grain;
Each verdant hill unnumbered flocks doth feed,
Unnumbered men possess each flowery vale."

But its agriculture is now in a most depressed condition. Tyranny and intolerance have disheartened the producers; much of the soil lies waste, and its cornfields and vineyards yield nothing to satisfy Olympus, and little for even ordinary men. The climate, however, is still very fine. Oppression cannot change that; and every wind is laden with aromatic fragrance. The genial warmth prevails throughout most of the year, and "hardly a day passes," so the people say, "in which the sun is not visible."

For the political and social sunshine of Rhodes, however, we must look into the past; and there we find that at a very early period it was distinguished alike for its wealth and its wisdom. There the arts and sciences, literature and laws, made rapid advances, and the names of its military and naval heroes figure conspicuously in the old world's catalogue of worthies. At the siege of Troy there was a Prince of Rhodes playing an active part; though the Rhodians were for a short time subdued by Mausolus, they soon asserted their freedom and drove away their invaders; with all his strength and strategy, his soldiers and his science, Demetrius could make no impression on the brave islanders; and Mithridates was equally unsuccessful in an attempt on their liberty. Deservedly, then, were these Rhodians ranked amongst the steadiest and most powerful allies of the Roman Empire.

The city of Rhodes was founded during the Peloponnesian war, and was remarkable for its symmetry and magnificence. Strabo gave it the preference over both Rome and Alexandria. It is "so much superior," says he, "to other cities, as to admit of no comparison." Its temples were splendid specimens of architecture, and contained the most beautiful statuary. To this Pindar alludes:—

"Thence in all arts the sons of Rhodes excel,
Though best their forming hands the chisel guide;
Then in each street the breathing marbles tell
The stranger's wonder and the city's pride.

The most celebrated of these productions was the work of Chares of Lindus, and is known as the Colossus of Rhodes. It was a magnificent brazen statue, erected in honour of Apollo, the tutelary deity of the island, and measured more than 100 feet in height. The expense of the Colossus was defrayed by the sums received by the Rhodians for the engines used by Demetrius in the siege, and which he gave up to them. Blaise de Vigenère states that the Colossus stood with a foot on each side the entrance to the harbour, and that the largest vessels under full sail passed between its legs. Rollin has adopted the story, and re-stated it in his Ancient History. But considerable doubt has been thrown upon it, as there is not a shadow of authority for it in any ancient writer. However, the Colossus was counted amongst the wonders of the world. It was set up B.C. 278, and thrown down by an earthquake about fifty years afterwards. It lay where it fell for nearly 800 years. When the Saracens seized on the island, they broke up the statue, and sold the brass (720,900 pounds weight) to a Jew of Alexandria, who, according to Dufresnoy, loaded nine hundred camels with the burden.

This allusion to the Saracens brings us to the more immediate subject of our sketch. About the year 667, when Mohammedanism was making rapid advances, and the Crescent was triumphing on many a blood-stained field, the Saracens came down on Rhodes and seized it for themselves. It was subsequently recovered by the Eastern Emperors, and by them presented to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. The ruins of the island, and especially of the city, indicate the engineering skill of those old Christian soldiers. If nothing else was known of the island, the remains of its fortifications would lead us to the conclusion that they were the work of the same master-hand that had constructed those of Malta.

When the Eastern Empire ceased to exist, Byzantium fell a prey to the infidels. Mahomet II., one of those men who are born for conquest, sat on the throne of Constantine, and his reign was marked by a succession of brilliant victories. It is said, but without much foundation, that he was the child of a Christian mother, and that he had received a virtuous education; but however this may be, there are few men whose lives exhibit so much that was contradictory, so many elements antagonistic to one another. History—notwithstanding his crimes—cannot withhold the title of Great from Mahomet II. Art and literature flourished under his rule. Even Christendom preserved his memory, by introducing new prayers specially directed against him, prayers which are still maintained in the Catholic liturgy. An annual feast was introduced into the calendar, in commemoration of a victory obtained over this redoubtable Turk. A crusade was formed against him, such as had never before been seen, in which the Pope and the College of Cardinals took part. The Emperor Frederick IV. instituted a new order of knighthood, binding the chevaliers specially to fight against this namesake of the Prophet. Popes, emperors, kings, priests, soldiers, and civilians, all joined against him; they waived private differences, forgot private wrongs, buried private animosities, and made common cause against the Eastern warrior. But of all who prayed or fought to defeat his designs and overthrow his power, none equalled the knights of St. John of Jerusalem. His hatred for them, and their hatred of him, was never surpassed. In all his battles, victories, or defeats, the standard of the cross argent on the field gules, fluttered in the foremost ranks of his opponents. In his insatiable thirst for revenge, he resolved to exterminate these brave knights. All who fell into his hands, he mercilessly put to death, and with the intention of sweeping the whole chapter at once into the sea, he laid siege to Rhodes.

The enterprise of Mahomet II., in 1480, against Rhodes, and the intrepidity manifested by its defenders, is one of the most brilliant episodes in the history of that age. Much has been written about it by foreign authors, and in the Imperial Library, at Paris, several interesting manuscripts, literary and pictorial, contain much valuable matter with respect to the siege not generally known. Availing ourselves of these materials, we propose to lay before our readers, two or three illustrated articles on the siege of Rhodes—a siege which exhibited, more than any similar event, the heroic valour of the knights of old.

CHAPTER XL.

ADVERTISES AN INVESTMENT.

CLAUDE BLANCE knew better than to go back at once to his lodgings with the few shillings he brought away, the gift of the Magdalens in the court.

They would not have paid a fiftieth part of his debt, and would have only quickened the appetite of his hungry landlord for the impossible balance.

At least, this was Claude's reflection.

He was very likely wrong; for one of the commonest and most fatal errors of poverty, especially of criminal or extravagant poverty, is to pay nothing, because you cannot pay all.

However, Claude's plan was to turn away from the chief thoroughfares, and swallow a cup of coffee and eat a slice of bread-and-butter at one of those open-air extempore breakfast-tables, where, depend on it, you often get better served than in many a prouder establishment under cover; and then he thought he would try, by the old means, to make the little that remained sufficiently more to be able to go to what he called his home.

To do this, you must understand, it was necessary to try a certain graduated scale of luck.

He began with a certain miserable hole in Mile-end, where the proprietor's ambition condescended to notice even shillings and sixpences. This was a place where you could sit down with your humble pot of half-and-half, and always be sure of a game with "mine host" himself, a game of "beggar my neighbour" or "cribbage;" and, if the landlord preferred winning, you always lost.

On this occasion, however, it was otherwise.

"Why, bless my soul," said the lord of "The White Weasel," as Claude went in, "if here ain't my dear friend, the Daisy, come back to life! Well, old boy, glad to see yer!"

And the greasy old villain shook by the hand, by the bare, ungloved hand, the son of the late Honourable Hugh, late Justice of the Peace for the county of Wilts.

"And how did yer leave Abr'am and Isaac, and the rest of 'em, guv'nor? For ye've been buried among 'em a precious while—eh? I began a-thinkin' we'd ver'y likely done summut to rile yer without knowin' on it—I'm sure without knowin' on it. How are yer, eh?"

"Stow it!" said Claude, in no cue for jokes.

For he was about, he thought, to throw away another of his "last chances," of which he had thrown away so many already.

He was used to the familiarity of the mis-shapen old wretch, but it was ill-timed just then.

"Bless us!" muttered the landlord, as he slouched away to get his visitor the customary potion. "Dry to-day, werry dry, I'm afeard—two ways! Vite or black, Daisy, eh?" he added, aloud.

"Both! you old fool; and touch it with the mountain dew, if that won't quite burn a hole in one's gullet. It did last time."

And the man turned round, as if to see the aperture in his guest's throat, and laughing a hideous laugh, toddled for the gin and beer.

The cards were, of course, marked as usual, and so that even Claude, who was no innocent, could very easily have been done.

But this was not at present the policy of his antagonist.

The losses had lately been too much on one side; and to this the absence of "The Daisy" was attributed.

So, when they got up, after two or three hours' play, Claude was a couple of sovereigns richer than when they began.

"Goin'!" said his friend; "now that's what I call clearin' of a covey jolly well out. Where my sweet wife (as ought to be) is likely to get the 'ousekeepin' for to-day and to-morrow, bless'd if I can tell yer. Hows'ever, hows'ever, 'tis your turn—so 'tis. I'll forgive ye, Daisy. One more drop?"

"Not a half o' one," said Claude.

Standing opposite a very polygonal piece of looking-glass that stood on the mantelpiece, and tilted against the wall, Claude untied his cravat and took off his shirt-collar.

"Whew! whew!" whistled his companion, "what on earth's the matter with the man, barin' of his neck in that ghastly way. 'Ave a razor, dear?"

But Claude gave the little wretch one quick jerk of his elbow, and sent him staggering against the wall; bidding him, at the same time, to go where he had often, and with some justice, been told to go before.

Claude turned his collar inside outside, re-folded his cravat, and brushed up his breast-pin; buttoned his double-breasted waistcoat over a very dingy linen front, and tucking up his wristbands out of sight, drew out a pair of gloves, which he thought he had lost, but which certain hands (though neither you nor I, good reader, would have thought it, perhaps) had carefully doubled up and put in that pocket, by dead of night.

"I'm going now," said Claude, "to see gentlemen."

And the old man swore, and asked whether his gentlemen would lose their money to him, as he had been fool enough to do?

"Yes," Claude said, "if they had the same infernal reason for losing that some folks have."

And in another minute he was gone.

CHAPTER XLI.

PLAY.

How strange it is, reader, to watch the pendulum of benevolence in different epochs of English, and especially of London life.

Pull it up to the left-hand side, further than it ought to go, in the days of the Tudors and the Stuarts; let the vices and the miseries of the poor be left to take their chances and murder their victims, while nobles, and clergy, and law-makers care for none but themselves. And then, up will spring the pendulum, in these happier times, to the right side, and we hear of little but the reform, the instruction, the conversion, of the "working-classes."

Mark, we say, the right side—right in the best sense. For if we needed to have monopoly of Benevolence for any class, let us have it for the larger ones.

But need we this monopoly?

And may not this be the very day, good reader, in which—without taking a jot less about the vices of the poor, or the ungodliness of the poor—we might reasonably think oftener on the vices of their (you'll call them) bettors?

It is not always Malice—it may be Philanthropy, a gentle sister—who asks to pull out your mote, when in her own eye there is a beam.

But the law applies to Philanthropy as thoroughly as to Malice—

"Pull out the mote out of thine eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the beam out of thy brother's eye."

Ten probabilities against one, it was none of the "working-class" which gave poor Su and Pol, on the very last night in our story, that slouching walk in London streets, and so poor a hospital into which to carry Claude Blance Latson.

(Though we are not quite sure they would have done it, had they themselves never drunk the out-cast's bitter cup!)

No, and if working-classes have their Mile-end, we have heard of Respectable Hells, farther, much farther west.

What then?

Do less for the working-classes? God forbid! Do it more humbly, and less like a patron: less as the beadle gives the loaf, in the country parish church, from the parson's hands into Mother Dripping's.

And, above all, get some reformatories for richer men. Call them what you like, but get them!

'This has been suggested to me, by the walk which poor Latson took, when he left "The White Weasel."

It was not a Regent-street, or a Pall-mall house, that he next entered; certainly not. He must have climbed a longer ladder, and changed his collar altogether, to have got into one of those houses on the same errand.

No! but it was the next stage in order—he knew the order well; it was a house in the neighbourhood of Leicester-square.

He was met in the passage by an inner door—a very stout and strong one—what cared he for its strength?

"Rat-tat!" a pause, then, "rat-tat-tat!" and so on, to as many tats as he could, till the door opened.

That was the orthodox signal. But the door was held only ajar, till the porter saw Claude's face.

Then, he just slipped himself in, and several strong bars kept him in.

Latson had no sooner entered the outer gaming-room, where a billiard table was the only, or at least the only questionable article of furniture, when there strode up to him a man of about his own height, but apparently a little older, and merely prefacing his act with the words which, as he never expected to see them on a page like this, we will not repeat, plunged his fist into Claude's face, and felled him to the floor.

You could have guessed that you were in a room, to which signals and passwords were required to admit you, from observing the way in which some five-and-twenty men, who were present, witnessed this outrage.

"Up again, Daithy!" said a little shrill voice with a lisp, that came from an equally insignificant little man, who had the cue in his hand, and just turned his head before trying the cannon, and saw what happened.

"I say, Swillman," observed another, quite under his breath, as if afraid of being heard, "do you know we've got nerves, my dear fellow? I dare say it's all right, you know; but really, 'pon honour, you've turned this punch, on my stomach, to butter—absolute butter—my dear fellow."

"Bravo! That's him! Score it! Score it!" cried half the voices at once. "That's magnificent—as a finish!"

And the money jingled on the table, as a new victory was won; while poor Claude was picking himself up.

"And pray, sir," he said to Swillman, who seemed inclined to repeat the experiment, as Claude sank on a sofa, "what do you mean by that?"

"I mean, sir, that the next time you've anything to say against a lady, you'll avoid anybody who happens to be a particular friend of mine."

"Lady?" cried Latson. "Who have I spoken about, you scoundrel, that belongs to you?"

"Scoundrel!" shouted the other.

And Swillman fell upon his adversary as he crouched down on the sofa; and, unless the little squeaky gentleman, with half-a-dozen others, had persuaded him to take it coolly, and "fight fair," there would have been, either an inquest, or a secret funeral, in that house, a few hours after.

Claude had not the faintest recollection of any circumstance to which the words of Swillman could possibly refer: but these two had done nothing but quarrel since first they met in those estimable halls.

The only explanation he could afterwards give to himself was, that as he remembered to have left the house rather obfuscated with punch and other excitants, when last at play, he must have unconsciously committed the offence of which Swillman had thus kept the penalty in reserve.

This was the more likely, as Claude was one of those who are often drunk, when, to all appearances, they are still in their senses.

"Confound ye!" said one gentleman, to Swillman, "don't stamp out the Daisy till he's paid ye the money. Don't he owe ye a trifle, Swillman?"

"Owe me? Of course he does,—a thief!" cried the other.

"Owe ye? What do I owe ye?" murmured Latson, fetching breath, as well as he could.

"Aha! ye've forgotten that too, have ye?" Swillman said, appealing for applause to all the bystanders; who, having finished their game, were enjoying the fracas.

"I'll trouble you, Mr. Latson, for that fifty pounds at your earliest convenience," said his enemy, with a low bow.

"Did I lose fifty pounds to him, Solomon?" said the poor fellow, to one of them who stood apart, and who had been rather quieter in view of the assault.

"Undoubtedly," said Solomon; "there's no question about that fact, my dear Latson."

"Then he shall be paid," said Claude; "and he only has to thank his parents for a little more muscle than I've got, or he should be paid another debt, too."

And Claude, sick with pain and mortification, was turning to leave the room.

"Stop, sir!" shouted Swillman. "Where and when shall I be paid? Mention, sir, time and place, if it so please you, before all these gentlemen, before you say good night."

"Will you take a bill, payable at three months?"

"Signed by Aldgate Pump, I suppose? Who signs it?"

And Claude mentioned a name that seemed to satisfy his creditor; and, fixing the next night, and that same room, he was allowed, poor wretch, to take himself and his two sovereigns past the strong and the stout door.

CHAPTER XLII.

CHANGES TO EARNEST.

On the next night, when Claude entered the billiard-room at an early hour, the time fixed, no one was there.

But, early as it was, it would have been evident to any, even a cursory, observer, how at least a part of his two sovereigns had been laid out.

He flung himself on the sofa, and was soon in a snoring sleep, dreaming, perhaps (who knows?), that he is reading "Pilgrim's Progress," away in Wiltshire, with Mrs. Glyde, and that the two girls in Court, dressed in white, are Prudence and Charity, at the gate of the House Beautiful!

When Latson awoke, he started up at observing that Swillman was lounging on an opposite sofa.

He could scarcely suppose that any consideration for him, or any regard to good manners, had induced such a man to let him sleep on there, instead of keeping his appointment.

But he gave himself no time for reflections or questions, and strode across the room; and, with a stiff bow, apologised for having kept him waiting; and then opened his pocket-book, and taking from it the bill for fifty pounds, rather threw it than laid it on the table; and, having got his acknowledgment, recrossed to his place, intending to wait for the trial of "luck" which he had missed the night before.

That night Claude was considerably the winner,—and the next night, and the next.

For by this time, and indeed long since, he had become quite as able, and quite as willing to fleece new-comers as any one there who had the chance. He, like the rest, lost with the greater, and won with the lesser, scoundrels than himself.

It was on the third night after the discharge of his debt, when Claude was in high glee at his success, at the cost of a "new hand" whom he was rapidly emptying, that Swillman dashed, in hot haste, into the room, and set the whole company agog by his impetuosity and high excitement.

Pushing every one else away that intercepted, and seeing Claude at the upper end of the apartment, he rushed up to him with the bill in his hand, and holding it so as nearly to touch his face, shouted out—

"So, I've not done with you yet, eh? Suppose I hadn't found you, where would my fifty pounds have been, you double-dyed villain! Isn't it enough, eh, that you must blackguard my friends—ladies that would make slaves of your sisters—but you must put me off, here, with a forged acceptance?"

"The first name wasn't good for much,—but if it was, it died spark out yesterday; and the second is a forgery!"

And the room's company all gathered round the pair of gamblers, some whistling, or laughing, but most of them much graver, as if concerned for the honour of the establishment.

Latson grew first pale, then livid, as he said, almost with a shriek—

"Forgery!—forgery! You lie!—you know you lie! There is no second name!"

And he snatched the bill out of Swillman's fingers. But, quick as lightning, Swillman had it back again, and began to show it to two or three of the more experienced bystanders.

Sure enough, two names were endorsed, and the second was the name of Claude's uncle by marriage, "Ernest Montgomery."

Latson stood like a statue at this exposure, before all the company.

"Well, sir," he stammered out, "I deny, I utterly deny!" and then, as if a sudden thought occurred to him, he added, "Well, sir, and what right have you to pronounce the signature a forgery?"

But he trembled from head to foot.

"Who proves, sir, that Mr. Montgomery did not sign the bill?"

Swillman's look of triumph told him in an instant that he had ruined himself by this change of language.

But in the fearful embarrassment of the moment, and thinking that Swillman was not likely to have consulted his uncle at Sharstone since the bill was given, he stumbled (what had men do not stumble, in an emergency?) on the most fatal and foolish of falsehoods.

"Mr. Montgomery," said Swillman, with a fiendish smile, and a quiet, cool deliberation, that maddened

Claude, "may perhaps be allowed an opinion on his own handwriting."

And poor Latson sank down on the nearest seat, the cold sweat bursting from every pore of his forehead, so that his handsome locks dripped again.

"Plenty of time, sir," said Swillman, with a horrid grin, "only your footmen have arrived, and are in the street, at your service."

It was a sad, sad sight, to see the look which Claude gave to his enemy—far more sad than if it had been a look of fury or of malice.

The look was that of one who has foreseen his doom for many a long and weary day, and many a longer and more weary night, and now sees that it has come at last.

He moved, staggering towards the door, Swillman following, and looking back with a leer to say "Tat-tat!" to the more cautious villains who remained.

Just before reaching the door, Latson stopped short, and, turning convulsively round, lifted his right arm, and with a fearful oath, declared that his uncle had signed the bill, that he had met him in town that very day before it was given to Swillman, and that—

He said much more,—it is sickening to write it—he seemed to be going mad. He would never have said it, or a syllable of it, if long suffering and crime had not made him, in mind as in body, a wretched invalid.

Two or three days after, Claude was committed for trial, on a charge of forgery.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THORNS AMONG ROSES.

Two days before the arrest of Latson at the gambling-house in Leicester-square, there was mourning and lamentation in the old rectory at Sharstone.

The family were all seated round the father's library table, and he was playing with the younger children one of their favourite games.

A gentleman was announced as waiting to see Mr. Montgomery in the dining-room.

"I have taken the liberty," said the stranger, "of coming down, in some haste, from London, to ask a question of you about a little matter of business, though I'm exceedingly sorry to disturb you at so late an hour of the day."

Mr. Montgomery bowed.

"I have had lately a little transaction with a gentleman in town, who has given me a bill bearing your name, and from circumstances that have come to my knowledge, I thought I should be more satisfied if I succeeded in getting a personal interview with the acceptor."

Mr. Montgomery looked almost as pale as his miserable nephew had done, for he caught at the fact, with a horrible facility.

Strange, that the miseries of the evil and the good, should, though so different, often equal one another!

The more shame to the evil, who do the horrid work.

"I never accepted a bill for any man in my life, sir," said the rector, with perfect calmness and determination, but with deep secret anguish.

Mr. Swillman produced the document.

"The writing is not mine, sir, and when you learn that the drawer of this bill is the son of my wife's sister, you will understand how much it costs me to make the announcement to you."

"I almost feared as much, sir," replied the visitor. "Then I fear we shall have to request your presence in London. You will no doubt agree with me, that—"

"Is there no way of avoiding that?" said the rector, covering his face with his hand and beginning to walk the room. "I would willingly pay this money, sir, to avoid that—willingly."

"My dear sir, the transaction between us is already known to several parties; compounding, in such a case, is a dangerous game. Besides which, I think I ought to tell you, that your nephew's manner of living has long been such as that some severe lesson, like this, may be his only salvation."

Montgomery sighed deeply, and paced still up and down.

Before they parted they agreed to travel together the next day.

There was a sad scene when Ernest returned to the library.

He kept no secrets from Maude. Happy the husband who does likewise: prodigates make, and suicides are made by, secrets from wives.

But the poor children could make nothing of their mother's tears. All that she said was, that cousin Claude was in trouble, and that papa was going to London to see him.

Some people, as Archdeacon Hare says, seem to be born into the world merely for the sake of other people. The archdeacon instances the case of infants who are born to be loved for a few hours and then die, as a discipline to their parents.

He might have added, the case of wicked relations. We must conclude that it was not good, for the happy Sharstone family, to become too happy. So one end, at least, of Claude's existence was to teach them the old, old lesson, that this is "not our rest, because it is polluted."

Maude had had many a broken night through the crimes of the father, and now she was not allowed to settle down into perfect bliss with husband and children. The son brought his tribute of thorns to the village rose-tree.

Montgomery went up, and, without more than a glance at Claude as he stood before the magistrates, disowned the signature, and saw his nephew led off to Newgate, committed on Swillman's testimony and his own.

CHAPTER XLIV.

SHOWS THAT BLOOD IS THICKER THAN WATER.

"LATSON! Latson! What's this?" said Hugh Church, as he hurried over the police-report in the morning paper the day after Claude's committal. "Forgery! committed for trial! Latson! It isn't a common name."

Hugh's practice lay in a very different direction from the pleas of the crown. Neither his partner nor himself had ever had anything to do with criminal law.

This is a strange feature in the practice of the law, but a universal one. Hundreds of the country's best lawyers, thousands, would rather have been concerned all their lives in the settlement of conveyances, where a few yards of dirt were all the matter in dispute, than be suspected of once interfering with the conviction or acquittal of a fellow-creature on trial for his life.

Nothing we can say, probably, will make any difference. Criminal law is voted the lowest kind of law, "and there's an end."

But it has always appeared to us anomalous, and also sad, that the world should not consider it respectable in its lawyers to meddle with the liberty for life, or with the life itself, of any of its fellows.

Argue the right of A. B. to a backyard, ten feet square, and get it for him,—you are not only a successful, but a highly respectable man.

Plead, more than once in forty years, for the life of C. D., a woman on her trial for murder, and you are—what? Well, a mere Old Bailey lawyer.

We can't help it—there it is. We take leave to think it rotten, a rotten fiction of legal etiquette.

For, if the greatness of the stake—Well, but why argue it? There it is,—and, as we observed, there it will remain.

However, Hugh's blood was stirred within him for the moment.

What do we mean? Are you sure that it was merely the accident of the name?

We are not. In a former chapter we have said something about the sympathy—we dare not call it the magnetic sympathy—of kindred.

We cannot pursue it; it will come out another day. Be it as it will, the word "Latson" determined Hugh. In another hour he was closeted with Claude.

"I have to apologise," said Mr. Church, as he entered Claude's cell, "for the liberty I've taken in asking for an interview."

"Not at all," said the other. "I'm quite aware of the liberty I take; but the truth is, that I once had a friend of your name—it is not a common name,—and I've come to ask whether I can be of any service to you in what I'm sure is a very anxious crisis for you?"

"What are you?" said Latson, looking down on the ground. "I'm a barrister," Hugh answered; "in a somewhat different line of practice from that which you, I suppose, require; but, if you have not yet engaged counsel, and will waive all ceremony, it will be a great gratification to me to hear anything you have to say on this unhappy affair, and—"

"What is your name?" asked Claude. "You'll not know my name: it is Church—Mr. Church, of the Middle Temple. But, if you'll excuse my stating my reasons—I have reasons—for offering, free of any cost to you, to enter into this matter, I shall be glad."

"You're very good," said Latson; "but I don't see that you or any one else can be of any great use to me. I've been, for some time past, scarcely myself; and there's the name—there's the name of my uncle to this bill; I can't deny that—I can't deny that; and I must have put it there at some time when I didn't know what I was doing, Mr. Church, I suppose; but, before God, if forgery were still a hanging business, I've no recollection of it—not any more than a babe unborn."

And so they talked the matter over. Claude could not have humbled himself more before any living being than he did during the conversation.

He said that for a long time his brain had been in such a state, that he hardly knew what he did; and that it was quite possible that, in an evil moment, he had put his uncle's name, as an additional guarantee, to the bill.

They continued together for some time. And Hugh left the prison unable to conceal from himself that the case were an ugly look, but under a deep conviction that he was bound to do his best, and with a firm resolution that he would.

When those two men shook hands at the cell-door, did the father of both, watch them as they parted?

Did he see the foundling stride out, free as air, and the pet of his house, remaining a prisoner, cower down upon his hard bedside, and wring his hands, cursing the day wherein he was born?

Were the two mothers by?

The coffin in the vault, on the stone shelf; and the other coffin in the poor country churchyard grave against the gravel walk,—there they both were.

But Ethel may have seen the only joy she had ever known since her marriage, overshadowed by a common goal!

And Joyce may have seen the lad she laid under the bush, still cared for by the angel!

Who knows?

Chemical Experiments.

To dissolve a flint into a colourless fluid.—An unchemical observer, looking upon a flint pebble, would be apt to regard it as the very type of permanent hardness; nevertheless, that very flint pebble was probably held in solution once; and, following the directions I am about to give, the reader shall convert it, or at any rate a portion of it, into solution again.

In describing these chemical experiments for the amusement of general readers, I have chosen to assume that only the very simplest apparatus, or none at all, is available. I suppose it would be useless for me to talk about a crucible of silver or of platinum, or even of earthenware; but if I am content to put up with the services of an iron spoon, probably the reader of this will not have to seek long for the means wherewith to prosecute the experiment.

Take a piece of flint (a gun-flint will, perhaps, be the most convenient); powder the flint minutely—which can be most readily effected by heating it to redness in the fire, and quenching it, whilst red-hot, in a basin of water. By the above-mentioned treatment the flint will be cracked in hundreds of mingled lines, and may be reduced to powder with ease, in almost any sort of mortar except one of glass.

Rub up along with the flint thus powdered, about twice its own weight of pearlsh, and four times its own weight of carbonate of soda, such as is used for soda powders; common washing soda that has been melted and dried will answer even better.

The flinty powder and compound alkaline materials having been well incorporated, the next point to be accomplished is to heat the mixture to redness for ten minutes or so, in a strong fire. An iron spoon will serve that purpose pretty well, but a deeper vessel of iron would answer even better; and a crucible of platinum, if the operator possesses such, would answer better still; though, in the latter case, one would do wrong to place such a valuable thing as a platinum crucible amidst the coals of an ordinary fire.

Whatever the crucible, or the substitute for a crucible employed may be, the object is to cause the flinty and alkaline materials to enter into fusion by the application of strong heat. The more completely fusion has been accomplished, the more complete will be the finality of our experiment. With the rough apparatus which is the only one I suppose the operator to possess, the union of flinty and alkaline material will scarcely be perfect; still the result will be sufficiently near perfection to show what could be done in a similar way under more favourable auspices.

As soon as the fused mass has grown cold, and can be handled, get it out of the spoon or other vessel by hammering, and project it into water; or immersing the vessel and its contents in water, allow the contents to dissolve out. If the heating part of the operation have been well-conducted, the fused compound of potash, soda, and flint will dissolve in the water, forming a colourless and transparent liquid, proving that the idea of flint soup is not so wide of the mark as many people think. The colourless solution before us is highly charged with flint stone in solution; and if an acid—say spirit of salt, or even vinegar—be projected into the solution, the flint will be thrown down in a state resembling jelly, whilst it is yet moist. If this flint jelly be dried and heated, it changes to powdered flint, really an impalpable powder, but which nevertheless feels harsh and gritty to the touch.

The fused preparation of potash, soda, and powdered flint which we have just assumed to be made, is really a soluble glass. Ordinary glass is usually considered to be insoluble in water, which, however, it is not, though the amount of solubility of it is very trifling indeed. If, however, common glass be fused with a large excess of alkali, or if (what amounts to the same thing) glass be made by fusing together powdered flint, and a large excess of alkali at first, the variety of glass produced is soluble in water with facility. A watery solution of this sort of glass has been recommended to be substituted for starch, in rendering linen incombustible, and I believe in the property department of some theatres it is extensively employed to that end.

To change a piece of flint into an invisible gas, and obtain the flint out of the gas.—Whoever has been surprised at the facility wherewith a piece of flint can be dissolved into a colourless transparent liquid, will probably be more surprised at the transmutation about to be described; the conversion, namely, of a flint stone into a colourless transparent gas.

Procure a Florence oil flask; clean it and dry it. Next fit accurately to the neck of the flask a cork by cutting and filing; bore a hole accurately through the cork and fit into the hole the extremity of about a two-foot piece of leaden gas-pipe. Support the Florence flask by the best expedient your ingenuity can devise, so that it may be adapted when all is ready to be acted on by the flame of a spirit lamp underneath; then bend the other extremity of the metal gas-tube downward in such wise that it shall dip quite to the bottom of a conical wine glass. Note well, the cork must fit the neck of the Florence flask air tight, and the fitting must be accomplished without much screwing, which would infallibly break glass so fragile as that of which a Florence flask is made. Note also that the extremity of gas-pipe must fit accurately into the cork; all, in short, must be air-tight, and satisfy yourself that all is air-tight before proceeding to execute the following instructions.

Grinding together in a mortar two parts by weight of powdered flints, and one part by weight of powdered fluor-spar, pour some of the mixture into a Florence flask; then add of strong oil of vitriol enough to convert the whole (by sufficient agitation) into a thin paste, and before applying heat, assure yourself that perfect mixture has been effected between the compound powder and the oil of vitriol; otherwise, on applying the flame of a spirit-lamp, the Florence flask will probably break. Matters being as described, replace the cork, support the flask in any convenient way, apply the flame of a spirit-lamp, dipping the further extremity of the gas-pipe quite down to the bottom of the wineglass.

A colourless gas, holding much flint in its composition, will come over. It is naturally quite invisible, but, meeting with moisture in the atmosphere, it generates a sort of smoke. If the stream of gas be now made to come into contact with water, flint is deposited in a most curious manner; but were you to plunge the extremity of the delivery-tube immediately into water, the latter would rush back into the flask, and there would follow a serious accident. The device to be adopted is as follows:—Pour a little quicksilver into the wineglass, until it bathes the extremity of the gas delivery-pipe, so that all the gas evolved must needs pass through a layer of mercury before coming into contact with the water.

This done, fill the wineglass with water, and, by heating the flask, cause the gas to pass over. As soon as it touches the water, flint will be deposited in an extraordinary manner, proving that truly, and without any play upon words, we have succeeded in changing flint into invisible gas, and getting solid flint once more out of the gas.

CONSOLATION.

There's not a heath, however rude,
But hath some little flower,
To brighten up its solitude,
And scent the evening hour.
There's not a heart, however cast
By grief or sorrow down,
But hath some memory of the past
To love and call its own.

PERGOLESI SURROUNDED BY HIS YOUTHFUL ADMIRERS.

GIOVANNI PERGOLESI, THE MUSICIAN.

The scene is in Naples, on a hot summer afternoon in the year 1716. The bay lies bathed in sunlight, and the water, scarce rippled by the breeze that has just sprung up, looks like a sheet of molten silver. Even the Italians keep the shady side of the streets, in the hot, dusty, glaring town; and the Lazzarone, stretched out in glorious idleness on church steps, and under porticos, seem to have an equal sense of enjoyment in the afternoon breeze, with the gaunt, half-starved, insect-bitten dogs that lie lazily winking their bleared eyes in the sunlight. The city, however, is awaking from the lassitude of its mid-day siesta; the hum of traffic, and the sound of human tongues, talking, arguing, and scolding, in the sweet Italian language, that falls so melodiously on the ear, gradually swell into a chorus. The clocks, one after another, strike the hour of four, and a shout of youthful voices rises joyously from a tall building in one of the narrow streets of the city, as the little pupils of the charity school, aptly called after Him who was at once the divine preacher and example of all charity—"the Conservatory of the Poor of Jesus Christ,"—come trooping from the class-room into the playground.

Fit objects for human and divine compassion are they all, these little students at the College of Indigence. Theirs is not the poverty that results from negligence, intemperance, and vice; they are orphans, every one, taken from the streets and kept in this charitable institution, where they learn to read and write, to cast accounts, and, above all, to sing, and to play on various instruments: for the school is not rich, and its inmates, one and all, will have to battle with the world, and to win a crust of bread by the labour of their own heads and hands.

The heat of the weather seems to have little influence on those boys, except it be to warm them into more active motion, and more boisterous hilarity. In a moment they had dispersed themselves, like a swarm of bees, through the playground, and were engaged at their sports; the quick Italian wit, and the hot blood of the south manifesting themselves in their every movement, and even in the sports they chose. Instead of games of the bat-and-ball and leap-frog class, which an English playground would have exhibited, these boys chose, almost exclusively, such as raised the passions and excited strong emotions. In one corner there were foot-races; in another, keen encounters of stormy wit, not unfrequently seasoned with strong vituperation; while in a more sequestered part of the ground, a group was furtively engaged in the forbidden game of moro, a species of "odd-and-even" possessing peculiar charms for the Neapolitan mind, but almost as objectionable a form of gambling as lansquenet itself.

All the pupils have not, however, burst forth from the bondage of dormitory and school-room. From an open window a strain of delicious melody comes floating downwards on the evening air. It is a simple tune—the evening hymn of the Neapolitan fishermen—played on the violin; but the soul of the musician is evidently in his task, for there is a thrilling beauty in the notes, as now they swell into a loud strain of hope, now sink into a low wail of sorrow. Through all the shouting and uproar in the playground do those strains of music find their way; and gradually one pupil after another breaks off his noisy sport in startled surprise, till a listening group is formed beneath the open window. Still the musician plies his bow; but now the plaintive cadences have given place to a livelier measure, and in sharp, well-defined accents, the unseen player is making his violin give forth an old Italian song.

"Who is it?" is whispered eagerly from one to another, as the group grows larger each moment; and a young voice answers that it is Giovanni Pergolesi.

For a few minutes they stood listening, forgetful of the sports they had so eagerly pursued; and then, with one accord, they glided softly up stairs, and gently opened the door of the general dormitory, or sleeping-room. There, beside one of the large windows, with the sunbeams shining on his fair hair, stood a little boy, not more than twelve years old, with a violin in his hand, from which he was producing the exquisite sounds that had lured his companions from their sports. He was diminutive in stature, even for his age; but in his face was that air of abstraction which, in musicians, is a sure indication of a high order of talent.

Hardly noticing, except by a kind smile, the entrance of his companions, he continued playing, and soon became too much absorbed in his occupation to give any further heed to the listening group. Variation after variation rolled forth from beneath his nimble fingers, some solemn and grand as triumphal marches—others light and airy as the trilling of the lark in spring. At last, with a masterly passage, he concluded, amid enthusiastic plaudits from his audience.

"Bravo, bravo, Giovanni Pergolesi!" they all cried. "Bravo, bravissimo, Giovanni!" repeated a deep voice.

The youthful performer started, as did also his companions. Behind them stood a wiry figure, with a shrewd but kindly countenance, and an eye that pierced like a needle. It was Signor Matteis, the maestro, who gave lessons on the violin to certain among the pupils. He too had been attracted by the playing, and now confronted the blushing performer.

"Excellently played, Giovanni," he continued, "but, fanciullo mio (my boy), can you write down what you have been playing, and bring it to me to-morrow?"

"I will do my best, signor," answered the boy, modestly.

"Do so," answered the master, shortly; "I will hear it to-morrow at twelve. Good night." And he turned and left them.

There was no sleep that night for the little musician. Hour after hour he lay awake, and as the bright moonbeams shone into the dormitory, lighting up the faces of his companions as they slept, they fell on his own pale, earnest countenance, while a flood of melody seemed rolling through his brain. At last the morning broke; and when the little Italian scholars opened their merry black eyes, there was Giovanni, poring over the worm-eaten desk, writing as if his very existence depended on his speed.

Twelve o'clock came, and with it the Maestro Matteis. "Well, Giovanni," he said, "where is your work?"

With knitted brows and attentive face, the old professor ran through the composition from beginning to end. As he went on, a strange expression came over his features—a look first of doubt and then of surprise, that ended at last in a bewildered stare. Alarmed at the unusual excitement in his master's face, the blushing composer felt almost inclined to run away; but the master's long bony arm was stretched out, and arrested his motions.

"You come along with me," said Matteis, in his abrupt way. "You come along with me, Giovanni."

The boy trembled—for his master was hurrying him along the corridors, straight towards that region of terror and mystery, the head-master's private room.

Gaetano Greco, principal of the musical orphan school, was one of the most learned composers of his time. Of a severe and sombre aspect, and hard and forbidding manners, he inspired with more awe than affection the quick little scholars, who were always more ready to flee from his room than to approach it.

Matteis advanced boldly and knocked at the door.

"Come in," cried the director's voice from within.

The master obeyed; and entered the room dragging the reluctant pupil after him.

Right into the middle of the room he strode; and, pushing the boy forward, cried in a voice oddly compounded of satisfaction and chagrin—

"Mr. Director, I bring you here a little threadpaper fellow who knows more music than I—yes, he does indeed. I know very well what I'm saying; and more than that, in a few years he will be a greater musician than any of us; but if he is to come out well, you must take him into your private class, where you only admit the very best pupils. Look here," and he brought forth Giovanni's composition.

"He shall come into my class," said the director, kindly, after he had attentively perused the pages of the boy's manuscript. "But, my dear boy," he continued, laying his hand on the shoulder of the delighted child, "you must remember one thing—namely, that genius may command admiration for a time, but that genius and application must go together, if you are to be a great and a useful man."

So said the rough but kind old director; and that the boy remembered the injunction, is proved by the magnificent works achieved during a short life of less than thirty years, by the great Italian composer, Giovanni Battista Pergolesi.

Inventions and Science.

MANUFACTURE OF GUM.—The peculiarities of this invention are, the use of farina, starch, and other amylaceous substances, with one-fifth of their weight of sour milk, buttermilk, or with lactates, lactic acid, and its compounds, in about the same relative proportion. The mixture is afterwards heated in the usual way, so as to convert it into dextrine, which is said to possess a greater power of thickening than that now in use, as well as other valuable properties useful in dyeing and calico printing.

AN EXTRAORDINARY SHIP.—Plans have recently been drawn up of a stupendous "fortress war ship," 480 feet in length, with 300 guns, 640 battle galleries, 3,600 berths, and all the munitions of war in proportion. Its appearance would, no doubt, scare off the most audacious enemy, without the necessity of firing a gun. The ship is further provided with stable accommodation for 300 horses, two lighthouses, three powder towers, two "wrench rudders," made to operate in all directions, and so arranged as to be used in checking the speed of the ship, besides a variety of other appliances. This last is a desirable quality, as the inventor is sanguine that she will be propelled at the rate of forty-five miles an hour. In addition to steam power, the ship will spread not less than 6,000 yards of canvas.

SOAPSTONE GAS-BURNERS.—Gas-burners, usually made of iron or brass, are subjected to some difficulties. The heat of the flame expands the metal and enlarges the opening, causing some waste of gas; and, besides, the metal is liable to corrode by the action of the gas upon it. To obviate these evils, M. Schwarz, of Nuremberg, has lately manufactured gas-burners from soapstone (steatite), which is prepared for this purpose in a peculiar manner. This stone is cut up into small four-sided slabs, put into hermetically-sealed cases, and exposed to a slow fire until it becomes red hot. Great care is exercised in thus roasting the stone, because, if quickly heated, it will rupture by the sudden expansion of small particles of moisture in it. The steatite slabs are exposed to this heat for about two hours, slowly cooled, and are then easily turned to the proper shape in a lathe. After this they are boiled in oil until they acquire a deep brown colour, when they are taken out, dried, and made to assume a beautiful polish by simply rubbing them with a woollen rag. Liebig gives these burners a very high character, and advises all chemists to employ them in their laboratories.

THE REAL INVENTOR OF SPECTACLES.—Although it is generally believed that it was a journeyman of Alkmaer, called Jacob Metz, or Metius, who invented spectacles, the following extract of a letter of President Jeannin to Henry IV. deserves notice:—"The bearer of this, who returns to France, is a soldier of Sedan, who had formerly served Prince Maurice. He has several inventions for new purposes, and knows how to make those spectacles lately made by a lunatic (f) of Middleburg, with which one can see very far. The states of Holland have ordered two for Y.M. from the journeyman who has invented them."

INVENTION TO RENDER STUFFS INCOMBUSTIBLE.—One of the most important of all the discoveries of modern times has just been made in France. It is no less than the invention of a means whereby any stuff or tissue may be rendered absolutely incombustible. The inventor, a M. Catoron, lately requested the Emperor and Empress to visit his ateliers at Neuilly, which they did, and they were witnesses to the extraordinarily curious experiments that were tried in their presence. A kind of white varnish (imperceptible to the eye, it is said) is spread over the surface intended to be preserved from the action of the flame, and the result is declared to be most unquestionably satisfactory. Light gauzy tissues, meant for ladies' dresses, were overspread with the substance I allude to, and the fire had no action whatever on them; camp tents with cotton curtains were also tried, and the same effect obtained. A hut was constructed with a thatched roof, half of which was prepared and half resisted, and the flames died out the moment they reached it.

THE LETTER.

On the long expected letter,
In the dear familiar hand!
Twice a thousand miles it's traversed
O'er the waters and the land.
Bring my rocking-chair and scissors,
Watch the baby, close the door!
Let me have no interruptions,
Till I've read it twice or more!

Now, I warrant me, he wrote it
In a business study brown!
For the "Mrs." looks like "Messrs."
And the stamp is upside down!
Pity he's so careless—giving
All his lines an up-hill turn;
Yet, I think, the sign's a good one—
Let me open it and learn.

"Yours received,"—a fair beginning;
"Health improved,"—good news indeed!
"Quite contented,"—that's but so-so;
"Time flies swiftly,"—ah! I heed!
"Fishing, gunning,"—pooh! I warrant
When he shoots, a man will fail!
"Cuisine charmant,"—pic-nics, ladies,
Exclamation-points and all!

Really, sir, this looks like business
In a somewhat novel line!
In my next, I'll surely tell him
Of that charming trip of mine;
Of the steamer's mirth and music,
Forfeit games, and dancing free,
And the moonlight promenading
Of the "merrie company!"

Ah! what's this? "Were you but with me;"
"Darling children—dolls and drums;"
"Parquet with splendid feathers;"
"What a Babel when he comes!"
"Isle St. Mary,—lovely sunsets,"—
There's a poet lost in him!
"Lonely Sabbaths,—weary absence;"
"Home, sweet home," is blurred and dim.
"Love"—"farewell;"—would it were double.
Choicest blessings crown the man
Who, inspired of good, invented
The epistolary plan!
Bless the ship, the car, the mail-coach,
Bless the hands, wherever they be,
That have brought this little missive
Twice a thousand miles to me!

The Matron.

NO. VII.

"Throw it away" are words constantly in the mouth of a thriftless housekeeper; but we hope to prove that hardly anything should be thrown away: even the ashes of your coal-fires may be turned to good account. In the country they are useful as manure for bushes and young plants; and in town they may effect great saving in fuel, if the following means are used:—Let the ashes be preserved in a corner of your coal-cellar, and add to them from your coal-heap an equal part of your small coal or slack, which is too little to be retained in the grate, and pour a small quantity of water upon the mixture. When you make up your fire, throw this mixture on the back part of it, having placed some fresh coal in front. An excellent fire will be the result, and very little of the mixture will remain unburnt.

Having shown that ashes should form no part of the waste or rubbish-heap, it will be easier still to prove that the following articles should never reach it:—bones, candle-ends, leaves of vegetables, pieces of rag, paper, string, fat, and bits of bread. With such things the sloven's dust-bin is filled, and available property thus moulders away, until the dustman does him the real service of removing goods converted by his ignorance and neglect into ills. I must leave him to his fate, and speak to my wiser readers, endeavouring to assist them in keeping to the rule of throwing nothing away; but unless they use method and discrimination, there are things they may keep to their cost instead of their profit. Although nothing should be thrown away, superfluities should be given away or sold.

Paper, rags, and string have a real value; but with untidy people they are a fruitful source of confusion. If you are mistress of a house, you must have remarked how paper, &c. &c., accumulates. What I advise is, that you keep a box for paper and a box for rags. Sort the contents of these boxes every week. Having carefully laid aside paper for all household purposes, such as covering books, putting up candles, making spills, &c. &c., lay by the remainder in a closet, and let it receive the overplus every week, until it has attained the weight of two or three pounds, and then sell it for what it will fetch. These rules apply (with little variation) to rags.

This subject leads to the introduction of a valuable piece of advice—Never allow of the accumulation of what you cannot use. The maxim is marked in italics on account of its great importance.

Who has not beheld slovens opening their closets or drawers and finding them choked up with rubbish—at least with what was rubbish to them, because it was what they did not wish for? Get rid of what you do not want; sell it, or give it away; but do not let it torment you at every turn. This remark applies to bones, fat, and dripping. If you are wise, not an iota of any of them will find its way to the dust-bin or rubbish-heap. Turn everything to account, but never sell what you can judiciously use in your own kitchen. Good cooks know the value of bones and dripping. The bones of roast-meat from which all the meat has been cut, will still make excellent soup, if broken, and boiled for three or four hours. The liquor should then be strained, to free it from splinters. If thickened with oatmeal, and flavoured according to the directions given for the mutton broth, it will be very fine.

The dripping should be used for the crust of pies and puddings, and for frying fish. Cakes made with it are much relished by children. The following is a good receipt for a plain cake. Order half a quart of bread-dough; keep it warm by the fire, until you knead into it a pound of dripping, half a pound of moist sugar, a pound of raisins, and the chopped-up peeling of two lemons. Send it to your baker: he will bring it home when done.

Now for candle-ends and strings. The first should be kept in a tin candle-box, and used on save-alls; for the latter a little bag should be made, and in this it should be wound on various cards, according to its thickness.

As to the leaves of vegetables and potato peelings, all these should find their way to the pig's trough. Here, in London, where pig-sties are forbidden, much vegetable food is wasted. Where vegetables are used for flavouring broth or soup, it is much better not to peel them, but merely to wash them well. Soyer makes use of much of the outer leaves of cabbages and celery—leaves that a cottager's wife would foolishly throw away.

However, the most saving housewife will have vegetable and animal refuse in her kitchen, and this should be removed without "ado." Never tolerate anything that infects the air.

Bread should be used up to the last crumb. It is the most valuable article of food, and it is easy to apply it to its right use. Take yourself or your servant severely to task if you ever find dry pieces of bread in dust-pans, or in holes or corners of kitchens or sculleries. Accustom your children to ask for no more than they want, and never to bite their bread at dinner. Have a clean brick pan for pieces, and for the outside of the loaf—I mean the white dry part. Never let these pieces accumulate. Use them up expeditiously into puddings, stuffing for meat, and croûtons, or fried bread, for soup.

I will now give you directions for a nice bread pudding:—Cut your pieces of bread thin, and spread a little butter on each of them; place them in a pie dish as lightly as possible till three parts full; break into a basin one egg, beat it up well and add one tablespoonful of flour and two of brown sugar; mix all together, and add to it, by degrees, a pint of milk and a little salt; pour over the bread, and bake it for about an hour and a half. It will make a nice sized pudding for four or five persons. The stuffing I am about to recommend is as nice with mutton or beef as with veal. Take from your pan half a pound of bread and crumble it, chop a quarter of a pound of suet and put it into a basin with the crumbs, add a teaspoonful of salt, a quarter of pepper, and a little lemon peel, then, with three eggs thoroughly beaten up, mix the whole into a paste, and stuff your meat with it. We are sure it will be liked.

The croûtons may be procured from the driest part of your bread savings. Cut the crusts, or dried bread, into little square bits, and fry them brown in boiling lard or dripping. They are excellent in pea soup, or any other kind of soup or broth.

I hope I have shown that hardly anything need be thrown away; and that in lessening the dust-heap, I have increased my readers' knowledge on things intimately connected with economy and comfort. So great is the importance I attach to the subject treated in this chapter, that were I commissioned by government to visit the homes of my countrywomen, with a view to reporting on the present state of domestic economy, I should (in the first instance) examine neither the drawing-rooms nor the dining-rooms, but immediately begin an inspection of the rubbish-heap and dust-bin.

FOUR good mothers have given birth to four bad daughters: truth has produced hatred; success, pride; security, danger; and familiarity, contempt. And, on the other hand, four bad mothers have produced as many good daughters: for astronomy is the offspring of astrology; chemistry, of alchemy; freedom, of oppression; patience, of long-suffering.

TIT FOR TAT.—The old Bethlehem Hospital was built on the plan of the Tuileries at Paris; and this fac-simile of his palace, adapted for such a purpose, gave so much offence to Louis XIV., that he ordered a plan of St. James's palace to be taken, for offices in his own capital of a very inferior description.

TOO LATE.—"I meant to have told you of that hole," said an Irishman to his friend, who was walking with him in his garden, and stumbled into a pit full of water. "No matter," said Pat, "I've found it."

A SOUR MEAL.—Theodore Hook in describing a badly dressed dinner observed that everything was sour but the vinegar.

AN IRISH DEFINITION.—An Irishman, on his first sight of a locomotive, declared it was the evil one. "No," said his companion, "it's only a steam-boat hunting for water."

LIES FLY.—The Chinese proverb says a lie has no legs and cannot stand, but it has wings, and can fly far and wide.

A GENTLEMAN once conversing in the company of ladies, and criticising rather severely the want of personal beauty in other ladies of their acquaintance, remarked, "They are the ugliest women I know;" and then, with extraordinary politeness, added, "present company always excepted!"

A CIRCUIT judge at a late session of his court in one of the western counties, highly complimented the people upon the fact that not a single indictment had been returned. It is sincerely to be hoped that the compliment thus paid to the community, was not more properly due to the Grand Jury.

Puzzles for the Ingenious.

SOLUTION of the Question in No. 202, page 353, Old Series. The Question was as follows:—"A, B, and C, with their wives N, M, and L, went to market to buy hogs. They severally bought as many hogs as they gave shillings for them. A bought 37 more than M, and B 11 more than L, and each man expended 5 guineas more than his wife. Which were respectively man and wife?—G. A."

SOLUTION.

Let x = the number of hogs any of the men buy, and y = the number of hogs any of the women buy; then $x^2 - y^2 = 105$ or $(x + y)(x - y) = 105$. By letting $x - y$ equal 1, 3, and 5 successively, we get three values of x and y . Namely: $x = 53, 19$, and 13 ; $y = 52, 16$, and 8 .

Now since A buys 37 hogs more than M, it is evident by inspection of the values of x and y , that A must have bought 53, and M 16 hogs, and also because B buys 11 more than L, that B must have bought 19, and L 8 hogs.

Now there is only one value of x and y left, viz., $13 = x$ and $y = 8$, therefore 13 is the number that C has bought, and 8 the number N has bought. Therefore, A bought 53 hogs at 5s. each; B, 19 hogs at 19s. each; C, 13 hogs at 13s. each; N, 52 hogs at 5s. each; M, 16 hogs at 16s. each; L, 8 hogs at 8s. each.

Then since $(53)^2 - (52)^2 = 105$, A & N are man and wife; also $(19)^2 - (16)^2 = 105$, B & M are man and wife; similarly $(13)^2 - (8)^2 = 105$, C & L are man and wife.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

Problem No. 19. By Mr. W. GREENWOOD.
BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

D. W. G.—Kt to R 2, in Problem No. 8, would be met with K takes R. Where then is the mate?

E. GRANT.—The game sent was fairly played up to the 20th move, when White made a slip by playing his Q R. Kt to K B 7, (anticipating the rejoinder of B to K sq.) would have given White the game. Black's subsequent moves are so apparent as to render the game devoid of interest.

W. J. C. (North Walsham).—Thanks for the Problems; they shall be reported upon at the earliest opportunity.

J. W. BRID.—The proper reply of Black to your first move in Problem No. 9, is B to Q Kt 8, or P to Q 4.

OMEGA.—Problems sent for insertion in the FAMILY PAPER must be accompanied by the name and address of the composer; and should, moreover, be submitted on diagrams. Unless these conditions are complied with the Problems will not be examined.

J. ALLISSON.—In the example of Pion Coiffe forwarded by you mate can be delayed several moves by Black playing Q to K Kt 4, threatening mate at his third move.

W. HELT.—B to Q B 7 at the second move of Black in Problem No. 1, would give him the game. No. 2 shall appear as early as practicable.

CAISSE AMIGUS.—The King cannot castle after he has moved. Neither can he do so if his Rooks have been moved.

G. P.—1. With proper play two Knights must succumb to two Rooks. 2. As the solution of the Problem sent depends upon a condition which would not exist in ordinary play, we must decline to give it insertion.

W. G.—You may as well compare sliding with skating, as draughts with chess.

T. WADE.—The addition of a Black Pawn in the Problem to which you refer would render it defective; e.g., Q to Q B 5, and mates next move.

A NOVICE.—White has a slight advantage in position, but with equal players the game would be drawn. The game is not sufficiently interesting or instructive for publication. Solutions up to the present date by F. G. Rainger, T. Simpson, J. Stonehouse, T. Martin, jun., Omicron, E. Grant, Douglas, E. P., Oxon, J. Palmer, G. George, M. A. R. (excepting No. 10), C. E. D., R. Austin, M. L., W. G. C., H. Phillips, A. Stevens, R. T. (Southport), T. Way (excepting No. 9), G. Bailey, W. G., Wm. M'K., and Thomas Evelyn, correct.

Our Editorial Table.

* * We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

T. G. (Maryborough).—The graceful design on the card forwarded for our inspection is exactly suited to the reverse side of playing cards. It was probably planned with the view of ornamenting such cards, and then sent by the artist to elicit admiration from the young lady.

A. CONSTANT READER.—You will find the subject of "Silk Worms" discussed in last year's May number of "The Ladies' Treasury," published by Ward and Lock, 158, Fleet-street.

A. T. A.—An excellent receipt for curing chilblains is given in a recent number of our Paper.

EMILY.—"Emily" is a silly girl, if she allows idle tattlers to deprive her of a sincere and well-tried friend. It will be time to relinquish the intimacy of which she speaks when her engaged lover objects to it.

E. E. P.—If you take the rash, unadvised step you meditate, you can have no reasonable hope of happiness either here or hereafter. Both yourself and your sister are on the brink of a precipice. Recollect the Commandments, and turn a deaf ear to the voice of beguiling passion. The lovers who are tempting you to defy your parents by eloping with them will be among the first to reproach you for yielding to their solicitations. Pray for Divine aid, in this your time of trial, and to strengthen you in good resolutions, read a tale in the fourth number of the new series of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER. This tale is entitled, "Anna; or, Cottage Devotion."

A. R.—At present we have not space in our columns for long treatises on fancy work; but the subject will be discussed by "The Matron," a title under which a great variety of interesting domestic subjects are now treated in our FAMILY PAPER.

CONSTANCE NEALE.—Dear Constance, it is a difficult thing to teach gentlemen to know their own minds. It seems to us that the object of your affections has not made up his mind yet, and as another suitor has offered you "both hand and heart," our advice is, that you withdraw your thoughts (as much as possible) from an uncertain good, and fix them on blessings within your reach. There is much truth in the old proverb, "One bird in the hand is worth two in the bush."

PATRICK SHARP.—The forehead you describe, viz., one that is partly high and then recedes towards the hair, may belong to a very intellectual person, but not to one who (according to phrenologists) possesses strong reasoning propensities, in other words, large organs of causality.

EDWIN C. is at variance with the woman he loves. He has tried the effect of one apology, but it has not succeeded. Let him try another. He owns he has been in the wrong. Let him not rest till he is forgiven. Very likely the lady wishes for a reconciliation as much as "Edwin" does. But female dignity prevents her taking the initiative. Sometimes a little present softens the heart more than the most eloquent letter. Let him send his fair lady a handsome bouquet (doubly welcome in this severe season), or the last new song, or some popular work of a sentimental tendency.

A. C. The Queen and Prince Consort have visited Germany. They were never at any bull-fight, but the Prince was present at a great German "chasse," part of which was witnessed by her Majesty. In this a vast number of deer (and other game) were driven by peasants, who beat extensive forests, into a comparatively small space, where they were shot for sport—if such pastime could be called sport. That illustrious persons should take pleasure in witnessing such slaughter excited much comment at the time. The answer to your second question is as follows. The Queen visited Louis Philippe in 1845, at the Château d'Eu, on the coast of Normandy. Here great cajolery was practised by the crafty and aged monarch and his astute minister, M. Guizot, upon her Majesty and Lord Aberdeen, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Much indignation was excited at home when, after all this, the royal Spanish marriages took place in violation of pledges given by the French government at the Château d'Eu; and the phrase "Ce cher Aberdeen" (with which Louis Philippe welcomed that minister), became a by-word among European politicians.

SCOTLAND.—The application should be made through a solicitor.

ALICE DENBIGH.—The Ides were a term of time amongst the ancient Romans of eight days in each month, beginning (but counting backwards) on the 13th day, except in March, May, July, October, in which it was the 15th.

A. SUBSCRIBER.—An applicant for a situation in the Post Office must learn patience; if he has a promise he is more fortunate than hundreds; but he must wait till a vacancy occurs.

J. L. B.—The marriage would be illegal.

ELSHIE.—Except the shares are taken under the Limited Liability Act, the shareholder is liable so long as he has a penny to lose.

G. Y.—Speaking slowly is the best remedy for stuttering. It generally happens that one or two letters are more difficult than others for the stammerer to sound. Let these letters be practised; use those words frequently in which they occur, and do not be discouraged by frequent failure.

ALICE BELL.—In answering "Alice Bell's" interesting communication, our wish is to console and to direct her, but first we must ask her a very important question. Did she allow the gentleman to whom she is attached to write to her, without first consulting her parents or guardians? If so, she committed a very serious fault. The gentleman himself may be of this opinion, and consider that "Alice Bell's" love, so easily won and so thoughtlessly bestowed, is hardly worth preserving. Supposing this to be the case, she must patiently endure the punishment of her rashness. Woman's lot is often to suffer rather than to act. There is no step that she can take in this affair that would not make bad worse. Fortunately for her, the home to which she returns will offer scenes unconnected with the sorrows of her heart, and by resolutely resuming the occupations that delighted her before the luckless visit to her friend, she may gradually resume her former peace of mind; and this she may do even supposing inconstancy to be the cause of the silence our correspondent deploras. But then womanly pride would come to the assistance of occupation, in strengthening Alice's heart, and instead of unavailing sorrow and pining regret, the pleasure of obtaining a conquest over herself may soon render her heart merry and light; and should she on some future occasion meet her faithless lover, these lines may occur to her as applicable to her own case:—

"No more when you're named the warm blushes arise,
No more beats my heart when I meet with your eyes;
When with you I feel neither pleasure nor pain,
Of your absence when from me no more I complain.
'Tis frost in December, 'tis sunshine in May,
Both when you are present, and when you're away."

L'ESTRANGE.—There is nothing very objectionable in the work. We are not aware whether it has been translated into English.

HUSSAN.—Study the Lessons in French in the "Ladies' Treasury;" they are both simple and accurate, and will meet your want exactly.

T. R. C. G.—Declined with thanks.

A. CONSTANT READER.—The late General Havelock was born at Bishopwearmouth, near Sunderland.

W. A. M. should apply to the commanding officer of the regiment.

JOHN DELAVAL.—Apply to the publisher.

MODERATOR.—We are obliged by your favourable opinion of our "Hopes and Helps." Arithmetic in all its various branches would be the most useful study you could possibly pursue, in connection with your business. It is quite essential that you should understand this thoroughly.

PUR.—A good handwriting and rapidity of calculation will be most useful to you.

A. CONSTANT READER wants to know the quantity of rabbits a full-grown boar-constrictor is capable of swallowing at a meal. We suppose it differs with the health and appetite of the creature. Perhaps our correspondent does not always feel capable of taking the same quantity.

T. B. S.—"T. B. S.," our constant reader, appears to us the most inconstant of men. At the commencement of his letter we expected to read of some cogent reason for his wishing to break off his engagement, but he gives us none. His now preferring another lady only betrays his fickleness. Before our answer reaches him, he will, in all probability, have preferred a third to the second, and, perhaps, a fourth to the third. The lines that slander mankind generally, are truly applicable to "T. B. S."—

"To love with little reason,
To flatter, feign, pursue,
To follow for a season,
And leave as vainly too—
'Tis thus men love."

FAGGOTS has got a grievance, and wants us to sympathise with him. Here it is:—Some young men, it appears, wanted to burn a Guy on the 5th of November last. So far so good. But fuel was scarce to consume Guy, and so they stole a few faggots from "a person calling himself a gentleman," as "Faggots" indignantly writes. The person in question made the delinquents pay ten shillings—far above the value of the wood stolen, and the depredators are indignant. We think they were rightly served, and they may be glad they got off so well. People shouldn't steal other people's faggots.

DELAVAL D.—At eight-and-twenty any lady is old enough to know her own mind on the subject of matrimony; and except under peculiar circumstances, ought to be left to judge for herself. If our correspondent's case stands exactly as she represents it, we think the course she proposes a judicious one.

SCHOOLBOY.—The science of æsthetics, in the fine arts, is that which treats of the beautiful; it may be defined as the science of taste.

GREGORY (Dartford).—The "Flagellants" were fanatics, who used to parade the streets of various cities of the Continent, at various periods during the middle ages, armed with scourges, with which they flagellated or flogged themselves as penance for their sins. The terrible famines and pestilences which desolated Europe called forth these extravagant demonstrations of penitence, which form one of the great popular delusions to which the ignorant among all nations have at times been subject.

INDIAN.—A lakh of rupees is worth ten thousand pounds sterling. Dakh travelling is like "posting" in England, except that palanquins are used instead of post-chaises between the various stations. Fuqueers, or Fakirs, are devotees among the Hindoos. They profess extraordinary sanctity, and often obtain much fame and emolument by some work of so-called piety—such as holding an arm in a cramped posture until it is withered, or allowing the nails of one hand to grow through the flesh of the palm. These men are one of the curses of India; they prey upon the superstitious natives, who are afraid to withhold the alms they extort.

SALLY CLIFTON.—The Master of the Horse appoints and governs all the queen's liveries. The carriages and horses are under his special care. He is assisted in this branch of his department by a Clerk-Marshal, whose province it is to attend to the economy of the stable establishment. The place of the Master of the Horse in all Court ceremonies is close to the person of the sovereign. In fact, in the state progress to parliament, at the opening or close of a session, he has the honour of sitting in the same carriage with the queen. It is evident that the safety of her Majesty's person must often depend upon the vigilance with which the duties of the Master of the Horse are performed; and his sense or responsibility cannot be slight, when the queen, on a steed of his providing, reviews her troops, and when the roar of cannon, and other indescribable noises and evolutions, might well try the steadiness of the best trained charger. In reply to the question about the Lord Privy Seal's duties, we will first observe that the Privy Seal is a remnant of those barbarous times when sovereigns thought it beneath their dignity to write, and when they gave the warrant of their authority by seal and signet. The Privy Seal is attached to all patents of inventions, or of nobility and honour. It is always in the custody of a Lord Keeper, who is responsible for whatever use it may be put to, and who affixes it to all deeds and instruments that have her Majesty's sign manual, or that of her Secretary of State.

MARY, EMMA, AND JANE.—These three ladies are anxious to know what we "think about lovers." We think they need not be avoided when they mean honourably, and when they are approved of by the ladies' parents, as well as the ladies themselves. As to the question respecting difference of age, the advantage ought certainly to be on the gentleman's side.

BETTY.—"Betty" must bear in mind that woollen clothes should be washed in very hot suds, and not rinsed. Luke-warm water shrinks them.

ORNALDO.—"Ornaldo" has reached his seventeenth year; he is a widower, and wishes to form another matrimonial engagement. He asks us whether we consider his taking such a step would be prudent. All must depend on his choice of a wife. If he can meet with a cheerful widow of fifty (willing to accept him), we have only to say, "Marry her, by all means."

A. SUBSCRIBER.—If a formal invitation has been received, an answer, accepting or refusing the same, should be sent. On meeting ladies in the street you may shake hands with your intimate friends, and only unreasonable ones would be offended at your not removing your hat while shaking hands; for

"Philosophers agree 'tis hard
To do two things at once."

EDITH.—"Edith" is much mistaken in supposing that the editor of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER would assist any young lady in carrying on a clandestine correspondence. We are glad that the gentleman in question does not know her address; and as "Edith" values her future welfare, we advise her not only to keep it concealed from him, but to have nothing to say to him, until he has declared his intentions to be honourable, and made this declaration to "Edith's" parents or guardians.

PERPETUS LÉTOR.—The aspirations of three important factions sufficiently account for plots against the emperor of the French. The members of all these factions, viz., of the Legitimists, the Orleansists, and the Republicans, would have reason to rejoice in his downfall; but the attempts to assassinate the emperor originated in the republican party, and in that alone. Not in the moderate champions of this ancient form of government, but in the extreme branch, denominated the Red Republicans.

ONE IN TROUBLE.—Although your brother was only eighteen years of age, and did not receive the sanction of his parents, still his marriage holds good if he procured a license, had his banns put up, or was married at a register office. His making a false statement respecting his age, would not free him from his present wife, but it would subject him to be indicted for perjury.

RHYMER.—We thank you for the specimens of poetry which you have favoured us. "The Thistle" breathes a patriotic spirit, and there is a tone of earnest piety pervading "The Sabbath Day." For your own satisfaction, and that of your immediate friends, we advise you to cultivate your muse, but your lines are not, as yet, good enough for publication. "The Sabbath Day" is the most promising of your effusions, because the most original. "The Thistle" too closely resembles the old song "Here's a health to fair Scotland."

FLORA (Cheltenham).—"Flora's" letter does her great credit. We do not doubt that, by perseverance and resolution, she may retrieve the past. As "Flora" writes and expresses herself fairly, all she requires in carrying on her education is a good set of books. "Cassell's Educational Course" is a library in itself, and "Flora" should lose no time in procuring it. The six volumes, in cloth boards, only cost 15s. 6d. In the first instance, our correspondent had better give her attention to that part which treats of the English language, and then to "Science Popularly Explained." In this treatise she will be so thoroughly amused and delighted, that with her pleasure and progress will go hand in hand.

VILHELMINA.—The flower buds of the March Marigold, preserved in salted vinegar, are a good substitute for capers.

MARO.—In your "Twilight Musings" there is sentiment and elevation of thought; but you must make a serious study of prosody before you can appear in our columns. Your metre is strikingly defective.

J. G. BISHOP'S question may be answered as follows:—Soap dissolved in milk cleans white kid gloves, if rubbed on them with a clean piece of flannel; but a more efficient way and one equally independent of turpentine is the following:—Put the glove on your hand, then take a small piece of flannel dip it in camphine and gently rub it over the glove without making it too wet. When the dirt is removed, take another piece of flannel, dip it into pipe-clay and rub it over the glove, take the glove off and hang it up in a room to dry, and in a day or two very little smell will remain.

A. CLERK.—Your master had a legal right to discharge you, though we are inclined to agree with you, that the notice might have been longer. If you will take our advice, you will refrain from "giving him your opinion" in an angry way, in a letter. This will do no good, and may make an enemy of a man who has the power to serve you. State your case firmly, yet respectfully, to your late principal, and we are sure he will not refuse his co-operation in your honest and laudable endeavours. A master's good word is always valuable.

ANTIPODES.—All men are liable to be tempted, and all are more or less weak under temptation. What is past cannot be recalled; but a wise man will profit by experience, and will not fall twice into the same snare. It is better to fly from temptation than to face it. Don't put yourself in the way of being tempted if you know that you are weak.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XXV.

But yet, O man, rage not beyond thy need;
Deem it not glory to swell in tyranny.
Thou art of blood: joy not to see things bleed.
Thou fearest death: think they are loth to die.
A plaint of guiltless heart doth pierce the sky.
SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.

THE Caradoc, the name of the ship on which poor Jack Manders had been so artfully trepanned, was a heavy, Dutch-built vessel, exceedingly long in the hull, abruptly round at the bows, and square at the stern; nothing graceful in her outline, and evidently a slow sailer. Instead of breasting the waves gallantly like a sea-bird, she broke through them with a dogged, sullen, lumbering roll which rendered it as difficult for a landsman to keep his legs as her commander to guard his temper—a fact the new apprentice discovered as soon as they passed the Nore. For the first time the vigorous, active boy felt physically and morally prostrate. He did not care a pin for life; it had never presented a very pleasant page to him. He would scarcely have resisted had any one attempted to throw him overboard,—perhaps have thanked them for the trouble.

Mingled with the agonies of sea-sickness were the fears he felt for Lillian, left to the tender mercies of his uncle Mike, without a protector to stand between her and his brutal nature. Jack had not forgotten the triumphant waving of the knotted cord, and the recollection drove him almost mad as he lay upon the deck of his floating prison, his aching head pillowed on a coil of ropes.

Still he never shed a tear nor uttered a word of complaint: neither could have relieved him. The conviction that the world was dealing harshly, unjustly with him, filled his heart with bitter thoughts; and he mentally asked himself what he had done to merit its unkindness. It wasn't his fault that he was the son of a convict, that one uncle had made him a thief, and the other refused to assist him to live by honesty. He almost thought honesty itself must be a humbug, seeing how well his relatives contrived to do without it.

Whilst the captain remained on deck none of the crew took the slightest notice of him: not from indifference, but kindness. They knew that any expression of sympathy on their part would only excite the malignity of the tyrant, who never felt so happy as when he had some helpless victim to vent his spleen upon. No sooner, however, had he withdrawn to his cabin, than the sailor who had joked with him on board the steamer, and the lad who had exchanged knives with him, approached the spot where Jack was lying. One threw an old pea-jacket over his shoulders, for the day was bitterly cold; the other drew a piece of tarpaulin within his reach, that he might cover himself with it in case it rained.

"Well, young grampus," said the old man, kindly, "how is it?"

The boy looked in his face sadly, but made no reply.

"Bad, eh? Well, I daresay you are. Was once bad myself, tho' it's so long ago that I forget it. You'll soon get over it, and sleep as soundly as a baby rocked by its mother in a cradle."

The assurance conveyed but little consolation to Jack. He had never had a cradle; and could not remember his mother.

"He mustn't lie here all night," continued the speaker, musingly; "we must get him in the foksal."

This was addressed to Caleb.

"No, no!" moaned the lad; "let me lie here. I shall die if you move me."

"Die!" repeated the seaman. "Bah! The sea is rather a rough nus at first, but she's a kind one. Afore we clear the Channel we shall see you as active as a dolphin—lively as a flying fish."

"Pray, let me remain."

"It might be as well," observed the young sailor who had exchanged knives with him; "the air will do him good."

Bunce glanced significantly at the cabin door.

Caleb understood him, and added his persuasions. Between them they supported, or rather carried the sufferer down the companion ladder.

"Where are we to stow him?" exclaimed Bunce, looking round. "The poor lad has neither kit or hammock. It's my opinion those who sent him to sea wanted to get rid of him. Tho' I wor a parish 'prentice," he added, "they rigged me out when they shipped me."

"Drop him into my berth," answered Caleb. "I'm in the first watch, so it won't much signify; when I turn in I can take a snooze on my chest."

With rough, but genuine kindness, they placed Jack in the hammock of the speaker. Placing him there really was a kindness; for, had his legs been steady and his head clear, he never could have got into it himself. He might as easily have held an eel in his hand without its gliding through his fingers. Talk of difficulties!—young gentlemen in spangled vests, who twist themselves in and out between the staves of a ladder, bring their feet over their shoulders, hop about upon their hands, and indulge in all kinds of imaginable and unimaginable acrobatic eccentricities, might give it up in despair. It is impossible for a landsman either to creep, drop, or jump into a hammock. We speak from experience. How sailors achieve it is a mystery we never could clearly comprehend.

Well do we remember in our juvenile days having been pitched over, first on one side, then on the other, in making the attempt, to the great detriment of our figure-head, as an amphibious monster, who stood watching our gymnastics with a fiend-like grin upon his countenance, designated our battered caput.

Having made Jack what they considered exceedingly comfortable, his friends left him to go on deck.

Fortunately the wind, which, during the day, had been blowing a hard gale, suddenly fell; a dead calm ensued; and the hull of the Caradoc lay in a state of comparative repose. The waves were not the only things which had ceased to heave.

When Bunce and the lad returned to the fore-castle at the end of their watch, they found the new apprentice fast asleep, and dreaming as well as sleeping; for he muttered frequently to himself, and more than once the name of Lillian escaped him.

"Who's Lillian, I wonder?" said the old sailor.

"His mother, no doubt," answered his companion.

Caleb was only sixteen, had not been more than a year from home, and doubtless recollected the tearful eyes which gazed on him when he bade farewell; the trembling lips pressed to his in the fulness of maternal fondness. The reply was a natural one: the love of a mother is the first love that fills the heart, the purest and the best; forgotten, perhaps, in passion's trials; but returning to us, like the sweet thoughts of childhood, when the memory of all other love is but a dream.

Bunce was one of those seamen generally designated "sea-lawyers;" not a man on board knew how far a sailor might go, and yet steer within the line of mutiny, better than he did; he was a great stickler for his own rights, and tolerably careful not to infringe those of others. No matter what captain he shipped with; if his messmates had any complaint to make, they generally elected him spokesman: the consequence was that, after the skipper and first and second mates, he was, perhaps, the most important as well as popular person in the ship; a distinction to which his talent in spinning a yarn not a little contributed.

"Well, youngster," he exclaimed, as Jack opened his eyes and gazed languidly around him, "how is the egh—you understand?"

The lad, after giving a shudder at the recollection of his sufferings, answered that he thought he felt better.

"Think you feel better!" repeated the sailor. "I am sure you feel better. When Caleb and I turned in after the first watch you were something like a young grampus; it was quite beautiful to hear you; only I was obliged to lie with my deaf ear to the windward afore I could get a snooze. But turn out," he added; "the skipper will soon be on deck."

Jack Manders made an attempt to quit his unsteady resting-place. The instant his feet touched the ground the treacherous hammock, with one of those playfully eccentric movements which no known law of motion can define, swung back, and left him sprawling on the floor.

Caleb assisted him to rise.

"Only to think what helpless lubbers you landsmen are," exclaimed the old man, in a tone of mingled contempt and pity, for he was a thorough sailor himself. "But never mind that now. 'You'll learn better in time,' as the old owl observed to its young one, when he insisted on taking a cruise afore sunset. Caleb and I are come to hold a palaver, as the South Sea Injians call it."

Jack mentally wondered what a "palaver" could possibly be.

"So you are a 'prentice?"

"No, I ain't."

"Your uncle 'prenticed you. I told you I didn't like his figure-head."

"I can't help what Mike did," replied the boy.

"But you signed the 'dentures."

"I ain't signed nothing," observed the lad. "How should I, when I can't write?"

"Then don't," whispered his adviser, lowering his voice. "It's your only chance. The first port we comes to, slip your cable and run. The skipper can't force you to return without showing your 'dentures to the English counsel—that's law and justice, though they ar'n't allays one."

The last words were pronounced as gravely as a judge could have spoken them from the bench. In fact, Mr. Bunce prided himself on being looked up to as a legal authority at sea. Jack thanked him, and promised to abide by his advice.

"He shall cut me in pieces," he said, "afore I make my mark."

The old sailor nodded approvingly.

"And I won't do a thing."

"Avast there!" interrupted the ex-lawyer; "the skipper afore the mates, the mates afore the seaman, and the seaman afore the loafer, but the ship afore them all. Every hand that cracks a biscuit on board of her must take his turn: so, no skulking duty."

Jack thought it very hard that he should be compelled to crack biscuits on board the Caradoc, when he would so much rather have gone with even half a loaf on shore. But he was quite wise enough to promise to do his best.

Sailors are proverbially a kind-hearted race—reckless, improvident, fond of fun, frolic, and dissipation, but rarely unfeeling. The unprovided state in which the new hand had been brought on board excited their sympathy, and they made up a kit between them. The chief contributions, however, came from Bunce and Caleb.

In the course of the morning, Jack was sent for by Captain Gall into the cabin.

"Mind how you tack," said the old seaman, as he left the fore-castle; "don't be beaten by press of sail. If the skipper mounts royals, up with your sky-scrappers."

In other words, the speaker recommended him to oppose both persuasions and threats by the most unflinching firmness. The boy nodded, as much as to say that he understood him, and with a heavy heart, mounted the companion ladder.

Captain Gall was one of those men in whose breasts nature had implanted a love of tyranny. Had he been born to the purple of the Cæsars, his great delight would have been in the arena. Restricted to a narrower sphere, his principal pleasure was in tormenting his crew, and rendering them miserable. But it was on his apprentices chiefly that his brutal temper loved to vent itself, simply because he could indulge in it with greater safety. There was scarcely a limit to their ill usage. The angry word, followed by the ready blow, were outrages of everyday occurrence.

The eyes which met his savage glance with firmness, excited him almost to madness, whilst those which shrunk in terror from his gaze, increased the zest the sight of the agony of his victim afforded him.

Nearly every voyage he was compelled to ship a fresh crew; scarcely a sailor ever sailed with him a second time. But there was no escape for the apprentices.

When Jack Manders made his appearance in the cabin, the captain eyed him sternly for some moments without uttering a word; the boy returned his gaze steadily, but without defiance: the tyrant would much rather have seen him trembling and cowed before him: his self-possession irritated him.

"Well!" he exclaimed, "now that you have quitted your evil way of life, and your worthy uncles given you a chance of retrieving your character on board the Caradoc, I trust you feel grateful to them, and have made up your mind to prove obedient to me?"

"What have I to be grateful for?" demanded the lad, colouring deeply at the allusion to the means by which he had hitherto lived. "If I did wrong, Mike made me."

"I don't believe a word of it," replied the skipper.

"Can't help that," observed the boy, philosophically. Gall felt very much inclined to knock him down, but for the present restrained his passion. He had one point to gain before his victim would be legally in his power.

"Sign that paper," he said, pointing to what purported to be an indenture, binding Jack Manders an apprentice to the owners of the good ship Caradoc for the space of seven years.

"What is it?"

"What is it? you impudent young rascal," repeated the brute striding towards him; "it's the chance of making an honest man of you. Write your name."

"I can't write."

"Make your mark, then," added the captain, thrusting a pen into his hand.

"I won't!"

The words had no sooner escaped his lips, than a blow upon the temple sent the poor boy headlong and half stunned against the side of the cabin.

"I'll teach you," exclaimed the coward, "to bandy words with me! There!—there! and there!" he added, striking him again with every word. "Now will you sign?"

Poor Jack, although exceedingly pale, and all but senseless from the cruel treatment, had still sufficient spirit to answer "No."

We will not shock our readers by dwelling too minutely on the scene of cruelty and violence that followed; it was brutal strength against the helplessness of boyhood—the evil passions of a ferocious nature unchained, and revelling in the sufferings of its victim.

Jack Manders, as our readers have already seen, did not want for what is generally termed "pluck;" he had shown it in defending Rachel against the insults of Carus Kearn on the bridge, and he now exerted it on his own account. Catching up a heavy sextant from the table, he became in turn the aggressor, and hurled it with all his remaining strength at the head of his persecutor.

Captain Gall measured his length upon the floor; and the boy, bleeding and exhausted from the contest, rushed up the cabin-stairs.

Several of the sailors, amongst whom were Bunce and Caleb, were grouped together on the deck. They had been listening to his cries.

"Have you signed?" said the former.

"You know I can't write."

"Made your mark, then?"

"I left it on the captain's head," replied the boy, as he sank exhausted upon deck. "I did it to save my life. He would have murdered me."

Caleb, with the natural sympathy of youth, knelt by his side, and began chafing his forehead, whilst one of the men attempted to pour some rum down his throat.

"The captain will flog him," observed a sailor.

"He can't," replied the sea-lawyer. "The boy is not an apprentice—he has been crimped."

The captain, who had recovered from the blow and fall he so richly merited, now made his appearance, foaming with rage and half mad with passion. The instant he saw the inanimate form of Jack, he rushed towards him and inflicted a severe kick on the side of his head.

There was a murmur amongst the men and a cry of shame.

"The rascal—the villain!" roared the brute, preparing to inflict a second kick. "I'll teach him to mutiny on board my ship. I'll flog the —"

"It ar'n't mutiny," said Bunce, firmly; "and you arn't got no right to flog him."

The infuriated monster glared on him like a tiger about to spring.

"He ar'n't no 'prentice," added the old man; "you crimped him."

"Apprentice or no apprentice, he shall feel the lash," answered Captain Gall. "Up with him." Not a hand stirred.

The commander of the Caradoc had displayed his temper somewhat earlier than he was accustomed to do, for the Caradoc was not yet out of the channel. There was something in the sullen disobedience of the men that ought to have warned him; but passion had blinded reason. Calling for his pistols, which the steward brought him, he looked round him resolutely, and directed the men to tie Jack up.

The order was met with the same result. "You will stand by me, Fraser," he said, addressing his first mate.

"Certainly," answered the officer, a canny Scot. "But, captain, war it no better to gi' the men no excuse for disobedience by showing the lad's indentures?"

"No!" roared the bully.

"Very weel," said Fraser, coolly.

"For the last time," exclaimed Captain Gall, eyeing the old seaman Bunce with a menacing look, for he at once set him down as the ringleader in the affair, "will you obey my orders? Remember," he added, "it is mutiny."

"It is worse," exclaimed Caleb; "it is murder! Your victim is dead!"

The courage of the white-livered tyrant fell at the word; and the bully sank into the coward.

The first mate walked very methodically to the spot where the boy was lying, and placed his hand upon his heart. It beat; but still very faintly.

"I don't think the poor laddie has long to live," he observed; "but he is no dead yet."

The commander of the Caradoc began to breathe a little more freely. He felt as if a very uncomfortable pressure had been suddenly removed from his neck.

"Take him to his hammock," he said, turning to the second mate; "the young rascal is only shamming."

"He ain't got no hammock," said Bunce.

"Or kit," added a sailor.

"Come on board with nothing but the rigging he stands in," added the sea-lawyer. "Prentice! Tell it to the marines! The boy has been crimped and murdered! In my 'pinion, the ship ought to put back to port again."

The brutal commander, who found his authority perilled at the very onset of his voyage, saw that it would not do to push matters too far, for, if Jack really died, it would require all his tact, and a pretty amount of hard swearing, to get clear off.

Whispering a few words to the first mate, he retired to his cabin, and something which sounded very like a hiss accompanied him.

Prudence forbade his noticing or resenting it.

Meanwhile Jack Manders, who still continued insensible from the treatment he had received, was carried down to the fore-castle, and placed a second time in the hammock of Caleb, who watched over him like a brother. It was not much that the poor fellow had in his power beyond kind words and sympathy to bestow, for he too was an apprentice, and, unfortunately, had signed his indentures.

That night Captain Gall did not venture on deck, but left the command of the Caradoc to the first mate, with orders to report to him every hour.

"Well, Fraser," he said, as the young Scotchman entered the state cabin, "how are the men?"

"Quiet enough the noo."

"And the youngster?"

"Still very bad, sir. He has been raving and talking in the strangest o' fashions aw the night."

"It's all a sham," replied the commander.

The mate remained silent.

"I'm afraid we have got an awkward crew," observed the former.

"Indeed, sir, it's my opinion."

"Of course you will stand by me?"

"In aw that's just and lawful," answered the canny Scot.

The captain scowled upon him, and dismissed him once more to the deck.

The report made by the mate of Jack's condition, was anything but exaggerated. The sufferings, mental and bodily, of his first night on board, joined to the brutal treatment he had been subjected to, brought on a fever. In his ravings, he uttered strange words; but ever and anon, gentler thoughts appeared to come over him, and he murmured, as he had done in his sleep, the name of Lillian.

Several days passed before he could be considered out of danger, and a still longer period ere he quitted his hammock.

Meanwhile the Caradoc still held her way.

Captain Gall had seen quite enough of the temper of his crew to calculate the exact amount of forbearance he might depend upon, and prudently determined not to exceed it. Instead of renewing his brutal treatment of Jack, which had so excited their indignation, he contented himself with a kick, a curse, or a blow, whenever the "obstinate young pickpocket," as he invariably designated him, came in his way.

This last proceeding galled the poor boy even more than his tyrant's harshness—it was the searing of the hand, which marked him for contempt; the heritage of shame, from which there was no escape.

Often, in the lone hours of the night-watch, or when aloft, aiding to furl the sails, did he feel tempted to end his misery and life together—for he saw no hope—no future! The horizon which bounded the prospect of his young days appeared dark and gloomy. It was hard to suffer, when relinquishing his hold upon a rope, as he stood at the extremity of one of the yards, would bring him peace. But he did suffer; for, strange to say, the prayer Lillian had taught him was seldom absent from his mind; and one line he repeated more frequently than the rest, although he had but an imperfect idea of what it meant:—

"Lead us not into temptation."

He had frequently wondered how it was that Caleb, who had to endure almost as great an amount of harsh treatment as himself, bore it so well; and on one occasion, when they were both aloft together, he asked him about it.

"I have a mother who loves me," replied the boy, "and whom I love dearly."

"And yet she sent you to sea," observed Jack; "my uncles, who hated me, did no worse by me."

"My father-in-law sent me against her will," said his companion; "but I shall live to return and disappoint him."

"I should like to return too," muttered Jack, as he thought of his uncles. "But I never shall," he added. "I am tired of life, and can't stand it much longer. I often feel as if I could throw myself overboard."

"The very thing," whispered Caleb, "the skipper would like to drive you to."

"Then I won't do it," was the reply.

"We might both hit on something better," added the speaker.

"What is that?" demanded his friend.

"Set our wits against the captain's strength," answered Jack; "and if you would only second me, I think we might give him as good as he sends."

A compact was made between them that they should mutually assist each other; and it was not long before the alliance bore fruit; for, two nights afterwards, as their tyrant was using a rope's-end upon the shoulders of Caleb, an iron bolt, hurled from aloft, struck the savage on the side of the head.

Captain Gall felt stunned for an instant. His suspicions not unnaturally fell upon Jack; and it might have fared hard with him, but for the evidence of the first mate, who declared that the boy had been standing by his side when the missile was thrown. Neither of the lads could comprehend his motives. Bunce, the old sailor, did.

The quiet, canny Scot had not the slightest objection, in case of any accident occurring to his commander, to take charge of the Caradoc.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Sincerity, thou first of virtues,
Let no mortal leave thy onward path,
Though from the gulf of hell destruction cry,
To take dissimulation's winding way.

HUME.

It is astonishing with what perseverance some men labour to destroy the only real basis on which happiness depends. Like children playing on the shores of life, they waste both energy and time in a vain attempt to rear a house of sand, instead of employing the more solid materials Providence has placed within their reach—materials which only require to be brought together to construct an edifice the tempests of the world may beat against in vain, leaving the structure majestic and uninjured.

To drop the tone of allegory, and convey our meaning more clearly to our readers, how frequently do we see mankind pursue the tortuous path of cunning, fraud, and crime, to arrive at fortune; although the nearer and broader one of integrity stretches itself invitingly before them. There are a few difficulties at its commencement, perhaps, and those difficulties appal them; so they either turn aside, or will not see it.

Carus Kearn was peculiarly cursed with this mental obliquity of vision. Like the serpent, he could never advance to the end proposed in a straight line. The turnings, windings, and doublings of deceit, appeared to possess an irresistible charm for him.

From boyhood he had been actuated by two strong passions; the love—we fear it is a profanation of the word—of his cousin Rachel, and the desire to inherit her father's wealth. We have seen already how the first hope failed him; time only can decide how far he is destined to prove successful in the second. Probabilities at the present moment seemed to favour him, for Mr. Bently continued as widely estranged from his daughter and son-in-law as ever; he never had, and, judging from appearances, never could forgive what he considered an ill-assorted marriage.

It is an unwise thing for parents to attempt to dispose of the affections of their children. Hearts are not like merchandise—to be invoiced and transferred at pleasure, but will have a voice in their own disposal.

Many would-be philosophers have regretted that the heart cannot be regulated, wound up, and set to keep correct time, like a watch—forgetful that ideas of correct time may differ.

Could their vain desire be gratified, what a monotonous thing humanity would become!

The disappointment which Carus experienced on his cousin's marriage with George Markham—although it roused every malignant feeling dormant or active in his subtle nature, and inflicted a terrible blow upon his vanity and self-love—did not prevent that very calculating gentleman from making a prudent match—prudent in the world's opinion; for the victim he selected was rich—the only charm she ever possessed in her husband's eyes. The portion he received with her enabled him to pursue the reckless game of speculation, and indulge in yet more debasing pursuits: for Carus was both a gamester and a sensualist.

Fortunately, a considerable part of his wife's fortune had been settled on herself. The principal it was out of her power to touch; the interest only being paid to her receipt, and hers alone.

During the first years of her ill-assorted marriage Mrs. Kearn had, regularly as she received it, given every guinea of her income to her worthless husband. Finding at last that neither her patience, liberality, nor confidence met the slightest return, the outraged wife recollected that she was also a mother, had the interests of her boy to protect, and firmly refused to let him touch another shilling.

From that day Carus hated her, and began to consider how he might rid himself of her—not by violence—for he was not one of those melo-dramatic villains who care to risk their own dear safety unnecessarily—but by some deep-laid scheme which would separate them legally, and overwhelm her with disgrace in the opinion of the world.

He longed to be free—at liberty to marry again. He had made one profitable speculation in the market of Hymen, and saw no reason why he should not prove equally successful a second time.

If incapable of pursuing the open and direct path leading to the accomplishment of his designs, few men were more capable, as we before observed, than Carus of discovering the crooked one. Of this Machiavelian tact he had given proof in the plans so successfully carried out against the happiness and reputation of George Markham. He it was who first inspired Mr. Bently with the conviction that the securities long since realised in India, had been abstracted by his son-in-law; he it was who supplied Styles with the means of leading the man he hated step by step into the degrading vice of drunkenness.

Could he have succeeded in plunging him into crime as well, the triumph would have been complete.

About the same time that his victim escaped from his trammels, Carus Kearn made the acquaintance of a Captain Bland—a fellow whose nature was as specious as his name. Nothing could be more gentle than his manner, or engaging than his conversation, especially to listeners of the beau sexe. Admiration appeared veiled in respect; his warmth, that of sympathy—the most dangerous weapon that can be directed against a woman's heart. Then he appeared to be so fond of children, it was impossible not to like him. Mrs. Kearn soon began to feel a pleasure in his society, and drew dangerous comparisons between her visitor and Carus.

In employing the term "dangerous," let us not be misunderstood. It is no tale of frailty or guilty passion that we are about to relate, but one of trial, suffering, temptation, and woman's triumph. The comparisons made by the neglected wife were dangerous in no other sense than they destroyed the last illusion—the lingering affection, which, despite his conduct, she still felt for her unworthy husband.

Scorn hardens the heart as fire tempers steel.

What Carus Kearn's intentions were, the progress of our story must develop. We have no wish to analyse them too closely.

As junior partner in the firm, he was not without a certain degree of influence with the clerks, more than one of whom, to curry favour with him, condescended to act the part of spy upon the proceedings of Peter Mangles, whose friendship for George Markham and affection for Rachel were the principal obstacles to the accomplishment of his designs; consequently, it was not long before he was made acquainted with the success of the recommendation of the latter to Mr. Thornton, to take him as director of the new establishment he was about to found. The intelligence was gall and wormwood to him, for it gave the victim a chance of escape from the poverty of his position, and of re-establishing his name and character in the commercial world.

Carus saw but one way of preventing it—an appeal to the prejudices of his uncle; and this appeal he took the first opportunity of making.

"I suppose, sir," he observed to him, shortly after the arrangement had been concluded, "that you have heard the intelligence?"

"I have heard a great deal lately," replied the merchant; "but to what do you more particularly allude?"

"Mr. Thornton's new branch establishment in town."

"He is an enterprising man," observed Mr. Bently, "and deserves success. Never have the affairs of a firm been conducted with greater discretion and liberality."

"Just at present, I agree with you."

The marked emphasis upon the words, "Just at present," caused the old gentleman, who was busily occupied in looking over his foreign correspondence, to raise his eyes, and regard the speaker inquiringly. "Everything will depend upon the party," his nephew continued, "whom he employs to conduct it."

"Doubtless."

"Have you any idea whom he has selected?"

"How should I?" answered his relative. "Mr. Thornton has not consulted me upon the subject."

"I thought not."

"What mean you, Carus? Do speak plainly," said Mr. Bently. "You know that I was never good at guessing mysteries, and detest them."

"My position is a painful one," replied the hypocrite, "for I owe you everything, and am fearful of being misconstrued; but I had better encounter that risk than give you the right hereafter to reproach me for my silence, especially if the ruin of a man who possesses so many claims to your friendship should follow his ill-considered choice. Yielding to the solicitations of Mangles, Mr. Thornton has consented to intrust the direction of the new enterprise to George Markham."

His uncle reflected for an instant, and appeared disagreeably surprised by the intelligence.

"Are you quite sure of this?" he demanded.

"Quite."

"Mangles has acted incautiously," observed the uncle; "and yet I have no right to blame, seeing that he has acted as a private friend, and not as my cashier."

"I trust, my dear uncle, that you comprehend my motives," said Carus.

"Perfectly; and do not blame you for your doubts of the prudence of my old friend's choice, for I entertain the same; but he knows the young man's character; has acted with his eyes open, and must take the consequences. I do not see how I can interfere."

The nephew felt disappointed. He had anticipated a storm of anger, a hasty resolution to remonstrate with the manufacturer, to threaten the withdrawal of accommodation unless the appointment were cancelled; but, fearing to excite suspicion, he kept his feelings carefully to himself.

During the morning Mr. Bently took occasion to remonstrate privately with his clerk upon the subject. Peter listened to him impatiently. It was an affair which in no way concerned the firm, and the old man did not choose to be interfered with.

"It is my business, Richard," he said; "and whilst I do not neglect yours, can't see what you have to do with it. I have quite as much right to befriend George Markham as you have to oppress him—more, for the balance must always incline to the side of kindness. I know whom you have received your information from—Carus. I can't understand you," he continued. "You are blind—obstinately blind. See only with his eyes—hear only with his ears, instead of trusting to your own. You judge your son-in-law through the opinions of the man who is most interested in ruining him. Is that wise? is it fair?"

"You are in error," replied his employer, calmly. "I judge him from myself."

"You imagine so."

"Did Mr. Thornton require any security?"

"I was his security."

"Any recommendation?"

"Recommendation!" repeated Peter Mangles, sharply; "I thought you were aware that I recommended him. And, little as you may think of my influence in the City, permit me to tell you that my recommendation would be looked upon as satisfactory by the best houses upon 'Change.'"

This was no idle boast—the speaker's character for intelligence on mercantile affairs did not stand higher than his reputation for probity and prudence.

"I see what it is, Richard," he resumed—"you intend to use your influence with Thornton, to induce him to withdraw from the arrangement."

"Why did you not inform me of it?" demanded Mr. Bently.

"Because I would not give the evil passions of your nature time to interfere," replied the clerk.

"It is not my fault if the confidence of other days no longer exists between us: I have done nothing to forfeit it. But mark my words," he added, seriously: "you have frequently found me as unstable as the rates of interest, and led me as you pleased, but this time, Richard, I intend to be firm: do you hear me? firm as your own obstinate temper; and if you interfere between George Markham and the chance I have procured him of redeeming himself, I not only withdraw from the house but join him in partnership, and start in business."

A smile of incredulity rested for an instant on the lips of his hearer: so improbable did it appear to him that the cautious, prudent Peter Mangles should ever risk the economies of his laborious life in such a speculation.

"You don't believe me," added the speaker, starting from his seat at the desk; "and very naturally not, I dare say, for you have turned me round your finger—moulded me as you pleased; but this time I am resolved—firm as a rock—there, I have sworn it."

He placed his hand, with solemn earnestness, upon the open page of the ledger before him. The oath—if oath it might be termed—was quite as binding upon him as if it had been sealed on a far more sacred volume.

"It is not my intention to interfere," observed Mr. Bently, calmly.

Peter looked at him doubtfully.

"Do you mistrust my word?"

"Not when it is given."

"I give it you now," replied his employer.

"Without reservation?"

"Mental or otherwise," answered the merchant.

"If we have arrived at opposite conclusions on the character of my son-in-law, it is a misfortune, not a fault; we can neither of us help our convictions; and, strong as mine are, believe me, old friend, that I shall feel happy should it ever be in your power to convince me that they have been conceived in error. May you never have occasion to regret your generous confidence in one who violated mine; or my valued correspondent, Mr. Thornton, suffer from having yielded to your solicitations on behalf of your protégé."

"That's the first sensible resolution you have come to for a long time, on the subject of George," observed the old clerk, "and I feel satisfied with it; but, as for his having violated your confidence, permit me to observe that his marriage with Rachel was not a mercantile transaction, consequently there was no confidence to violate; had there been, my opinion might have been shaken. It was an affair of the heart, I think they call it, debited and credited with affection on either side. Ah, Richard! Richard! I am afraid that we City men know too little about such things."

"You, at least, appear to be progressing in knowledge," replied Mr. Bently, with a smile.

"Because I have lately seen more than I ever suspected to have existed in the world of it," answered Peter. "You have no idea how Rachel and George love each other. Poor girl, she had almost made up her mind to part with him, when I told her how he had been employing his time: but that was your fault—you misled me."

"And the weak fool yielded to his solicitations," exclaimed her father, bitterly, "refused my forgiveness and the comforts of her girlhood's home, to share the fate of the man who had so frequently deceived her."

"On the contrary, George advised her to accept it."

"Indeed!"

"And she would have done so," continued the clerk, "had she not discovered that his nightly visits to the dreadful places you described—by-the-by, I wonder that you ever ventured to such scenes—were for no other object than the recovery of his lost son."

"And she believed him?"

"Yes."

"And do you believe him?"

"Firmly," replied Peter,—"as firmly as I believe in the stability of the Bank of England, the acceptance of our firm, or any other unquestionable security. George was always truthful. But there, let us drop the subject. I must hasten into the City. Bless me!" he added, "there will be quite a panic upon 'Change. I shall be an hour behind my time; such a thing never occurred before, since I have been cashier of the firm of Bently and Company."

The speaker hastily buttoned on his greatcoat, took a large bill-case from his desk, put it in the breast-pocket, and walked out of the office with a brisk step and cheerful countenance: his heart felt all the lighter for the explanation he had had with his employer, whose promise not to interfere with the appointment of George was a great point in the latter's favour. His influence with Mr. Thornton might possibly have caused the manufacturer to rescind it.

"It is a painful task," exclaimed the merchant, looking after him, "to wear a mask with Peter. He thinks my heart is iron. Could he read it he would find its sternness is but seeming—but the time has not come yet. Those securities!" he murmured to himself, "those fatal securities! Were that doubt removed—were I but convinced that his reformation is sincere, how gladly would I acknowledge my son-in-law, receive my daughter to my arms, and bless her with a parent's fond affection. Patience! patience! the path I have entered upon is a rugged one, but if followed to the end must lead to happiness at last."

During the year which elapsed, the conduct of George Markham was all that could be desired by his most devoted wife and their mutual friend. Curious eyes of hate as well as of affection were fixed upon him, watching his progress; but nothing could be discovered to alarm the latter or gratify the malevolent feeling of the former. Early and late he was in the counting-house of his new employer, displaying an activity and intelligence, an attention to his interests, which slowly but surely commanded both respect and confidence.

Peter Mangles, who now passed his Sundays en famille with Rachel and her husband, chuckled with delight. His fondest hopes were being realised; the long-suffering wife smiled again; a new era had dawned, and the only cloud which obscured its horizon was the uncertainty of the fate of her son.

One Saturday evening, on returning home, George found her dreadfully agitated, and in tears. He knew too well the cause of her sorrow, but dreamt not of the occasion which had so painfully renewed it.

"Still mourning," he murmured, folding her fondly to his breast.

"These are tears of joy," replied Rachel; "look here!"

She placed a letter in his hand; he recognised the writing of his son.

Our readers, doubtless, have not forgotten the letter written by our hero on the eve of his departure for the school in Jersey, in which he stated that a benevolent gentleman had snatched him from the streets, and promised to provide for his instruction and future career. This letter the sudden abandonment of the house in the Belvedere-road, had prevented Mr. Morton from delivering; and he had only just discovered the occasion. We need scarcely add that it was sent in a way which left no trace, or that it brought the best consolation—hope to the heart of the fond mother.

"Thank heaven," exclaimed the reformed drunkard, "my boy has not been left to contend unaided against the vices of the world. Providence has been kinder to him than his father. Bless the benevolent stranger, whoever he may be."

Neither of his parents doubted for an instant the truth of their son's assertions, for Richard had never yet been guilty of a lie.

When the news was communicated to Peter Mangles, the kind old man fully shared their joy. At first, they had indulged a vague hope that he could give them some clue; but, however intelligent in all commercial matters, the clerk was a perfect child where the intrigues and accidents of life were concerned. He had never mingled with them.

"When was this written?" he asked.

Fortunately the letter was not dated. It might have been but yesterday.

That night Rachel slept with it under her pillow. Balm had been poured upon the wound her heart had received. True, it was not healed, the presence of her boy alone could accomplish that, but its agony was assuaged, the hope which had supported her appeared brighter than ever. Heaven seemed to have sent it as a recompence for her trials and long-enduring patience under misfortune.

When his clerk related the circumstances to Mr. Bently, the latter changed colour and seemed visibly affected.

"Does he say where he is?" he asked.

His informant shook his head in the negative.

The merchant appeared somewhat relieved.

"We shall find him, Richard," replied Peter; "Providence is wiser than we know. I never thought so much on these things before. Only to think of raising up a friend for the poor deserted boy on that terrible night, when everything appeared to have conspired to accomplish his ruin. I wonder who the gentleman is! He has sent him to school, too! I hope they attend properly to his ciphering and hand-writing. His father was always clever at figures."

"And do you really think that Providence directed this?"

"I am sure of it," replied Peter; "and you must be blind indeed if you are not of the same opinion. It was necessary to strike a great blow to bring George Markham to a sense of his folly, and the blow was struck. The loss of his son, the despair of his wife, reclaimed him. Heaven would not permit the instrument of its purposes to perish, and wisely raised the boy a friend, one who performed the duty his—that is," he added, correcting himself, for he felt unwilling to create pain, "which those nearest to him had neglected."

Mr. Bently regarded him with surprise; he had never heard Peter either so eloquent or philosophical before.

"You must be a miserable man, Richard," continued the speaker, "when you reflect on the sufferings your obstinacy has created. But there, I will not reproach you; take your own way; the same good angel which watched over the poor lad, will soften your heart at last."

"Perhaps."

"Perhaps!" repeated Peter, warmly. "It would be wicked to doubt it. Do you imagine that you will be permitted to die at variance with your only child? It is not in nature. Her voice may be stifled in health, prosperity may blind us; but when the hour of sickness comes, and we lie upon our solitary pillow, reflection comes; the rock is struck, and—"

"Say no more," interrupted the merchant, hastily; "the picture is gloomy."

"But truthful," muttered the former. "I have done. I saw Mr. Thornton to-day, and he speaks in the highest terms of George Markham, his intelligence, industry, and perseverance. Perhaps he is a little too speculative," added the speaker, thoughtfully; "but all his speculations have hitherto been successful. The concern is extending rapidly; he talks of throwing more capital into it; of taking your son-in-law as a partner."

"A partner," repeated Mr. Bently.

"Yes, Richard; and I think of throwing a certain amount of capital into the concern to assist him; and now the murder's out."

"How much?"

"Well, not much at first," replied Peter; "four thousand pounds."

Never had his employer betrayed so much astonishment. That his old clerk should risk such a sum appeared to him so extraordinary, that he could scarcely credit the evidence of his senses.

He muttered something about the risk.

Mangles caught the word, and looked rather serious.

"On the conduct of a man, too, whose integrity is doubtful."

The countenance of the old man lighted again.

"I thought you had some solid objection to offer," he observed, "but find it is only your old prejudice. I have every month gone over Mr. Thornton's books, not for my own satisfaction, but for George's, and never saw accounts better kept. Clear, Mr. Bently, clear and intelligible as your own—not a penny has been expended that is not vouched for—the balance right to a fraction. Integrity! I always told you he was as honest as my ledger, and the experience of the past year has confirmed it."

"How do you intend to raise the sum you name?" inquired his employer, who knew that Peter's money was all invested either on mortgage or in shares in several well-established companies.

Peter Mangles scratched his ear—a habit when anything puzzled him—not that he felt the slightest difficulty in procuring the sum, or five times the amount: that was easy enough; it was the embarrassment of choice, the effort to make up his mind what securities to realise. A certain number in the fire and life office paid him nine per cent.: of course he could not think of parting with them; and his shares in the gas company were equally profitable.

"I must call in Howard's mortgage, I suppose," he observed, answering the difficulty in his own mind rather than the question of Mr. Bently.

"That will require time."

"A month or so."

"And it pays well."

"Only five per cent. The security is ample, and—"

"The investment is a safe one," interrupted the merchant, "and it would be a pity to withdraw it. Transfer it to me, and I will write you a cheque for the money at once; should your expectations of George's conduct and success be realised, you can redeem it."

Peter looked astonished, and felt yet more astonished than he looked! That the speaker should by any act of his, either directly or indirectly contribute to establishing his son-in-law, was something so remote from his calculations, that the old man could not comprehend it; and he not unnaturally suspected that he could not have clearly explained the purpose for which he required the money.

"Did you really understand me, Richard?" he exclaimed.

"Perfectly."

"What! that the money is—"

"To enable your friend to take a share in the firm which Mr. Thornton has recently established in London, and of which George Markham has hitherto been only the manager," said the merchant. "I see nothing so very extraordinary in my offer," he continued; "the security is unexceptionable. You are the party I oblige."

"That's true," murmured the clerk, with a sigh of disappointment.

"Still, I do not wish the transaction to be spoken of," observed Mr. Bently; "it might be misconstrued."

"No fear of that," muttered Peter, bitterly.

"Give rise to hopes that may never be realised; lead Rachel to—"

"Say no more," interrupted the old man, "say no more, Richard, or I shall refuse your offer at once."

"You accept it, then?"

"Yes."

The "yes" was rather reluctantly given: the motives of his employer not appearing quite so clear as the clerk could have desired.

That same week the transfer of the mortgage was made, and the money paid into the firm, on signing the deed of partnership. Henceforth the name of George Markham appeared in conjunction with the respected and well-established one of Mr. Thornton.

It was a proud day, a very proud one, for Peter Mangles; it has been asserted—but we must decline vouching for the fact—that in his excitement he absolutely entered an account in the day-book in the names of Bently and Markham, instead of Bently and Company, to the great disgust of Carus, whose malevolent feelings were still further increased by the air of triumph with which he imagined the old clerk regarded him.

It cannot be concealed that the hitherto successful schemer had some grounds for mortification. The man he hated—whose utter downfall he had foretold—done all in his power to accomplish—whom, when speaking of in the City, he had treated as an adventurer, a nonentity—had become a personage in the commercial world, had a signature and a standing upon 'Change; the reflection was gall and wormwood to him, and he determined once more to attempt his ruin; not by the means he had formerly used: he knew the world too well to expect the same scheme to succeed twice. This time, he resolved to strike not only at the happiness, but at the honour of his successful rival.

"George possesses the fool's virtue, gratitude," he argued with himself; "and believing that he is under obligations to Styles, will feel bound to serve him."

It was a fiend-like calculation—out of his own goodness of heart to weave the net that was to ensnare him.

OBEEDIENCE IN CHILDREN.—It is unspeakable what a blessing it is to a child, what a saving of unhappiness and wickedness in after life, to be early taught absolute obedience: there must be no hesitating or asking why, but what a mother says must at once be done. The young twig bends easily, but remember that, in after years, it grows hard, and you will break before you can bend it. A little steadiness at first will save you many years' sorrow. While you insist upon obedience, however, you must take care that you do not provoke a child, and tempt it to disobedience by unreasonable and foolish commands. "Provoke not your children to wrath;" and when it is necessary to punish them, see that it never be done violently and in a passion, but as a duty.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

GOOD MANNERS.

THERE is much truth in the old saying, "Manners make the man." Politeness has made many a man's fortune, given him an enviable position in society, won for him the esteem of the estimable, and added refinement of life to sterling worth of character.

Every man may be a gentleman. To confound riches and refinement is a great mistake; so it is to associate vulgarity and poverty. "Judge Jeffries, though seated on the highest tribunal of common law, whilst pouring forth his brutal ribaldry, was a vulgar man; and a very vulgar man was Chancellor Thurlow, sporting oaths and obscenity at the table of the Prince of Wales. But there was no vulgarity about James Ferguson, though herding sheep, whilst his eye watched Arcturus and the Pleiades, and his wistful spirit wandered through immensity; and though seated at a stocking-loom, there was no vulgarity in the youth who penned the 'Star of Bethlehem,'—the weaver boy, Henry Kirke White, was not a vulgar lad."

Whatever our position, and however limited our means, it is quite possible for us to cultivate refinement of manners, and it is an error to suppose that the term gentleman exclusively belongs to the wealthier class of the community.

WHAT IS A GENTLEMAN?

The word itself is, without doubt, derived from the French gentilhomme, a man of birth or extraction from a noble family. One of our old English writers (Selden) says it was introduced by the Normans, and most likely it was. But the French word itself, where did that come from? Doubtless it had its origin in the Latin adjective, gentilis, belonging to a family. The French gentilhomme and the English gentleman were then only applied to those who boasted ancestral honours. But this old signification soon gave way, and the term was applied to those who had the manners of the great, those courtesies which the well-born learned and practised. Hence to be a gentleman and to be courteous became one and the same thing. A churl, on the other hand, was applied to men of an ungracious turn, and Dame Juliana Berners, reflecting on the Scriptural chronology of the progeny of Cain and Seth, says, "Cain became a churl through the curse of God, and Seth a gentleman by his father's and mother's blessing." Bernard Gilpin, preaching before Edward IV., said, "The mean men murmur and grudge, and say the gentlemen have all, and there never were so many gentlemen and so little gentleness."

We commonly use the term gentleman in two senses: first, as applied to persons of rank; second, to those of refined and elegant manners. To the latter we may all attain, if we resolve on doing so.

HOW TO BEGIN.

Begin with your personal appearance. Avoid everything that is offensive in your person and dress. First, your person. Keep scrupulously clean. This is impossible in many businesses during business hours. We would recommend no youth to be fainal about his labour, to fear soiling his hands, or dirtying his clothes. When at work keep yourself as clean as you can, for it is far more comfortable and pleasant, but don't be afraid of work because it is not clean. The only clean work a man should be scrupulous about is honest work, and the only dirty work he need fear is dishonest or dishonourable labour. When work is over, make yourself agreeably presentable to other people. Soiled hands and a begrimed face, ruffled hair and dirty clothes, need not be carried into the dining-room or parlour, so long as we have soap and water, brushes and combs.

But at the very outset of an effort to cultivate refined manners, we should remember that honesty is an essential part of it. Honesty demands that the body should be clean as well as the face and hands, that the hair should not only be dressed but washed, so that the scalp may be thoroughly pure and wholesome. Nails have to be looked after. Without proper care the finger nails grow too long, and break off, or else they are cut to the "quick" as some people say, when they fail to answer their object, in addition to presenting an unseemly appearance. They should be looked to every time the hands are washed, and every particle of dirt removed from under the nails. The feet want looking after as well as the finger-nails. People who only try to be refined for "the look of the thing," very often neglect to do more to their persons than is absolutely necessary for show. They are shortsighted. Nature has gifted us with a nose as well as eyes, with scent as well as sight, and the organ of smell detects uncleanness when the eye cannot see it.

This renders it especially necessary to keep the teeth clean. It is not pleasant for people to turn away their heads if you come too close, but they are frequently obliged to do so on account of the mouth being left uncleaned, and no care being taken as to the breath.

In cleaning the teeth use no tooth-powder. The teeth do not require it. Pure water is their best restorative. If they, through neglect, require for a time anything more than water, a little powdered charcoal or cigar-ash is the best and simplest remedy. "Bad breath arises more frequently than otherwise from neglected and decayed teeth. If it is occasioned by a foul stomach, a pure diet, bathing, and a general attention to the laws of health, are required for its removal."

All food which occasions a disagreeable odour should be avoided. Anything calculated to produce a bad breath should be scrupulously shunned.

DRESS.

"Dress is always to be considered as secondary to the person." Clothe yourself in the manner most becoming to your person. Never sacrifice your appearance for the sake of wearing what others wear: at the same time never assert your independence by wearing a costume out of keeping with the dress of everybody else. While we should never be the slave of fashion, we should avoid anything like a striking opposition to her laws. As members of society we owe allegiance to her dictates; but may adapt them at the same time to our particular wants.

A neat, well-made, inconspicuous attire is always preferable to that which challenges the public eye by the singularity of its colour or construction. What is called the "fast" school has brought a ridiculously showy costume into fashion with a certain class of young men, but it should be borne in mind that fast men are not gentlemen. Avoid anything that is singular in your dress and manner; and especially avoid anything that is associated with a class of men notorious both for vice and folly.

A recent writer has remarked that "dress has two functions—to clothe and to ornament; and while we cannot lose sight of either point, we must not attribute to the one a power which belongs to the other. The essential requirement of dress is to cover and make comfortable the body, and of two forms of dress which fulfil their functions equally well, that is the better which is the most accordant with the laws of beauty. But fitness must in nowise be interfered with; and the garb which infringes on this law gives us pain rather than pleasure. We believe that it will be found that the fittest and most comfortable dress is that which is most becoming: fitness is the primary demand; and the dress that appears uncomfortable is untasteful.

"But in the secondary function of dress, ornamentation, there are several diverse objects to be attained—dignity, grace, vivacity, brilliancy, are qualities distinguishing different individuals, indicating the impression they wish to make on society, and are expressed by different combinations of the elements of beauty, line, or form, and colour. When the appareling of the outer being is in most complete harmony with the mental constitution, the taste is most irreproachable."

GENERAL BEHAVIOUR.

A gentleman is characterised by perfect ease and tranquillity of manner. He is neither abashed nor confused, and his easy confidence and agreeable behaviour is readily communicated to those with whom he is in society.

It is difficult to be at ease with people of uncultivated manners. They are either sullen, which they mistake for reserve; imperious, which they mistake for dignity; or boisterous, which they mistake for freedom. If quietness is the true sign of a polite man, noise is the great characteristic of the ill-bred man; or, if he is quiet, his quietness is of a subdued, awkward kind, which shows at once how unused he is to society.

The ill-bred man is abashed without cause, and consequential without reason. He either talks not at all, or never leaves off. He is either motionless as a statue, or ubiquitous as a waiter. Whatever he does is so done that no one can fail to perceive his want of proper training.

Of course the very things the ill-bred man is in the habit of doing, are the very things which a man who desires to appear well-bred should avoid. Observe a few of his peculiarities.

He enters a room with nervous trepidation; he sits uneasily, shifts, shuffles, and employs his hands in touching up his hair or meddling with his face. Sometimes—being a shy man—he looks on the carpet and plays with his hands all the time another person is addressing him. When he replies he stammers and becomes incoherent, says "You know" a good many times, and stops without finishing what he had to say.

There is another kind of ill-bred man, who is noisy and dogmatical. This man is the more objectionable of the two. He comes into the room with a noisy step, tramps about with all the elegance of a cart-horse, never moves a chair without making a racket, never sits down nor stands up, but in a blustering, defiant, manner. He deals largely in adjectives of the superlative degree; every petty trifle throws him into a wondrous state of excitement; he is boisterous with his friends and bullying to his servants. He never conceals his vexation if anything goes wrong, nor his surprise at anything novel. He manifests impatience while others are addressing him, is dictatorial in his replies, flatly contradicts, and prides himself on saying what he thinks. He alludes to other people with the addition of old or young to their proper names, or is descriptive, indicating them by some personal peculiarity, as tall, short, stout, or squint-eyed. He criticises your appearance, clothes, house, furniture, food; never hesitates to ask the price of any article, nor to depreciate its value. His conversation, whether about books or bullocks, is of an oracular sort that seems to challenge contradiction, for that man as dearly loves an argument as did the Great Frederick himself, and would use the thick-booted logic of that emperor, if he dared.

In our intercourse with society we should exercise the utmost consideration for the feelings of others. We have not only to please ourselves. If we lived alone in the world we could follow our own inclination as to personal appearance, our mode of eating and drinking, or any of the ordinary affairs of life. Even then carelessness and vulgarity would have an injurious influence on our mental and moral character. But, as it is, we are under certain obligations to society, and we cannot mix with society agreeably without an exact discharge of them.

HOME.

Good manners should begin at home. Politeness is not an article to be worn in full dress only, to be put on when we pay or receive a complimentary visit. It is one of those things which never wear out, but are all the better the more they are worn. People who are only polite on certain occasions are always awkward. It does not sit easily on them: just as you may observe the uneasiness of an individual wearing a dress to which he is unaccustomed. In the workshop, in the home, politeness adds grace and elegance to the character, and shines as brightly there as in the best and highest society.

Remember, then, you may not do as you please at home. Respect as well as affection is due to the members of your family. We do not recommend anything insincere or artificial. Let your manners do justice to your feelings. Parents, brothers, sisters, have claims upon your courtesy, that should never be forgotten. Stiff ceremonies and cold formality are out of place, but rudeness to the members of one's own family circle stamps a man as of the lowest breeding, and testifies also to the badness of his heart.

THE PIONEER'S DAUGHTER.

THE moon had risen before Mr. Staunton and his party returned from the settlement. They were accompanied by a young maiden, who had been invited to serve as bridesmaid to Amy; the other guests were to come in the morning. With animated steps the company left their boat, and ascended the bank, somewhat surprised that Amy and her lover were not there to meet them, yet without the most distant thought of the calamity that had occurred. Having arrived in sight of the house, no bright beacon welcomed their approach; and a sudden apprehension of evil clouded their spirits in gloom.

Silently they hastened towards the small, dark cabin, when Hugh, who went first, stumbled over the lifeless body of Joanna, which lay as it had been left by the departing Indians. A low exclamation of horror escaped the youth; and, although his blood seemed turned to ice in his veins, he went round to his mother, and, with affectionate caution, guided her in such a way as to hide the corpse from her view. The women spoke no word of terror, uttered no despairing cries, for, in those days, women had little leisure to indulge in nervousness.

A light was soon struck; and shrinking eyes took a hasty survey of the apartment; but no mangled bodies met their gaze; and Mr. Staunton said, almost joyfully: "Thank God! they are not dead! If captured, we may recover them."

Hugh knew the truth must soon be known: therefore he deemed it best to acquaint them with what he had discovered at the door. In a moment the light was falling softly over the upturned face of Joanna, whose body was partially concealed by the doorsteps; her gray hair was dabbled in gore, and a ghastly wound in her temple revealed the cause of her death. Keeble groaned; and Mrs. Staunton shed tears for the faithful creature who had sacrificed life in her service. After convincing themselves that Charles and Amy were really gone, it was decided that Keeble should unload the boat, and return in it to the settlement for assistance. After his departure, the heavy door was secured by three oaken bars; the two small windows were removed, and the apertures filled with blocks of wood. The rigid form of the unfortunate Joanna had been reverently prepared for burial, and lay in the little room that was curtained off from the main department.

Scarcely a word was spoken through the dreary watches of the night, nor until the earliest dawn, when Keeble returned accompanied by fifteen or twenty men.

Two of the number were to remain with Mrs. Staunton and her young companion. Hugh, mere stripling though he was, had declared his intention of accompanying the party, though the rough and stalwart backwoodsmen had assured him he would be unable to endure the fatigue of a long and hurried march. But he said, firmly: "Think of my poor sister! Can I not endure as much as she! Hinder me not, for I will go."

No more opposition was made; and the brave boy took his gun and ammunition, then bade his mother a tender farewell.

"Be brave, but be careful, my boy," said she, with a steady voice, though her cheek was pale, and her eye dim with its load of unshed tears. "Remember, Hugh, if you do not recover your sister, I shall have no child but you." And then the noble mother retired to her own room to shed, in the unconscious presence of the dead, the most sorrowful tears of her life.

The party was led by an experienced scout, whose practised eyes could detect traces of the trail, however carefully concealed by their cunning foes. He soon found the place where the litter was made, and the pursuit commenced.

After marching an hour or two Hugh's quick eyes were the first to detect the moccasin Amy had cast off, and which lay half hidden in a tuft of brakes; then they saw where her little feet had been planted with such a good will.

"Hurrah, boys! Heaven be thanked! Miss Amy knew how to head the bloody Indians," shouted Keeble, exultingly, for, in the kind and gentle girl he thought every womanly grace and perfection were centered. He secured the moccasin, renewing inwardly the oath of vengeance he had taken over the remains of his murdered sister.

In a few hours the camp of the preceding night was discovered; the ashes were found to be yet warm. It was decided that the pursuit must be made with the utmost caution, for the sturdy pioneers were well acquainted with the wary habits of the marauders. On they went over brush and brier, through dark ravines, and along rocky heights, never pausing to think of rest, but refreshing themselves by devouring squares of cold corn-cake and slices of meat as they went along.

For their first camp, they chose a sheltered nook at the base of a steep, rocky hill, upon whose barren sides a few small and stunted shrubs clung for life with a tenacity of purpose that merited a better reward. They dared not build a fire, lest the light should attract the attention of their foes; but they cut down cedar branches, and made couches that were comfortable as beds of down to their weary limbs.

One of the party was placed as sentinel; and the rest composed themselves to sleep almost as unconcernedly as if they had been in their own beds at home, little dreaming, poor fellows! that, in the dim twilight above them, lurked the very party they were pursuing, waiting an auspicious moment to destroy them all. Yet it was even so; they had encamped in a cluster of young spruce and hemlocks not a quarter of an hour before the approach of the white men.

Charles and Amy, securely bound, were sitting dejectedly upon the moss-covered hearth when the voices of their friends were heard. They raised their heads in joy; and the light of hope again burned in their hearts; but two fierce savages instantly bent over them with hatchets raised, threatening immediate death if either of them dared to speak or move.

When the moon rose, they saw eager but cautious preparations going on for an attack upon their unsuspecting friends, who had chosen a camp in every way favourable to the designs of the blood-thirsty crew above them.

The high courage of the pioneer's daughter rose with the emergency. She thought of her gray-haired father and her promising young brother, whose lives were dearer and more valuable than her own; she thought of the homes that would be made desolate by the deed that was meditated; and she thought of the lasting injury it would be to the settlement if so many brave men were cut off—what was her poor life when so many precious ones were at stake? Charles, who was watching her closely by the pale moonlight, read in her expressive face the desperate resolve she had formed. Hoping chance would yet turn the scales in their favour, he enjoined her to silence by an imploring look; but the firm lines about her mouth did not relax. She would not yield in this because she knew she was right.

Suddenly, a new thought flashed upon her lover; and in another moment he was exerting his ventriloquial powers to the utmost.

"Hugh! Hugh! we are upon the hill above you! Beware! the Indians are preparing an attack!"

The white men sprang from their couches in surprise and alarm; but, at a word of explanation from Hugh Staunton, they sought shelter behind the surrounding trees.

The savages looked at each other, then at their captives, seeking to read the riddle of that mysterious voice, which appeared to come from so great a distance with a warning to their unwary pursuers; but Amy's face wore a look of blank astonishment; while that of Charles was as impassive as a block of granite.

The red men are a superstitious race; they believed the Great Spirit had deserted them in favour of the whites; and, in dismay, they again set forward, driving the already exhausted prisoners mercilessly before them. Upon reaching a place suitable for a defensive post, they paused, and made preparations to meet the expected attack. It soon came; and they found their enemies well skilled in the Indian mode of warfare, namely, that of dodging behind trees, and aiming at every head, body, or limb that was exposed to view. This cautious manner of proceeding was exceedingly distasteful to Keeble, whose hand was burning to avenge his sister's death, and to rescue his beloved young mistress. He imprudently exposed himself, against the express commands of the leader, and in return received a bullet through his right arm from one of their watchful opponents.

It was thought best to rescue the captives as speedily as possible, lest the savages might put an end to their lives in order to be rid of the incubus. Therefore, they sprang from tree to tree until they were close upon their foes, when the voice of Charles was heard imploring them to hasten, or it would be too late. Then the attack became fierce and determined. Keeble contrived to get near the captives, and, despite his shattered arm, to shoot a savage, who was in the very act of hurling a death-dealing tomahawk at Amy Staunton. He hastily severed their cords, and in another moment had led them to a place of safety.

It was not long before the conflict was decided. Six of the red men were slain, and five escaped; while but one of the settlers lost his life: it was Mr. Grainger, the father of the intended bride, a brave, good man. His loss was deeply regretted by his companions; but it was the "fortune of war;" and with heavy hearts they set out upon their homeward march, four of them bearing the body of their slaughtered neighbour.

Towards morning, a couple of hours were snatched for rest for the sake of Amy, who, although nearly worn out with fatigue and exposure, remonstrated against the delay, knowing that her mother's suspense must be lengthened thereby.

However, about noon, the anxious watchers at the pioneer's cabin were rejoiced by the triumphant shouts that announced the successful termination of the pursuit.

A brief space was allotted for rest and refreshment, and then the body of Joanna was laid in the rough coffin that had been made by the men who remained to guard the women.

With uncovered heads the borderers listened to a few impressive words and a prayer from their clergyman, who had come down during their absence; then the body was lowered into its last resting-place at the foot of a drooping willow that bowed its pensile branches, as if in grief at her untimely fate.

After the conclusion of the funeral service, the body of Mr. Grainger was borne to the boat; and his sorrowing daughter was escorted with tenderest care to her desolate home, for the frontier-men, notwithstanding standing their unpromising exterior, had hearts as soft as those of women.

Before departing, these kind neighbours had extorted from Mr. Staunton a promise that he would immediately leave his dangerous locality, and take up his residence nearer the settlement.

The wedding was deferred until the family could be established in their new home.

In the meantime, a new log-house sprang up, as if by magic, near the outskirts of the village; and, in a few days more, Charles and Amy were married amid general rejoicing.

HOW THEY MAKE ICE IN INDIA.

ICE-MAKING in India is a very important branch of manufacture, and is attended with no small difficulty. The manner in which it is accomplished is as follows:—They dig, on a large open plain, not far from Calcutta, three or four pits about thirty feet square, and two feet deep each, the bottom of which they cover about eight inches or a foot thick with sugar-cane, or the stems of the large Indian corn, dried. On this bed are placed, in rows, a number of small, shallow, unglazed earthen pans, formed of a very porous earth, a quarter of an inch thick, and about an inch and a quarter deep, which, at the dusk of evening, they fill with soft water that has been boiled. In the morning, before sunrise, the ice-makers attend the pits, and collect what is frozen in baskets, which they convey to the place of preservation. This is generally prepared on some high, dry situation, by sinking a pit fourteen or fifteen feet deep, lining it first with straw, and then with a coarse kind of blanketing. The ice is deposited in this pit, and beat down with rammers, till at length its own accumulated cold again freezes it, and forms one solid mass. The mouth of the pit is well secured from the exterior air with straw and blankets, and a thatched roof is thrown over the whole. The quantity of ice formed by the method above described depends on a light atmosphere, and clear, serene weather. Three hundred persons are employed in this operation in one place. At first sight this curious process may appear to be an effect of evaporation; but this is not the case, for it is remarkable that it is essential to its success that the straw in which the vessels are placed should be dry, whereas, if evaporation were concerned in the congelation, wetting the straw would promote it. When the straw becomes wet by accident, it is obliged to be replaced by dry straw. The earth is continually losing heat by radiation, and it loses most on clear, starlight nights, when there are no clouds to intercept and send back the rays of heat. The straw, like all filamentous substances, is a good radiator of caloric, and it is in consequence of the heat that is thus given out by it into space on clear nights that the ice is formed. When the weather is windy and cloudy, the effect does not take place.

THE WIFE'S APPEAL.

PRAY thee, Dugald, love me,
For there is no other home,
Where I could nestle, or could rest,
But in thy arms, my own!
And in these days of heavy toil,
When I so pine to see—
So watch for, long for, looks of love,
And tender tones from thee:
O Dugald, let the looks be kind,
And gentle be the tone,
That fall on me, for these without,
My days are very lone.
Couldst thou but know how easier far
The tasks by duty set,
Cheered on by watchful looks of thine,
Thou sure wouldst not forget
The weary foot, the aching head,
Not half so heartless move,
Because 'tis all for thee they spring,
Because they toil for love.
But when no look nor word betrays
The presence of that love,
What wonder that they weary out,
And heavier live, and move!
The nestling baby by my side,
In all its helplessness,
Receives for thee full many a clasp
And many a fond caress;
But half I fear, sometimes, my child
Will garner all my heart,
Till both shall loathe an idol's curse,
And all be rent apart.
Oh, love me, Dugald, love me,
As I love the precious babe,
In helplessness, in trustfulness,
Upon thy bosom laid.
Let me have thy daily cheering,
Daily, hourly looks of love,
And then, how gladly, tirelessly
My daily tasks will move!

RIGHT HON. LORD JOHN RUSSELL, M.P.

THE name of Russell is honourably associated with the history of our country. Amongst those men who engaged in the great struggle for the political and religious liberties of England, and who sealed with blood their attachment to the popular cause, Lord William Russell stands conspicuous. The descendants of this heroic patriot have faithfully adhered to the opinions which he upheld, and for which he died. For the last thirty years especially the name has been associated with all those popular movements, and with all those great achievements, which have extended the franchise, liberated commerce, emancipated the slave. Throughout that time Lord John Russell has sedulously laboured in the interests of the people; he has lent all his influence to the advancement and prosperity of the masses; from his entrance into public life he has worked hard for the attainment of those rights and liberties which the public demand; and to these efforts we are indebted for much of the political, social, civil, commercial, and religious freedom we enjoy.

Popularity is notoriously fickle. The favourite of to-day is the outcast of to-morrow. Every public man knows how rapidly the wheel turns. Even the popularity of Lord John Russell has been shaken; his sky has been clouded; and for awhile he was not only banished to the obscurity of back benches, but threatened with the loss of his seat altogether. But the clamour raised against so tried and faithful a man subsided; he stood forth as one of whom we had reason to be proud; and even those who had been the loudest in denunciation, were well satisfied to see him in his old position, advocating those principles which are so dear to Englishmen, and contending for those liberties which are the birthright of us all.

Although there may be questions on which we are not agreed with Lord John Russell, and points on which he differs from the more advanced politicians of the day, the energy and perseverance he has shown in everything he has undertaken are worthy of the highest praise. The question of Jewish disabilities is an illustration of this persevering determination. He has steadily pursued that subject, warmly agitating for the removal of those difficulties which disqualify the Jewish citizen from a seat in the House; under a variety of forms he has introduced and re-introduced this question; unwearied by incessant opposition, and undaunted by frequent failure, he has remained the firm and constant advocate of the religious and political equality which he considers this question involves.

Lord John Russell has occupied a prominent position in all the great measures for reform which have taken place within the last thirty years. Foremost among these are parliamentary reform, repeal of the test and corporation acts, Catholic emancipation, the abolition of West Indian slavery, repeal of the navigation laws, repeal of the corn law. He has stood forth as the friend of progress, that true progress which, by popularising education, elevates and advances the people. Consistently he has remained the warm advocate of general education, ever since he entered on that great work with Bell and Lancaster, and as the friend of the late William Allen he has laboured hard to obtain proper education for the children of the poor. His sympathy with educational movements has been of the most practical character. He has presided over school meetings, temperance meetings, young men's meetings, throwing not only his influence but his own personal exertions into the scale.

The battles he has fought, the triumphs he has won, the campaigns in which he has served, have shown him the unswerving friend of liberty. Although in the ferment of the moment, public feeling was excited against him, the very circumstance which aroused the storm ultimately quelled it and called forth a display of true English feeling. In an age of shams and political intrigues, of idle pretensions and hollow professions, of protestations on behalf of national liberty without an effort to extend or to consolidate such liberty—a truckling to foreign power, and a blatant assertion of independence—the manliness and consistency of such a man as Lord John Russell are more than ever valuable.

The following sketch of the career of this celebrated statesman is necessarily brief, our limits forbidding anything more than a mere outline of his public life.

Lord John Russell was born on the 18th of August, 1792. He is the third and youngest son of the Duke of Bedford and Georgiana Elizabeth, second daughter of Viscount Torrington. He began his education at Sunbury, continued it at Westminster, and finished his academical course at Edinburgh. With his majority he attained a seat in parliament, being duly returned for the borough of Tavistock. His name was speedily associated with the liberal tendencies of the age. It was evident that the scion of the house of Bedford inherited the spirit, as well as the name, of his renowned ancestor. In 1817 he availed himself of the tyrannical proceedings of the government to denounce the "Cabinet of Mediocrities." In 1819 he submitted his great scheme for Parliamentary Reform. It was a year of political excitement. In the House and out of the House, some great change was felt to be approaching. There was a murmur which seemed to foretell an eruption, and the agitation was shaking the very basis of society. Old institutions were breaking up. That great giant, the Public, had outgrown its bands, and was snapping asunder the cords by which its limbs were bound. The measure which Lord John Russell introduced into parliament was moderate in its demands, but even its moderation was regarded as singularly dangerous. Castlereagh strongly opposed the measure; but still that ice-hearted dog, as Ebenezer Elliott calls him, was induced to consent to the disfranchisement of places which have remained a proverb of electoral corruption. The struggle for reform was continued from session to session. Lord John every day became more popular with the liberal party. If he went too far for one body of constituents, others were ready immediately to avail themselves of his services:—thrown out for Huntingdon, he was returned for Bandon Bridge. The question of reform was the absorbing topic. Everything else was swept away before it. The rottenness of the system of representation was so notorious that its advocates were compelled to give in. The struggle lasted through the reign of George IV., but was brought to a close when the sailor-king ascended the throne. The Duke of Wellington resigned the helm of affairs. Lord Grey was authorised to form an administration on the basis of parliamentary reform: Russell, Lansdowne, Brougham, Holland, were its leading spirits; Melbourne and Palmerston were its subordinates.

On the 1st of March, 1831, Lord John Russell brought forward, in the House of Commons, the ministerial plan for a reform in parliament. The sweeping character of the bill surpassed public expectation. Hume declared that it far exceeded his highest hopes; Macaulay pronounced it great, noble, and comprehensive; while the opposition were stricken with horror; Sir Charles Wetherell denouncing it as a corporation robbery; and Inglis as "revolution, not reformation!" But, in spite of all that could be urged against it, the bill was carried, and the whole country illuminated in honour of the event. The reform was great; but it was not all that was required. The representative system was still incomplete. It has been the effort of the noble champion who won the first triumph in the cause, to extend his conquest. He has not suffered the question of reform in parliament to rest. He has introduced new measures; and has done much, since the success of that first battle, to obtain a still more enlarged and comprehensive reform in the representative system.

The abolition of slavery in our West Indian colonies is another of those early triumphs which have given an enduring lustre to the name of Lord John Russell. It was a protracted struggle; a question which affected a large number of wealthy holders, and which had to contend against every kind of opposition. But it was done. The victory was achieved which gave "liberty to the captive and let the oppressed go free." And Lord John is still the same unflinching enemy of slavery as he was thirty years ago. Whatever name it may be called by, or disguised in whatever character—urged as it may be on the show of necessity, and modified as it may be in its form, slavery is that with which Englishmen have done for ever; and there is not a man in England who would more strenuously and zealously denounce its restitution in any form than Lord John Russell.

From 1830 till November 1834, Lord John Russell was Paymaster of the Forces; from 1839 till 1841, Secretary of State for the Colonies; First Lord of the Treasury from July 1846 to March 1852. As member for Tavistock he sat from 1813 to 1817; and again from 1818 till 1819; he represented Huntingdonshire from 1820 to 1826; sat for Bandon Bridge till 1830; for Devon in 1831; for South Devon from 1832 till 1835; for Stroud from 1835 till 1841. He was first elected for the City of London in 1841. At the last election a strong opposition was got up against his return, on account of the part he had taken in the Canton question; but gratitude for past services, esteem for independence of character, and honest appreciation of the sterling qualities of Lord John, secured his return to parliament. No man in the House has done more for popular and natural progress than Lord John Russell. He has stood firm by the liberal party under all circumstances. To him we are indebted for the most decisive victories ever obtained over antiquated obstacles to national advancement, and from the experience of his past political career we augur well for his future exertions in the cause of salutary reform.

As an author Lord John Russell has exhibited considerable ability; but it is as a statesman that he is best known, and as a statesman that posterity will regard him as a worthy descendant of his distinguished ancestor.

PIERRE D'AUBUSSON DELEGATING THE COMMAND OF THE ARMY TO HIS BROTHER ANTOINE.

THE SIEGE OF RHODES.—II.

AMONG the works least known, but equally authentic with those usually consulted, is one entitled, "Gulielmi Caoursin Rhodiorum vice Cancellarii obsidionis Rhodie urbis descriptio." This is a very scarce book, printed at Ulm in 1496, in small folio, and republished in Rome in 1584. The Abbé Vertot, in his "Histoire des Chevaliers de Saint Jean de Jerusalem," has availed himself of this production. It has given to his work all the warmth, strength, and colour which characterise the recital. The style of Caoursin is unpretentious, concise, and sufficiently touching, and is never overloaded with ornament. But the absence of enthusiasm is amply compensated by the scrupulous accuracy of the narrator.

William Caoursin was born at Douay, in 1430, and belonged to a family said, but without foundation, to be originally natives of Rhodes. For several years he was attached to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, in the capacity of vice-chancellor, but he never adopted the mantle of the order. He exercised the functions of his office under several successive grand masters; he took part in every council, was present at every chapter, and engaged in all the negotiations which had anything to do with the Turkish war. Under Raymond Zacosta, in 1464, he was intrusted with an embassy to the Venetian Republic. He went to Rome to solicit help against the threatened expedition of Mahomet II., and played a valiant part when that expedition actually took place, and the Turks laid siege to Rhodes.

Several editions are in existence of the works of Caoursin. In the seventeenth century they were translated into German by a Strasbourg doctor. The Imperial library at Paris possessed two translations of the Siege of Rhodes, one done into good French at the beginning of the sixteenth century, by a writer unknown "on account of his very great littleness," by order of that distinguished nobleman Jacques Calliot, knight of the order of Jerusalem, commander of Brabant, and liege lord of Chanteraim, &c., &c.; the other is by Gilbert Papillon, baron of Ryan, a Bourbon gentleman, and is dedicated to Charles Gonzago, duke of Nevers and Rethel. But the most valuable manuscript of Caoursin's celebrated work is a small folio copy, written on fine vellum. It contains besides the "Siege of Rhodes," the "History of Zizim," brother of Bajazet. The text is adorned with vignettes exceedingly well executed, and from which our engravings are taken.

The first vignette in this valuable manuscript is called the presentation. As we do not give an engraving of this picture, we may briefly describe it. Caoursin is represented offering his book to the grand master, who is surrounded by his knights, ranged in a half-circle and clothed in the mantle of the order. It is these brilliant accessories that render the copy so valuable. The author begins his story by recounting the occasion of the enterprise of Mahomet II.—the hate which that prince entertained for the defenders of the cross, and his ardent desire to seize on their island home. In order to obtain an adequate conception of the difficulties he should have to encounter, he called to his assistance a number of renegades who had formerly resided in Rhodes, and who were acquainted with all its strong, and all its weak points. Having so far ascertained the work he had to accomplish, he intrusted the command of the expedition to his grand vizier Missah, himself an apostate; this Missah was no other than the last of a royal line, who, when his family were stripped of all their possessions by the Moslem conqueror, embraced Mohammedanism; and thereby not only saved his share of the property, but won the favour of the emperor. On account of his valour, his intelligence, and blind obedience to the sultan's will, he was promoted to the dignity of grand vizier; and, like all apostates, he felt an implacable hatred against his ancient creed, and those who still professed it; and none, in all the sultan's dominions, were so merciless against Christians in general, and the grand master of the Order of Jerusalem in particular.

The engraving we gave last week of Rhodes, is contained in Caoursin's manuscript, and is supposed to be identical with the view and plan which was supplied to Mahomet. This plan was made by a rascal named Georges, who came as a spy to Rhodes, pretending that he had fled from the vizier Missah, and throwing himself on the hospitality of the knights of Rhodes. He managed while there to make and despatch a plan to the sultan, but as he continued his operations his secret was detected, and a long cord and a short shrift were justly dealt out to him.

The topographical description which Caoursin furnishes of Rhodes is too concise to be explicit. He has laboured to be brief and has grown obscure. The artist has assisted to increase the obscurity; and the intelligibility of our view is attributable more to contemporary authorities, than either the miniature from which it is copied, or the description by which that miniature is accompanied.

Rhodes, built on the brow of a hill crowned with hillocks and surrounded by fields, was divided into an upper and lower city. It was encircled by fortified walls, flanked with strong towers. The palace of the grand master was placed in the upper city, and served as a castle and a citadel. All the knights had lodgings near the palace. The secular officers, merchants, and ordinary citizens, occupied the lower city. The city had two harbours, one large and commodious, the other of less importance. The entrance to the chief harbour was formed by a mole, which ran for three hundred feet into the sea, and was defended at its extremity by the tower of St. Nicholas. The Arabian historians describe this fortress as of extraordinary dimensions: its battlements touching the clouds, its foundations in the centre of the earth! It is easy to excuse want of success by exaggerating difficulties. The truth is, the tower was of no particular strength, and exhibited nothing surprising in the engineering skill of its construction. It was an important position, and ably defended; and against it, by advice of Georges, the first attack of the assailants was directed.

The attack was determined and persevering; but the knights repulsed the soldiers of the sultan with great slaughter, and they were compelled to desist. Irritated by defeat, the vizier resorted to an odious plot for satisfying his vengeance. Two treacherous citizens undertook to penetrate the army of the knights, to gain the palace, and to assassinate the grand master. Poison or steel was to accomplish this diabolical mission; but the assassins were arrested, and expiated their offence on the scaffold. Hoping nothing more from treason, Missah resolved to effect by force what he could not accomplish by stratagem.

Meanwhile the grand master assembled a council, consisting, not only of the knights and chief citizens, but of foreign allies who had proffered service.

Among these was Antoine d'Aubusson, Viscount Montell, eldest brother of the grand master. Upon this redoubtable warrior the hopes of the beleaguered garrison were centered; and, at the unanimous request of the council, he accepted the command of the army.

The engraving we present is taken from the original vignette which portrays this event. It is a remarkable composition. The grand master, surrounded by the principal knights, is handing the bâton to his brother, Antoine d'Aubusson. Artisans working at their several trades make up the picture. Here is a bootmaker busy at his craft, there a hosier in his shop; here a barber shaving a customer, there a company of priests singing mass and imploring the protection of heaven for the beleaguered city. The brilliant colouring of the original renders it particularly interesting. There is much more expression in it, both with regard to the principal figures and to the accessories of the piece, than is usually seen in the illuminated manuscripts of that age.

CHAPTER XLV.

THE HALF-BROTHERS.

THE Old Court at the Old Bailey.

If you have nerve for it, go and sit there, man of this world, once or twice every year. If you have to pay your shilling for the gallery—five shillings, or ten, if anything "interesting" is coming on—it's a shame you should have to do it, but pay it; it will be money well spent.

If you are endowed with a good memory, go half an hour before the judges come upon the bench, and, putting your hat under the seat (never mind the sawdust) lean on your stick, and remember!

Think of all that those four gloomy walls have looked down upon, since they became walls!

The lies, the perjuries, the tales of horror, the tears of woe, the livid cheeks, the broken hearts, the escapes of guilt, and (yes, sometimes, no doubt) the slaughter of the innocent—for even Justice may be too blind, now and then—think over it all, and be humbled for the nature you have a part in!

Here, the valet who stabbed his noble master; here, the husband who beat to death his young wife; here, the couple who shot, and then buried their friend under the kitchen flags; here, the sporting surgeon who doled out poison to boon companions, and watched their struggles for hours, without moving a muscle, or once turning pale; here, mothers who tied the string about the necks of new-born infants, mad, perhaps, with mingled love, and wretchedness, and revenge; here, in that square, spiked, well-worn box, all these, and thousands more, have stood; and those wretched herbs lying on the shelf before them, looked the same, still the same, faded, sickly things they look to-day—the flowers that Justice casts on the Coffin of Human Hopes!

Lean upon your stick, and think!

Last night, they led off from that step in front of the dock, the wretch who, in a fortnight, will tread another step, hard by,—a step that will not bear him, and, breaking down with him, will cast him off, while dirty ruffians ring in his ears (he catches the sound even through the white cap), "The last dying speech and confession of Thomas Davis!"—the dear little boy of thirty years ago whom his mother would have buried in kisses, as your mother would have done you; now, he is down there, waiting for the bell and the hangman's rope, on the Monday morning that comes on so fast!

Think, go on thinking; and, if you ever pray, good gentleman, pray there, as you lean on your stick.

Here's a prayer for you—

"Keep back thy servant from presumptuous sins!" Have you done?

Now take another—you may have forgotten this—

"Who can understand his errors? Cleanse Thou me from secret faults!"

"Make way, there!" cries an usher.

In come six or seven gentlemen of the bar.

Two or three are in a broad and loud laugh, as they put upon the green-baize table their red bags, bags that could almost have come in by themselves, they know the way so well.

They nod to the Clerk of Arraigns, who pitches a clean new pen to each corner, and then takes snuff with this one, and speaks in hearty, cheery tones to all.

"What leads off, Mr. Crook?"

"Case of forgery," says the clerk.

"Long?"

"No, no; I should think not. Depends on Fotheringay's eloquence. You must ask him."

The reader will recognise Claude's old school-pal in the counsel for the crown.

And just as the bar began to titter—for Mr. Fotheringay had no great eloquence to speak of—every one rises, and the two judges on the rota enter, and take their seat on the bench.

Then a man whom you have never noticed gets up, and begins to gabble something about—

"All persons," and "before my lords, the Queen's justices," &c. &c.

And two or three more men, from different quarters, call "Silence!" And there is a general "Hush!"—"Sh!"

"Put up Claude Blance Latson!" says the clerk.

And he comes up!

You see first his head, then his shoulders, then himself in full.

They put him on the step, among the marjoram and the rue.

And Claude hangs his head as he attempts a bow to the court.

And ladies, and counsel, and judges put their eyeglasses up, and scan him from head to foot, as far as they can see him.

"Claude Blance Latson, you stand indicted, for that you," &c.

"How say you, are you guilty of the forgery for which you stand indicted, or not guilty?"

And Claude, in a clear voice, answers, "Not guilty!"

Then he is told that the gentlemen whose names he will now hear called, are those who are to try him; and if he objects to them, or any of them, he must do so as they come to the book to be sworn, before they are sworn, and he will be heard.

Poor fellow! he has no objection to them. He hardly hears the license to object.

"Take the book in your right hand, gentlemen.

"That you shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make, between our Sovereign Lady the Queen and the prisoner at the bar, whom you shall have in charge, and a true verdict give, according to the evidence, so help you God!"

And so, one by one, they are all sworn.

And then the prisoner is given in charge to them by another quick form of words, which, if you are not used to it, you hardly understand.

"May it please your lordship, Gentlemen of the jury."

And then the prosecuting counsel opens the case.

And the judge, having nothing as yet to take down, leans back, and joins the tips of his fingers, and rests his elbows on the chair, watching whether the opening agrees with the depositions, or perhaps thinking of something else.

And on the counsel goes through the facts he means to prove.

"I think, gentlemen, that I have now gone through the main facts in this case; and if, as I believe, I shall be able to prove by evidence the facts I have stated to you; if I shall show that the prisoner at the bar gave the bill to Mr. Swillman bearing the name of Mr. Montgomery, as one of the acceptors of the bill, and if Mr. Montgomery declares, as he will, that the acceptance is not in his handwriting, you can then come to no other conclusion, as reasonable men, than that the prisoner is guilty of the forgery with which he is charged in the indictment."

And so he sat down.

"Ernest Montgomery!" shouts the junior counsel.

"Ernest Montgomery!" shout two or three voices at once.

And Ernest Montgomery appears, and is sworn.

They had had hard work with Ernest to bring him up to that point. He had done his very best to effect a compromise of the affair, but Swillman had got the lawyers to work pretty early in the business; and Montgomery's distinct disclaimer of the signature, at the interview with Swillman, was quite enough.

The poor clergyman's examination-in-chief consisted only in the single question, and the fatal answer.

Mr. Church, for the prisoner, had nothing to ask him.

"Oh, yes! I beg pardon. Perhaps your lordship will just allow me to ask him one question?"

"Mr. Montgomery, do you know the holder of this bill, James Swillman?"

"I never saw him before he called upon me in relation to this transaction."

"Had you any reason to know whether he was acquainted at all with you, or knew of your relationship to—"

"Really, Mr. Church," cried Fotheringay, starting up, "I object entirely to—"
 "Of course," said the judge, "you cannot ask that—you cannot ask that."
 "Well," said Church, bowing to the Bench, "you have never written to Mr. Swillman in your life, have you?"
 "Not that I recollect. I think I may say, I never have."

"You married the sister of the prisoner's mother, I believe?"
 "I did."
 "Was your marriage before or after the death of Colonel Latson, the prisoner's father?"
 "After his death."

"Then you had no intimacy or friendship with the Colonel's family?"
 "None whatever."
 "You had no friends in Wiltshire who were also friends of the Latsons—common friends, I mean?"
 "None at all."

And Mr. Church sat down.
 "James Swillman!" said the prosecuting counsel.
 And "James Swillman!" echoed and re-echoed, inside and outside the court, and along a number of distant passages; for, at Church's request, "all the witnesses, on both sides, had been ordered out of court."

Swillman was sworn.
 "You have had, I believe," said Mr. Fotheringay, "a betting transaction with the prisoner?"
 "Not exactly betting; he lost some money to me at play."

"Just so—yes. I meant to say play."
 "What was the last sum he lost to you?"
 "Fifty pounds."
 "How did he pay you?"
 "By a bill payable in three months."
 "How many acceptances were on that bill?"
 "Two."

"Whose were they?"
 "One was the signature of a person, a common friend of ours, and the other that of Ernest Montgomery."

"How soon after you got possession of the bill did you discover the name of Mr. Montgomery, and find that it was not in his handwriting?"

And so Swillman told his story.
 And he told of Claude's confusion and prevarication when charged with the crime. And especially he told, with infinite relish, of Claude's repeated assertion that the writing was his uncle's.

And Claude leant forward, and buried his face in his hands, and shook violently.

And the fiend shone out—nay, rather, glared out—from every line in the face of the witness.

For he and Claude had been to one another, as we have told you, like natural enemies. He had done more to ruin Claude than any man in London had done; and he hated his victim as only victims are hated.

Not, mind you, that Claude was a better man. He himself had played falsely enough, and falsely won; but he stood no chance against the higher or lower rascality of Swillman.

Hugh Church rose to cross-examine.

"Where were you when this bill was given you, Mr. Swillman?"

"At the house in Leicester-square."

"By appointment with the prisoner?"

"By appointment with the prisoner."

And the witness buttoned up his frock-coat to the top, and looked with infinite complacency, and something like condescension, on his examiner.

"Which of you arrived at the house first?"

"Latson."

"You found him there on your arrival?"

"I did."

"Was he alone?"

"He was."

"In the room where you generally played?"

"Yes."

"What was he doing when you went in?"

"Doing? nothing."

"Nothing! Was he walking about, sitting down, or reading, or what?"

"I really don't remember, but I think he was sitting down. No, he was—yes, to be sure; yes, he was sitting down."

"Come, sir, it's not so very long ago. You can hardly have forgotten. You're now sure he was sitting down, are you?"

"I think I may say, I am."

"Now, sir, attend to me. Did you receive the bill from the prisoner's hands, immediately after you entered the room, and found him there?"

"Yes."

"What! sir, will you swear that? Take care! will you swear, that immediately on your entering the gaming room, the prisoner paid you his debt with this bill?"

"It wasn't long before he did."

"Long, sir! answer my question; was it immediately?"

"There may have been a few minutes, perhaps, before I got it."

"Now, sir, during that few minutes, what was the prisoner doing?"

"Doing?"

"Yes, sir! doing. You understand the word, I conclude?"

"Upon my soul, I can't say."

"Do you mean to tell my lord, and the jury, that you don't know what the prisoner was doing, between your entering the room, and his handing you the bill?"

"No, I don't know what he was doing; and you can't prove that I do. I didn't care a curse what he was doing, till he paid me the money."

"Now, sir; on your solemn oath, was not the prisoner asleep on the sofa when you entered that room?"

"Asleep! for anything I know he might have been. I've told you I know nothing about it."

"Will you swear that he was not fast asleep on the sofa?"

"No, I won't swear that!"

"You won't? And yet you don't know what he was doing?"

"No, I don't."

"Now, sir, when you saw him asleep on the sofa—"

"Mr. Church," said the judge, in an under-tone of voice, "I don't know what this is to lead to. But if my suspicions of your proposed course are correct, this mustn't proceed. I shall caution the witness that he is not obliged to answer any more questions on this part of the case."

"Oh!" cried Swillman, "let him go on, my lord; he'll make nothing of me; I'm prepared to answer any question the gentleman is anxious to put. Pray, don't inconvenience him, my lord, on my account."

And Swillman grinned round the court, as if to receive the admiration of all present for his unimpeachable integrity.

"Well, sir, then," said Mr. Church, "if you have no objection to answer one more question on this subject, we'll take your answer, if you please. But before you give it, I merely give you this other caution, that I am not asking this particular question without an excellent reason for doing it. So take care."

Swillman smiled a smile that meant to be contemptuous.

"Where did Latson take the bill from, when he paid you? Let me ask you that, first."

"Take it from? His pocket, I believe."

"Did he not take it from his pocket-book, sir?"

"Oh, yes, to be sure. Yes, he did."

"Now, sir, take care! On your solemn oath (and remembering what I've said about being in a position to support my question), had you not seen that pocket-book while the prisoner was—"

"Upon my word, Mr. Church," said Mr. Fotheringay, springing to his feet, "this is going a little too far! What will you ask next?"

"I don't see," said the judge, "that if the witness is willing—"

"Willing! my lord," broke in Swillman, "most willing! I'll answer in a trice. No!" and the witness repeated the last words of the oath by which he had been sworn.

"Very well, sir," said Church; "then we'll take up that question again presently."

All this while Claude, having obtained leave to sit, sat with the lower part of his face covered with his hand, his elbow resting on his knee, and his eyes fastened, without ever moving, on Swillman's face.

"Now, then, I have a few more questions, my lord, to ask you," said Church, in a stern voice.

Every one in court stared at the learned counsel.

"Questions to ask me, Mr. Church," said his lordship on the bench, looking in bewilderment at Church's self-possession and the assurance of manner, and hearing the voice of an authority so unusual in counsel addressing the court, and especially unusual in Mr. Church.

"Beg your lordship's pardon," said Church, bowing very low. "I had not the honour of addressing the court just then. I spoke to the witness."

And Hugh quietly began turning over his brief, and some other papers that lay before him, without troubling even to throw away a glance at the thunderstricken deponent.

"Now, my lord," said Church again, very calmly.

"Lord!" said Swillman, laughing; "I'm really very much obliged to you, but you do me too much honour. I suppose this is to make up for all the bullying I've had."

Church stood at the table, with a certain paper open in his left hand, while with the other he held up a very threatening-looking finger towards the witness, and then in a deep tone, and in measured syllables, said to him—

"Sir, it is high time that this foolery should be laid aside. Are you not the cast-off son of the Marquis of Shackberry? and is not your proper name the Lord Blinmore?"

The witness seemed to be falling back in the box, and the bystanders instinctively moved away, lest he should fall upon them.

It occurred to not one among them to save him from a tumble.

But he rallied in another moment.

Whiter than the judge's ermine was the man's face as he nerved himself to answer, in a tone of constrained ease and full of bitter malice—

"Well, sir, and suppose it is, what then?"

"It is a very dangerous thing," said the judge, solemnly, "to come into a court of justice and swear under a false name; and, let me say, ten times worse, to do this when prosecuting another man for forgery."

Church spoke next.

"I shall not put you to the pain, my lord, of telling us the circumstances under which your family name is discovered or has been taken from you—whichever the case may be."

"You'd better, I should think—oh, you'd better!" said Blinmore, trying to taunt—but he didn't make much of it.

He could scarcely have been worse off if the question had been pursued; for there were a hundred directions in which he knew how fatal to him would be this discovery.

The cold sweat sat on his brow in beads. He dabbed it up with his handkerchief.

"No, my lord," said Hugh, "we won't push that part of your history: it would scarcely be fair; besides, we don't want it. We'll come to another period, long before you left home."

"Does your lordship recollect ever taking an interest in the races at Soresby, in the county where you resided?"

"Perfectly," said Blinmore.

"Possibly, you remember, my lord—"

"Now," said the judge, "I think it is my duty to tell you that your lordship may decline answering any question, the reply to which would criminate you, in any way."

"Oh," laughed the witness, "much obliged; but I don't mean to shirk anything that the gentleman asks. Though, where the devil he's going to take us, he knows best."

"Just so," said Church, with imperturbable gravity, turning over his brief, as it lay on the table.

"Has your lordship any particular recollection of the year in which a horse of Colonel Latson's ran, named—named,—yes,—named Mandrake?" looking for the name among the papers.

"Aye, perfectly, perfectly."

"And, I think that your lordship had special reasons for desiring that Mandrake, which was the favourite that year, I believe, shouldn't win; is that so?"

And the witness darted a look at the dock, and into Claude's fixed face, that would have slain him there, as he sat, if looks could kill.

"Oh!" said Blinmore, changing his cue in an instant; "I know where you are now, exactly. Tricks in all trades, you know. What! he's told you, has he? Well, he took my advice, I suppose, and doctored him, for he lost, safe enough. It was for my con-founded father; not for me."

"What proof have you, sir," said Church, sternly, "that he did anything of the kind? But what he did, or did not, doesn't concern us here, to-day. You admit that you advised his tampering with the horse?"

"Oh, yes, if you like. Anything to oblige."

"And you also admit, I suppose, that when you mentioned the matter to the prisoner, he indignantly refused having anything to do with it?"

"Aha! that's very rich, very. He snapped at it in a moment. He knows he did."

"Stop, stop, my lord! take care!"

"Why, don't I tell ye, the horse lost! and Latson made her lose; you don't do:bt that, I suppose?"

"I ask this simple question—did not Claude Latson leave your company that day, vowing that you were the very devil himself, and that he would have nothing in the world to do with your frauds? Answer, my lord! yes, or no!"

"Yes," said Blinmore; "and then went and did it, the next moment!"

"What your lordship did, we were in a position to have proved, if it had been denied. What the prisoner did, none can prove; and if they could, it is beside my present purpose to inquire."

"Hm!" said Blinmore.

And again, his eye met Claude's, and his lip curled with a horrid sneer.

"My lord," said Church, "you may stand down."

He needed no second permission.

And a broad gangway was made by the crowd, as he went through, as if each spectator would have felt a taint of pollution, had Blinmore touched him.

"My lord," said Hugh, addressing the bench, "I have to pray your lordship to forbid the last witness to leave the court, until the conclusion of the case."

"Oh! of course, Lord Blinmore will remain in attendance. He may be wanted again, in the course of the trial."

"That is your lordship's order, as I understand?"

"If an order be necessary, Mr. Church, certainly."

There was, then, a re-examination of Lord Blinmore, alias James Swillman, but Fotheringay could make nothing of it.

He only tried to make the most, as was natural, of Mandrake's having lost the race; and, from that, wished it, of course, to be inferred (as the reader knows was the fact) that Claude had tampered with the horse.

But Hugh's point had been gained—viz., the damaging of Blinmore's character. For whatever Claude might be, Mr. Church had reasons for disparaging the accuser's character, to prepare the way for what follows. This he had effectually done; not only by the exposure of the Mandrake affair, but by the deportment elicited from the witness, in the giving of his evidence, from first to last.

"That, my lords," said Fotheringay, "is the case for the prosecution."

Hugh Church then rose.

Rose, to do what?

Rose to plead for the son of the man who had done him the direst injury one human being can inflict upon another!

But, nevertheless, rose—a gentleman nearly at the top of a most honourable profession, after a life of sorrow and struggle—the mediator of one who, a few years ago, would have called him (and perhaps, if he had known him, would have called him still) by the most offensive of society's worst names.

"May it please your Lordships, Gentlemen of the Jury—

"I congratulate myself, that I shall be able, on this occasion, to spare you one of those lengthened and impassioned introductions which are not generally wanting in the speech of counsel; standing, as I do, to defend a gentleman of station and family, under a charge like that which is laid in this indictment.

"Under other circumstances, I might have felt it due to my client that I should dwell at some length on the contrast, the miserable contrast between the birth, the education, the former prosperity of the prisoner, and his appearance in the dock before you now, on his trial for an offence which, a few short years back, would have involved, not his liberty, but his life.

"Gentlemen,—whatever may be the momentary humiliation of Mr. Latson's position, and although neither you nor I would elect to stand in that dock, even for the purpose of receiving a full and honourable acquittal on a disgraceful charge like this, yet, if you and I live a few moments longer, I think we shall be of one mind on this point, at all events—viz., that if the prisoner, for a short hour or two this morning, has been deprived of your respect, and that of this crowded court, he comes out of this ordeal—as I promise you he shall come out—an object of more heartfelt and more universal sympathy than he would, probably, ever have been made, by any other means.

"Gentlemen,—the case for the prosecution rests, as you have heard, mainly on the evidence of two witnesses.

"I don't deny, I never did deny, Mr. Latson does not deny, that the signature of Mr. Montgomery to that bill is a forgery—no doubt, a wilful forgery; and you, I am sure, felt, as I did, the profoundest compassion for that poor young man's uncle, as that uncle was compelled, in yonder box, to disavow the handwriting.

"Unquestionably, gentlemen, the signature is a forgery.

"But who forged it?

"First of all, let me ask you, what conceivable motive the prisoner at the bar could have for adding a second signature at all? The highly respectable nobleman who comes here to give evidence under an alias, told my friend (he let out to my friend), that he had required only one name on the bill, with which the fifty pounds was to be paid.

"What did Latson want with another name?"

"If the noble lord was satisfied, why should the prisoner be uneasy, and actually forge his own uncle's signature to give this man, his known enemy, more security than he had asked for?"

"For, mark you, gentlemen, Mr. Latson had no great reason to look after the interests of this James Swillman. From the first moment of their meeting, years back, the prisoner detected, under the cloak of an alias, the valuable friend of his boyhood, who wanted him to poison his own father's horses; and, from that day to this, Latson has been the object of that man's deliberate and persevering hatred and malice: and this Latson has seen. But, by gradually, I fear, infecting his victim with a portion of his own character, and snaring him in his vile plots, the noble lord has held his victim, as if spell-bound, so that no basilisk ever made surer of his prey.

"Ay, gentlemen, and this bill" (holding it up) "was to have been the coup-de-grace to that miserable man's character!"

"What is my case?"

"Gentlemen, my case is this. My case is, that Claude Latson had no more knowledge of that signature of Montgomery, until Swillman showed it to him, than his lordship on the bench;—my case is, that it was only in one of those dreadful paroxysms of despair in which men have been known to do far wilder things than this, that poor Latson adopted the handwriting, and maintained it to have been his uncle's;—my case is, that when this wretch—this Blinmore, whom his own father has been forced to disclaim—entered the gambling-house, Latson was asleep, overcome with wine: that his pocket-book—which, you will presently see, was a large one, and probably protruded from the pocket of his shooting-jacket, as he sat, or lay, snoring;—my case is (don't tremble, gentlemen—don't tremble for the feelings, the delicate feelings, of my Lord Blinmore, which I am forced to wound by the words I am going to utter—his almost feminine sensitiveness, as you have seen it exhibited here to-day, has borne worse things than this: I say, gentlemen, my case is), that Blinmore abstracted that book, while Latson was there, asleep—that he added the name of Montgomery, and then returned the book—and waited for his victim to come on to his ruin, when he should present the bill!"

"Why, gentlemen, look at that man."

And Mr. Church pointed out Blinmore, who sat only a yard or two from the advocate, his face a horrible confusion of terror, shame, and a struggle to laugh it off as a joke.

"Look at that man! Remember how he behaved to-day in that box! Did you see his glances towards the prisoner?"

(Here Hugh lowered his voice, and leaned forward towards the jury.)

"Is that the man, do you suppose, to have waited patiently, doing nothing whatever, in that billiard-room, till it was his enemy's pleasure to awake, before he received his debt! Why, gentlemen, this sucking-dove of a lord had made an appointment with Latson for that hour! There was no one else in the room—no one for his lordship to amuse himself with,—no one, I may say, for him to torture or to ruin. Do you believe, that, if he had no motive for allowing Latson to sleep on, he would, gentle patient soul, have meekly taken up a newspaper, and sat down to bide his companion's time; gentlemen might, no doubt; but it is for you (under his lordship's direction, presently) to say whether Blinmore alias Swillman is the man to do it!

"No, gentlemen! He would have gone up to him on the very instant of his entering the room. He would have taken him by the shoulder!"

"—and shaking him, as only a ruffian like that can shake, he would have said, 'Now, then! Pay me that thou owest.' He doesn't do anything of the sort. The case, even for the prosecution, is, that he waits, I don't know how long, in perfect tranquillity (like a nurse, no doubt, watching the sick, and afraid to breathe almost, lest the patient should wake!), and when Latson is perfectly prepared and refreshed, meekly takes the bill, and goes out!

"I say, gentlemen—if the case ended there—if I could carry it no farther—you would have very grave difficulty in saying—considering all the antecedents of this gentleman—considering his knowledge, time after time, that Latson had asked his uncle Montgomery for money (which, I believe, has not yet been proved to you, but it will be)—considering the utter absence of motive in that young man, for adding a second name to the bill, when the first had been agreed upon between them—and above all, considering the conduct of Swillman (left only where it now is), while the prisoner was asleep—I say, gentlemen, that even if the case were to close at this point, and I sat down without calling a single tittle of evidence, I'm sure his lordship would tell you, that there was not that firm, reliable, indisputable ground for you to stand upon in this case, on which, as reasonable men, tempering justice with mercy, you could consign my client to destruction by a verdict of guilty.

"But, gentlemen," said Church—and here he finished a speech of great power, of which we only give the substance, and said again, in a very solemn, subdued under-tone—

"Thank God, the case does not stop here! I shall lift the veil upon those few minutes that elapsed in yonder billiard-room, a veil which poor Latson couldn't have lifted, a veil which no mortal could have lifted, but for that all-merciful and all-just Providence, which often marks a murderer by one spot of blood, and gives the gallows its due, by half a foot-print on a few inches of dirt.

"Gentlemen, bear with this painful case but for five minutes longer (I assure you, for myself, that is as much as I can do), and then I think I can promise you, that, beside restoring that unhappy man to society, and giving him one glad prospect of breaking away from friendships that have well nigh been his ruin—(beside this), you will become Almighty God's agents in bringing the real culprit to justice, and forcing prosecutor and prisoner to change places (as they often do in this world); above all, you will, by your verdict, supply the public of this country with one more illustrious example of that great, inevitable, everlasting law, to which every villain must bow, and under which the innocent can sink only for the moment—

"Be sure your sin will find you out."

And when the advocate sat down, the applause of the people, as the officers in vain tried to check it, loud as it was, was not so deep, nor so precious to Hugh Church, as the tears that fell from Claude's eloquent eyes, or the fiend's revenge that fixed and darkened every muscle of Blinmore's mouth!

THE YOUNG POET'S DIRGE.

A FLASH of your dark eye, stranger boy,
With a memory of my dead,
Hath touched my soul, like a solemn joy
That can never be written or said.

Oh, haunting spell of a smile that's gone
Like a star from the morning gray;
Oh, gentle charm of a spirit-tone,
Like a brook in a lapse of May!

Oh, tender grace of a sweet young face
They hid from me long ago,
One eve, when the lonesome burial-place
Was wild with the drifting snow!

Ye gather about my heart, and wring,
With a desolate sense of pain,
From the trembling chords of that broken thing,
A wild and a wailing strain.

For, princely boy, in the years gone by,
A gleam of your beauty shone
From the ripe red lip, and the falcon eye
Of a proud heart all my own.

A shadow is on your heart and brain,
And your voice is heavy with tears,
And your brow is sealed with the seal of pain—
A sign of the coming years;

But under the seeds, and the lilies dim,
On a lonesome river shore,
There cometh no sorrow or pain to him,
For ever and evermore!

My beautiful one! my poet lost,
The tones of whose glorious lyre
Are breaking to-night on the starry coast
Of the river of crystal fire.

And I know when the shining purples fade
From the distant twilight skies,
His steps are under the palm-trees' shade,
'Mid the lilies of paradise!

THE existence of a rational and improvable creature is not to be measured by years and months, but by ideas and sensations—by what we can see, enjoy, learn, and accomplish during our pilgrimage upon earth; and, in this point of view, every educated individual is as a Methuselah in comparison with his remote ancestors.

TAJE MAHAL, NEAR AGRA.

TAJE MAHAL, NEAR AGRA.

INDIA contains architectural monuments of nearly every age and style. Considerable light is thrown on the gradual progress of the country by these indications of the genius of its people. There are many beautiful specimens of building which lead the spectator to form no mean opinion of the ability of the Hindoos. The pagodas or temples are characterised by the richest ornamentation, being covered with sculptures of the human figure and of the lower animals. The temple of Ajmeer is one of the most ancient in India, and is remarkable for the elegance of its columns and the finish of its carved foliage. The pagoda of Chhillambaun, on the Coromandel coast, is adorned with so much elegance as to have excited the admiration of ingenious artists. But even this is surpassed in grandeur by the great pagoda of Seringham. The pagoda of Tanjore also presents features which rival the splendour of those found in other oriental empires. Both by their extent and magnificence they are monuments of the taste and genius of the people by whom they were erected.

Since the establishment of Mohammedan rule in India, most of the public edifices have been reared under Moslem superstition, and in the style of architecture peculiar to the Mohammedans. Their mosques and tombs are very fine specimens of Saracenic art, and their palaces are characterised both by size and splendour.

One of the most spacious and elegant of these structures is that which is represented in our engraving, and which bears the name of Taje Mahal, or Crown of Empires. It stands on the banks of the river in the immediate neighbourhood of Agra, and was erected as a mausoleum of the Emperor Shah Jehan, in honour of his empress the Begum Narr Mahal. The estimated cost of the building is £750,000. The architect was a native of Sahar. The structure has been kept in excellent repair at the expense of the British government.

The edifice is of white marble, resembling in form and style an ordinary mosque, with minarets. It is surrounded by beautiful grounds, containing the choicest flowers and plants, arranged with considerable taste, ornamented with elaborately sculptured gateways and decorated fountains. The interior of the building is rich in mosaic ornaments; the walls and pavement are composed of arabesques of agates, jaspers, lapis lazuli, and coloured marbles, while texts from the Koran are profusely introduced.

The Taje Mahal is said to surpass everything in the world of the same description. "It is possible," says Bernier, "I may have imbibed an Indian taste; but I decidedly think that this monument deserves much more to be numbered among the wonders of the world than the pyramids of Egypt—those misshapen masses, which, when I had seen them twice, yielded me no satisfaction, and which are nothing on the outside but heaps of large stones, piled in forms of steps one upon another; while within there is very little that is creditable to human skill, or to human invention."

SIR RICHARD ARKWRIGHT, THE KNIGHT OF THE LOOM.

THERE is a remark of Sir Thomas Browne well worthy the attention of those who are desirous of entering upon the great work of self-improvement: "He that chiefly owes himself to himself is the substantial man"—a remark which the history of the self-taught man has amply verified. Foremost amongst the worthies of all ages of the world have been those who, deprived of the éclat of noble birth and the blessings of early education, have found means to educate themselves, and to do the work for which they were specially designed. The annals of biography are now adorned with the lives of many such—men who, although born poor, had a certain royalty of nature belonging to them, which demanded the honour and esteem of the wise and enlightened of every grade in society. The time has passed away, never to return, when mere outside respectability is to be received as the standard of worth and greatness; for the world is now looking for real men, and thankfully receives them, whether they issue from the splendour of the palace or from the obscurity of the cottage.

The life of the distinguished mechanic ARKWRIGHT eloquently reveals what may be accomplished by industry, energy, and perseverance. He was the son of humble parents, and was born at Preston, in Lancashire, on the 23rd of December, 1732. He was the youngest of thirteen children, and, while quite a lad, he was placed with a barber, to gain a livelihood by hair-cutting. He appears to have kept patiently to this business for about sixteen years; but when he arrived at the age of twenty-eight, he relinquished the labours of the shop to collect hair for wig-makers, he having discovered a chemical secret for dyeing human hair, a secret at that time very valuable. It was in his journeys to and fro on this expedition that he became acquainted with the laws of mechanics, and their special application to spinning machines. As is usual with the discoverers of new ideas, he wasted a great deal of time in applying his invention to things to which it bore only a remote reference, ere he saw its more immediate application. The great want of the time was a spinning machine. The demand for cottons was occasioning a much larger demand for cotton thread than the English spinners could supply. The weavers at that period had the weft they used spun for them by the females of their family; "and," says Mr. Guest, in his "History of the Cotton Manufacture," "those weavers whose families could not furnish the necessary supply of weft, had their spinning done by their neighbours, and were obliged to pay more for the spinning than the price allowed by their masters; and, even with this disadvantage, very few could obtain weft enough to keep themselves constantly employed. It was no uncommon thing for a weaver to walk three or four miles in a morning, and call on five or six spinners before he could collect weft to serve him for the remainder of the day; and when he wished to weave a piece in a shorter time than usual, a new ribbon or gown was necessary to quicken the exertions of the spinner."

To the facilitating of the spinning of cotton thread Richard Arkwright gave his whole attention, and having at length obtained a clue to the creation of the famous spinning-jenny, it may literally be said that "he gave no sleep to his eyes, nor slumber to his eyelids," until he saw the distance between his idea and its accomplishment materially decreasing. He laboured from five in the morning until nine at night, and even injured his health that he might develop his crude notions into a practical shape. He was impatient of whatever interfered with his all-absorbing pursuit; and the fact is too strikingly characteristic not to be mentioned, that he separated from his wife not many years after his marriage, because she, convinced that he would starve his family by scheming when he should have been shaving and hair-cutting, broke some of his experimental models of machinery. Indeed, so unbounded was his confidence in the success of his machinery, and in the national wealth to be produced by it, that, as his plans became more mature, he would make light of discussions on taxation, and say that he would pay the national debt. From the year 1767, it appears that Arkwright gave himself up completely to the subject of inventions for spinning cotton. In the following year he went to Preston, and set about constructing his first machine, which was put up in the dwelling-house attached to the free grammar school of that town. At this time his poverty was such, that, being a Burgess of Preston, and a contested election raging, he could not appear to vote, till the party with whom he sided gave him a decent suit of clothes. The first mill erected for spinning cotton in harmony with Arkwright's invention was at Nottingham, and was worked by horse power; but in 1771 another mill was built at Cromford, in Derbyshire, to which motion was given by water. Up to this time no such mill had existed; and it says much for the maturity of Arkwright's plans when it is remembered, that in the present day, with only slight modifications, they still continue in full force. No sooner, however, had the skilful mechanic taken out a patent for his invention than its validity was contested, on the ground that he was not the original inventor of the process; but the law decided in his favour. In proportion to the improvements he made in his machinery were the difficulties against which he had to contend in defending his rights. The country, instead of hailing with pleasure and gratitude the useful labours of Arkwright, looked coldly upon him, and threw every kind of hindrance in his way;—manufacturers combined against him, and even the legislature lent its influence to annul his patent and to crush his energies; but, sustained by his own enthusiasm, and convinced that his invention had countless wealth bound up in it, he laboured on until at last even parliament gave him its hearty and decided support.

Some years elapsed ere he derived any profit from his scheme. He was constantly opposed by the Lancashire manufacturers, who, having a large stock of yarn in hand produced by the old method of spinning, would not even think of his invention until they had profitably disposed of it. The working classes, generally, were strongly opposed to him, as they saw that as his scheme succeeded their own labour and wages would proportionably decrease. At Birkacre, in Lancashire, Arkwright had erected a large factory; but this fine building was set on fire by a mob of unthinking, incensed workpeople, in the presence of a powerful body of police and military, without any one of the civil authorities requiring them to interfere to prevent so scandalous an outrage. But at length his perseverance and indomitable energy were amply rewarded, and began to tell upon the country at large. His machine was introduced into all the large manufacturing towns; employers began to look upon it with approbation as a means to a better article and to increased profits; and factory operatives saw with satisfaction, that while one branch of labour was closed to them another had opened up itself. Wealth in large abundance began to flow in to Arkwright; he erected new mills, and took shares in great establishments where his machine had been introduced. The manufacturers so far deferred to him as to fix the market price of cotton twist according to his scale of charges, and the country generally was disposed to pay him honour. In the year 1786 he was appointed high sheriff of the county of Derby, and having presented an address of congratulation to his majesty on his escape from the attempt on his life by Margaret Nicholson, received the honour of knighthood. He died in the sixtieth year of his age, leaving behind him nearly half a million of money. But he left to his country a still richer legacy in the invention which he was the means of making popular. Every corner of the land has been benefited by it, and happiness untold has it conferred upon the sons of industry. The following estimate has been given of his character:—"Considering the difficulties in which he was placed by the deficiency of his early education and the unfavourable tendency of his early employment, Arkwright must be acknowledged to have been a very extraordinary man. His plans were all laid with skill and pursued with energy; he displayed the most unwearied perseverance in pursuit of his object under difficulties which would have borne down most men; and he forms one among the bright instances afforded by the annals of this country, that talent, when thus allied with patient energy and persevering industry, will not fail to insure ultimate success to its possessor."

The Matron.

NO. VIII.

ORDER is heaven's first law. So says Pope; and of this we may be certain, that order is the first law of good household management. When we speak of order, we do not mean mathematical order, but order founded on a good knowledge and just appreciation of the requirements of home-comfort and home-welfare.

In preceding numbers I have spoken at large about good economical dinners, and I shall often revert to this very important subject; now we are about to discuss other matters of importance to our well-being. The arrangement of rooms, for instance. A young wife should acquaint herself with all particulars respecting the furniture necessary for every room; and then she should see all this furniture is kept clean and in a good condition. What comfort a sensible man enjoys in a thoroughly well arranged room,—a room in which there is everything for use, and not one iota of lumber. This leads to the repetition of the rule I earnestly tried to enforce:—Clear away everything you do not want; now, mark me, I do not say throw it away. This sentence is not to be found in what I have written. Philosophers tell us that nothing in nature perishes. In our homes nothing should perish. Whatever we do not want we should sell, or give away. But let us return to household arrangements. Not only should you clear away everything useless, but you should have in good order everything that is wanted. Never allow your husband's eye to rest twice on a broken or a ragged article. The money that goes in mending is, almost always, well spent. This is much more than can be said of the money that goes in buying.

In your own house, be your own critic. Seek out every defect, from the garret to the scullery. Let no broken pane of glass, worn-out chair-bottom, ragged stair-carpet, or leaking pot, escape your notice. Let reformation quickly follow in the footprints of discovery, and it will soon be felt that, as the eye of the master maketh fat the horse, so the eye of the mistress maketh glad the house. But do not be impatient, and above all do not be discouraged by difficulties at the outset. Judicious, active management is sure to make a happy home; but at first you may see a scowl on your maid's countenance, and discontented mutterings may reach your ear. Heed them not, but still go on, grappling with, and mastering all the difficulties of domestic management; and among these no slight item is the proper arrangement (viz., the writing down and putting up) of all the linen for the wash. Never leave this important duty entirely to your servant. Always inspect it yourself; and, whether you wash at home or not, take a list of everything, and see that everything comes back. But this is not all I have to say about things going to the wash. Taking a list is not enough. You should see that all is mended, for what is sent to the wash torn will come back in tatters. And, above all, see to the buttons on your husband's shirts. Examine the collar and wristbands, and do not be satisfied with seeing the buttons; feel them, to test the firmness of the sewing. Who will deny that the first angry word from the young married man is often elicited by finding his shirt buttonless? Now for a kindred difficulty, and one that must be encountered, though from painful experience I can tell you that a great deal of resolution is necessary to come off victorious.

I can fancy you seated at your piano, delighting your ear with some of the airs from a favourite opera. A knock is heard at the door; after your "Come in," Sarah appears. "If you please 'em, I haven't a single kitchen-cloth."

"No kitchen-cloth, Sarah! Why, there were six new ones in the dresser-drawer when you came."

"Well mem, I'm sure, I never saw 'em."

You wisely reply, "I will come down and look for them myself." This was not the answer Sarah expected. She is confused, she turns red, and endeavours to dissuade you from visiting the kitchen, but you remain firm. Having reached the lower regions, you open the dresser-drawer. You find no cloths in it. During Sarah's reign it has become stuffed up with what is commonly called rubbish. You look under the dresser, and on the handle of an iron you recognise one of the new cloths (hemmed by yourself). It has been folded up and made to do duty as an iron-holder. Not far from the spot is another of the missing articles; it is black and singed, having been used to clean the iron. You say nothing, but proceed to the scullery. Soon your eye is attracted by a dark greasy ball in a corner of the sink. You conquer your disgust and take it up, when lo and behold! to use Sarah's language—it comes a two in your hands, for in fact it is formed of two of your kitchen-cloths that have been forgotten, and left to decay in greasy stagnant water. Prepared for horrors, you walk to the dust-hole, and there you behold fragments of your fifth and sixth cloths. Once in her life Sarah had washed them out, and put them to dry, but had placed them so imprudently near the fire, that on returning from the baker's, she found them in flames and half consumed, and but for the presence of mind of the butcher boy, who entered the kitchen with her, and smothered the flames in the ashes, the whole house might have been consumed.

You resolve on dismissing Sarah then and there, but second thoughts are best. In all probability, you would gain nothing by exchanging Sarah for Betty. If you have not looked after your property, you could not well expect your servant to care for it.

Supposing you calm again, and once more in your own sitting-room, I advise you in future to take your house and kitchen cloths under your own direction. Intrust to your maid as many and no more than she requires for immediate use. On every Saturday let her return to you those she has used during the week, but let her give them back clean, and intrust to her another set, to be returned the next week. See that all you have are used in rotation. This rule is important as applied to house-cloths, and also to linen in wear.

Never fear that your servants will dislike you on account of your determination to have everything in order. If you give your directions kindly and good-humouredly, they will willingly obey you, particularly if you make it evident to them that you have their good at heart, as well as your own; and of this you may rest assured, that there is no happy home where the servants are unhappy. We depend on them as they on us, and each should work for the good of the other. It is the harsh, bitter, scolding mistress that is hated; and here follows a precept that young wives should write in gold. Never acquire the habit of scolding servants or children. The rough music that used to be given to husbands who beat their wives, was harmony compared to a vixen's voice. The sound of it in the distance is sufficient to drive a husband to a tavern. Kindness, wisdom, joy, and love should ever be associated with the name of wife. Hers is a high mission. Hers is an important part in the reformation of the world. It is hers to strew life's thorny path with flowers, and,

"Recollecting all humbled the hour
Of Eve's disobedience and doom,
By virtue's omnipotent power
To make a new Eden of home."

Our Scientific Column.

For the delectation of ingenious youth of both sexes, and of the fair sex in particular, we inaugurate this, our scientific column, with a few remarks on a very interesting subject, calculated, we doubt not, to be received with much approbation; and inasmuch as the space accorded to us is very short, while that which we have to write is very long, if we write the whole which presses uppermost to be written, instead of wasting time with further introductions we will proceed to the accomplishment of the task at once, by presenting the first number of a short series on chemical magic, prepared for us by a conjurer of immense celebrity, as the reader would own if we were only permitted to state the conjurer's name. Opening some MS. forwarded to us by that conjurer we find directions for making

A PECULIAR PIE.

Procure in a glass-house a few feet of the thinnest and smallest glass-tube you can lay your hand upon, and take especial care that the tube be not made of German glass, for that will be totally unmanageable. Taking one end of the tube in either hand, hold the middle of it in the flame of a spirit-lamp until it gets soft and pasty, which will occur in less than a minute. When you feel the tube melted, and drooping between your two hands, give a sharp but even pull, by which means the fused portion of the tube will be drawn out into a hair-like thread, which will always remain tubular, no matter how small it may be. For present purposes it must not be drawn out too small, however. About the size of a hog's bristle is what you should aim at, though a little larger or a little smaller will not much matter. Repeat the operation again and again several times until five or six portions of the bristle-like tube have been prepared, which you must now proceed to treat as follows:—Dipping one end into a little strong oil of vitriol placed conveniently in a cup or wine-glass, apply your mouth to the other end, and suck up the oil of vitriol until it fills about three-fourths of the tube. Keep your eye carefully upon the vitriol column whilst rising, in order that it may not enter your mouth. This done you will have in each tube oil of vitriol in the middle portion, and the two ends empty. The next process is to melt or seal each end, so that the oil of vitriol may be confined and prevented escaping until the tube is broken. To close or seal each end of the tube is the simplest matter imaginable. You can do it by holding each extremity for an instant in the flame of a candle; for this purpose you do not require a flame so strong as that of a spirit-lamp, though if you happen to have it lighted by you it may be employed. Assuming the operation done, you have next to wipe all adherent oil of vitriol away by running the tube between a fold of blotting paper, and be sure that all has been removed, or the subsequent stages of the operation will be ruined. You may ascertain that no further oil of vitriol is adherent by passing the tube between your lips, and touching it with the tongue. If no longer sour you may be quite sure it is not daubed with oil of vitriol.

Before using the tubes you will require to be taught the philosophy of using them; therefore attend to the directions which I shall now give you. Procure, at a druggist's shop, a drachm of chlorate of potash, and powder it in a mortar with its own weight of lump sugar, previously made quite dry. When mixed, the compound will require to be preserved in a well corked or stoppered bottle, inasmuch as any contact with moisture spoils it. Laying a little of this mixture on a plate, and touching it with the minutest quantity of oil of vitriol, the whole bursts into flame—a result which will prepare you to understand the philosophy of the hair-like tubes just charged. In respect of them it is evident that, if they be folded in a channel of paper holding the mixture of chlorate of potash and sugar, and then broken, the oil of vitriol will escape, and ignite the materials. You are now to accomplish that operation of folding. It must be delicately performed, without much pawing. And you will do well to perform the operation at arm's length. Not that anything very serious is to be apprehended even if the tube should break, and the whole ignite. But that is not what you aim at, of course.

Although you have had instructions how to make the compound tubes in question, it should be done subsequently to the operation now about to be described. Procure a pie-dish, of such size that your prepared tubes shall reach quite across. Fill the pie-dish with sawdust, or bran; lay a crust over it, and send it to the bakehouse. When baked and cold remove the crust, by sliding a knife under it, and throw away the sawdust. The most critical part of the operation is now to begin.

Laying three or four tubes across the pie-dish, a little way down towards the bottom of the dish, so that the crust when laid on shall in no degree interfere with the tubes, fasten each extremity of the latter to the side of the pie-dish which it touches by means of sealing-wax, when, owing to the arrangement made, it will be evident that any person cutting the pie must necessarily break one or more of your ignition tubes, and set free the oil of vitriol amidst the sugar and chlorate of potash, when the whole bursts into a flame, of course, and sets fire to anything combustible you may happen to have put into the pie. As to that matter, all depends upon your own taste, and the nature of the company on whom you wish the cutting of the pie to devolve. If to be part of a bachelor's repast, the charge may be strong and noisy; if for the amusement of ladies, you must remember the delicacy of their nerves, and in all cases I think it well to let the lady part of an assembly into the secret. Five or six good crackers make almost noise enough, but a whole pie-full may be used without any danger. I generally manage to give one of these pies to a lady, telling her all about it, and allowing her to negotiate the rest. I forgot to mention that the crust of the pie had better be stuck down to the lid of the dish by a little sealing-wax. There are other mixtures besides chlorate of potash and sugar which ignite when brought into contact with oil of vitriol. Chlorate of potash and sulphur is one of these, but the sulphur smells abominably, and cannot for that reason be recommended. It was by a device something like that of our fire-work pie, that the Russians managed that their infernal machines should explode when pressed upon by ships sailing over them, and also that their fougasses, or little mines, at Sebastopol should explode when our soldiers happened to march over the ground where they were concealed.

Small Change.

AMERICAN EXCUSE FOR AN ECLIPSE.—Little boy: "What's the use of an eclipse?" Astronomer: "Oh, it gives the sun time for reflection."

An Irishman, in France, was drinking with some company who proposed the toast, "The land we live in." "Aye, with all my soul, me dear," said he, "here's poor old Ireland."

"HAVE you dined?" said a loungee to his friend. "I have, upon my honour," replied he. "Then," rejoined the first, "if you have dined upon your honour, I fear you have made but a scanty meal."

A PERSON named Owen Moore once left his creditors somewhat unceremoniously, upon which a wag wrote—

"Owen Moore has run away, Owing more than he could pay."

An Albany paper says that there is a man in Greenbush who believes in rotation of crops. One year he raises nothing, the next year weeds.

"TOMMY, my son, what is longitude?" "A clothes line, daddy." "Prove it, my son." "Because it stretches from pole to pole."

"Do you think I'll get justice done me?" said a culprit to his counsel. "I don't think you will," replied the other, "there are two men on the jury who are opposed to hanging."

PRINTERS' TOASTS.—The Press—it expresses truth—re-presses error—im-presses knowledge, and op-presses none. (We thought this too good to be suppressed, and therefore publish it.) Woman, the fairest work of creation—the edition being extensive, let no man be without a copy. Babies—miniature editions of humanity, issued periodically, and displayed in small caps.

"DICK, how is it you are always possessed of such a store of fun? Where do you get it?" "I manufacture it. I can make it out of nothing. For instance—I could make fun of you, but for friendship's sake."

THE PURSUIT OF JOKING UNDER DIFFICULTIES.—A German band playing under the windows—a young lady practising the Battle of Prague next door—Polish refugees arguing with the landlady in the passage—three gasmen fixing up a "V R" on the balcony—500 different voices bawling loudly in the distance—and the printer's devil whistling Poor Dog Tray outside on the door-mat.—Punch.

"WELL, John, did you take the note I gave you to Mr. Smithers?" inquired a gentleman of his rustic servant. "Yes, sir," replied John, "I took the note, but I don't think he can read it." "Cannot read it!" exclaimed the gentleman; "why so, John?" "Because he is so blind, sir. While I was in the room he axed me twice where my hat was, and it was on my head all the time."

We once heard a partizan boast that his party was a Briarius with a hundred arms. "Oh, yes," said his opponent, "a hundred arms and a hundred legs. The arms all busy in plundering the country, and the legs in running away with the spoil."

"My dear madam, I am surprised at your taste in wearing another woman's hair on your head."—"My dear sir, I am equally astonished that you persist in wearing another sheep's wool upon your back."

WHAT officer in the Customs did King Canute represent while sitting upon the sea-shore rebuking the waves?—A tide-waiter.

A NEGRO, who had learnt to read, wishing to give some of his countrymen an idea of it, said, "Reading is the power of hearing with the eyes instead of the ears."

UGLINESS is an advantageous stimulus to the mind, that it may make up for deficiencies of the body. Moral beauty, the reflection of the soul, is as superior to superficial comeliness as mind is to matter. It is a halo which will win worshippers, however unadorned the shrine whence it emanates, for she who looks good cannot fail to be good-looking.

A SHOEMAKER has one important advantage of most kinds of mechanics—his goods, whenever finished, are always sol'd.

CHARACTER.—It is an error common to many to take the character of mankind from the worst and basest amongst them; whereas, as an excellent writer has observed, nothing should be esteemed as characteristic of a species, but what is to be found amongst the best and most perfect individuals of that species.

Notes by the late T. H. Lowe, Esq.

(a) This move is recommended by Von Heyderbrandt, as it prevents Black from playing Q P next move.—(b) Despite the authority, Black throws forward his Q P, and seems to lose nothing by the venture.—(c) Any other move would have yielded an immediate advantage to Black.—(d) Hoping to gain the attack.—(e) Rather bold this for a match game.—(f) We should have preferred playing Q to Q B 2.—(g) His best move to save the threatened mate.—(h) Hoping to get a passed pawn, but it seems too venturesome.—(i) White should have taken B with Kt; he would have gained a pawn.

Our space will not permit us to give the whole of the game in the present number. The remainder of the game shall appear next week.

W. B. G. K.—I. Assuming it to be your turn to play, and that your King without actually being in check, is in such a position that he cannot move without placing himself in check, and at the same time you have no other piece or Pawn that can be played, you are said to be stalemated. 2. Stalemate is a drawn game.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO OUR READERS.—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ANOTHER NEW TALE.—In No. 15 of this Journal will be commenced another new and original tale, beautifully poetical and very interestingly instructive, by one of our most popular authoresses, entitled "Hope Evermore, or Something to Do"—a tale of the Ragged Schools and the Temperance Movement.

CHINA.—With No. 15 will be published a splendid Panoramic Map of China, with the approaches to China from Hongkong. This map, which is remarkable for the accuracy with which it has been designed and the care with which it has been engraved, equals in size the Panoramic Map of India, which was published with No. 1 of the new series of this Journal. The price of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, No. 15, New Series, together with this beautiful Panoramic Map of China, inclusive, will be three-halfpence. In addition to the Panoramic Map, there will be a separate engraving of the Plan of Canton, including, together with the approaches to Canton and the Island of Hongkong, a mass of statistical and useful information. The events now occurring in China, both political and religious—the deep interest which is felt concerning a country which contains upwards of three hundred millions of inhabitants, or nearly one half of the population of the whole globe—its "crockery metropolis," exclusive customs, ancient colonisation and history, &c. &c., will necessarily render this Panoramic Map and accompanying engravings, upon which no expense has been spared in the drawing, engraving, and electrotyping, of great value and interest, both on account of the engravings themselves and the information which the letterpress supplies.

COOKEE.—The origin of the word stirloin of beef is variously stated. One account tells us that King Jamie I., of witch-hunting memory, knighted a loin of beef at a banquet, which joint was ever after called stirloin. Another story ascribed the freak to Charles II., whose deed is thus immortalised in doggerel verse:—

"Our second Charles of fame facets
On loin of beef did dine;
He held his sword pleased o'er the meat—
"Rise up, thou famed Sir-loin!"

MILES.—In asking us "in what year gunpowder was invented," our correspondent has given us a hard nut to crack. Our English histories generally mention the scientific monk, Roger Bacon, as the discoverer; the Germans stoutly uphold the claim of Berthold Schwartz, of Cologne; and the French have some favourite inventor whose name we cannot at this moment call to mind. There is no doubt, however, that gunpowder was used at the battle of Cressy in 1346, and at the siege of Calais that immediately followed.

S. T. C.—When sentence of death is recorded against a criminal, it is intended to mark the enormity of his crime, which is punishable with the last penalty of the law; but no criminal is put to death except by the sentence of the judge pronounced in open court. Transportation for life is generally the doom of those against whom sentence of death has been recorded.

MILITAMAN.—Bayonets are named from the town of Bayonne, where they were first invented in 1670. The first occasion on which they are known to have been used by English troops was in 1693.

JOHN R.—The great storm—the most violent ever known in England—occurred on the 27th of November, 1703. The lead on the roofs of several churches was rolled up like scrolls of parchment; giant oaks were torn up by the roots, and even in the Thames vessels and barges were sunk. The fleet suffered terribly; in the navy alone fifteen hundred seamen were lost, and in the merchant service a far greater number. The damage done in London alone by the great storm is estimated at a million of money.

HUGH LATSON.—The postal system is of very much more ancient origin than our correspondent imagines. In the time of Alexander the Great the Persians under Darius employed mounted couriers, who were stationed at different parts of the empire for the transmission of despatches. Among the Romans, Augustus introduced a postal system, and even employed post-chaises some time before the birth of our Saviour. In France the post was introduced under Louis XIII., about the year 1620; in England, under Charles I., in 1635. James II. may be called the first postmaster-general, and received all the profits arising from the carriage of letters. They amounted then to about £4,000 a year. What would James think if he could see his department now?

AMELIA.—The spinning-wheel was invented at Brunswick about the year 1530. The spindle and distaff previously to that time formed the implements wherewith ladies pursued their industry in days when fancy work had not been introduced, and broderie was unknown.

TRO.—We are unable to say when, or by whom, stenography was invented. The first treatise on the subject, in our own language, is a curious little book, without a date, entitled, "Arte of Shorte, Swift, and Secrete Writing by Character," invented by Timothy Bright, Doctor of Physike. The learned "Doctor of Physike" seems to have lived in the time of James I., or in the latter years of Elizabeth's reign.

G. H. P.—We are not at all pleased with the sentiments contained in your letter; quite the reverse. You begin by acknowledging that "you owe your landlord £9 for rent," and then proceed to ask us if you may take advantage of a quibble, and only pay the rent for one week. Take our advice, and do what is fair and honourable, by paying your debt at once, or within a certain time, as you and your landlord may agree; and in future transactions of this kind, remember to "do as you would be done by."

CURIOS.—The first Christian Church of St. Paul, London, was built on the site of the present cathedral, in 1610. A Temple of Diana had formerly occupied the ground.

CURIOS (No. 2) asks us if we think he could obtain Lord Shaftesbury's autograph by writing to that nobleman on any subject, for the sake of the answer he expects to get in Lord Shaftesbury's handwriting. We can only say that we entirely disapprove of such a subterfuge; and that we hope if our correspondent endeavours to obtain Lord Shaftesbury's autograph by any such means, his lordship will suspect the trick, and "sell" "Master Curious" by not replying at all.

CICELY.—Prince Frederick William of Prussia, the husband of the Princess Royal, will not succeed to the throne of Prussia on the death of the present king, who is his uncle, but at the death of his father, the younger brother of Frederick William IV. Thus there is one claimant to occupy the regal seat after the demise of the king irreverently termed "Clitquot," before the Princess Royal can be Queen of Prussia.

F. P.—The pedometer was invented in 1790.

INDIGNANT.—It is always difficult for us to decide on complaints from apprentices against their masters. In the first place, young people are apt to look on their grievances rather too seriously; and in the second, we only hear one side of the question. "Give and take" is, or should be, the rule of life. Let our "Indignant" correspondent yield to his master's wishes in one respect, for instance, in the matter of staying at home in the evenings; and we are sure the master will meet his apprentice's wishes by giving him time to study and to read. "A soft answer turneth away wrath;" but, from the tone of his letter, we cannot help thinking that "Indignant" is fond of using the grievous words that "stir up anger."

G. S. S.—Let a good dentist see your hollow tooth; and, unless he can promise you permanent ease by stopping it, have the refractory grinder out, like a man. Don't attempt to stop it yourself. Your amateur dental surgery will end in dissatisfaction. In nine cases out of ten "a long pull and a strong pull" is the only cure.

CHEMISTS.—Sympathetic or invisible inks may be divided into three classes. Firstly, those that become visible on paper by being sifted over with powder of some kind; secondly, those that become visible by moistening the paper with some liquid; and thirdly, those that become visible by heat. For the first class of writing, any glutinous juice may be used on which soot or other fine black powder will stick; of the second kind there are a great many, for instance, bismuth for the writing, and solution of sulphuretted hydrogen to make it visible; again, green vitriol for writing, and prussiate of potash for washing. Among those visible by heat, we may mention lemon-juice, diluted sulphuric acid, and chloride of copper, which become visible through the action of heat.

ULYSSES must have degenerated in physical strength and endurance, since the time when his great ancestor returned from the Trojan war, for "Ulysses," our correspondent, applies to us to know "about flannel shirts." For persons who are apt to take cold, such garments are both harmless and healthy; but if "Ulysses" is in robust health, we cannot see why he need "coddle" himself in flannel.

AN ANXIOUS FATHER.—Do not send your son to Madeira if you expect him to earn his own living, for he will assuredly find no field for industry and energy in so small a place. If his health makes his staying in England a matter of danger, send him to the Cape of Good Hope, where the climate is good, and there is some chance of his obtaining honourable and profitable employment.

NAUTICUS.—The first double-decked ship built in England was the "Great Harry," constructed in 1509, by order of Henry VII. It was 1,000 tons burden, and cost £14,000, a sum worth more in those days than £120,000 now. At that time fifty to a hundred tons was the usual burden of merchant ships. The "Great Harry" was burnt by accident.

ÆSOP.—Æsop, the fabulist, died 556 years before our Saviour's birth.

HENRY.—The insurrection of Walter the Tiler, commonly called Wat Tyler, occurred in 1381. Incensed at the rudeness of a tax-collector to his daughter, Wat slew the aggressor, and raised a party to oppose the hated poll-tax. Jack Cade's insurrection, in favour of the Duke of York, occurred in 1440.

JOSEPH H.—Macadamised roads are so called after the name of John London M'Adam, the introducer of the system of paving. He died in 1837.

I. T. S.—There is a great difference between talking and gossiping, and we think your schoolmistress quite right in prohibiting the latter pursuit. You should learn to talk of things rather than of persons, and particularly avoid speaking ill of others. The wish to say good things (frequently very ill-natured ones) has made many people friendless; and by dwelling upon the defects of others, and making them matter for conversation and comment, we not only may give much pain, but stand in danger of losing what little Christian charity we ourselves possess.

FORMULA.—In a letter it is always well to avoid anything that may have the appearance of undue familiarity; while, on the other hand, stiffness and formality may become offensive. The best way is to write the first letter to a lady (unless the epistle be a long one) in the third person, beginning, "Mr. — presents his compliments to Mrs. (or Miss) —." After two or three letters, you may begin "Dear Madam," unless the person to whom you write is much above you in social position. The transition from "Dear Madam" to "Dear Miss or Mrs. —" should always be made with care.

JAMES.—The offence for which Sir Walter Raleigh suffered death was participation in a conspiracy to place Lady Arabella Stuart on the throne of England. The offence was never proved against him; and the fact of his condemnation forms one of the many disagreeable reminiscences against the royal writer on demonology and witchcraft.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—The Order of the Bath was instituted at the coronation of Henry IV., in 1399. It was, and is still, intended as a reward for distinguished military service. It was renewed in 1725, and the distinction of Grand Cross added in 1818.

A WORKING MAN.—Sumptuary laws are enactments made at various times in different nations to regulate the kind of dress to be worn by each class of the community. Among the early settlers in the New England States, the sumptuary laws were very strict, all gay-coloured stuffs and rich embroideries being prohibited, except on special occasions. In England these laws have chiefly been directed to repressing the extravagances in costume that crept in from time to time. Thus, for instance, in Richard II.'s time, a prohibitory law was required to prevent people from wearing shoes with points that required to be fastened with chains to the wearer's knee; and Queen Bess found it advisable to station officers at the gates of London city, to break every gallant's sword that exceeded a yard in length. In the same queen's reign an edict was passed to regulate the depth of ruffs. Sumptuary laws have become obsolete, and there is now nothing to restrain the growth of crinoline.

A LOVER OF THE BEAUTIFUL.—Obtain an introduction to the lady's parents.

P. H. has been purchasing tickets in the Baden Railway Lottery for four years, has never won anything, nor did we ever hear of anybody who did, and now writes to ask us if we counsel perseverance in that desirable investment. If "P. H." wishes to have anything in return for money invested, beyond the mere excitement of gambling, we should say, "Give up the lottery;" and if "P. H." has money to spare, it is better to give to the poor than to encourage gambling schemes, which may, perhaps, enrich one, but certainly impoverish many.

F. HANKY, ESQ.—The Greenwich Railway was opened in 1836.

A WEE BIT LADDIE.—The first volume of the "Educational Course," entitled "Science Popularly explained," is published at 3s. 6d.

A LAD OF SIXTEEN.—The lines sent us by "A Lad of Sixteen" evince a talent for poetry, but his versification must be much more correct before he has a chance of appearing in our paper. In the meantime, we strongly recommend him not to neglect useful or elegant arts.

HAFIZ.—The study of Sanscrit without a master is rather an arduous undertaking; but by industry and perseverance much may be effected.

IGNORAMUS deserves the appellation he has voluntarily assumed; not because he has shown a laudable curiosity about a great physical truth, but because he cannot spell the word which betrays his want of knowledge. "Ignoramus," of which custom has made a substantive, is the first person plural of the present tense, indicative mood, of the Latin verb ignoro, and means "we are ignorant." It is, therefore, a great fault in orthography to spell it ignoramus. The rate at which light travels through an "exhausted receiver" has been ascertained; and the time in which light from the sun or any other fixed star of which we have approximately, through "the arc of the parallax," learnt the distance, reaches the earth, is calculated with reference to the medium through which the rays pass. It is perhaps incorrect to say "empty space," as the most learned of our recent astronomers consider that a thin fluid pervades the whole universe.

CONSTANT.—As you do not say in what diocese the property of which your ancestor was possessed lies, it is impossible to inform you where his will is registered. It is, however, most probable that you will find it, if you know the date of his death, in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Doctors'-commons. The expense of a copy will depend upon the length of the will, as the charge is so much per folio.

H. J. F. Y.—G.—The Act passed in the year 1835, known by the name of Lord Lyndhurst's Act, renders illegal a marriage with the sister of a man's deceased wife.

WOODPECKER.—It is impossible to answer your queries without having had a perusal of the papers to which you refer.

A. S.—An apprentice can be compelled by law to do the legitimate work of his employer. "Reasonable hours" are twelve hours out of the twenty-four—breakfast, dinner, and tea inclusive.

ALTA PETIT will be eligible for orders as a "literate person," without passing through "arts," if he can obtain the necessary certificates and testimonials from three beneficed clergymen. We would caution him, however, against the folly of neglecting his present duties for the distant and uncertain prospect of ordination. The subjects in which he would be examined by the bishop's chaplain are Latin composition and translations from Latin authors. He should make himself well acquainted with Grotius, and have such a knowledge of Paley's "Evidences of Christianity" as would enable him to answer any of the questions appended to the Oxford analysis of that book. He must be well versed in the Greek Testament, and be able to construe and explain, with collateral references, any passage in the Evangelists, the Epistles, or the Revelation. Scripture history must be acquired direct from the Old Testament. An intimate familiarity with the principal prophecies relating to the advent of the Messiah, and great readiness in repeating by heart and proving by texts of Scripture the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, are indispensable. When "Alta Petit" shall, by following these directions, be able to give to the three beneficed clergymen, who shall have known him intimately for "the three years last past," such reasons for the hope that is in him as will satisfy them of his fitness for the ministry, he can, by applying to the chaplain of the bishop in whose diocese he may have procured a title, obtain a list of such other books as may be considered either necessary or accessory.

M. A. B.—Your case is a very cruel one; but, as far as marriage is concerned, you have no remedy. Your husband's second marriage is null and void; the woman he lives with in America is not his wife, and he himself is indictable for bigamy. The felony, however, of which he has been guilty would not, even under the new Act, justify you in following his example.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARTLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVII.

I like not fair words and villain's mind.

SHAKESPEARE.

"Well, Styles!" exclaimed Carus Kearn, when the tempter of George Markham made his appearance at his chambers, "where have you been hiding yourself?"

"Where I have learnt much that concerns you," replied the man, in no very amiable humour; "and as for your not having seen me, the fault has been your own. I have called day after day, and still received the same answer, 'not at home.' Had you known what I know, it might have been different."

"But you have received your allowance regularly."
"Of course I have," observed the ruffian, sullenly.
"You dared not stop that."

The cheek of his employer flushed with shame and anger; the first was but a momentary feeling, arising rather from pride, than a sense of the degrading conduct which compelled him to listen to such a threat as the word "dared" implied, and passed away as quickly as it came. Prudence taught him to repress the latter, for he was completely in the speaker's power,—so true is it that the bond of evil binds alike those who conceive and those who execute it, in a chain of mutual dependence on each other.

"I sent for you," he said.

"Because you require my services, I suppose."

"Exactly so!"

"Well, let's hear what it is."

Without the slightest circumlocution—for the gentleman could speak plainly, although he seldom acted straightforwardly—Carus proceeded to inform him that George Markham had become a partner in the firm with Mr. Thornton; and proposed to him that he should wait upon the former, and, urging the plea of past friendship, endeavour to obtain a situation, either as entering-clerk or porter in the house. No matter how humble the position or how trifling the salary, they were disadvantages which money could make up to him. Gold was a commodity, when the gratification of revenge or the furtherance of his interests was at stake, the speaker was by no means chary of, provided those he employed served him faithfully and unscrupulously.

Styles listened to him patiently. He quickly comprehended all that was expected from him.

"You must abstain from drink," observed the tempter. "George is a reformed drunkard."

"We can both of us reform in business," replied the man.

"And tell him that you have followed his example. Considering the past kindness and liberality on your part, he can scarcely refuse to employ you."

PETER MANGLES AT THE "CROWN AND MAGNIE."

"I should say not, if he has any gratitude in him."
 "That is the plea you must urge. If I know him rightly, he will not refuse to listen to you. Once in the establishment, the rest will be comparatively easy. But you must not apply to him in that dress. It savours too strongly of the tap-room."

This was a remark which his visitor was far from disputing, since it implied a new suit of clothes. As a matter of course, he agreed that it would be perfect madness in him to present himself in the respectable counting-house of Thornton and Markham unless suitably attired.

Carus counted him down ten sovereigns for the purpose.

"You will take note," he said, "of all commercial transactions that may pass before your notice, and report them to me. But above all, contrive to get a sight of the bill-book, and ascertain whether George has the signature of the firm."

Styles nodded knowingly.

"The names of the houses they have business with."

The sign of intelligence was repeated.

"Where the cash is kept, and who retains the keys of the safe."

"I understand, perfectly, what you require," observed the ready tool.

"That done, I will give you further instructions."

Mr. Styles reflected some minutes before giving his unqualified adherence to the proposal; not from any scruples of conscience—he was beyond such very vulgar prejudices—but simply because nothing had yet been uttered touching the recompence. Tampering with bills of exchange and robbery, were widely different affairs from leading a weak, excitable man into drunkenness, and exposing him in that state before his friends, in order to confirm the opinion they already entertained of his unworthiness.

"The risk will be considerable," he observed; "the law is dreadfully severe on breach of trust. You, who keep in the background, and have plenty of money, might easily escape its meshes; but they would prove quite strong enough in the event of discovery to entangle me."

"Proceed," said Carus.

"After the game is played—that is, if I should venture to play it," resumed the drunkard, "none but a fool would remain in England. I should fear even my shadow;—hesitate to take a glass, lest some unguarded word might betray me,—for liquor unlocks the tongue. I must have the means of retiring to America."

"You shall have them."

"And of remaining there."

"Certainly."

"By remaining, I mean living there comfortably," observed Mr. Styles.

"And I mean so too; for it would not be to my interest that you should continue in this country, or, once absent, ever return to it. The provision I intend for you is commensurate with the importance of the service I require. Hitherto I have found you faithful and intelligent in the execution of my orders: show but equal zeal in the execution of my present design, and my liberality shall keep pace with your deservings."

"But what is it," he added, recollecting the observations of the man on his arrival, "that you have discovered so deeply affecting me?"

"It concerns your uncle, Mr. Bently," replied the fellow.

"Indeed!"

"You were mighty curious to know where he went to in so mysterious a manner a few weeks since, without leaving his address even with that old fool Mangles."

"Can you inform me?" demanded the plotter, eagerly.

"Yes."

"Tell me at once. I feel——"

"Not so fast, Mr. Carus," interrupted his agent. "There is a certain little preliminary to be arranged first. Gratitude is all very well, but I trust no man's gratitude too far."

Carus Kearn perfectly understood what the "little preliminary" meant, and gave him five sovereigns more.

Styles turned them over in the palm of his hand with a half dissatisfied air, looked at the gentleman, and observed that the secret was honestly worth ten.

The sum necessary to make up the number was given to him.

"Now then," said the fellow, "I will speak out. Mr. Bently went to Jersey."

"Jersey!" repeated the nephew; "he has no commercial affairs there."

"No; but he has got a boy at school there," replied his informant.

Carus bounded from his seat at the intelligence, so completely had it taken him by surprise. Every variety of suspicion passed through his brain. Was his uncle privately married? Had he adopted any one? Or, worse than either, could it be his grandson?

"The intelligence is worth the ten pounds," he exclaimed. "Jersey! umph!"

Then he recollected the letters marked "Private," which had so puzzled Peter Mangles.

"Attend you to the instructions I have just given you," he said. "I will see to the last affair myself."

There was a peculiar concentration of the lip, and flashing of the deep-sunken eye, as the ruffian uttered the last words, which boded danger to the being who had thus suddenly crossed his path, especially should it prove to be the one his fears pointed out.

Mr. Styles, satisfied that he had made an excellent morning's work, withdrew.

"The idiot!" muttered Carus. "But age is ever weak; strong resolution dwells in manhood's vigour. It were folly to seek for it in the decline of life. My uncle cannot dream that I have obtained this clue, which I will follow as the bloodhound does the track; neither does he suspect me—so much the better. Whilst I work unseen I am safe."

The fool! Whilst indulging in this empty boast, little did he imagine that a hand he could not discern was directing the workings, even of his crimes, to an all-wise end, the benevolent one of Providence. Even had he felt and avowed its presence, Carus Kearn was now too far advanced in crime to retrace his footsteps.

For some time he meditated in silence on the discovery.

"It must be his grandson," he repeated several times in a tone of bitter mockery to himself. "This, then, explains his altered feeling and manner towards me. Can the Markhams know it? No; it is a secret he has guarded even from his confidant Peter Mangles: there is some comfort, even in that. He must have stolen the boy from his parents with the intention, no doubt, of bringing him up to succeed him in the firm, and making him his heir. His heir!" he repeated, with a bitter smile. "Never. I have sinned too deeply to let that prize escape me. When Rachel bestowed her hand upon my rival, I swore that her father's wealth at least should be mine. It was all that her perfidy had left to console me; and I'll keep my oath."

"Uncle, you are playing a dangerous part with me. It remains to see which is the most accomplished gamster; time will show who wins. At present the cards are in your hand; to-morrow may reverse the deal—throw the trumps into mine."

With these reflections, in which the words as well as the habits of the gambler were apparent, the speaker began to pace the floor of the chamber, plunged in a profound reverie. From time to time a sinister smile rested upon his saturnine countenance: it was when some fresh move in the desperate game he had been calculating, or additional chances of success, presented themselves to his feverish imagination.

Mr. Markham was seated in the counting-house at his books, whilst his partner went over the transactions of the week, when one of the junior clerks made his appearance and informed him that a man named Styles was in the outward office inquiring for him.

On hearing the name of his former associate in drunkenness, a deep blush overspread the cheek of George, and his first impulse was to decline seeing him, till, looking up, he detected the eyes of Mr. Thornton fixed earnestly upon him; and fearing that his motives might be misconstrued, he at once gave orders to admit him.

"Shall I leave you?" demanded the former; "the affair may be private."

"Certainly not," answered George, touched by the mark of confidence. "I have no secrets from you, my dear sir, to whom I owe so much. If you noticed any hesitation on my part to receive this unexpected visitor, it is on account of the past. He was my companion in the race of folly which so nearly ended in the destruction of every hope of life, and more than once I have been under obligations to him, which I shall gladly discharge."

There was a manly frankness in the explanation of the circumstances, which, by-the-by, the manufacturer was already perfectly acquainted with, that pleased him highly, and he remained; not from any doubt of the speaker's stability, but from another reason. He had heard Peter Mangles' opinion of the respectable person in question long before.

When Styles made his appearance, to the surprise of his former dupe, he was plainly but respectably dressed in a suit of black, cleanly shaved, and looking altogether so different from his former self, that George scarcely recognised him. Still a close observer might have detected a suspicious redness about the nose, and a certain watery look in the eye; in other respects, the make-up was complete.

Although the sight of the fellow recalled some of the most painful passages of his past life, Markham forced himself to shake hands with him.

"Thank you, sir," said the hypocrite, "your condescension is very grateful to me, considering the baseness, the madness of my past conduct."

"It is not for me to reproach you with that."

"You are very kind not to do so," continued the visitor. "I too have seen the folly of yielding to the love of drink: it nearly ruined me. But thank heaven," he added, emphatically, "I have overcome it."

"I do indeed congratulate you," exclaimed his former companion.

Mr. Thornton quietly looked on.

"I have been seeking employment everywhere, but in vain: men cast my former drunkenness in my teeth—true, I deserve it, deserve it richly—and refuse to give me a situation. What can I answer to their reproaches? I feel they are merited, and am dumb. It's a hard world for a man to retrieve himself in."

"It is indeed," mentally ejaculated George Markham; "without the unexampled devotion of my wife, and the friendship of Peter, I too should have found it so."

And he began to feel deeply interested.

"I therefore took the liberty of calling upon you," added the deceiver, "in the hope that you would give me a chance of redeeming the past by employing me. Not as a clerk," he added, "although, as you know, I write an excellent hand, and am quick at accounts; I cannot expect such confidence at first—but as messenger, porter, anything."

"You must speak to my partner," replied the man whom Styles, by this artfully-concocted story, so well calculated to work upon his feelings, was studying to betray: "I leave all such arrangements in his hands."

His visitor looked terribly disappointed, and began to suspect that he had not used cant enough, or that his artifice was seen through.

"My personal assistance," added the speaker, "you have a right to expect, and it shall not be withheld to aid you in the path you have chosen."

The hypocrite meekly thanked him.

Thus indirectly appealed to, Mr. Thornton felt that it was time for him to speak. With all his knowledge of the world, the drunkard's tale of reformation had made some impression upon him; and, if true, he resolved to serve him. Fortunately, he was one of those men who rarely act upon impulse. Experience taught him that it was unsafe.

"And how long," he demanded, "have you refrained from your former habit of drinking?"

"About six months, sir."

"And felt no inclination to return to it?"

"Very often, sir," replied Styles: "those who have never been the slave of the debasing vice, cannot imagine how strong are its fetters. They bind the heart and brain stronger than chains can bind the limbs. I have had fearful struggles and temptations, as I sat night after night in my solitary lodgings, thought of the company, the drink at the bar, and knew that I had the means in my pocket of indulging my sad passion. But I resisted."

George shuddered. He had really passed through the ordeal which the speaker so artfully described.

"How have you lived?" continued the merchant, pursuing his interrogatory.

"My poor old mother died, sir," said Styles, pretending to be deeply moved. "I believe it was her loss that brought me to reflection. After burying her, and selling her little furniture, a few pounds remained, and I lived upon them, but they are nearly gone."

"Mr. Markham," he added, after a pause, "knows that I used frequently to receive money from her: she had a life annuity."

George willingly confirmed this statement, which he believed, it being the explanation the speaker had invariably given him of his idle life, and liberality in treating him.

"You have already been in an office?" resumed Mr. Thornton.

"In Bently and Company's, sir."

"And lost your situation?"

"Through drunkenness, sir."

"Candid, at any rate," thought the gentleman.

"Can you obtain a character?" he added, speaking aloud.

"For honesty; yes, sir," answered Mr. Styles.

"My greatest enemies cannot accuse me of ever wronging my employers. For conduct, no."

"Whom do you designate as your enemies?"

"Mr. Kearn and Peter Mangles. It was through their representations that Mr. Bently discharged me."

True, I deserved it, but they might have given me another chance."

It was a clever stroke, coupling the names of Carus and the old clerk; in fact, so clever, that Mr. Thornton felt seriously inclined to believe him. Highly as he respected Peter's judgment and integrity, he knew how far anything approaching to dissipation might warp it and render him too severe—it was so unbusiness-like.

George's case was an exception to the old man's rule, and followed out perhaps the more perseveringly because it was the only one.

"Well, my man," said the senior partner, "as my friend Mr. Markham seems desirous of employing you, I have no doubt but we can find something for you to do."

Styles appeared all joy and gratitude: perhaps he was a little too profuse in words, for the speaker added—

"After due inquiries—"

"Oh, yes! certainly, sir."

"If I find there is nothing against you but your past dissipation—no dishonesty—we will see what can be done for you."

The emissary of Carus did not feel quite so confident of success as he had done.

"Call again in five days."

"Thank you, sir."

The hypocrite took up his well-brushed hat, which had a crape round it—Mr. Thornton noticed that it was quite new—and, bowing humbly, took his leave. As he quitted the counting-house, George Markham slipped some money into his hand.

"Do speak for me," whispered the fellow.

His dupe promised him that he would, for, with his still blind confidence in human nature, he doubted not the truth of his reformation. His partner entertained the same opinion, but it was an opinion only.

That night, on his return from the city, George found Peter Mangles, as usual, seated by the fireside, with little Mary on his knee, and Rachel preparing tea. So punctual had he become, that she knew almost to a minute when he would arrive.

"I have seen Styles," observed her husband, when the meal was nearly concluded.

Rachel trembled, not from doubt, but the name revived so many painful recollections in her heart. As for the clerk, he all but dropped his cup.

"Drunken rascal," he muttered.

"He was, my dear sir," replied his protégé, "but is now a reformed one."

"Don't believe a word of it," exclaimed Peter, vehemently. "A scheming, cunning, unprincipled, unbusiness like fellow. His petty-cash book was never right—I felt it never was; and yet, somehow, it was all but impossible to detect him."

"He has applied for a situation with us," said George.

His wife regarded him anxiously.

"Which you, of course, refused?" observed Mr. Mangles.

"No."

Peter groaned.

"I referred him to Mr. Thornton."

"Right," exclaimed his friend, "quite right, my dear boy. Could not have referred him to a better man. He won't take your partner in as easily as he might."

Here he paused, not liking to complete the sentence.

"As he might me," said Markham, smiling.

"Exactly so. You had always too much confidence in your fellow-creatures; not but that many of them are better than I once thought them. And what did Thornton say?—refused him, as a matter of course."

"No."

"No!" repeated Peter, his former uneasiness returning.

"He promised to inquire; and, if he found nothing against his honesty, and the tale of his reformation to be true, to give him a chance."

The old man sighed heavily.

"Your partner believes in his reformation?" he said.

"Yes."

"And you also?"

"I too."

"I can't, won't believe in it," replied Mr. Mangles; firmly. "I see it all. The fellow trusted to your gratitude—sympathy; and has trumped up a tale to impose upon you. That Thornton should have been such an idiot; but I'll talk him."

The last words were muttered to himself; and, shortly afterwards, the speaker took his leave, alleging that he had papers and accounts to look over; but instead of returning to his home at Blackheath, no sooner had he reached the street, than, buttoning up his greatcoat with a determined air, he called a cab.

"Where to, your honour?" demanded the man.

Peter did not know where to direct him, so little was he acquainted, even by name, with the usual haunts of vice in London. At last he recollected that the "Crown and Magpie," in Westminster, had been the scene of George Markham's, and his friend Styles', dissipation, and requested to be driven there.

On his way he examined the state of his finances—nine shillings and sevenpence.

"Fortunate," he thought, "that I am so well provided. Not often I bring so much cash out with me. It must be an expensive night, indeed, to spend it all."

Poor Peter, how little did he know the world!

CHAPTER XXVIII.

O that men should put an enemy in their mouths, to steal away their brains! that we should with joy, revel, pleasure, and applause, transform ourselves into beasts.

SHAKESPEARE.

Nothing but the strong affection that Peter Mangles entertained for Rachel and her daughter Mary would have urged him to the desperate step he had taken. The interest he felt in George Markham alone would not have induced him, for during his long residence in London he had never yet set foot in a public-house of the class of the "Crown and Magpie;" in fact, he regarded such places with a feeling of horror, as dangerous and unbusiness-like, and had as little idea of the society to be met with in them, as a City porter would have of the company at one of her Majesty's drawing-rooms.

In London, thousands, we are happy to say, may still be found who resemble him, who look upon life as a sacred trust, perform its duties conscientiously, and pursue the even tenor of their way silently and unostentatiously, without ever dreaming that there is anything either singular or meritorious in their conduct.

Society resembles a stream; the under-current will generally be found the clearest and the purest.

When the cab drew up, the old clerk stepped out with an air far less resolute than he had worn on entering it,—like an untried soldier, at the moment of action, he was not without certain, or rather uncertain, misgivings. First he regarded the gaudy parti-coloured lamp over the door, next the flaming gaslights in the window, then listened to the voices of those within, some loud in anger, others indulging in the maudlin sensibility produced by gin.

"Eighteenpence," said the driver, extending his hand to him.

"Perhaps you had better wait for me," replied his fare, hesitatingly, for he half repented his rashness.

The man eyed him for an instant—considered the respectability of his greatcoat, the quality of his well-brushed hat, and the green silk-umbrella Peter carried in his hand. Satisfied on these points, he touched his hat, to intimate that it was all right.

With desperate courage the old clerk pushed open the door, which a leathern strap held partially back, and entered the bar.

The landlady, decked out in her usual finery, was actively engaged in serving the numerous customers that thronged the place, consisting of the young of both sexes: boys just entering on a career of vice and dissipation, which they mistook for proofs of manhood, spirit, and independence; girls whose home was now the streets, and who could endure anything but the recollection of that earlier and better one they had abandoned, the home which recalled their girlhood's years—household love, hopes, and blighted promises; husbands and fathers, who had pale, anxious wives and hungry children waiting their return, wondering if they would bring them bread; gray-haired men, and women too, in whom all memory of the past and self-respect were equally a blank, who retained little of humanity save its form, and even that so sullied and degraded, one might have imagined the demon Drunkenness had taken up his abode in the ruin he had made. He glared through the portals of their eyes—was seen slumbering in some, in others appeared half drowned in listless apathy.

Peter Mangles looked hurriedly round him, for he had never mingled in such a scene before. Gathering courage, however, from the motives which had brought him to the place, he advanced to the counter, and raising his hat, asked timidly for a glass of ale.

There was a general titter at such an unusual display of politeness.

"Hot or cold?" demanded the woman, pretending to misunderstand him.

"Ale, if you please, madam."

The glass was filled.

"How much?"

"Twopence."

The old clerk took some halfpence, carefully screwed up in a piece of paper, from his pocket, and counted out the sum.

"I shall be very happy to drink your health, sir," observed a shabby genteel-looking fellow, who stood with his back to the wall, smoking a short pipe.

Peter expressed himself highly honoured, but never offered to call for anything.

"What is it to be in?" added the man, winking to those nearest to him.

"In anything you please."

"Brandy; hot and strong, missus," exclaimed the sponge.

It was mixed and passed to him by the landlady.

"A shilling," said the woman, without releasing her fingers from the glass.

Something more than a hint had to be given, before Peter could be made to comprehend that he was to pay for it, which he did at last, though somewhat reluctantly. He had not the slightest idea, when he gave his assent, that having his health drunk would be so expensive.

The words "Jolly green!" "Very 'ansome!" "A real gentleman!" fell upon his ears.

"Out for a lark," observed the gent he had treated, in a confidential tone; "so am I. Happy to have made your acquaintance. Shall we have a night of it? Up to everything."

Peter began to wish himself safe in the City, or in his cottage at Blackheath.

"Try a cigar? allow me to offer you one. Two of your best."

The landlady passed them over the counter.

"Dear me! I never smoke!" exclaimed his victim hastily, as the speaker thrust a genuine British Havannah into his hand.

"Smoke 'em for you," replied the fellow, taking it back, and preparing to light the other.

"Sixpence," said the woman.

Finding the money was not forthcoming, she repeated the demand.

"I never ordered them," observed the old man, timidly.

There was a general laugh, accompanied by the words, "Shabby!" "Turn him out!" "No gentleman!"

Peter, feeling as much confused as if he had committed some very questionable action, or detected an error in his accounts, hastened to pay the money.

"Cab-hire, brandy, cigars, three shillings and twopence," he mentally calculated; "bless me! I could have dined three days in the City for just one penny more."

Till that moment he had not the slightest idea that public-houses were such expensive places; and he no longer wondered at poor George having been ruined by them; but he was not the man to fall into a similar snare. Deducting the eighteenpence in which he stood indebted to the driver, he would have exactly six shillings and twopence left; so he wisely resolved to pull in before the worst of all embarrassments—a pecuniary one—stared him in the face.

Grasping his umbrella with desperate firmness, for the effort required considerable nerve, he advanced to the counter a second time, and, raising his hat—a politeness the landlady did not appear to appreciate—said in a very decided tone—

"You will not debit anything further that gentleman may order to my account, madam, if you please."

"What does he mean by 'debit'?" demanded the woman, with a stare.

"Won't stand sam any more!" shouted half a dozen voices.

"As you please," exclaimed the mistress of the house, shaking her ringlets with what was intended for an air of disdain.

Those who had not been treated pronounced Peter less of a fool than he appeared.

With a heavy heart the old man looked anxiously round him. Styles was not there, and he began to suspect that all he had endured had been in vain.

"Has the drunken rascal," he asked himself, "abstained from his usual haunts for one night on purpose to disappoint me?"

Determined that no amount of annoyance should drive him from his post, he took a seat on one of the benches under the window, and began leisurely sipping his glass of ale, which had hitherto remained untasted.

Finding that nothing more was to be sponged out of him, the gentleman who had so politely insisted on offering him a cigar, began to indulge in that peculiar style of conversation generally known by the name of "chaff." He commenced by delicately inquiring whether his maternal guardian was aware of the fact of his being out; asked the price of his hat; how much he had bought himself for, and what was his selling price.

It was all thrown away on Peter, who, in the natural simplicity of his character, never for an instant suspected the intention of the speaker to insult him. He only replied by a look of astonishment, mentally concluding that the fellow was either drunk or mad.

As it is not the first time we have introduced our readers to the bar of the "Crown and Magpie," they are perfectly aware that the company who frequented it could not strictly speaking be called select, unless in an inverse sense to the general acceptance of the word. On the present occasion it consisted of characters more than usually reckless and depraved.

It was a fortunate thing for the clerk that it was not criminal as well; but no violence was offered.

Finding the old man's patience more than a match for their impudence, his tormentors gradually ceased to pay attention to him, and he was left to occupy his seat under the gas-light in peace till another character appeared upon the scene, a negress, well known at the West End by the name Black Moll.

When sober the wretched creature was perfectly harmless; but, excited with drink, which many a well-dressed ruffian, who would have laughed had she asked for bread, frequently gave her, violent and dangerous, fierce as a tigress, her extraordinary strength making her a terror even to the police, who were but too well acquainted with her.

There was a loud shout when she made her appearance.

Peter began to suspect that he had fallen into very questionable society indeed, and wondered what the clerks would say could they see the cashier of the well-known firm of Bently and Company seated in front of the bar of the "Crown and Magpie," drinking beer; in the event of such an exposure he could never show his face on 'Change again—that would be impossible.

"Out of quod, Moll?" observed the man he had treated, or rather who had treated himself at his expense; "why, some one said as you had killed the peeler."

"I break him arm, dat was all," replied the negress.

"The unfeminine savage," mentally ejaculated Peter.

The woman began to look round the place in search of some one likely to treat her: the craving for the fiery stimulant she had so long been deprived of was strong. At last her eyes rested upon Peter Mangles, and she fixed him, as the glance of the rattlesnake is said to fascinate its intended victim, with terror.

"Good gracious! what can she mean by staring at me in that extraordinary manner?" exclaimed the old man.

The negress nodded, and Peter, in his bewilderment, imitated her, by nodding too.

There was a general laugh.

"You dear old gentleman," she said, "wid beautiful white head, you treat black lady to glass of gin?"

"No: go away, my good woman—go away!"

"Me drink your good heaf, sair."

Peter grasped the handle of his umbrella with increased firmness—he had paid for the compliment once already.

"Go it, Moll!" whispered a young fellow who was leaning against the bar; "I'll stand treat."

"You no give me gin?"

"Certainly not."

"Den you give me kiss!"

"A what?" ejaculated the horror-stricken clerk, starting to his feet.

The negress opened her arms and rushed towards him. Many a younger and bolder man would have acted as Peter did, under the circumstance. With an exclamation of terror and disgust, he sprang to the door of the bar, and bolted into the cab which had been waiting all the while for him.

"Shut the door—fasten it—don't let her come in," he shouted to the astonished driver, at the same time poking through the window at her with his umbrella.

The cabman knew the fury he had to deal with, when once her blood was up. Instead of descending to close the door, he wisely gave his horses the rein, and galloped off towards Parliament-street, followed by the loud cries of the negress and the still louder laugh of the spectators of the scene.

Having passed St. Margaret's church, the driver drew up.

"Where to?" he inquired.

His fare looked quite bewildered.

"What is yer game?" added the man.

Peter reflected that he should never succeed without an assistant; brave the horrors of the "Crown and Magpie" alone, he dared not.

"Drive me to some place," he said, "where we can speak in quiet."

The result of their conversation will be seen in the concluding portion of the chapter. Enough to say that the cabman suggested a means by which his fare might return to the public-house without the danger of exposing himself either to insult or recognition.

The parlour of the "Crown and Magpie" was frequented by a very different class of visitors from those who patronised the bar. They were less profitable as customers, perhaps, but, with one or two exceptions, far more regular and respectable, and consisted chiefly of petty tradesmen, several lawyers' clerks, a retired undertaker, the sexton of a neighbouring church, and the upper servants of the abbey dignitaries and families residing in the immediate locality.

Their president, for they had constituted themselves into a regular, or rather, irregular society, under the name of the "Crows," was a melancholy-looking little man, almost a dwarf, named Goran, who had been employed about the House of Commons for the last thirty years as porter. The opinions of this important personage on all political points were listened to with profound respect, and it was only natural they should be, considering that he had actually been spoken to both by Castlereagh and Sidmouth—though no one knew exactly upon what subject: it might have been the weather, or state affairs—had held the rein of the poet-minister George Canning's horse—recollected the Cato-street conspiracy, the trial of Queen Caroline, Catholic emancipation, the passing of the reform bill, and the destruction of the House of Lords.

In fact, Mr. Goran's melancholy might be dated from the last event. His most intimate friends had never seen him smile since. He had a private opinion respecting the origin of the fire, which he could not be brought fully to explain. When questioned closely upon the subject, his replies were either oracular or enigmatical; and, even to the present day, those deepest in his confidence, are in doubt whether he attributed it to accident, the suppression of the rotten boroughs, or the incendiary eloquence of the almost forgotten Cobbett and O'Connell.

On the night of Peter Mangles' visit to the "Crown and Magpie," the company in the parlour had mustered more than usually strong. An important wager of glasses round had been laid by Styles, that he would bring his landlord, a renegade "Crow," named Impey, who, since his marriage, had absented himself from their nightly meetings, back to his abandoned haunt.

For years the seceder had been one of the constant habitués of the place, the first to arrive and the last to depart; his retirement was a loss, a positive loss, for he sang a good song, and being well-to-do in the world, spent his money freely. In an unguarded hour, and most certainly without consulting his lodger, he had married his housekeeper, or rather his housekeeper had married him, for the luckless Benedict never comprehended exactly how it occurred, and we question if he ever will.

The change which a few mystical words and the passing of a ring over the not very delicate finger of the bride produced was a most remarkable one. The housekeeper had invariably welcomed her master when he returned home—no matter how late the hour, or in what state—with smiles, assisted him to draw off his boots, lit him to his room, bade him good night in a most cheerful voice, brought him a cup of green tea in the morning, and never once presumed to hint that she considered his conduct either unwise or dissipated. The wife, however, came to a very different conclusion: she spoke her mind not only with freedom but decision, and forbade him—absolutely forbade him to renew his visits to the "Crown and Magpie" again.

Somehow, the happy husband did not care to disobey her injunctions. There was a peculiar something in her tone and manner that—in short, till the night in question, he had resisted every attempt to withdraw him from the allegiance he had so lately sworn.

The appearance of Styles and his victim was welcomed by a general cawing—the Crows prided themselves on keeping up their character. Every one appeared delighted at seeing them, except the retired undertaker, who had lost his wager, and two strangers seated in a distant corner of the room, who were evidently at a loss to comprehend the scene.

One of these was a burly, jovial-looking man, with the unmistakable characteristics of a cab-driver. His companion wore a respectable, sober livery, and one of those peculiar little flaxen wigs, once sacred to coachmen, but now rarely seen, unless in very aristocratic families, and only then on state occasions; he had also a large shawl twisted loosely round his neck, concealing, it is to be presumed, the lower part of his face.

The arrival of the bridegroom and Styles was the signal for a brisk volley of witticisms, more or less refined, in which all but the parties we have just described heartily joined. Judging from their silence, they evidently wished to remain unnoticed.

The president, in a serious speech, proposed a vote of thanks to the bride from the society, for having given her husband a holiday; it was seconded by the retired undertaker, who slyly hinted that his esteemed brother Crow was a little henpecked—an insinuation which instantly brought Mr. Impey to his legs.

With great vehemence, in fact, far more than the occasion justified, he insisted that he was the most independent as well as the happiest of mortals, struck his waistcoat, and expressed himself particularly anxious to know whether any Crow thought him a man likely to be henpecked; and, after looking fiercely round him for a reply, which, of course, no one made, concluded by accusing himself of being a domestic Nero, a perfect tyrant, whose conjugal sceptre was made of iron.

"Hear, hear!" shouted Styles, vociferously, at the same time winking to those nearest to him.

The appearance of the waiter with a tray filled with glasses prevented further discussion; but before drinking them, a preliminary ceremony, which generally occasioned some mirth, and an additional expenditure, had to be gone through.

It was one of the rules of the society that on a member paying for glasses round, each Crow should sing the verse of a song, in which he compared himself, his trade, or profession to that highly decorous and respectable bird, or, failing, to pay a fine.

The president was the first to commence. His allusions, as a matter of course, were quite parliamentary.

Of the crows of the earth, with the crows of the air,
Your new-fangled statesman alone can compare:
Both indulge in high flights, and can see no disgrace
In feathering their nests in the very best place.

Caw! caw! caw!

As in duty bound, the verse of their distinguished president was received with acclamations. Without a moment's pause the brother next him was expected to take it up. It was the lawyer's clerk.

Of the crows of the earth, with the crows of the air,
O, the lawyer I'm sure may presume to compare,
For he dresses in black, and he preys on the weak,
And though minus his wings, he at least has his beak.

Caw! caw! caw!

A farmer-like looking man succeeded—although we shrewdly suspect that his acquaintance with fields was limited to those in Lincoln's-inn, and that the last lane he had visited had been Petticoat-lane.

Of the crows of the earth, with the crows of the air,
'Tis the farmer I think has best right to compare;
They are so much alike, and shall I tell you how?
Both the crow and the husbandman follow the plough.

Caw! caw! caw!

It was the bridegroom's turn next, and there was a storm of applause when he rose. Laying his hand upon his waistcoat, he bowed to express the intense gratification he felt, and commenced his tribute to the amusement of the evening:—

Of the crows of the earth, with the crows of the air,
Whilst the hen birds only can truly compare;
Whilst the hen birds must sit, keep their nest warm at home,
They spread their glad pinions at freedom to roam.

Caw! caw! caw!

The bravos had not half subsided, when the door of the parlour was thrown open, and a neatly-dressed, respectable little woman made her appearance. The countenance of the singer changed as he recognised her: evidently he would have preferred being anywhere else.

Fixing her keen gray eye with anything but a lovable expression upon him, she exclaimed in an angry tone—

"Impey, you fool, come home!"

After the boast her husband had made, it must be confessed that he cut rather a ridiculous figure. The domestic Nero, as he had styled himself, turned pale. The conjugal sceptre was proved to be of lath, instead of iron.

The laugh was terribly against him.

"Yes, certainly; presently, my love," he faltered.

"Presently won't do; you must come now."

There was no hesitation in the tone of the speaker; every word fell sharply and clearly from her lips; evidently a great domestic battle was on the eve of being decided.

"Something serious must have occurred, gentlemen; very serious," observed the husband.

"A fine!" exclaimed the president. "a fine!"

It was against the rules of the society to address or speak of the members but as the Crows.

"I vote that Mrs. Impey takes the chair!" shouted Styles.

The proposal was carried nem. con.

"A glass and pipe for the lady," added the proposer.

The words had no sooner escaped him than a vigorous slap of the face expressed the sense she entertained of the compliment.

Mr. Impey turned exceedingly pale, probably from anticipation.

"These are your fine friends, are they?" said his wife. "Let me hear of your ever setting foot in the 'nest,' as you call it, again, spending and wasting my property in drunkenness! Crows!" she repeated, in a tone of contempt: "you had better have called yourselves owls. How much longer am I to wait?" she added, in a peculiar tone. "Do you wish to exhaust all my patience?"

"Certainly not, my love," hastily ejaculated the unhappy Benedict.

Slowly he quitted his seat on the right hand of the president, and walked hesitatingly towards the door. No sooner did he approach within arm's length, than his wife took him by the arm, and led him from the parlour of the "Crown and Magpie" in triumph.

The exit was accompanied by a shout of derision, for which Mrs. Impey cared very little, for she had carried her point—withdrawn her husband from a society in which their humble means, home, comfort, and respectability must have been ultimately wrecked.

The remedy was as decided as the evil appeared pressing, and for once the end justified the means.

In the midst of the confusion which followed, the cabman and his companion in the respectable livery and coachman's wig escaped unnoticed.

It was past midnight when a cab drove up to the cottage on Blackheath. Mrs. Lawrence, the housekeeper, had been dreadfully alarmed. During the twenty years she had directed the household of Peter Mangles, he had never been absent to so late an hour before.

She considered the old clerk was growing dissipated; and the impression was confirmed when he walked into the little parlour with a gait and stare which would have produced a singular sensation in the City.

The driver followed him.

Peter opened his desk, and counted him down three sovereigns.

"Mad!" muttered the housekeeper; "decidedly mad!" as she carefully closed the door after the cabman.

Her master was in a very joyous humour. But it is not to be supposed the three glasses of gin and water he had been compelled to drink, to keep up appearances, had anything to do with it; most indignantly would he have repudiated such an idea.

"The world's at an end," added the woman; "he is singing."

She listened, and distinctly heard something about two crows, followed by "Caw! caw! caw!"

On her re-appearance in the parlour, Peter made an effort to recover himself. Taking the chamber candlestick in his hand, he regarded her earnestly.

"Mrs. Lawrence," he said, with great dignity, "I have a direction, a very particular direction, to give you."

"Certainly, sir."

"If a black lady should call for me in the morning, I am not at home to her."

"A what, sir?" demanded the housekeeper, very much shocked.

"A black lady."

"Very well, sir."

"In fact, I am never at home to her."

With this last observation he marched majestically out of the room; and, with the assistance of the banisters, walked up stairs, and bolted himself in his room—a precaution the housekeeper had never known him take before.

"Bless me!" exclaimed the bewildered Mrs. Lawrence, "if he is not singing again!"

She listened, and once more distinguished the words, "Caw! caw! caw!"

At the expiration of the time appointed, the penitent Mr. Styles made his re-appearance at the counting-house of Messrs. Thornton and Markham. He was received by the senior partner.

"I have made the necessary inquiries," observed the latter.

"You are very good, very good, indeed, sir," replied the deceiver, "to take so much trouble for a poor, friendless, but I hope thoroughly reformed man."

"There is nothing against your honesty," added the manufacturer.

"That I am sure of, sir. Neither Mr. Carus nor Peter Mangles, whom I look upon as my greatest enemy, can say a word against that."

"And but for one circumstance I should feel delighted to employ you. I cannot think of depriving the Crows of so valuable a member of their society."

The countenance of his visitor fell.

"Hypocrite!" exclaimed the speaker, "unblushing hypocrite, you are unmasked. Such fellows palsy the hand of charity, harden the heart, and almost justify the contempt which too many feel for the humanity we all share. You have played your stake and lost."

Without casting a look towards George Markham, the penitent Mr. Styles sneaked out of the counting-house.

"What am I to understand, my dear sir?" demanded the astonished partner.

"That you have escaped a snare," replied Mr. Thornton, shaking him by the hand: "the friendship of Peter Mangles has once more watched over you. It was the worst of all snares," he added, "for it was calculated to work your ruin through the best feeling of your nature—gratitude."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

A FEW weeks ago, while walking down the streets of one of our large towns, a working man, dressed in his fustian jacket, came up to me, and, after a little hesitation, said—"Excuse me, sir, but ar'n't you conductor of the ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER?" "Certainly," I answered, "I am connected with that journal." "Well," he said, "I wish you would give us an article on the Sunday question." "Indeed," I replied; "happy as I should be to do so, the FAMILY PAPER is not professing a religious publication, and I don't see how a controversial question could be introduced into its pages." "I am sure," he went on, "a few words in CASSELL'S PAPER about the Sabbath would do a world of good. It is not only as a religious, but as a social question that we ought to look at it; and if you could do something for us, I am sure it would be useful."

I must confess that this rather abrupt but earnest address from a working man who made no profession to religion, made rather a deep impression upon my mind. The request came from a person who perceived that a day of rest from toil was an advantage even in a physical, social, and civil sense; and when I reflected that the FAMILY PAPER embraces most subjects that can benefit and bless the family circle, I came to the conclusion that a few words on the day of rest could not be out of place.

First of all I looked at the command of Moses, and I found that the precept contained two parts:—First, It enjoined rest from labour; and, second, it directed that the day should be kept "holy to the Lord," or, as the word means, be devoted to religious exercises. I perceived, also, that the Jewish magistrate might punish any breach of the former part of the command, but that the other portion of the injunction was left chiefly to the conscience of the worshipper and the retribution of heaven.

I went a little further, and, looking at our species, I found that, according to Scripture and the general belief, this being, which we call man, consists of a body and a soul; that his body is common to him with animals, and is made up of nerves, muscles, &c.; and that this said body requires rest. I saw, also, that his mind was the only part of his nature which was capable of being moral, religious, or "holy"—for it would be as correct to talk of the piety of a horse or a worm as it would be to speak of the godliness of the mere animal frame of any human being. It is true that a person employs his body in a virtuous or a vicious manner, but then the virtue or the vice must exist in the soul—for, deprive him of a soul, and you hear no more of his morality or piety. Man, then, has a twofold nature—a body and soul; and that twofold nature has a twofold demand—his body requires rest, his soul needs "holiness." Without periodical rest, his physical frame will be exhausted before its time; and without holiness, or separation from sin, his soul will be debased with moral pollution. Now, it is worthy of especial notice that the twofold character of the fourth command is exactly adapted to the twofold nature of man—for it enjoins the necessary rest for his body, and directs him how to obtain purity, or holiness, for his soul.

The meaning of the English and Hebrew word

"Sabbath" is "rest." I saw an article in a daily paper, the other day, which asserted that "Sabbath" means "seven," but the writer, of course, had never looked into a Hebrew Bible or Lexicon, or else he would have known that he was misleading his readers. We have borrowed our word Sabbath from the Hebrew term for rest, and not from the Jewish numeral "seven," which, every schoolboy knows, is from a very different root. Rest from our worldly callings and pursuits is, then, the idea of the word Sabbath. "In the Sabbath," or in "the day of rest, thou shalt do no manner of work." This command recognised the great principle that the human frame requires cessation from toil at fixed periods, and also determined that this relaxation should take place every seventh day. It is a well known physiological fact that a certain portion of rest is essential to health. Hence we require sleep. Some anatomists tell us that it is during the hours of repose that the nutrition we derive from the assimilation of our food solidifies and becomes bona fide a part of our frame. Young sings:—

"Kind nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep!"

And not only sleep recreates us, but we all know the refreshment we receive, when weary, by sitting down or resting awhile from corporeal or mental toil. Every labour we undertake teaches us the importance of rest, and, therefore, the absolute need of a Sabbath if we would preserve our physical and mental health.

But, if rest is necessary, who was to settle how often the Sabbath should return? Most of the heathens had their holidays, which occurred at different intervals, and there is no doubt that these cessations from their various employments arose from the evident physical wants of the human frame. Some of them are said to have observed every fifth day, and others every tenth. The Romans divided every month irregularly into "calends," "nones," and "ides." According to the Scriptures, we are directed to rest every seventh day, and history, observation, and science have shown us that this is the period most adapted to the exigencies of our body. The French abolished their seventh-day Sabbaths, and had recourse to decades, or the observance of every tenth day, but the number of suicides, &c., that followed showed that they had made a great physical blunder. Instead of fifty-two Sabbaths or days of rest, they gave the labourer but thirty-six; and this robbery of the poor man of sixteen days of bodily repose was attended with the most fatal consequences, and our philosophical neighbours were glad to return to the seventh day. The observation of every fifth day would be too frequent, and would not give sufficient time for worldly pursuits, and therefore it is now generally admitted that a rest once every seventh day is a rule which approaches nearer to the golden mean than any other that has ever been devised.

This fact has now been fully established on physiological principles. I have conversed with several gentlemen and tradesmen who had much to do with horses, and they have all attested with one voice that, to rob the horse of his Sabbath or day of rest every seventh day, was a bad speculation, and invariably proved injurious to the health and vigour of the animal, and eventually shortened his life. We have also seen the sad effects on the human frame of neglecting the rest taught in the Scripture. Young men who were determined to be rich have become gray-headed at forty, and paralytic idiots at fifty. They were, so they said, too wise to waste the seventh day in repose; but, as a physical consequence, premature old age doomed them to keep every day as a Sabbath. The Jews were sent seventy years to Babylon, that during their captivity the land might enjoy its Sabbaths. And these modern worshippers of Mammon have, in like manner, paid back in weeks of disease, pain, and affliction a ruinous percentage on every Sabbath which they had stolen from that physical rest which nature demanded, and our Heavenly Father, out of love to our welfare, had benevolently enjoined.

In the large blue book, or parliamentary document, containing "The Evidence of the Committee of the House of Commons on the Sabbath Question," there are many striking facts stated by eminent medical men, showing that on physiological principles alone, men require the rest of the seventh day. They also asserted that dissipation, laborious exercise for pleasure, drinking and smoking in tea-gardens, &c. &c., prevent that physical rest which the body requires, and produce disease and premature old age and death. Some recommend dancing for Sabbath recreation; but the exertion would be so laborious as to interfere with the natural repose from toil which the animal part of our constitution needs. Many have died from dancing, and other violent exercises adopted for the purpose of recreation. When some of our countrymen and countrywomen, in Canton, were exerting themselves in a dance, the Chinese, who were looking on, observed that "the amusement was very good, but they wondered that the gentry did not employ their servants to do such hard work." It is a well-ascertained physical fact that the body requires rest once in seven days; and, therefore, even in the form of recreation, all hard labour and excessive exertion should be avoided.

On this point there is a striking passage in Exod. xxiii. 12: "Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest; that thine ox and thine ass may rest, and the son of thy handmaid and the stranger may be refreshed." This passage shows a tender regard for the body of the ox and the ass. These poor beasts could know nothing of the higher enjoyments of meditation on the character and works of God; of gratitude for divine mercy; of adoration and praise; or of the luxury of doing good to the bodies and souls of men; but their own bodies needed repose, and Jehovah, who made their frames, knew the extent of their physical vigour; the want of every nerve, muscle, and bone; the exhausting influence of continuous labour; and the recreative power of relaxation from toil to animals as well as to men; and therefore enjoined that "the ox and the ass should rest." And if beasts of burden, which have so much stronger and harder a frame than we, require a rest every seventh day, how much more needful is the Sabbath to the bodies of the human family. For we have a far more delicate structure than they; and, above all, we possess a mind whose thoughts, studies, cares, and anxieties make a large demand upon the brain, the nerves, the digestive organs, the heart, and the muscles; and hence the command above directed that "the son of the handmaid" (or servant-woman), "and also the stranger, should rest and be refreshed." There was danger that unjust and oppressive owners and masters would rob their animals and servants of the rest which their physical frames demanded; and, therefore, it was a part and parcel of the law of the land that animals, labourers, servants, and slaves, should have the Sabbath secured to them.

Here the power of the civil magistrate was confined to the mere body. There was no punishment for not going to the tabernacle, the temple, or the synagogue. The chief idea in the word rest, or Sabbath, was cessation from labour for animals and men; and it was left to the priests and the prophets to induce the people to spend the day religiously. For we need not say that mere relaxation from toil could not constitute the people virtuous; otherwise, we might talk of the piety of the ox or the ass. Rest from work is a passive sort of thing, which animals might enjoy; but religion, or "keeping the Sabbath holy to the Lord," is an active exercise, demanding the faculties, thoughts, affections, volitions, and words of intellectual and moral beings.

Some have intimated that to legislate concerning rest from labour every seventh day is to interfere with religion and the consciences of the people; but this is a great mistake; because, to make a law that our shops, factories, &c., shall be closed on the Sabbath, is no more a religious interference than the "Ten Hours Bill," or the statutes that regulate the duration of labour in the mines and factories, or that protect women and children of a certain age from being injured by excessive toil. The civil law concerning the Sabbath is merely a "Seventh Day Bill," as the factory enactment is a "Ten Hours Bill;" and they both rest on exactly the same principle, that labour, continued for too long a period, is destructive of the physical health of mankind. And as the man is left, after his ten hours' toil is over, to spend his leisure time as he pleases, so on the Sabbath the law does not tell any one how he shall occupy the day; it only demands that public works and shops should be stopped and closed, that men and beasts may rest.

We have heard a great deal of late of recreation for the working-classes on the Sabbath; but most of the advocates have wished to enslave one part of the community to minister to the gratification of the other. Here you have the slavery principle brought out in all its power. Legree boasted that he did not mind killing his slaves, because he profited thereby,—the overwork paid for the loss of life; and so in England, we are to have railway clerks, porters, stokers, drivers, and the superintendents of public works converted into white slaves, and sacrificed to give recreation to other members of the community. But the pretence is a hollow one, and sounds very much like the regard of Judas for the poor; for if there was a real wish to benefit the masses, why not carry them for nothing? Take away the contemplated profit, and we fear that most of the gentlemen who carry the bag would very soon forget their vaunted philanthropy. We would also suggest to our working friends that if one body of men and women are to be robbed of their right to a day of rest for the gain of their employers, there is reason to fear that other masters will soon make a similar demand, and require seven days' toil instead of six; and national slavery instead of national rest will be the result.

Most of those who would rob the poor man of his Sabbath, or who advocate Sabbath recreation, take it for granted that labourers and operatives should never have any recreation during the six days, but should be doomed to hard toil for ten, twelve, or fourteen hours on every working day. Hence there is no small degree of mercenariness in the proposition to turn the Sabbath into a day of work or secular pleasure. Let taxes be lowered, let all restrictions on trade be removed, let wages be just and equitable, and let the labourers and operatives adopt the great principles of temperance and economy; and then, without robbing themselves of the advantages of Sabbath rest and mental edification, they may have as many weekday holidays as they can reasonably desire. We do not belong to those morbid philanthropists who would doom every man and woman to labour like the galley slave for a certain number of hours a day, and never enjoy any relaxation from Monday morning until Saturday night. We maintain that this ought not to be necessary. We believe in "a good time coming;" and one of its characteristics shall be that toil shall be lightened by machinery, that the hours of labour shall be shortened, that remuneration for the work done shall be just and ample, and that, as a consequence, our operatives and peasants shall have time on the weekday for bodily recreation and mental culture.

England is the only country in Europe in which the word "home" is fully understood, and we owe this blessing to the Sabbath. This is the day of rest from toil, and the period of family gatherings. The father and mother, who, on other days, rise early and hasten to labour, on the day of rest remain with their families and bless their households. The dwelling of the labourer undergoes an entire change. The floor, the clothes, the furniture, and the faces and hands of all are clean; and, for one day every week, the house of the poor man seems to rival the mansions of the wealthy. There is no work nor bustle, and in the bosom of his family, the operative, every Sabbath day, is as free from toil and as happy as the prince. Abolish the day of rest, and England will lose its domestic bliss, and cease to understand the words "Home, sweet home."

Much is said of the corporeal and mental energy of the Anglo-Saxon race, as if there was only one blood in our veins; when, the fact is, we are the most mixed nation under heaven. We are Britons, Phenicians, Romans, and the compound of which Roman armies were made up, Saxons, Norwegians, Danes, Normans, Irish, Scotch, French, Germans, Jews, &c., &c., so that the English are an amalgam of humanity, so much so that a similar mixture of the races could hardly be found in any other kingdom upon the face of the globe; and, therefore, it is absurd to trace our energy to any one paternity. Still it must be owned that we are an enterprising people, and, of course, we owe no small portion of our strength and intrepidity to our nerves; and, we feel persuaded, that for our nervous and mental power we are mainly indebted to our Sabbaths, or days of rest. The bodily repose we have experienced, and the great, glorious, and invigorating truths we have heard every seventh day, have given us our corporeal and moral superiority, and our pre-eminence among the nations.

The Sabbath, or seventh day of rest, is, then, a great physical boon, demanded by nature, and commanded by nature's God. Every friend of the working classes must be anxious to see that the laws of the land secure to the labourer this divine right; and every Christian philanthropist must desire and strive that the rest from toil may be conducive to the mental and moral elevation of all ranks and conditions among us.

SHE stood by the washtub when her twenty-fifth birthday arrived. The hair, the lips, the eyes were not calculated to excite the heart. Five cross young ones were about the house crying—some breaking things and one urging the necessity of an immediate supply of food. She stopped in despair and sat down, and tears trickled down her once plump and ruddy cheek. Alas! Nancy, early marriages are not the thing. Better enjoy youth at home, and hold lovers at a proper distance until you have muscle, limb, and heart enough to face a frowning world and family. If a chap really cares for you, he can wait for two or three years, make presents, take you to concerts, and so on until the time comes. Early marriages and early cabbages are tender productions.

LOVE LEVELS ALL RANKS.

CHAPTER I.

Her cheek was pale and thinner
Than should be for one so young;
And her eyes on all my actions
With a mute observance hung.

LOCKLEY HALL.

A soft, golden June sunset bathed the whole country-side in a flood of radiance. The white pendant blossoms of the acacia and the delicate green of the just opened foliage were rippled by the low west wind beginning to stir among the tree-tops burdened by its freight of perfume stolen from the distant clover fields, the new mown hay, and the clustering roses—crimson, white, and blush-tinted—that hung around the unpainted cottage, nodded in at the windows, or disputed the outstanding trellises with honeysuckle, clematis, or hardy grape-vines—a wealth, a mass of blossoms, and tendrils, and emerald leaves.

A shy, slight child, at first sight neither plain nor attractive, looked out eagerly from the gateway down the road to the city, white with dust, and in its unshaded barrenness. Strange contrast to the nook of verdure which we have described. It seemed as if some miracle must have reclaimed this spot from the desolate common, covered by a crop of stunted weeds, and crossed in every direction with a network of footpaths or netted cart-tracks. A sluggish stream wound sullenly among them; a few cabins of miserable structure were scattered here and there, the only other human habitations within sight.

It was indeed a miracle of patient industry and forethought that had rescued this lovely home and the fertile gardens which surrounded it from what was once all desolate and barren. At first, a little patch of ground, scarcely an acre, was inclosed around an old country house long deserted, and falling into decay. All that remained of its former occupancy were the fine old trees that had shaded it, and which first attracted the Scotch gardener, Allen Palmer, in his search for a home. Here he settled for his experiment, renting the house and garden spot, and spending his little capital in repairs, and renovating the worn-out soil. His wife, like himself, frugal and industrious, shared his earlier toil. Night and morning dews, the heat of summer noonday, and the cold of early spring were alike unheeded until their home was their own, blossoming into the promise of its present luxuriance, and yielding a fair return for the original outlay.

One thing was against them: the market was so far off. It was the journey of a day to transport the vegetables thither, and dispose of them profitably; and the gardener could afford but two from every week without neglecting their culture. But they were earliest with spring delicacies, and latest with successions; so, in spite of this drawback, Allen Palmer had become a prosperous man.

His own frame had but developed and strengthened by the honest toil; but earlier hardships and the first few years of care and anxiety had stolen silently strength and health from his one friend and companion, his much loved, all-enduring wife. He did not dream how heavily the burden had fallen upon her till the crowning blessing of a child was given to them; and when, in his thankfulness, he thought life had nothing more to offer, he watched in vain for the old buoyancy of step and tone to return to the mother of his little one. She lived to hear the baby voice prattling to the birds and flowers, to guide its first tottering steps through the shaded alleys of the garden, and then left them both, isolated, as their lives had always been, dependent on each other for comfort and companionship.

An old servant was the only person Christy had seen besides her father for many years. When occasional visitors came, she ran away from the garden, her natural shyness heightened by this unusual seclusion, and hid, clinging to old Betsy's garments, until the intruder was gone. The evening was her delight. Then she sat on her father's knee, and smoothed his fair hair, silvery now upon the temples, or patted his rough, sunburnt cheek, and sang, and talked, and questioned him of her dead mother, or his old home, until he came to look upon her more as a loving friend than a child. The wild children of the cabins were no playfellows for her; the farm-houses were too far off to find companions there; but she was satisfied with her flowers and pets, and never knew what she lost in merriment, or what she escaped in coarse contact.

She could not always remain a child: following her father, or aiding old Betsy with her busy, helpful hands; and satisfied with the scraps of knowledge she gathered from the few old books that but for her would have lain dusty and undisturbed upon the window-sill. The gardener began to think of this; and to fall into long reveries of what might befall his orphan child when he should be taken away from her.

The thin, wistful face looked longer than usual for the trim market cart Christine could tell so far off. Twice she ran into the house to be sure there was nothing wanting on the supper-table she had arranged with her own hands, or to hasten old Betsy's preparations in the kitchen. And when the sober brown horse trotted slowly into view, Christine saw with a pang of disappointment that her father was not alone. She shrank back, hoping that the stranger was a wayfarer, and would pass on; but no. When the wheels passed by so closely that they brushed the hawthorn bush behind which she was hidden, she saw by a leathern valise and packages in the cart that, for the first time since her recollection, a visitor had come to stay at the cottage. She had watched for her father, and anticipated his coming, after a whole day of absence, so eagerly, that great hot tears of disappointment sprang to her eyes, and she sat down disconsolately on the ground, with her apron thrown over her face, sobbing harder and harder at fancied wrong and neglect, as minute after minute went by, and her father did not come to seek her. He had looked through every room, and wondered at her absence before he came to the door and called "Christy," the second time so imperatively that she dared not disobey. How she hated this stranger, whoever he was, as she walked slowly to the house, shutting her eyelids tight, every now and then, to shake the tears from her long lashes, to which they sprang again in spite of her resolution and her pride!

The room was just as she had left it: flowers everywhere that a nosegay could be placed, filling up the centre of the wide-mouthed fire-place, and reflected on the shining brasses over which they fell; on the little round table with its twisted legs and cloven feet in the corner; on the grandest piece of furniture in the room, called by Betsy a "secretary;" the drawers surmounted by a slanting desk, whose mysterious recesses and pigeon-holes were a wonder still to Christy when her father sat before it making out his accounts or arranging his few papers.

All was so neat, and fresh, and shining with cleanliness, and the supper-table looked so inviting, now that Betsy brought in fresh vegetables with their appetising odour, and the cold joint from yesterday's dinner, that the guest congratulated himself on the excellent quarters into which chance and the market cart had conveyed him, happily unconscious of the unfavourable scrutiny of the child standing in the doorway. He was seated in what had been her mother's chair—an offence in itself, for it was only very lately that Christy had ventured to occupy it, and always, when she did so, felt grander and more important than at any other time in her life, and held herself very straightly from all contact with the cushioned back and sides. But the stranger—what did he know of its sacredness?—loll'd back completely at his ease, and was surveying himself with evident complacency in the little oak-framed mirror between the windows, on which the last slanting sunlight fell.

"Who can he be?" thought Christy, waiting her father's reappearance from the stables, where he had gone to superintend personally the comfort of old Dobbin. "He's more like a picture in a book than my father, or John, or old Mr. Ronalds. How white his hands are! how his hair curls!—just as mine would if Betsy would not cut it off every time." And he was young, too, younger than any man she had ever seen; lithe and graceful in figure, but with pale features; and listless in attitude, as if suffering from ill health. He was, in fact, just recovering from a severe illness, and had been ordered to the country for a change of air, and total cessation of the studies which had so absorbed him as to make him forgetful that knowledge without health was unavailing. Strolling through the market in search of early fruit, all that his appetite craved, he encountered his old acquaintance, the gardener, who had served him with many a tasteful, if not choice bouquet; and, questioning him of lodgings, had proposed himself as guest, and as suddenly found the arrangement accepted.

It was plain to see that Allen Palmer liked his young acquaintance. Perhaps there was no other of all his chance customers whom he would have admitted to his little household. As it was, he turned a deaf ear to old Betsy's muttered wonderings, and ordered the only unoccupied room to be put in readiness for their visitor.

"But I never will like him, I don't care how long he stays," the child said, perversely, to herself, as she stood by her father's chair, later in the evening. The twilight was suddenly replaced by the unclouded splendour of the just risen moon, tracing the foliage across the window on the uncarpeted floor, and making the low room and its homely furniture picturesque. Her father's arm was around her; but he scarcely seemed to know it as he talked on and on as she had never heard him talk before. There was all her little news of the day still untold—the first blossoming of the white moss roses, the loss of a favourite chicken from her little brood, an undeserved lecture from the old servant to be deprecated, and still, for the first time in her recollection, a stranger absorbed all his thoughts. It was very hard; and she looked out into the garden, and the moonlight brought strange, sad thoughts, as it often did, of her unknown mother, and a yearning for sympathy and companionship which she had never felt before, and scarcely understood now, until she stole away to bed without a good-night kiss, for the first time in all her life, and cried herself to sleep.

Utterly miserable, as Christy determined to be at night, she had to confess herself quite resigned and even interested before the next day was over. She had been surprised into an acquaintance with Mr. Wiley while dusting and arranging his room—a task at which Betsy had set her as soon as he had gone out for a look over the garden with her father. It was in wonderful confusion, to be sure: clothes hanging on the high, slender bed-posts, and lying on the floor just as they had been pulled out of the open valise; drawing materials and toilet articles scattered about; and, greatest treasure of all, a pile of books tumbled down as heedlessly.

It was a very plain, unadorned chamber, low, as were all the rooms, with open rafters overhead, on which were deposited Betsy's accumulation of dried medicinal herbs, with thyme, and sage, and various other winter help to soups and dressings for the kitchen. The one window had no curtain save the drooping branches of a weeping willow and one adventurous spray of climbing roses, just now flushed with buds and blossoms. But the busy little hands did their best. The bed, with its blue and white counterpane, was straightened into most tidy precision, the clothes gathered together on a single chair for Betsy's longer arms to dispose of; but then came the temptation—lifting those enticing volumes to place in the window seat, the only bookshelf the cottage could boast of. Christy opened one and another, skimmed a page of this and a verse of that, until, absorbed in the rhyme of the "Ancient Mariner," she sat with her head bent down on her hands, leaning over the book, and the short waves of fair hair shading her large gray eyes, lighted by the wonderful interest of the story.

Her face flushed into positive beauty for a moment as she looked up with a startled, appealing glance to find Mr. Wiley quietly seated, and watching her from the foot of the bed. She had heard the footsteps, but, thinking it only the old servant come to chide her for her idleness, sat still, spell-bound, by the legend.

Shame and timidity struggled together as she sprang up, and would have escaped from the room, had he not seized her hands and held her fast a prisoner before him.

"And so you read Coleridge," he said, "and Shelley too, perhaps. Why, what a wonderful little maiden! Who taught you to like poetry? Oh, no! I can't let you go yet awhile." And after a time she ceased to struggle, and stood passively, while his soft hand brushed the hair back from her face as a woman might have done.

Christy never exactly understood how it came about, but she ceased to think he was so formidable, though a certain wholesome awe never quite departed, and she was soon showing him the flower-garden, and making him the recipient of yesterday's still unuttered news instead of her father, who certainly did not deserve it, she thought.

That evening she listened to the conversation instead of watching the moonlight, although it was not of the subjects she liked best. She could not understand all they said about railroads, and real estate, and the greatly-increased value of her father's land if it could only be brought nearer to the market.

But it was pleasant to see her father so interested, instead of falling asleep in his chair, as he so often did in the evenings, and to hear Mr. Wiley's pleasant voice, and watch his face, knowing that he could not see her for the shadow in which she sat.

A whole host of new pleasures was suddenly opened to the child, young in heart and experience rather than in years, for she had passed her thirteenth birthday. Almost incapable of exertion as the convalescent felt himself to be; talking to this little maiden, with her strange fancies and sometimes startling thoughts, was the occupation that best suited him. He gave her free access to his books, and wondered at her choice among them, and the avidity with which she read and comprehended. He took long strolls over the uninviting common with her by his side, silently holding by his hand, if he had fallen into a reverie of the glorious career he would carve out for himself, of the fame, and fortune, and the love he was sure to win. So said young, untried enthusiasm, leaping over all intervening obstacles, with the largest faith in the future. Or if he chatted to her, that was more delightful still. He told her of books she must read when she grew older, of pictures that she would learn to understand if she could see them, of the actual world beyond this narrow life which now seemed bounded and obscured, until she began to wonder if it would always be thus, or whether she should some day see, and hear, and learn for herself.

"Have you never been to the great town?" Mr. Wiley said, one evening, in answer to some such half-revealed aspirations. "Never! and within seven miles of its roar and confusion! Would you like to go some day?"

"Oh, yes, very much!" and the child's heart gave a great bound, but as suddenly sunk again. "With you, I mean. I should not be afraid then, I think."

"Less afraid with me than your father, Christy?"

"But he would be so busy, he could not attend to me, you know."

"Well, you shall go, little one. I may have to be there myself to-morrow; but I dread it—ugh!" and he shrugged his shoulders at the thought of encountering the heat, and dust, and turmoil of town life, even for a day.

The gardener exclaimed, and pondered for a moment over the proposition—"But if Mr. Wiley was so good as to be troubled with the child, he saw no reason to say nay;" and Christine ran headlong to the kitchen to communicate the wonderful news to Betsy.

(To be concluded in our next.)

MERCHANT GOLD

Gold, red gold, is a merchant old,
And from manhood's dawn has bought and sold.
In every country and every clime,
The products and trophies of workman Time.
The broad, round world is his ledger page—
His invoices are of every age,
Nor breathes there a being who does not hold
The "promise to pay" of Merchant Gold.

The maiden who sits in her lonely bower,
And waits, heart-broken, the nuptial hour,
When merry bells, amid pomp and pride,
Shall ring to honour the rich man's bride—
Though he is not present she loves so well,
To look a long and last "farewell,"
Is she not bargained for? Is she not sold
To the selfish trader, Merchant Gold?

The miser who steals, at the dead of night,
To count and gloat o'er his treasures bright—
Who, while others riot in lust or sleep
Adds something more to his shining heap—
Whose priest, whose God, whose law divine,
Is the yellow ore of the mint and mine,
Is he not bargained for? Is he not sold
To the cunning trader, Merchant Gold?

Feelings and friendships, love and truth,
Honour and virtue, age and youth,
Creeds and craftsman, senates and kings,
Down to the meanest of human things—
Body and spirit, matter and mind,
Must go in their turns to "raise the wind."
For all are bargained for!—all are sold
To the ruthless trader, Merchant Gold.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR DE LACY EVANS, G.C.B., M.P.

In the House of Commons as well as in the field of battle the subject of our sketch has done good service, and throughout his lengthened career has fairly won a reputation for consistency of character, and for staunch unflinching adherence to the principles which he has adopted.

Sir De Lacy Evans was born in 1787, and was a native of Ireland. He began his military life in 1807, and his first campaign was in India, where he took part in the operations against Ameer Khan. In 1810 he joined the Peninsular army, under Wellington, and took part in all the principal actions; gaining some distinction by his readiness to undertake any duty that was unusually dangerous, or that required caution as well as courage to accomplish. At Hornazo he was wounded; and at Toulouse he had a horse shot under him. Leaving the army of Wellington in 1814, he proceeded to the United States—war was then raging between England and America—where he rendered essential service to the British arms. Not content with fighting on shore, with leading a storming party to the House of Congress, and with having two horses shot under him at Blandensburg, he volunteered to serve with the boats' crews to board and capture the American war sloops off New Orleans, and did good service in that hazardous enterprise. At the attack on New Orleans he was twice severely wounded; but notwithstanding this, when the war broke out again in Europe, he rejoined Wellington's army and fought at Quatre Bras and Waterloo, having two more horses killed under him in the fray. He subsequently served on the staff at the occupation of Paris; and finally, the war being over, and the piping times of peace returned, he came back to England and looked about him for fresh adventures.

"If it be a sin to covet honour,
He was the most offending soul alive."

The beginning of the reign of William IV afforded an excellent opportunity for a parliamentary campaign. There was a fierce battle raging in the senate; the whole country was stirred into activity; the cry for reform was heard from one end of the land to the other; and Evans was drawn from retirement, and came before the world as a popular candidate, a thorough-going liberal, and a radical reformer.

In 1831 De Lacy Evans sat for Rye; in 1833 he successfully contested Westminster with Hobhouse, who, to afford his constituents an opportunity of expressing their sentiments on his conduct, had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

In May, 1835, there was an application made on behalf of the youthful Queen of Spain to the British government for raising an auxiliary force to the Spanish army. The army, under the name of the Spanish Legion, was to be employed against Don Carlos, and in the cause of the Queen and the Queen-mother; or, in the opinion of the gallant general, for the support of freedom and constitutional government against absolutism. The army was raised, and the command offered to Evans. With the consent of his constituents he accepted the offer, but soon found himself involved in many serious difficulties. It was hard to induce men to enlist—many of those who had been enlisted were in as bad a condition as the recruits of Falstaff; officers were not willing to accept commissions, and the cause in defence of which the "Legion" had been raised was inimical to the feelings of a powerful party in England. At a later period Evans declared in parliament, that of the entire force, amounting nearly to 10,000 men, there were not more than a hundred who were not too young or too old for service.

With this inefficient army Evans landed in Spain. At Bilbao they saved Espaleta from destruction; and in outpost duty accomplished much more than could have been anticipated from troops so hastily gathered and so imperfectly drilled. The victory of San Sebastian was another proof of the intrepidity of this little army, and the skill, as well as courage of its general. "Whatever may have been the losses you have sustained," wrote Count Harsippe, an old general of the Empire, "the results of this engagement reflect the highest honour on the English soldiers, and above all on the officers who have given such brilliant proofs of devotion and intrepidity."

The victory of San Sebastian was followed by further successes over the Carlists. Reverses afterwards took place, but not a single trophy was ever taken from the Legion. In victory or defeat the men behaved admirably. The capture of Hernani by escalade, the storming of Irun, and the capitulation of Fontarabia, were the last important services rendered by the Legion to the Spanish government—"a government which starved it, and which, after its term of service was completed, withheld from its members the reward which they had earned with their blood."

On his return to England, General Evans vindicated in parliament his conduct; charges having been brought against him during his absence. He received from his sovereign the Cross of Commander of the Bath; and from the Spanish government the Grand Crosses of St. Ferdinand and Charles. Better than any honour which royalty could bestow, was fame which he had fairly won in the sight of Europe, and which the English were not unwilling to acknowledge.

He was returned again a member for Westminster in 1846, again in 1852, and again at the last election.

General Evans served in the Crimea. He gallantly led one of the leading divisions up the heights of Alma in the midst of a storm of grape and shell, and was wounded in that dashing exploit. During the siege of Sebastopol, Evans's division was attacked by the Russians, but the attack was bravely and effectually repulsed. Lord Raglan, in reporting on this affair, declared that he could not too highly praise the manner in which the attack had been met, and that nothing could have been better managed. At the time of the battle of Inkermann, Evans, worn down by sickness, was on board ship preparatory to returning home, and General Penefather held command of his division. On hearing that fighting was going on, General Evans insisted upon landing, not to win the honour of victory from his brother officer, but to assist him by his friendly counsel. Shortly after this he returned to his home. His reception in the House of Commons was enthusiastic. He received the public thanks of that body from the Speaker. Honours fell thick upon him. He received the Crimean medal, the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour, was created G.C.B. and D.C.L., and most, and best of all, had the pleasure of knowing that he had faithfully discharged the duties intrusted to him, and had fairly won the reward.

THE GRAND VIZIER DIRECTING THE ASSAULT ON RHODES.

THE SIEGE OF RHODES.—III.

DISAPPOINTED in his expectations of reducing Rhodes by an attack on the castle of St. Nicholas, and in gratifying his rage against the grand master, the sultan's vizier resolved to change his tactics, and assault the city on its weakest side. The most unprotected part of Rhodes was that of the Jewish sojourners. The battlemented wall was of little more use than a canvas fortification; it certainly could not withstand a vigorous attack. The Turkish army, once within the city, would easily accomplish its subjugation, and the sea nest of these knights of Jerusalem would be spoiled by Moslem hands. With this purpose in view, Missah attacked Rhodes in flank, and his artillery soon began to tell on the frail defences of the Jewish quarter. The attack was so sudden and apparently so successful, that the soldiers on the walls were ready to capitulate, and thus save their lives at the cost of their honour. The grand master was informed of the imminent danger which impended, and, hastening to the threatened position, besought his men to remain faithful to their duty. Displaying the flag of the order he called upon the knights to follow his example, and, rather than submit to the infidels, to perish under the walls of the city.

The accompanying illustration is from Caoursin's manuscript. The grand vizier is standing near his tent, surrounded by his principal officers, watching the progress of the siege. The Turkish bowmen are harassing the enemy with their bolts, while behind are seen numerous batteries of artillery directed against the walls of the city. The assault has commenced. The knights on the ramparts are answering the fire of their assailants. On one of the towers at the front is seen the grand master in a suit of complete mail; he is followed by some of the knights of the order bearing their sacred standard, and animating the courage of the people. The field on the Turkish side is strewn with dead, and indicates the steady, unerring fire of the besieged.

This daring assault on Rhodes brought to a close the memorable siege. It covered with shame and confusion the boasted invincibility of Mahomet II., and conferred immortality on the name of Aulus.

Enraged at the defeat of his army, the passion of the sultan knew no bounds; he solemnly swore utterly to destroy Rhodes, not leaving one stone upon another, not sparing age or sex, but leaving the city a desolate ruin, without a dog to howl for the dead. An army of three hundred thousand men was rapidly assembled. The sultan placed himself at the head of his troops, and began his march through Natolia. At Teggair Tzair he was attacked with colic, and, notwithstanding every remedy which the medical knowledge of his age afforded, died on the 3rd of May, 1481. His remains were conveyed to Constantinople, the projected invasion given up, and the prince who had conquered two empires, twelve kingdoms, and more than three hundred cities, gave orders that his epitaph should consist of these simple words: "I PROPOSED TO MYSELF THE CONQUEST OF RHODES AND THE SURJUGATION OF ITALY."

CHAPTER XLVI.

BLUE SKY IN THE AFTERNOON.

"WILLIAM DUCKETT," said Mr. Church, immediately rising again after he and the court had gained breath.

And once more corridors and lobbies echoed with the witness's name.

William Duckett probably never heard his patronymic pronounced by so many important people in so short a space of time.

"I believe," said the counsel, when the witness had pushed his way through and been sworn, "I believe that you are a page at a house in Leicester-square?"

And Hugh mentioned the number, and further ascertained that Duckett was there in service on the day in question.

Duckett was a lad in buttons, of about fifteen or sixteen.

"You know the billiard-room in that house?"

"Yes, sir."

"How many doors are there in that room?"

"There are two."

"One leading on to the staircase?"

"Yes."

"Where does the other lead to?"

"Into the dressing-closet."

"Just so—into the dressing-closet."

"Now, has the dressing-closet two doors?"

"Yes, sir."

"The one into the billiard-room just mentioned."

Where does the other dressing-closet door open into?"

"On to another staircase."

"On to another staircase; I thought so."

"Now, just tell us, William: have you any business with that dressing-closet? have you anything to do there?"

"Oh, yes! to keep it in order—change the towels, and so on."

"Change the towels, and so on," repeated Mr. Church.

"Now, I want you," he went on, "to carry your mind back to the day in question, the—th of —, and just tell us whether you went into the dressing-closet at any time on that evening?"

"No, sir, I never went in."

"Now, just recollect, be careful."

"I never went in; I went to the door, sir, and I was going in."

"Ah! just so; you were going in."

"But I saw a gentleman there; and I then turned back."

"You saw a gentleman there; and you then turned back. Now, did you know that gentleman: did you know him by name?"

"Oh, yes, very well."

"Now, who was that gentleman?"

"Mr. Swillman."

"How long before you went to the door of the dressing-closet had you been in the billiard-room?"

"The billiard-room?"

"Yes."

"Not five minutes before, I'd been in to see to the fires; and gone down, and up the other staircase."

"Now, when you were in the billiard-room, at that time, who was there?"

"Mr. Latson was asleep on the sofa, and Mr. Swillman was standing looking out of the window."

"That, you are perfectly sure of?"

"I am."

"Well, now, when you afterwards saw Mr. Swillman in the dressing-closet, had you time to see what he was doing?"

"I saw that he was taking something out of a book."

"Could you see what sort of a book it was?"

"I could only see that it was a light-leathered book. The time was so short: it was only a moment."

"Of course—I know—I want you not to state a single thing you are not perfectly certain about. It was a light-leather book was it?"

"Now, could you tell whether it was like a memorandum?"

"Now, really," said Fotheringay, jumping up, "my lord, I protest against words being put into the witness's mouth, like—"

"Well, well," said Mr. Church, "could you tell at all what sort of a book it was?"

"No, I can't say I was there long enough."

"Quite right—quite right."

"Have you ever seen Mr. Swillman's pocket-book?"

"Oh, yes, often,—scores of times."

"When you have seen it, was that a dark-leathered, or a light-leathered pocket-book?"

"Quite dark."

"And you are sure that the book in the dressing-closet was a light one?"

"Quite sure."

"Now, did you observe anything particular in Mr. Swillman's movement or manner when you took him by surprise?"

"Surprise!" cried Mr. Fotheringay—"who said anything about 'surprise'? Pray, let us have a speech all by itself, and the evidence all by itself; but don't inflict a speech upon the jury, and then call it evidence. 'Surprise,' indeed!"

"Well," said Hugh, "I beg your pardon. Then we'll say, William, to please the learned counsel, when you took yourself by surprise, was there anything particular in the gentleman's conduct?"

And the court tittered.

"No, I can't say that there was."

"You can't say whether he moved, or did anything at all, on account of your opening the door?"

"On account!"—there you are again. What does the boy know about 'account'? Was he inside Swillman?"

"You may ask, Mr. Church," said his lordship, "whether he saw the gentleman do anything; but surely the lad can't tell us why he did it."

"That was all I meant, my lord, only my learned friend is rather sharp upon me this morning."

"Did you observe any particular movement in Mr. Swillman, just at the moment of your entering the room—the dressing-closet?"

"Yes! he started, and put the book under his coat-breast."

"You saw that,—you had time to see that?"

"I had. I thought he was entering a bet, and didn't—"

"Never mind what you thought. Did you see anything else in Mr. Swillman's hand beside the book?"

"No."

"Nothing whatever."

"Very well, and that is all you saw him do; start, and put the book under his coat? Now, could you tell us whether the book in his hand was anything like that?"

And Mr. Church held up to the witness, Claude's pocket-book, which appeared to be nearly a new one, and was of Russia-leather.

"It was that sort of colour; but I couldn't say it was that book."

"Of course not. But the colour was like the colour of this?"

"Yes, it was."

Then Mr. Church sat down.

And Duckett was subjected to a vigorous cross-examination by Mr. Fotheringay. But the main facts were left untouched.

Hugh again addressed the jury, urging over again the points he had taken up before, and commenting timidly on the evidence of Duckett, as he would be likely to do.

Fotheringay replied, on the whole case, and the judge summed up—with all respect be it said—but it is not many a summing up, on a criminal trial, that throws much light upon the case, or greatly assists the jury. Now and then, when the judge is a clear and logical speaker, one sees a sophism cleared away, and little half-concealed facts brought into prominence; but the see-saw style so often adopted, "If you think so," and "if you don't think so and so," and "if, on the other hand, you should be of opinion," &c., all this is very wearisome to a layman, and, we should think, worse than wearisome to a jurymen.

In the present case, there was more than the usual amount of service done by the summing up; but the leaning of the judge was clearly towards a conviction.

He concluded in the following words:—

"You have, then, gentlemen, these conflicting testimonies to weigh in your minds against each other. And I am sure you will weigh them carefully, solemnly, and under a recollection of the oaths you have taken."

"You have the undenied fact that the prisoner uttered the bill bearing the forged name. You have very little indeed to prove to you that the witness Swillman knew anything of the prisoner's relations. You have no sufficient motive before you—none has been offered—for so base an act as the defence suggests, except, that these two men had never agreed. It will be for you to say whether that circumstance renders it probable that the witness Swillman would forge this signature, and so think to compass the destruction of the prisoner. As to the fact that Swillman turns out to be an alias for Lord Blinmore, I need not remind you that that has really nothing to do with the case; for a man's character may be of the very worst description, in some respects, and yet not be the malicious, the fearfully malicious, character imputed here to this witness. Well, then, you have the evidence of the page, Duckett. Gentlemen, it is for you to say how much importance you will attach to that evidence, even if you believe it. For after all, what does it amount to? Merely to this—that Swillman had a book, something like the prisoner's pocket-book, in the dressing-closet of that gambling-house. It is for you, not for me, to say whether you believe it proved to your satisfaction that that book was the prisoner's; or, rather, whether it creates in your mind such a reasonable doubt as that you cannot convict the prisoner. That is entirely a question for you."

"But, gentlemen, it is my duty to remind you of the source whence that evidence of Duckett's proceeds. Here is a house that is daily and nightly breaking the law of the land. You will, I think, look with some caution on anything that comes from so suspicious a quarter. I never lose the opportunity of making this remark from the bench, and I make it now,—that wilful law-breakers are bad witnesses. I don't mean to say that this lad must necessarily tell lies because he is a servant in an illegal house; but you will remember his calling, you will remember how far money goes within those four walls; and you will say whether, even if Duckett's testimony had been more important than it seems to me to be, you could give such weight to it as to cancel, by its means, the whole of the evidence for the prosecution."

"Gentlemen, I confess it would have been most satisfactory to me, and no doubt to you also, if after the learned counsel had brought out the story about Swillman's suggestion to tamper with the racehorse, he had been able to show us, that the horse won the race after all. He has not done so. As the case stands, for anything we have heard, the horse was tampered with. And if so, you will say, whether that business brings any more discredit to the witness Lord Blinmore, than it does to the prisoner Latson. Whether the learned counsel exercised the wisest discretion in bringing out that affair, it is not for me to say."

"On the whole, gentlemen of the jury, this is, in my view of it, a most painful case. It is painful, if you believe Swillman, for then you have the son of one of the first gentlemen in the county of Wilts without an answer to the charge of forgery. It is painful, if you believe Duckett, and accept the case for the prisoner; for then you have a nobleman guilty of—perhaps, next to murder, the most diabolical cruelty that one man can visit on another."

"I trust that whatever may be the issue of this trial, the lessons of it will not be lost upon the crowds who have heard its details. Here is a warning, trumpet-tongued, against the vice of the gambler. Believe which side you will, this much is clear, that these two young men have been brought to what we see them this day, by the horrible fascination of the gaming-table."

Here Claude shook with fearful emotion, and covered his face with both hands.

"A hard life of labour, with dry bread to eat," pursued his lordship, "would probably be very willingly exchanged by either of these men at this moment for the wild courses that have brought them here before us; and well it might be."

"I now leave this difficult and momentous question for you to solve—Did the prisoner at the bar forge his uncle's name to that bill, and then utter it to pay that debt? or, did the witness Swillman, while Latson was asleep on the sofa, obtain possession of the bill and add Montgomery's name, to compass the prisoner's ruin by placing him in that dock? If you think the former, you will convict the prisoner. If you come to the other conclusion, or if the evidence for the defence has raised in your minds reasonable doubts, doubts that would prevent your acting in any of the ordinary affairs of life, then, gentlemen, your verdict will be 'Not guilty.'

And the court began to relieve itself from the long suspense, by a general breathing, and rustling, and low whispers.

Claude stood up and leaned forward over the dock, as if about to speak to his solicitor; but immediately changed his mind, and sat down again.

They are terrible moments, those, moments poised as if between life and death, when the twelve men begin to turn round and lay their heads together, obeying the clerk's charge—

"Gentlemen of the jury, consider your verdict!" In this case they expressed a wish to retire, and they retired.

Another jury was sworn, and another prisoner was put up—a poor girl of not more than eighteen, charged with the murder of her child.

Mr. Church had left the court.

Otherwise, here would have been a summons to jump the barriers of bar-fashion, even louder than the last!

The time for the court to rise is come, and the jury in the forgery case have never returned.

The judge sends for them.

"There is no chance, my lord, of our agreeing to a verdict. Seven of us are on one side, and five on the other."

"Well, gentlemen, I'm very sorry, but I've no alternative. You must remain in your room till you are agreed; and I will come down to the court to receive your verdict as soon as it is formed."

The next morning, on the opening of the court, the poor jurymen came in, jaded and worn out, but no verdict. One man still held out—nothing would move him.

Far on in the afternoon, in they came again.

A trial was interrupted by the clerk's rising, and by the universal buzz and hush of the spectators.

Latson is called and put up.

"Gentlemen of the jury, are you agreed upon your verdict? How say you—is the prisoner, Claude Blance Latson, guilty of the forgery for which he stands indicted, or not guilty?"

"We say that he is Not guilty."

"Your lordships," said Mr. Church, "will, probably, after that verdict, order the witness, Lord Blinmore, alias Swillman, into custody."

(But they had first of all to find Lord Blinmore—which they never did.)

And—in spite of judges and ushers and all—there immediately rose a shouting and stamping of feet, and a clapping of hands, which was never subdued till Claude was safe outside the dock, and went walking off, side by side, with his counsel and his half-brother.

CHAPTER XLVII.

SUNSET.

"Which way do you go, Mr. Latson?" asked Hugh, when the congratulations and the comments on the trial were over, as they walked along.

Claude looked away from his companion, and said nothing.

In a moment more, he staggered against a shop that they were passing, and fell heavily on the pavement.

He had walked from the court very feebly, and Hugh would have offered him his arm, had he dared to do it.

But this question, "Which way was he going?" was the last feather on Claude's burdened spirit, which fairly broke it down.

What "way" had the poor fellow to go?

He had quite looked to be arrested from twenty quarters, immediately on his discharge. He probably would have been, but that his creditors believed him to be safe enough for a long time to come.

"Who does he belong to?" said a great, strapping carter who had rushed from the road, and was lifting up Claude as if he had been a baby. "Was you with the gent, sir?" he said, turning to Church.

"Yes," said Hugh, "will you help to get him into a cab?"

And in less than half an hour, Claude was at the house in Hackney, and in a bed, the like of which he had long dismissed the hope of ever seeing again.

Poor fellow! as yet, he had not seen it, or, seeing it, he had not cared for it.

Claude was in the land of unconsciousness, to all appearance, for many days.

While Ruth—dear Mrs. Bliss—every one's comforter, and an ever-present nurse when wanted, slipped in and out of the room, and gave charges and directions to the nurse, and saw that his head lay comfortably on the pillow, and conversed, down stairs, with the doctor about his progress,—where was the mind of Claude Blance Latson wandering to?

Was it living any of the past over again,—the bitter, bitter past? Bitter in the nurseries of Latson Towers—bitter in the halls of Eton College—bitter in the ennui and the folly of other lands—how trebly bitter ever since!

Was Claude, lying there on his brother's bed, reckoning with his father for the heritage of woe he had bequeathed to his son?

Was he demanding sternly—who knows where?—why he ever was born, and what he had done to earn the heavy, heavy woe that had weighed him nearly down in the dock of the Criminal Old Court, and quite down in Cheapside, when he was asked where his home was?

Was that wandering mind (for, mark, they always say, in such cases, that the mind is wandering), learning strange secrets from lips which they about him could not see?

Was his mother with him?

Did he learn under whose roof he had been carried? and when he woke, had he any knowledge of the name of Joyce, or of the poor old Claymores, and what his father had to do with him?

And is it possible that one of his dreams may have been, that he who prayed, below, for the sick man, night and morning, had, years back, pronounced the marriage blessing on that other wretched union; and that he who had picked him up out of the street, was formerly "the little bundle" once cared for by the same gentle nurse he himself had, that day?

If his mind "wandered" among these things, he not surprised that Claude's breathing was very hard and loud, and that with great difficulty they kept him quietly in bed.

It was about a week after the long stupor had passed away, and when the invalid was lying very helpless and very pale, an altered man, on his brother's bed, that Ruth came in to see how he was, one evening after the tea-table had been cleared down stairs.

"I'm much, much better, thank you; but very weak, very weak."

"Of course—no doubt. But that will be cured by time, I hope."

"Mrs. Bliss," he answered, "I can never thank you—"

And here Claude broke down for a moment and stopped.

"—Never thank you and Mr. Church for all your great, great kindness. But, will you do me one more favour?"

"Gladly," said Ruth.

"Then, don't speak of my ever getting better. Don't wish it; and, as I know you pray, please not to pray for it. For, if you did, I know I should get better—"

"Mr. Latson!"

"I've not been in Newgate, or stood in that dock, Mrs. Bliss, without finding room for many, many thoughts—sad thoughts enough, Mrs. Bliss, but wholesome, very wholesome ones."

And Claude turned away from her again.

"I might—I should lose them, if I ever recovered."

"We won't talk of that now—not now, dear sir. Would you like me to read to you a little, to-night?"

"Very much," he said.

"What shall it be?"

"I daresay you have got 'The Pilgrim's Progress,' Mrs. Bliss?"

"Yes, oh yes,—would you like that?"

"It's many, many years since I read it," said Claude; "but there's something in the beginning about the burden, and about some one coming to Christian,—what was his name?"

"Evangelist!" Ruth said. "Yes, would you like that part?"

And while the sick man lay there with closed eyes, watching for the first syllable, Ruth seated herself at the foot of the bed, and began to read:—

"Now, I saw upon a time, when he was walking in the fields, that he was (as he was wont) reading in his book, and greatly distressed in his mind, and as he read he burst out, as he had done before, crying 'What shall I do to be saved?'"

"I saw also that he looked this way, and that way, as if he would run; yet he stood still, because, I perceived, he could not tell which way to go. I looked then and saw a man, named Evangelist, coming to him, who asked, 'Wherefore dost thou cry?'"

"He answered, 'Sir, I perceive by the book in my hand, that I am condemned to die, and after that to come to judgment, and I find that I am not willing to do the first, nor able to do the second.'"

And there the good creature sat, reading on to him, of Evangelist and the wicket-gate, and then, missing some parts, she went on to the place where the cross was, and where the burden fell from off Christian's shoulders.

Turning to look at the invalid, she saw that his eyes were directed full upon her, and that big tears were rolling down his cheeks; tears that he made no attempt to check or wipe away.

He had not wept over that story for more than thirty years.

"That cross is there still, is it not?" said Ruth. And Claude covered his eyes with his hands.

"There's no list, is there," he asked, "of Christian's sins?"

"It isn't necessary," the ministering angel answered. "The burden may be as heavy as it can be, it always falls off."

"Always?" he said.

"Always, always! It cannot stop where it is, when the pilgrim once comes up to the cross."

"If he has robbed his own father?"

"Yes."

"If every word he has uttered, almost, has been a lie?"

"Yes."

"If he has murdered his own nurse?" Claude said, smothering his face in the pillow.

"Whatever he has done!" said Ruth.

"Mrs. Bliss, can I ever get up to that place? It's very easy, now that I'm so ill and weak, for me to think of these things; but doesn't God know that if I were well again, and with plenty of money, began the world afresh, I should very likely go back to the City of Destruction?"

"Perhaps," she answered, very softly, and with a sweet smile, "that's the very reason why you will not be allowed to be well at present till the good work becomes stronger in you."

"Thank God!" said Claude. "Mrs. Bliss, did you ever pray with sick people?"

"Yes, sometimes. Shall I pray now?"

And when he had thanked her, from his very heart, and said "yes," she was beginning to kneel down by his side, when Hugh gently opened the door and came in.

"Would you like Mr. Church to pray?" Ruth asked.

"Very much, if he would be so good."

And then they, Ruth and Hugh, knelt down beside the bed, and Hugh prayed; prayed with far more heart, and far more true eloquence than when, some time back, he was pleading for the prisoner before only an earthly judge.

They had risen from their knees, when it was announced to Hugh that he was wanted down stairs.

While he was gone, Ruth followed up the conversation, and laboured to convince the sick man that whatever his life had been, there was enough of power in Divine love to pardon even him.

She had hard work; and she was the most pleased to find that she had.

For she could gather from the hints he dropped that Claude's had been no ordinary history, and she would have suspected the depth of his repentance if his hopes had come up bright and strong at once.

Presently Hugh gently opened the door, and was followed (almost too suddenly) by Ernest Montgomery.

Claude no sooner caught sight of his uncle than he went off into a kind of hysterical fit, followed by a long faint; and it was some time before he recovered himself sufficiently for them to tell him that Ernest would like to see him.

His uncle had no conception, of course, that he should find Claude there. He had only called on Mr. Church to show him the following letter, which was, at last, read to him softly in Ruth's gentle undertones at the side of the bed.

"On board ship —"

"Sir,—You can tell your nephew, when you see him, never to go to sleep again, when he comes to pay a debt, in a flash house. The fact is, I'm off into foreign parts to seek my fortune, and I may as well ease all your minds before I go. Latson's done about as many such things in his life, perhaps, as any man, and he therefore hasn't much reason to be proud. But his bigwig was quite right—'Ernest Montgomery' was done by the fist of

"Yours truly,
"BLINMORE."

"P.S. Any messages to the East? Because I'm not going there—I'm going West."

B." Claude heard this note without the smallest visible emotion, and when Hugh took his thin hand and pressed it in earnest congratulation, he returned the pressure for a moment, but immediately raised his other hand, as if in admonition, and said with great difficulty—

"Don't, don't. It's a mere accident—a mere accident. If my own father had chosen, he could have condemned me for the same thing. Yes, the same thing!"

And his sufferings became so threatening that, save Ruth, they presently left him alone.

They had not been gone down more than ten minutes when the bedroom bell rang violently, and both Ernest and Hugh were summoned back.

Years of wearing dissipation, and recently weeks and months of more wearing remorse, had done their work. They saw what Ruth had seen—that only moments measured now that highborn yet miserable life.

Ruth stood on one side and Ernest on the other, Hugh and the nurse, who had answered the bell, were at the foot.

Claude had fallen suddenly back while trying to tell Mrs. Bliss some wretched story in his wretched life. (It seemed to relieve him, that she should know what he had been.)

And when the gentlemen came in, his eyes were already fixed in the direction of the door, not looking for them, but looking, peradventure, on things no one present ever saw, ever imagined.

Ruth stooped down, and whispered—

"Can we do anything—are you lying quite easily?"

But he never moved, or showed that he understood her.

Ernest well knew the story of Ethel's life, and then of Ethel's death; and so, stooping down, said to the dying man—

"Your mother's Saviour is with you, now, I hope, dear Claude?"

He seemed to try to lift the fallen jaw, and bring his lips together; but he failed. They could tell he heard, for a moment's flush passed across the white cheek.

They stood, and watched, in solemn, reverent silence. It was an hour that seldom occurs.

Those scenes are commonly witnessed only by close kindred, whose sufferings are too wild, or too weighty, for the lessons of the spectacle ever to be fully learned.

Here, there was no near relationship, at least none that compelled deep affection, and therefore poignant sorrow.

They stood, and pitied, and prayed, and trembled at the sight, and grew wiser and better as they trembled.

Presently, he seemed to try to turn his head, and his hands slightly moved, as if he wanted something.

Ruth fancied he wanted her. She was right.

(You may never have noticed it, but we have, that the dying almost always seek, at the last moment, the soft and gentle services of feminine bystanders, if any be near them, as if in that great hour of need, nothing could take a mother's, or a sister's, or a wife's place. Ruth had most of the excellences of all three, and Claude was in search of Ruth.)

She bent down again close to him.

"Is the burden gone, dear Mr. Latson?" she whispered.

He only moved his fingers nervously within hers.

"Look, look, straight up at the cross! Will you try?"

There was a perfect smile, then, covering his entire face.

"Can you see it? Did Jesus die to take away your sins?"

And then he turned his eyes away from the door, and looked her full in the face. She almost started at the sight: it seemed like a resurrection.

But in a moment his glance was so bright, and so happy, that she burst into tears, as she leaned over him and said, clasping his hand in both of hers—

"Thank God!—thank God! He sees it! He sees the cross!"

"Do you think he does, really?" Hugh murmured.

And, as if he overheard the doubt, and couldn't go till he had dispelled it, Claude changed his look—still so happy—from Ruth to the foot of the bed.

And when, a few minutes later, Mr. Bliss, who had entered the room, and had his fingers on the pulse at the wrist, laid the hand down softly, and made that gesture, so well understood, that means, "All is over!" Claude's eyes were fixed, in their last gaze, "upon his brother" Hugh.

They buried him in the old city churchyard, not far from the grave where Ruth had laid her mother; and Mr. Bliss, with Hugh's concurrence, had this verse inscribed, under the dates of the tombstone, telling, in one sentence, both his ruin and his hope:—

"The wages of sin is Death; but the gift of God is Eternal Life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Joyce Latson's son—(how we love to write these two words together!)—is now in the very first rank of his profession. He has been offered a vice-chancellorship and one or two puisne judgeships, but he declined them; he looks higher, and every one says he has a right to do so. But if you were to ask for him in Chancery-lane, as Mr. Church, nobody would know who it was you wanted.

A distant relative and namesake of his father, who had heard the story of his birth from Marmaduke Bliss, has died and left him all he had, on condition that he took the name of Latson, which, with all the due form and ceremony (though he little needed them) he has now taken. If you want a very heavy case in Chancery conducted, and conducted as no other man at the bar can do it, you must retain Sir Hugh Church Latson.

Yes, and if you were to go down to Sharstone, in Norfolk, at the present time, and expect to see Miss Montgomery still doing what you last saw her doing for the poor sick villagers, carrying grapes by the side of the Lady Maude, who carried the jelly, again you would be disappointed. If you wish to see her, you must go to a house in one of the squares (all of which are exactly alike) about Bloomsbury, and inquire there if Lady Latson is at home—for your sake we hope she will be—for even Hugh does not deserve a better wife, and even he could not make her happier.

When last we had the joy of seeing Ruth Bliss—Well, it is not material, but we quite forget whether the last time was when we were looking about for the old slab in Soreby Churchyard, and were guided to it by seeing her standing near it, and leaning on her husband's arm, looking down upon it, sadly smiling. We quite forget whether this was before or after we came suddenly upon her, as we entered a cellar in Spitalfields, to visit a family where four members out of five were lying very ill with the worst form of typhus fever. Ruth was just kneeling down to pray with the mother.

We didn't disturb her, but knelt down too.

There were gray hairs on that dear brow, as we couldn't help seeing when we snatched a glimpse at her as she knelt and looked upward.

But they only made us feel the more confident as we said to ourselves, "God bless her! If any human prayer can help that sick woman, body or soul, Ruth's prayer will do it!"

As to the Sharstone Rectory, Maude has long since been converted to her husband's belief in the wisdom and justice of life's various ranks and stations. But, if she had still held her old opinions about the miseries of humble life, she could not have exerted herself more than she does every day to make those miseries fewer and fewer. She has a capital leader and helper in Ernest.

Ernest? She has now two Ernests. And it is matter of almost perfect indifference to their peaceful congregation whose turn it is to preach, the rector's or the curate's—the father's or the son's.

Indeed, they are so much alike, that we forget which of the two it was we heard, when last down in Norfolk, preach from this text—"Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap!"

THE END OF "LATSON."

[In No. 16 will appear the opening chapters of a truthfully descriptive and highly instructive tale, entitled, "Hope Evermore; or, Something to Do"—a tale of the Ragged Schools, illustrating the advantages of Temperance, by an author of high repute.]

RESIST TEMPTATION.—A very good lady had taken great pains to establish an infant or children's school upon a large scale, and had sent into the country a person who happened to be one of the Society of Friends, to collect money and apple-trees for the school garden. He called upon the narrator, and told him his double purpose. "Ah!" said my friend, "apple-trees! a very proper thing, and the poor little children will have nice apples to eat." "No friend," quoth Starch, "not to eat." "Oh! for puddings, then! better still—a very good plan." "No, 'tisn't for puddings neither, nor pies." "No?" said my friend: "what then?" "It is to teach them to resist temptation." "Oh! that is it, is it? To resist temptation!"

Chemical Experiments.

SOME PECULIAR CASES OF COMBUSTION

Artificial Will-o'-the-Wisp.—Occasionally may be seen, in marshes, burial-grounds, and other places where decaying animal matters abound, a faint, wavering light flickering about, and continually changing its position. It is called "Jack-o'-the-Lantern," or "Will-o'-the-Wisp," and consists of inflammable gaseous matters, which take fire immediately they come in contact with the atmosphere.

The Will-o'-the-wisp may be made artificially by either of the following processes. The first process is the easier of the two, but by adopting the second you can manufacture a Will-o'-the-wisp of quality so much superior that I advise you to incur the little extra trouble for the sake of doing so.

No. 1.—Procure at an operative chemist's some phosphuret of lime, otherwise called phosphuret of calcium, and with even greater propriety. In procuring the substance you had better state the purpose for which it is required, in order that there may be no mistake about it. If a few lumps of this material be thrown into a basin of warm water, bubbles of gas, called phosphuretted hydrogen gas, will ascend and take fire. The gas in question is either the very same that Will-o'-the-wisps are composed of, or almost the same. The next process, however, is by far the prettiest way of making artificial Will-o'-the-wisps.

No. 2.—Procure a little glass retort, of about a wineglass capacity, and having a neck large enough to admit a good-sized pea. Pass into the retort in question three or four lumps of phosphorus, each about the dimensions of a pea; completely fill the retort, neck and all, with potash solution, which you must ask for at the chemist's under the name of liquor potassæ, and when the retort is full to the very end of its stem, place your thumb upon it, and dip the beak of the retort into a basin into which other liquor potassæ has previously been poured. If the operations have been adroitly performed, the retort should not contain the slightest bubble of air. Supposing an air-bubble to be apparent, the retort should be again manipulated until such air-bubble no longer exists.

Preliminaries being thus arranged, apply the heat of a spirit lamp to the little retort. In this case, as in every other involving the application of heat to glass vessels, apply it not all at once, but gradually, by which precaution fracture of the glass vessel will be avoided.

Soon the phosphorus will be observed to melt, and gas being generated, will pervade the body of the retort, and subsequently its neck, driving the liquor potassæ before it. At length a bubble of gas escapes from the beak of the retort, and rising through the potash, both come into contact with the atmosphere. Immediately this happens the gas-bubble takes fire, and burns in a very fantastic manner, generating a number of beautiful smoke-rings, which rise aloft and hover in the atmosphere.

When the experiment has been prosecuted long enough, do not suddenly remove the beak of the retort from the bath into which it dips; the consequence of doing so would be to admit atmospheric air, and we have already seen that whenever atmospheric air comes in contact with the gas in question the result is combustion. Deal with the apparatus as follows:—Having allowed the retort to cool, plunge it, bath and all, into a pail of water. By turning the retort about in various directions under the surface of the water, the last remnant of gas can be dissipated safely, and the phosphorus washed out and stored away under water, to be used for other purposes.

Note well that, although, in performing the experiment just described, I have desired you to bring your fingers into contact with potash solution, which may be done without any evil consequences, yet potash solution is not a nice thing to touch with the naked skin more than is absolutely necessary. Prolonged contact with it would dissolve all the skin away, even to a denudation of the bone. Do not attempt the absurdity of handling glass apparatus with gloves, you will assuredly break your apparatus. One plunge of the fingers into liquor potassæ will do no harm, especially if you dip them into water immediately on withdrawal.

To make soap bubbles which explode like cannons.—Most people have heard about fire-damp—the explosive gas which infests coal mines. The gaseous explosive mixture we are about to prepare is a sort of fire-damp, but, measure for measure, it is considerably stronger than the latter.

The gas in question is a mixture of two measures of hydrogen and one of oxygen gas, each of which we shall have to generate presently.

Firstly, procure a bladder large enough to hold three measures of gas—say three half-pint measures. Moisten the bladder until it becomes quite soft, then tie it by waxed thread to the stem of a funnel. The funnel is for the purpose of getting into the bladder the gas which we shall presently generate.

Before, however, preparing any gas at all, I shall ask you to go through your gaseous evolutions, using common atmospheric air; proceed then as follows:—

Having filled a half-pint large-mouthed bottle with water, invert it in a tub of water. It is unnecessary that the bottle be totally immersed; if only the mouth of the bottle touch the surface of the water in the tub, it is enough. Whilst the bottle filled with water is thus inverted and kept in position either by the hands of an assistant, or by supporting it on a shelf fixed in the tub for that purpose, take a tube—the stem of a tobacco-pipe will do—and blow air underneath the mouth of the inverted bottle. Presently water will go out of the bottle, and air from your lungs will get into it. Please, for the sake of exercise, call the air just blown into the bottle from your lungs “oxygen,” and get it into the bladder by aid of the funnel. Need it be remarked, that before filling the bladder it must be completely emptied of the air it naturally contains, by squeezing, and that the funnel must also be deprived of air, which can be accomplished by dipping it into the water in the tub, mouth upwards, and turning it mouth downwards, after it has been filled with water. A little dexterity will now enable you to pass into the bladder the bottleful of air, which we have agreed to call “oxygen.” Repeat the operation twice more, and fancy you have passed into the bladder two volumes or measures of hydrogen. Your preliminary exercise is now complete, and you may proceed to operate with the real gases, for preparing which I shall give directions.

Oxygen.—Mix together intimately in a mortar equal parts by weight of chlorate of potash and black oxide of manganese. Put about two tablespoonfuls in a Florence flask, to which a perforated cork, with tube leading from it, has been accurately attached, apply a spirit-lamp flame, and oxygen gas will be evolved. The first portions must be allowed to escape, after which the gas may be collected in bottles filled with water and inverted.

Hydrogen.—Take an apparatus precisely similar to the last; place in the flask a few shreds or cuttings, or other small bits of zinc or iron, and pour upon them a small teacupful of oil of vitriol, previously mixed with water, in the proportion of one measure of oil of vitriol to eight of water. Hydrogen gas will be rapidly evolved, without the application of flame or any other source of heat. Two measures of hydrogen and one of oxygen constitute an explosive mixture. When the three measures have been got into the bladder, proceed as follows:—Slip out the neck of the funnel, and substitute a tobacco-pipe in its place. By means of this tobacco-pipe, blow bubbles with soapsuds, either igniting them whilst they stud the surface of a basinful of soapsuds, or whilst they are ascending through the air. A loud explosion (quite harmless) will in either case be the result. Take especial care to remove the bladder from the bubbles before igniting the latter.

CARISBROOK CASTLE, ISLE OF WIGHT.

THANKS to the rapid transport afforded us by rail and steam, smoke-dried Londoners can occasionally escape from town, and actually spend a few hours in sylvan solitudes or on the seashore. Taking advantage of an early train they can make their way from the Waterloo-road to Southampton, can cross “the briny ocean,” wander over some of the most romantic parts of the Isle of Wight, and return to the metropolis in the evening.

And the Isle of Wight is an attractive spot, irrespective of the fact that it has been chosen as a retirement for royalty. It is one of the most beautiful districts,—finely diversified with hills, dales, woods, towns, villages, and gentlemen's seats. To stroll upon the chalk hills, to yacht it round the Needles, to visit Black-gang Chyne, or make pilgrimage to Carisbrook, are worth more than the trouble and expense of the journey.

Carisbrook Castle is one of the most interesting remains in the Isle of Wight. Some parts of this ancient fortress date from a very early period; but as it was considerably enlarged and underwent a thorough repair in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, it does not present that appearance of venerable old age which might at first be anticipated. The walls of the old castle inclose an area of one and a half acre, with its keep in the centre. This is comprised within the more modern fortifications, which inclose about twenty acres. It has five bastions, a deep moat, and a terrace a mile in length.

The castle occupies the ground on which there formerly stood a Roman tower, rebuilt by Wightgar the Saxon, who, according to Stowe, was king of the island. The building having fallen into decay, was reconstructed by Richard de Rivers, Earl of Devonshire, in the days of Henry I. The entrance is at the west side, over a bridge between two bastions; then through a small gate which commands the approach to the main building.

The historical interest of Carisbrook chiefly belongs to the troublous times of the first Charles. When that unfortunate monarch began to suspect the dangerous designs which were formed against his life, he withdrew himself from the army, privately left Hampton Court, and concealed himself at Titchfield, a seat belonging to the Earl of Southampton. As he could not remain there for any lengthened time without his residence becoming known, a communication was made to Hammond, the governor of the Isle of Wight, who no sooner received the intelligence than he obliged the king to accompany him to Carisbrook Castle, where, though he was received with expressions of duty and respect, he was in reality a prisoner. Some historians seem to imagine that the king's retreat to the Isle of Wight was voluntary, that he still confided in the promises of his generals, and flattered himself that if he was removed from the presence of the agitators, they would perform whatever they had promised in his favour. It is certain, however, that Charles pursued an irresolute course, which furthered the designs of his adversaries. He was now confined in a place removed from his friends, at the disposal of the army, whence it would be almost impossible to deliver him, either by force or stratagem. There he suffered thirteen months' incarceration, and from thence he made a vain attempt at escape. There is, therefore, a melancholy interest attaching to the old building, which is still further increased by the sad history of the fate of his daughter Elizabeth. There, in the early spring-time of life, the princess expired. She was found dead in her chamber, with the open Bible before her, the last gift of her royal father.

THE REUNION; OR, ELSIE'S LIFE-TASK.

Live and love,
Doing both nobly, because lowly.
Live and work strongly, because patiently.

On a wild October night, Elsie Raymond sat beside her solitary fireside in deep thought—in thought which, truth to tell, was tinged by sadness. It was not often that she sat thus, for she was the most cheerful and busy of little women, the best of sisters and aunts, and the kindest of neighbours. This being the case, she found little leisure for thought or solitary musing; for, in some one of these relations, work enough was always provided for her.

But to-night she seemed to have arrived at one of the halting-places in her life. Her young sister Sophie, the last of her charges, had that morning been married. The old gray homestead had been left desolate when her smiling face went from it—at least so Elsie thought. True, she had a tribe of small nephews and nieces staying with her, while their mother—Elsie's sister Mary—and her husband accompanied the bridal party on their tour; but they had long been asleep, and there was no token of their presence in the somewhat prim-looking room, except a great basket of playthings in a corner, and a row of shoes, headed by Willie's "new boots," and closed by baby Elsie's tiny bronzed slippers, that were ranged against the wall.

Elsie's father had died suddenly, the victim of a fatal accident, and his widow, overwhelmed by the sad and terrible bereavement, soon followed him. With her dying breath she commended the younger children to the care of their elder sister, and exacted from her a promise that she would devote her life to them. The girl could hesitate at no demand made in the last feeble accents of her dying mother. She lifted the little unconscious babe from the feeble arms that clasped it, and holding it close to her bosom, and looking upon the tearful face of the little group gathered around that death-bed, gave the required promise.

In an hour her mother had ceased to breathe, and Elsie's life-work had begun. But it was not until the sad ceremonies of the funeral were over, and the little family had returned to the desolate home, that Elsie fully comprehended all she had undertaken.

None who have truly loved will fail to comprehend the struggle that, for the following weeks, went on in Elsie's soul. It was no light sacrifice that was demanded of Elsie; duty and love, her promise to the dead and her vows to the living, were the antagonists that contended every inch of ground. John Francis loved Elsie full well enough to have aided her in her life-task. He saw no reason in the duties she had undertaken why she should not fulfil her vows, and in becoming his wife, divide the burden of her responsibilities and care.

But she thought differently. She felt that she had no right to allow his generosity to lead him into such a sacrifice. He was young, and life lay bright and long before him. Should she allow the shadow of her care to project across the sunny path? Should she seek to lay upon his shoulders the burden that weighed her down, and doomed her to a life of toil? She could endure and sacrifice much for the children, so dear to her by the ties of blood—the sacred legacy of her dead parents; but to him they were nothing, save for her sake, and she might have to see him grow weary and discontented with the untimely cares that marriage with her must thrust upon him.

So Elsie and John Francis parted, as they feared for ever. When her lover found that no arguments nor prayers could change her purpose, that she had solemnly recorded her vow to the dead, and was fully prepared to perform it to the uttermost, even to the sacrifice of her dearest hopes and most cherished wishes, he disappeared from the neighbourhood, without a farewell to any who had known him.

After a time a letter came to the parish clergyman to say that he was safe, and about to sail for a foreign land, and from that hour, for all those twenty years, no tidings of John Francis had fallen on Elsie Raymond's ears. When she knew that he was gone and would not return, she very carefully gathered together every little memento of the happy season of her happy love, and locked them in the casket he had given her, thenceforth to be the shrine of her affections; then, sternly and uncomplainingly, she turned to her life-task.

Year after year rolled on. Elsie spun and wove, and directed her maidens and her farm-labourers, and taught and nursed her brothers and sisters, and in all things strove to supply to them the place of the parents they had lost.

In time the wounds of her heart healed, at least they ceased to bleed at every touch, and she learned to find solace in the affection of her children, as she called them, while habit made her duties light, and almost pleasant.

The midnight hour had already passed when Elsie rose to retire. Her long, lonely vigil had made her timid and nervous, and she could hardly repress a shriek of alarm—as just at that moment, a heavy knock was heard at the outer door, and resounded through the house.

But Elsie's only thought was of a summons to some sick or dying bed, for, in that quiet neighbourhood, people were seldom abroad at night on less urgent errands; so smiling at her causeless alarm, and still trembling in spite of her bravery, she undid the fastening of the door, and threw it open.

A tall man, wrapped in a long, dark riding-cloak, stood upon the threshold. By the light of the flaring candle Elsie held, she could not distinguish his features. She only saw the strange eager look of a pair of very bright eyes, as the stranger bowed, in answer to her salutation.

"Madam," he said, "I am benighted, as you see, and in trying to reach the next village have lost my way. I am drenched to the skin, and my horse is too weary to go further through these miry roads; and seeing a light here, I have ventured to crave a shelter for him and for myself, for the remainder of the night. I assure you that you will find me no ungrateful guest."

"Sir," Elsie resumed simply, "the doors of Raymond farm have never been closed to the weary wayfarer. Enter, and a servant will care for your horse."

The stranger bowed again, and passed her silently, as she held back the broad leaf of the door. What was it that, at sight of that tall muffled form, caused her heart to beat so wildly? She put up the bar that secured the door, and then preceded her guest to the apartment she had left.

She stirred the smouldering embers, and threw on fresh wood, which caught the flames that soon leaped cheerily up the broad chimney. Leaving the stranger cowering over the blaze, she went and called the gardener to take charge of the horse that was neighing impatiently at the outer gate.

When she came back, she busied herself, silently, in preparing refreshment for the stranger, who still sat beside the hearth casting curious glances at her as she moved about. Thrill after thrill shot through Elsie's frame, as she met those bright, strange glances. She had begun to feel almost frightened at his singular manner, when he suddenly addressed her.

"Madam," he said, pointing to the row of little shoes, and the overflowing basket of toys, "I see that lonely as is this house, it is not desolate. Human flowers, that brighten so many homes, bloom here. You have little children, beautiful and loving, and, doubtless, a good husband. Pardon me, madam," he added, observing Elsie's emotion; "we who are lonely wanderers up and down the world, are wont to notice, with somewhat of jealousy, the tokens of domestic happiness that is denied to us."

He was silent, as if waiting for an answer, and Elsie, conquering her emotion, answered quietly—

"There are children here, but not mine. I have neither husband nor children," and a faint sigh struggled up from her heart, as she thought of what might have been.

Just then the gardener came stamping in at the kitchen door, and showed himself, shaking the water from his garments. Elsie turned to the stranger—

"Your meal is prepared," she said; "when you have partaken, the servant will show you to your room."

And bidding her guest good-night, she went away to her room, and lay down upon her bed, but not to sleep. Through the long hours, until the late autumn dawn, she tossed restlessly upon her couch, thinking much of her strange guest, and marvelling why his image mingled so continually with her visions of the past.

The next morning, when the breakfast hour was passed, the stranger spoke of his departure.

"Before I go, madam," he said, "I ought to inform you who I am, that you may, at least, know you have not bestowed your kindness on one unworthy."

"For twenty years I have been a wanderer in other lands, a sad, lonely disappointed man. Yet I have ever kept one hope bright and vigorous, the hope of return to my native shores, and the scenes of early happiness."

"I was born and lived till manhood in the midst of a region much like this in which your home is situated. I was an orphan, but I had a small competence, and many friends. My guardian had a daughter whom I loved, and who acknowledged that my love was returned. We were betrothed, by the consent of her parents, and our wedding-day was very near, when strange misfortunes overwhelmed my Alice. First, her father died a sudden and terrible death; then her mother drooped beneath the blow, and shortly followed; leaving to Alice the care of the younger children, and exacting from her a promise that she would never leave them until they were all provided for. I would willingly have shared the heavy burdens that now fell upon Alice, but she refused to bind me to her life of toil and self-sacrifice. She laid her love, and all her bright hopes, upon the altar of duty, and I, appalled by the sacrifice, and mad with disappointment, fled from my country, and became a wanderer in other lands.

"Elsie, I promised to return when your task was ended! I am here! Have you no word of welcome, after all these years of separation?"

He had no need to ask, for Elsie lay sobbing in the arms opened to receive her, while the little ones looked on wonderingly; and the old gardener, to whom the secret had been imparted the night previous, stood with clasped hands uttering ejaculations of thankfulness.

"Elsie, shall we ever part again?"

"Never," said Elsie, with her quiet simplicity; "never again until death;" and she looked up into his face with the old confiding glance that had greeted him a score of years before.

Very quietly the middle-aged pair settled down at the old homestead, which was beautified and adorned by the wealth John Francis brought from foreign lands, and dearer far to them than any palace home, with the store of memories that people its dim chambers, and all the green demesne which had witnessed their early joys, and their re-union after weary years of separation.

The Matron.

NO. IX.

THE ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER is a "journal pour tous"—a journal for everybody. Its tales, instructions, and anecdotes; its "Hopes and Helps," and finally its "Matron," speak to all—though not to all at once.

If my remarks seem particularly applicable to those with whom economy should be the chief object, let this be my excuse: that we are often bad economists in proportion to our poverty, and that we are frequently most deficient in the virtue most wanted.

In the present chapter I think it may not be amiss to return to the subject of dinners, particularly as I promised in a former number to explain why a fair proportion of fat with our meat is highly advisable in cold weather. Fat generates heat, and so evidently is this the case, that in the polar regions the food of the natives is almost all fat, consisting, as my readers are probably aware, of whale-blubber, and of the flesh of seals. Some of my young friends might be surprised to learn that an Esquimaux boy would make a much better feast on a pound of tallow candles than on an apple-pie. And not only must the quality but the quantity of food vary according to climate. A native of the frozen zone can eat as much at one meal as would serve an Englishman for four or five. The poor Esquimaux does not devour a great quantity through greediness. The fact is, in very low temperatures a great deal of oily food is necessary for the maintenance of animal heat. Thus, we English people, with our roast beef and plum-pudding at Christmas, have good sense on our side, Frenchmen may ridicule us on account of fare which they consider coarse and greasy; but we know what suits us, and in our cold climate we should become poor shivering creatures if we lived on continental soup maigre.

Very different to French fare is what I am about to recommend as suitable for the present season—viz., roast pork. It makes a capital English dinner, and in one respect it is cheaper than either beef or mutton. One eats less of it on account of its richness. The best way to dress it is an important consideration, because its wholesomeness depends on its being properly cooked. It should have a housewife's best attention, in order to render it as nice and savoury as possible. Indeed, it is no trifling matter whether dishes look and smell good. The mistress of a house who loves the members of her family, will agree with me here, when I remind her that those things nourish most that are best relished.

In choosing pork, procure, if possible, that which is dairy-fed. The part called the spare-rib is a nice piece for a family of four or five. Like all white meats it must be thoroughly done, but beware of burning it. Meat that is overdone is wasted. Soyer is so eloquent on this subject, that I will give you his own words. You must imagine him in a cottage, where a piece of beef has just been taken down from a dangle, having been roasted. Alluding to it, he says, "It was lying in the dripping pan, and was a great deal overdone, in fact, dried. Noticing in the course of conversation that the fire was spoiling it still more, I took a plate from the table, and placed it against it, so that it should not burn. The old lady noticed my proceeding, and asked me if I was going to have a bit of dinner with them?"

"No, thank you, my dear madam," replied I.
 "Then let me take away the plate, as it will spoil our dinner."

"How do you make that out?" I asked.
 "Well, the fat is not yet half out of the meat, and my Thomas will not eat fat, unless it is dripping in the crust of pies or puddings."

"I then perceived that the meat was in their estimation a secondary consideration, and that they paid the price of beef for the fat, paying eightpence per pound for the meat, when they could get the fat at fivepence. There was scarcely any nutriment left in the meat—that which weighed five pounds before roasting, weighing hardly three pounds when done."

Serious loss in the quantity of food, alone suffices to show when it is overdone. The general rule for roasting is to allow fifteen minutes to a pound, for roasting with a good fire, and ten or twenty minutes, according as the family like it done. I recommend the extra twenty minutes being given to pork, not only because white meats always require thorough dressing, but because fat meat takes longer in cooking than the same quantity of lean meat. Never imitate the old lady just mentioned by Soyer, who allowed her dinner to dry before the fire, but bear in mind that roast meat should be served up the moment it is done, if it is to be eaten in perfection.

Plenty of vegetables should be eaten with pork, and whether boiled or roasted, we recommend the addition of pease-pudding. I here give you a good receipt for making it.
 Put a pint of split-peas into a cloth, leave room for their swelling, boil in a gallon of soft water, pass them through a sieve or colander, then add a tea-spoonful of salt, half of pepper, two ounces of butter and two eggs, which if scarce can be omitted, beat up, tie again in cloth, boil for one hour and serve it up with greens and potatoes; and particularly apple sauce will make the dinner complete, provided you remember all the accessories, viz., good fresh mustard in the mustard pot, and everything clean and complete, which relates to that important task "laying the cloth." By the way, the cloth should (if possible) be laid half an hour before dinner, in order to ascertain whether anything necessary has been forgotten.

I must be forgiven if I retrace my steps to say a few words about the greens and the apple sauce. Supposing savoy to be the green cabbage chosen, mind they are well washed and soaked in salt and water. The stems should be removed, and two teaspoonfuls of salt and a little soda should be mixed in the half gallon of water, in which the savoy is to be boiled. Now for the apple sauce: Peel six good-sized apples, cut them in four pieces, cut out the core, slice them fine, put into a stewpan with two ounces of brown sugar and a gill of water; stew till in a pulp, and serve it up with pork. As to the potatoes, I hope by this time you boil them to perfection.

Having fixed on roast pork, if you tell your husband what dinner you intend giving him, very likely he will bring home a friend to share the repast. Mind you receive this friend most cordially. And now, ye young wives (for I doubt not there are many such among my readers), mark this precept—Always welcome cordially any friend your husband brings home with him, no matter how unexpectedly this friend may make his appearance. If on such occasions you are well dressed, and your dinner well dressed into the bargain, what could be more apropos than the arrival of a guest? But if you are in deshabille and the fare scanty, you must atone for these unfortunate circumstances by extra smiles and good humour.

Your husband has a right to select his own company, and it is a wife's duty as well as interest to promote the comfort and happiness of all her husband's guests.

The poor man who dreads a scowl on his wife's face, whenever he thinks fit to take a friend home with him, is, indeed, to be pitied. Single life is lessened compared to a union with an ill-tempered woman.

Small Change.

A SPANISH proverb tells us that four persons are required to make a really good salad: a spendthrift for oil, a miser for vinegar, a counsellor for salt, and a madman to stir all together.

EXPERIMENTAL PHILOSOPHY.—Asking a man to lend you money. MORAL PHILOSOPHY.—Refusing to do it.

AN OLD BACHELOR'S DEFINITION OF LOVE.—A little sighing, a little crying, a little dying, and a great deal of lying.

MRS. CHAPONE was asked why she was so scrupulous in coming early to church. "Because," she replied, "it is no part of my religion to disturb the religion of others."

WHY is a the most useful letter in the alphabet for a deaf woman?—Because it will make her hear.

"Mr. G—," said Erskine, speaking of a barrister of very slender talents, "is the most affecting orator of the day. He never speaks without exciting universal pity."

LOQUACIOUS "parties" would do well to remember the reason given by a Greek philosopher for his taciturnity on an exciting occasion, namely:—"What was to the purpose I could not say, and what was not to the purpose I would not say."

"My lord, the prisoner took a pair of boots from my shop in Holborn and ran away. He says now he only took them in joke." Judge: "Indeed, he carried the joke very far." Witness (eagerly): "Above forty yards, my lord, before I caught him."

TRUTH, they say, lies in a well—

A paradox, forsooth:

For if it lies, as people tell,

How can it, then, be truth?

"Don't talk to me of firmness!" said a cringing Bengalee, in a confidential moment. "I am sixty years old: my teeth, which were firm enough, are nearly all gone, and my tongue, which has always been pliable, is as supple as ever."

"MARY, is your master at home?"—"No, sir, he's out."—"I don't believe it."—"Well, then, he must come down and tell you himself; perhaps you'll believe him!"

WONDERFUL, BUT TRUE.—The residents in the Isle of Wight know how to obtain mutton from Cows!

"PAT, do you love your country?" "Yes, yer honour." "What's the best thing about Ould Ireland, Pat?" "The whisky, yer honour." "Ah, I see, Pat, with all her faults, you love her still!"

"Sir," said an irascible man, excited by a theological argument, to his opposite neighbour who had differed from him—"Sir, I believe you are either a deist or an atheist." "Wrong, sir," was the rejoinder, "I am a dentist."

LIMPING Peter Macnally, a lame attorney, wanted to be enrolled in a volunteer corps. "You'd never do, Peter," said the officer to whom he applied for admission. "The more we told you to march, the more you'd halt."

"MR. SPEAKER," said a patriotic M.P. for an agricultural county, "if the question is put to me, I answer boldly in the affirmative—no."

A BIT OF ADVICE.

Because you flourish in worldly affairs,
 Don't be haughty and put on airs

With insolent pride of station.

Don't be proud and turn up your nose

At poorer people in plainer clothes;

But learn, for the sake of your mind's repose,

That wealth's a bubble that comes and goes;

And that all proud flesh, wherever it grows,

Is subject to irritation.

SOME one having praised Longfellow's aphorism, "Suffer and be strong," a matter-of-fact man observed it was only a variation of the old English adage, "Grin and bear it."

If punning is the lowest kind of wit, may it not be regarded as the foundation of the whole structure?

INTELLIGENCE PER LAST AMERICAN MAIL.—The man who ate his dinner with the fork of a river, has been trying to spin a mountain-top.

"PRAY, sir," said a scientific man, "did you ever see a cat-fish?" "No, sir; but I've seen a rope-walk."

WHY is a betting-house keeper like a bride? Give that up? Well, because he is taken for better or worse. (General sensation, and expulsion of punster.)

Fox had a great respect for the genius of his rival, Pitt. He used to say, "I never want a word, but he never wants the word."

COCKNEY EPIGRAPH FOR A COOK.—"Peas to his hashes."

If a henpecked husband were to see his scolding wife drowning, what letter of the alphabet would he name? Answer—Let her be! (Letter B.)

Drawn game.

(K) Black having already lost game, B, by a serious blunder, risks everything in attempting to win this game; as, lost or drawn, the result of the match would be the same to him.—(l) An exceedingly well played correspondence game.

OXON.—The chess notation to which you refer is attributed to a German player named Koch. We prefer the system which is in general use in this country.

JUNIOR.—The Castle could move either to B or D, or to any of the intervening squares in the position to which you refer, but not to the square marked C.

A NOVICE.—The reply to B to Q B 7 in Problem No. 6, is B to Q B 4. We do not then see how mate could be effected in three moves.

J. ROBINSON.—Your solution of Problem No. 5 is correct.

OXON.—The object of the White Pawn on K 6, in Problem No. 8, is to prevent a very easy mate in three moves, commencing with Kt to K 6.

D. G. P.—The pieces should not be moved until you are satisfied that the Problem is correct.

M. A. R.—Whether the games are drawn or not the first move should be taken alternately.

S. P.—A chess club has recently been established at Norwich with a fair prospect of success.

PHENIX.—We much regret the occurrence to which you refer. We think, however, that chess, beyond all other amusements, is the best that you can pursue under the circumstances.

MAIDSTONE.—If in Problem No. 12 White commences with R takes Kt P, Black replies with B takes B (ch). In Problem No. 13, what is to prevent the King from playing to K 5 after Black has played his Bishop to Q 7, as you propose?

GRAPES.—Do you not overlook the fact that Black in Problem No. 9 can cover the check upon his King with the Bishop if White play R to Q 3, as you propose? 2. What is to prevent R taking R in Problem No. 11, if White for his first move play Kt to K B 4.

EXON.—1. See answer to "Grapes" touching Problem No. 9. 2. B takes B is the proper reply to your move of Q to K 4 in Problem No. 11.

T. SIMPSON.—The best defence to your first move in Problem No. 11 is P to Q 4. We do not then see how mate is to be effected. Bishop to Q Kt 5 in Problem No. 13 is perfectly unavailing, as a re-examination of the position will, no doubt, convince you.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO OUR READERS.—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ANOTHER NEW TALE.—In No. 16 of this Journal (instead of No. 15, as stated in our last week's number) will be commenced another new and original tale, truthfully descriptive and highly instructive, by one of our most popular authoresses, entitled "Hope Evermore; or, Something to Do"—a tale of the Ragged Schools, illustrating the advantages of Temperance.

CHINA.—With No. 16 will be published a splendid Panoramic Map of China. This map, which is remarkable for the accuracy with which it has been designed and the care with which it has been engraved, equals in size the Panoramic Map of India, which was published with No. 1 of the new series of this Journal. The price of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, No. 16, New Series, together with this beautiful Panoramic Map of China, inclusive, will be three-half-pence. In addition to the Panoramic Map, there will be in the number an engraved plan of Canton. On the back of the Panoramic Map will be published an elaborate and carefully prepared view of Hongkong, with the approaches to Canton from that important settlement; and also a mass of statistical and general information, giving a clear insight into the history, products, and capabilities of this vast empire. The events now occurring in China, both political and religious—the deep interest which is felt concerning a country which contains upwards of three hundred millions of inhabitants, or nearly one half of the population of the whole globe—its "crookery metropolis," exclusive customs, ancient colonisation and history, &c. &c., will necessarily render this Panoramic Map and accompanying engravings, upon which no expense has been spared in the drawing, engraving, and electrotyping, of great value and interest, both on account of the engravings themselves and the information which the letterpress supplies. Should our subscribers or the trade experience any difficulty in obtaining the necessary supply of this number, the demand for which cannot fail to be very great, they will oblige by applying direct to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard.

JACK TAR, aged 17, must apply to the "Naval Rendezvous"—which is established in every naval station—if he wants a berth in the royal navy. We think, however, that the only berth a landsman at 17 is likely to obtain in the navy just now, is what sailors call a wide berth. Ten to one the officers will have nothing to say to him. The look of hair our friend obligingly incloses for our inspection, is of the hue called by partial friends "auburn," by impartial observers (like ourselves) red.

E. SHARP.—The notes A sharp and B flat are identical. SOPHIA.—Of course, in singing, much depends on the manner in which the voice is cultivated; but where the voice is naturally harsh and disagreeable, to attempt to cultivate it to any great extent would be like throwing seed among stones. The chief rules to be observed by young singers are these—sing from the throat, not from the head; don't strain your voice; take particular care to sound each tone clearly; and particularly avoid the false practice of slurring or dragging the notes. Do not practise too long at once, and avoid fatiguing the voice.

H. W. R. P.—Till within a short period the plates in books of natural history, voyages, &c., were all coloured by hand. Now, however, hand-colouring is being rapidly superseded by colour printing. The plates are printed from woodblocks, whereupon various tints are laid, by the mixture of which different effects are produced. Of course each colour thus applied, involves a separate printing.

FANNY, EDWARD, J. F., A. B.—We receive innumerable questions on the important subject of handwriting. We answer, that for those who have neglected writing, and now wish to acquire the art, and for others who write well, but desire to write better still, the best plan is immediately to procure the "Model Copy-Books" published by Ward and Lock; the price of the complete set will, we believe, be two shillings. They are published in separate numbers at three-pence each.

JERRY.—No. DYD.—"constant reader of FAMILY PAPER"—blushes "to an awful extent," particularly in the company of ladies, and wants us to suggest a remedy for this distressing state of things. Let "Dyd," without intruding where he is not wanted, cultivate the society of good refined women, and he will find that his awkward habit of blushing, the result of embarrassment, will gradually wear off.

P. H. MORRISON.—In learning Eastern languages, much will depend on the capacity of the student. We should scarcely, however, counsel our correspondent to undertake the study without the assistance of a master.

J. Y. H.—Inquire of the London Missionary Society. LYDIA S.—The cheapest route to Paris is via Newhaven and Dieppe; the most expeditious via Folkestone and Boulogne; the shortest sea passage is between Dover and Calais.

YARM, who writes to us to know what would be the result of "an irresistible body coming in contact with an immovable body," has either been hoaxed himself, or is trying to hoax us. In the first case we should pity his want of comprehension; in the latter, his lack of good taste.

A THIRSTY SOUL.—"A Thirsty Soul," who has little time for study, yet longs for information on all subjects—on everything that relates to the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdom, and to the wonders of the heavens above, and the earth beneath—wishes for our advice as to the best manner of acquiring a great deal of knowledge in a short space of time. We are happy to have it in our power to satisfy "A Thirsty Soul." To effect his laudable object, he must lose no time in procuring "Science Popularly Explained." This book, containing eight thousand questions and answers on scientific subjects, forms one volume of "John Cassell's Educational Course," and is sold for three and sixpence.

BLANCHE.—Excellent portraits of the Prince and Princess Frederick William of Prussia appeared in No. 188 of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER (Old Series).

CUMBERLAND.—Repeat your question and it shall have our best attention.

B. W.—We thank our correspondent for his good opinion of our FAMILY PAPER, and with regard to his idea "that each subscriber should engage to find another friend to take a copy and thus double the circulation," we can only say we have not the slightest objection to so kindly and reasonable a proposition, and we are vain enough to think that the subscriber's friend would be under quite as deep an obligation as ourselves. In writing music, all European nations use the same signs for the notes.

IRON WORKS.—When cutaneous eruptions proceed from a general lowness in the system, they can be removed by a simple but strengthening diet, and rigid attention to cleanliness, and general regularity. When they proceed from hereditary or inherent disease, an experienced medical man should at once be consulted.

JEFFREY S.—The invention of the organ is of ancient date, though it did not come into general use until the tenth century. The Roman Emperor Julian wrote an epigram in praise of the organ, and Saint Jerome mentions one furnished with twelve pairs of bellows, and whose sound might be heard nearly a mile off. The harmonium is constructed on the principle of the organ.

CONSTANT was accidentally shot on the 5th of November last. Can any of our correspondents tell him how he can extract the gunpowder spots from his face? We fear not.

ART TREASURES.—In reply to the inquiries of numerous subscribers, we beg to announce that we intend (if possible) to complete our "Art Treasures Exhibition" in twelve monthly parts. The price of this magnificent work, unique of its kind, both in letterpress and engravings, will be but eight shillings. Should we be able to carry out our present intention, the entire volume will consist of 480 pages, and contain upwards of 240 engravings, copied from the chefs-d'œuvre of the most celebrated masters of the various schools of painting, and executed in the highest style of art.

J. R. G.—The native population of Australia is dying out fast. With few exceptions the indigenous blacks are perfectly useless as co-workers with the white colonists. They are insufferably lazy, and will frequently leave their peaceful avocations to fly off to the woods, with no ostensible reason for such a proceeding. An intelligent lady traveller in New South Wales relates how she once saw a native standing before her husband's pigsty, lost in philosophic contemplation of the fat, grunting tenants of that fragrant domicile. "Ah, ah," he broke out at last, "lucky fellows, you; sit in gunyon (hut) all day—white fellow work for you." And this native expressed the feelings of most of his countrymen with regard to the highest earthly felicity.

ZETETIC.—It will depend on the nature of the property he leaves. His freehold estates will go to his eldest son by his first marriage; his copyhold estates and his personal property will be equally distributed between his several children.

NIGEL.—Wedding-cards sent to the mistress of a house, are of course supposed to be addressed to the whole family. The number of bridesmaids is quite optional, ranging from one to four or five.

PUN.—Thanks for your anecdotes. We shall make use of some of them.

R. C. H. JESTON.—Apply to the publishers of the FAMILY PAPER.

LOUISE HARCOURT.—If you have been an attendant at the church you may.

AN ORPHAN GIRL.—The man who divorces his wife for infidelity can marry again; but "An Orphan Girl" does very wrong in keeping company with him until he is freed by law from the tie which still binds him to his unfaithful wife. A marriage with him before the sentence of the Court has dissolved his previous marriage, would be no marriage at all, and would subject the man to the penalties of bigamy.

THEOPHILUS.—Your question is answered in the reply to the queries of "Zetetic."

W. J. T. was bound for seven years, and he ought to serve that time, although in the meanwhile he may have attained his majority, and may not be compelled by law.

QUEST.—A simple undertaking, joint and several, would bind the parties to pay both the interest and principal of whatever you disburse for them.

PICKWICK DIXON.—Your questions are not clearly put, but the pith of your long letter is—has the woman who imagined herself his wife, through the force of a second marriage, any claim in law upon the man who has deceived her? None whatever for alimony for herself, but she can affiliate the children to him.

MARKHAM.—For fourteen years.

ONE OF THE OLDEST SUBSCRIBERS.—The value of a painting in oils depends upon the reputation of the painter and the state of preservation in which it has been kept, not on the material of which it consists. If the rent has been paid yearly, a full year's notice from the date of payment will be requisite, unless there is some special agreement.

J. W. E. O. cannot recover back rent if he waived his right to it by giving a receipt for rent subsequently due, without stating that it was only in acknowledgment of money had on account. Moreover, the debt accrued ten years ago, and unless it has been acknowledged in writing within the last six years, it would be barred by the "Statute of Limitations."

G. GRANT.—Liquid or potable gold is prepared by agitating ether with a solution of terchloride of gold for some time, then allowing it to repose, and decanting the portion which swims above. Liquid silver is prepared in the same way.

INQUIRE.—The Christian population in Calcutta is about 12,500. Of this number, 6,600 are Europeans, 5,000 are Eurasians, or Anglo-Indians (the progeny of white fathers and native mothers), and 850 are Americans. This population is scattered through a large native population, numbering some 400,000, of which 275,000 are Hindoos, 115,000 are Mohammedans, and the remainder are Asiatics.

G. RAMSEY.—Good paste blacking is made thus:—Take one pound of treacle and a pound and a quarter of ivory black, two ounces of sweet oil, and a little strong vinegar. Rub them all well together, and put the whole into a pot for use, or make into cakes, and wrap them in bladder. This may be converted into liquid blacking, by adding a little water or soapsuds.

CHAMPION.—Birdlime is made thus:—Boil the middle bark of holly, gathered in June or July, for six or eight hours in water, until it becomes tender; then drain off the water, and place it in a pit under ground, in layers, with fern, and surround it with stones. Leave it to ferment for two or three weeks, until it forms a sort of mucilage, which must be pounded in a mortar, into a mass, and well rubbed between the hands, in running water, until all the refuse is worked out. Then place it in an earthen vessel, and leave it for four or five days to ferment and purify itself. The portion which adheres to the hands may be washed off with spirits of turpentine.

A WELSH YOUTH.—The D.D. of either Oxford or Cambridge University wears a hood of scarlet cloth. The Master of Arts of the University of Oxford wears a black silk hood lined with red silk, and the Master of Arts of the University of Cambridge wears a black hood lined with white silk. No graduates of any Universities wear hoods lined with ermine, but the Bachelors of Arts of both of our Universities wear hoods lined with white fur.

EDWIN PARKER.—Your indentures are binding, notwithstanding the alteration in the style of the firm.

HORE.—If the parties reside in separate parishes the banns must be published in both parishes, and the parties can then be married in either.

CLERICS can obtain a degree at the London University by offering himself for examination, and satisfying the examiners. At Oxford or Cambridge he can only obtain a degree after three years' residence and many examinations.

J. BLUNDERBICK.—If an order has been made upon you by a magistrate or at "petty sessions," you must continue to pay the appointed allowance until the child is fourteen years of age. If the woman follows you about to your annoyance and the interruption of your business, you can, if you think fit, give her in charge.

B. B.—A lodger who has paid quarterly must give a quarter's notice, unless he has a special agreement to the contrary.

A PROVINCIAL CORRESPONDENT.—The publishers of the paper in which a libel appears are liable for damages.

A LITERATE will find all his questions on the subject of ordination answered in the notice to "Alta Petit," in our last Number. Arms once mated belong in perpetuity to the lineal representatives of the matriculator.

A CONSTANT READER.—Apply at any patent office. The expenses will eventually amount to about £120, but a portion only is payable at first, to secure the right, and the balance six months afterwards.

T. D. KENDALL is informed that no member can take his seat in the House of Commons who is not of full age.

HANDWRITING.—ROLAND writes a neat and intelligible hand, which would be better without the flourishes; it is also important in good writing that the letters forming a word join each other; in the specimen before us this is not attended to.—ARTHUR BOLINGBROOK makes his letters peculiarly angular, yet there is a freeness and business style about his writing which we admire.—THEODORE: Very good.—LONGFELLOW: We can scarcely form an opinion, not knowing how long you have been learning; for a school-boy it would be very fair, but too stiff and cramped for business.—SELF-EDUCATED: If success depends upon your handwriting, you stand a good chance of getting the situation.—ANXIOUS: Your note is both badly written and badly indited.

BOSCO THE YOUNGER is desirous of knowing "What sort of a thing is a ghost?" We have no personal acquaintance with ghosts, but we apprehend by the term that the apparition of some deceased person is intended. Ghost is the old Saxon word for spirit, so that, in a certain sense, every man is his own ghost; but this is not the popular idea. Twelve o'clock at night, stormy weather, dismal quarter of the house—that is the sort of time and place for the credulous to imagine they see ghosts. Fluttering white garments, sepulchral odour, strange bluish light—these are the supposed accompaniments. Now we must confess our disbelief in any apparition of the sort. "Ghosts!" says poor Tom Hood; "no such things in nature. All laid long ago, before the wood pavement. What should they come for? The colliers may rise for higher wages, the bread on account of the failure of the crops, the radicals for reform, the rising generation may rise—but that a ghost should rise, merely to make my hair rise, is more than I can fathom!"

RODERICK HASTINGS (who ought to mind his stops) wants to know "what would tan the skin of a small animal." The process is too long for description here. Consult the word "Taxidermy" in an encyclopædia, or a manual on the subject.

ALICE.—The "great plague" of 1665 was brought into England from Holland, where it had raged for some months previously to its appearance here. The mortality was frightful; considerably more than 80,000 persons fell victims to the scourge. In one night 4,000 persons died. The fact that the disorder never reappeared after the rebuilding of the city on an improved plan, subsequently to the great fire of 1666, points significantly to the cause of the terrible visitation.

ROLAND.—To render leather boots and shoes waterproof, take a quarter of an ounce of India rubber, and three-quarters of a pint of oil of turpentine; put them into a pot, tie it over with bladder, and set it in hot water. When dissolved, add hot boiled oil, one pint.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARBLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Angry looks can do no good,
And blows are dealt in blindness;
Words are better understood
If spoken but in kindness.

J. BURBIDGE.

In seeking the destruction of George Markham by entraining him into dissipation and vice, Styles had hitherto felt no other incentive than the mercenary one of gain. His employer paid him for his services, and that was all which he either considered or required. But now personal feelings of envy at the dawning prosperity of his victim, and revenge for the exposure which had so humbled him, were added to it, and he vowed to leave no means untried to reduce him once more to the level where drunkenness had left him. Full of this resolution he sought the chambers of Carus Kearn, and related word for word everything that had transpired—the story he had artfully concocted, the exposure, and defeat.

The evil-minded man listened to him impatiently; it was enough for him to know that his project, as far as the speaker could be his agent, was at an end; and he cared little for details: they only added to his mortification and disappointment.

"You must have played your cards badly," he observed.

"I played them as they were dealt to me," replied the ruffian. "Who could have foreseen that the old fool who has taken Markham for a partner would have obtained such exact information of my habits and haunts? George must have split upon me. I have always observed," he added, "that your staid, respectable men of business, as they are called, possess far more cunning and calculation than your jovial, reckless ones. I have done my best, however, and have nothing to reproach myself with."

"You are tired, I suppose, of the undertaking?" said Carus.

The man shrugged his shoulders, and muttered something about his having been defeated.

"Your true bird of prey strikes twice."

Styles regarded him steadily.

"It is the kestrel alone that ceases the pursuit when disappointed in his first swoop," added his employer, with marked emphasis upon the words. "I am far from blaming you for the result; the plan was well laid, and not unskillfully executed. It is impossible to calculate every contingency. Your reward shall be the same as if you had succeeded."

His hearer began to look more cheerful.

"There is a danger far more menacing to my future prospects," resumed the speaker, "to be seen to, and, if possible, guarded against."

CARUS KEARN ATTEMPTS THE DESTRUCTION OF RICHARD MARKHAM.

"The boy at Jersey," observed his hearer; "his grandson."

"You have read my fears aright," replied Carus Kearn. "I more than suspect it. Should it prove so, adieu to all hope of my being his heir, of fulfilling the promise I made of providing handsomely for you in the event of his death, which would leave me a poor man."

"The old fool," muttered his visitor; "after all his threats of what he would do—of never forgiving them."

"There is nothing more unstable than an old man's resolution, unless it be a woman's promise," added Carus Kearn, bitterly. "If the boy is Mr. Bently's grandson I am a ruined man, unless some accident should remove him from my path. But the first point is to ascertain whether it is really the case, or merely the suggestion of my fears. You have seen the lad?"

"Frequently."

"And would know him again?"

"From a hundred."

"Start, then, at once for the island. I need not recommend caution. Make no inquiries; they would lead to no good results, and might excite suspicion. Contrive to see him—that will be enough—and having done so, return to me for instructions."

Tom Styles slowly repeated the word.

"I need not remind you that both our interests are at stake," observed his employer; "it would really grieve me, after your long and faithful services, should I not be able to fulfil my intentions of making a provision for your age, to say nothing of the disappointment on my own account."

"Of course it would," muttered his agent; "but Mr. Carus, you are not the gentleman I take you for if you submit calmly to be done out of your expectations by a boy, the son of George Markham, too!"

The gentleman smiled.

"His father has injured you enough already."

At the allusion to his disappointment with Rachel, the sinister smile vanished from the lips of her cousin, and his dark eyes flashed with all the evil passions of his nature.

"Something ought to be done," continued the speaker.

"Well! well! we shall see," replied Carus.

"And soon!"

"I seldom delay when once I have made up my mind," was the answer. "My first difficulty will be to decide."

"As for a friend, Mr. Carus," exclaimed the respectable Tom Styles, "you need not look far for that."

"Thank you."

"I declare it makes my blood boil to think of your being plundered of a fortune which ought to be yours, and prevented from acting handsomely by your friends as you would like to do, by a brat, the son of a fellow no better than myself. I feel," he added, "as if I could do anything to prevent it."

Although his employer perfectly understood the meaning of the fellow, he made no reply; it was enough for him to know that in the speaker he had discovered an agent as unprincipled as his purpose—as desperate as his designs, which, at present, were dark and undefined: shadows which only required the confirmation of his suspicions respecting our hero to be confirmed, to start into palpable and terrible existence.

There is an enticement—a fatality—a logic—in crime. The first step as invariably leads to a second as a deduction to the consequence.

That same night Tom Styles started for Southampton, where he arrived just in time to catch the steamer for Jersey, at which place he landed on the following morning, and took up his abode at the Lion d'Or, a French hotel, where he considered he should be less likely to be recognised. As a further precaution, he gave himself out as a tradesman just retired from business, who, allured by the reported cheapness and salubrity of the island, had come with an intention of settling.

Richard Markham had now been upwards of a year under the care of the Reverend Mr. Oneas Brown, and the progress of his education had been most satisfactory. The sorrow he felt at his singular separation from his mother had not rendered him blind to the advantages of instruction. Possessing one of those rich intelligences which, like virgin land, when cultivated, make up for past barrenness by present fruitfulness, he had surpassed the expectations of his instructor—his perceptions seemed all but intuitive. He seized upon the difficulties of education, and mastered them with a facility which soon placed him on a par with boys who had passed years under the worthy clergyman's care, and had already achieved a respectable proficiency in Latin; but his great talent seemed to lie in the acquirement of modern languages, especially the Hindostani, which Mr. Brown, who had formerly been chaplain in India, taught: most of his pupils being destined either for the army or an oriental career.

Richard's great friend at school was Harry Morton, the son of the lawyer at whose house he had passed the New Year's night which had exercised so marked an influence over his future destiny. The youth was about his own age, of a frank, open, loyal disposition; and mutual sympathy drew them towards each other, till perfect confidence existed between them.

When we say "perfect confidence," there was one reservation. Our hero had never forgotten the promise made to Harry's father. The fact of his having passed a night under the lawyer's roof was never hinted at by him.

It is a wise dispensation of providence by which the heart is strengthened in the hour of sorrow or suffering. How frequently have we seen naturally weak natures grow suddenly strong under the pressure of pain or affliction. It proved so in Richard's case; for, although he had never forgotten either his mother or little Mary—indeed a day, scarcely an hour passed, that memory did not revert to them—he endured the separation with fortitude: his instructor had pointed out to him that it was for his good, and given him an assurance which he could not doubt without ingratitude, that they had been placed beyond the reach of want.

His first great trial was at the summer holidays, when his young companions returned to their friends—to happy homes—to those who loved them. For weeks before the event—always an important one in school-boy life—took place, he had to listen to the anticipations of the boys, their plans of amusement during the vacation; and his heart felt heavy—not with envy, for he was a stranger to such passions—but regret.

What would he not have given to have returned to London—to pass only a day or a single hour under the roof of his parents? to have shared their toil if necessary, provided he might once more have received his mother's blessing—his sister's kiss—have witnessed the change which the Reverend Oneas Brown from time to time described to him?

These thoughts naturally made him dull; and one morning, instead of mingling with his young companions on the playground, he retired to a distant part of it to meditate alone—even as the poor stricken deer, when wounded, flies from its joyous fellows in the herd.

His friend Harry soon missed him, and with the perseverance of friendship sought him out. To his surprise he found him in tears.

"What is the matter, Richard?" demanded the sympathising boy, seating himself by his side. "I can't bear to see you so dull and miserable."

"Nothing," replied the youth, trying to force a smile.

"You don't generally cry for nothing," observed his friend, hurt at what appeared a want of confidence. "One would imagine that the approach of holiday time gave you pain."

"And so it does."

"Why so?"

"In the first place, it will separate me from you," replied Richard Markham.

"But you will see your parents and friends," urged Harry Morton; "and our separation will only last for a few weeks."

Great was the astonishment of the speaker when our hero informed him that he was to remain on the island during the vacation. That from circumstances he had given his word not to explain he had no prospect of seeing his parents for a long, long time to come. "Do not think me selfish," he added, "or that I am capable of feeling envious of your happiness; but I cannot avoid drawing the contrast."

"Not return for the holidays!" repeated Harry, in a tone of surprise.

"No."

"Or see your parents?"

"No."

"Why, what have you done to merit such a punishment?" Brown says that you are the best boy in the school, and I can bear witness that you deserve the character."

Richard coloured deeply. The recollection of the circumstance which had placed him in the hands of his mysterious protector pained him severely; for, with the susceptibility of an ingenuous mind, he judged his own conduct far more severely than others would have done.

"It is meant as a precaution rather than a punishment, I believe," he answered.

"Precaution!"

"Yes; for fear I should run away. Have you never remarked that, of all the boys, I am the only one who receives no pocket-money?"

"We have all noticed that, and thought it so strange."

"Well," said Richard, "I have only to give my word not to quit the island, to have the same allowance as the rest; but I have constantly refused to do so; and now, Harry, ask me no more questions, for I dare not answer them. Promise me not to think badly of me, or like me less, in consequence of what I have told you."

His friend warmly assured him that it would take something far more serious than his not being allowed pocket-money or kept at school during the holidays, to shake the good opinion and friendship he entertained for him. And so the conversation ended between them; but by one at least of the two boys it was not forgotten.

That very day Harry Morton wrote a long letter to his father, in which he described his schoolfellow and friend with all the simple eloquence of boyish enthusiasm; painted his sad position—left alone during the vacation, and concluded by asking his permission to invite Richard home with him.

This letter so interested the worthy lawyer that he showed it to his client, whom we need no longer conceal from our readers to be no other than the wealthy merchant, Mr. Bently. The old man felt deeply affected on perusing it. The description of his grandson's good qualities, his industry and progress in his studies, and the honourable tenacity with which he adhered to his promise, touched him; and if consistently with the design for the reformation of his son-in-law, he could have given his assent to the proposed arrangement, he gladly would have done so. But that was impossible; and by his directions Mr. Morton replied to his son's request by a refusal couched in the kindest terms, but still a firm one, assigning as a reason for not complying with his request, that as the friends of our hero had decided upon his remaining with his tutor during the vacation, he did not think that the Reverend Oneas Brown would be justified in departing from the arrangement.

Poor Harry, he felt terribly disappointed; and the young friends parted with renewed assurances of friendship, and cheered by the prospect of speedily meeting again.

The second evening after his return home, Mr. Bently dined at the house of Harry's father. The unsuspecting youth was easily led to converse on the subject of school and his school companions, and thus the grandfather of our hero obtained the information which so deeply interested him.

"You cannot imagine," said the boy, "how strongly we are all attached to him. Even the Howards, who think themselves superior to the rest of us, because their father is a general and governor of some place abroad, never show the least pride to Richard, and yet they have loads of money, and he is not allowed a sixpence."

"But I suppose his companions share their allowance with him?" observed the merchant.

"There is more than one that would willingly do so," answered Harry, including himself as a matter of course in the number, "but he has always refused to accept it. On half holidays, when a party of pleasure is proposed, he always declines: we know the reason of course, and have tried all kinds of schemes to induce him to join us, but he won't be persuaded; and so lately we have given them up, rather than leave him out."

Mr. Bently felt secretly delighted with this instance of his grandson's spirit of independence, and mentally resolved if he persevered in the line of conduct he had chosen to recompense him richly for his present humiliation and privation.

From that day a singular desire to see Richard took possession of the old man: it soon became so strong that he determined to risk the chance of being recognised by any visitors on the island, rather than forego it. Hence the mysterious absence which had so puzzled Peter Mangles, and excited the curiosity of Carus Kearn.

Richard was reading in the new solitary playground, when his tutor came to him and informed him that a gentleman had arrived from England and wished to see him.

"Is it Mr. Morton?" eagerly demanded the youth.

"No."

His pupil knew of no one else likely to inquire for him.

"It is one who has taken what must appear to you a strange but kind interest in your welfare—the gentleman who intrusted you to Mr. Morton's care. He has heard of the honourable manner in which you have hitherto kept your promise, the satisfactory progress you are making in your studies. Let me advise you to receive him gratefully, as goodness so unexampled and disinterested merits."

"He has separated me from my mother, sir," answered the boy, seriously.

"For your good," replied the clergyman.

"I cannot see it. True, I am better off, have fine clothes, am well fed, and educated; but all he has done cannot recompense me for the pain it must have caused her. I would forego all to see her but for one moment—to receive her kiss—to know that she is well. It is cruel kindness to wring the heart that never wronged him, under the pretext of my advantage."

"Here comes the gentleman," observed the clergyman, as he saw Mr. Bently advancing from the house towards the spot where they were conversing. "I shall leave you. State your feelings frankly; truthfully, I am sure you will. I doubt not but your benefactor will be able to defend himself."

So saying, the speaker walked to a distant part of the grounds, leaving the merchant and his grandson together, in the hope that an explanation would take place between them; for in his judgment, he felt that the feelings of his pupil were both natural and right.

Richard had risen on the approach of the man who had exercised so extraordinary an influence over his destiny, and stood coldly, but respectfully before him. Young as he was, he entertained a perfect sense of the advantages he was deriving from his bounty, remembered the terrible position from which he had rescued him; but the sentiments of gratitude were chilled by the feeling that they had been purchased by the sacrifice of his mother's peace of mind.

For several moments they contemplated each other in silence. The wealthy merchant felt gratified by the improved appearance of the boy, his gentlemanly bearing, handsome, intelligent countenance, and had he yielded to the impulses of his heart, would have pressed him to it; but the time had not yet arrived in which, consistently with his intentions, he could reveal himself to him.

"I perceive that you recognise me," he said.

"Yes, sir."

"But are you not glad to see me?"

Richard Markham remained silent.

"And yet I have taken a long and somewhat inconvenient journey from no other motive."

There was a feeling of disappointment in the tone of Mr. Bently, as he uttered these words, which did not escape the observation of our hero.

"Ah, sir!" he exclaimed, "why render your bounty and kindness to me incomplete by keeping me from all communication with my parents. You are acting unjustly to yourself, since you render it impossible for me to love you as I ought to do. As I could love you," he added; "for something whispers me that you mean well towards me."

"And is this desire to see your parents so strong," demanded the merchant, "that you would sacrifice the prospect of future prosperity to gratify it?"

"Stronger than ever," interrupted the youth. "I dream of them; scarcely a night passes but I see pale faces mourning over me in my sleep, and awake with tears upon my cheek. You have broken my mother's heart," he added, passionately, "and I have been the instrument."

"Perhaps I have merely tried it," replied his grandfather seating himself upon the bank beside him. "Richard, I came here to see a boy, a being whose mind, like virgin parchment, is capable of receiving any inscription. Taking a deep, far deeper, interest than you imagine in your future welfare, I have guarded, as far as is in my power, against any unworthy lesson being written there; but I find that suffering has made you prematurely a man—a man in judgment though not in years—and contrary to my first intentions, will explain my conduct towards you."

"I shall hear you, sir, with patience."

"And justify it."

"I trust so," replied Richard.

"When we first met—and you can never, I am certain, forget the occasion," resumed Mr. Bently—"I made up my mind to snatch you from the precipice upon whose verge you had been led, driven, I might say, by poverty, and the agony of seeing those most dear to you perishing from want. I first ascertained that your story was a true one. In doing so, the history of your parents became known to me—your mother's ill-assorted marriage, and the dissipated, to use no harsher term, conduct of your father."

At this allusion to his father's vice, Richard Markham coloured deeply.

"I asked myself two questions," continued the speaker, "before I decided on the line of conduct I should pursue. The first was, whether it would have been wise to leave you to the contaminating influence of such an example, by permitting you to remain in communication with a parent who had so far forgotten his duty towards his child?"

"I hear you, sir."

"The second was, whether it might not be possible to save both father and son by keeping the former in ignorance of the fate of the latter, by letting uncertainty haunt him like remorse, follow him closely as his shadow?—for I knew that sorrow was the only real purifier of the heart; and this conviction it was that induced me to turn a deaf ear to your prayers, to send you suddenly from London, destroy all trace by which you might be followed; and, thank heaven, my plan has succeeded. George Markham is no longer a hopeless drunkard, but a reformed man, earning an honourable living by his own industry. When the time arrives that will restore you to him, you need not blush to own him as your father."

The youth clasped his hands in silent gratitude. His heart was too full for words. He knew how the change must have rejoiced his mother.

"With his wife," resumed Mr. Bently, "my task was far more difficult: your loss was a blow which caused my heart to bleed as I inflicted it. I ascertained that a true friend had snatched her from poverty and all but that mental suffering that time only can assuage. She has found consolation in the reformation of her husband, lives in Christian confidence and hope that her boy will one day be restored to her longing arms; has gathered strength in patience."

"Oh, sir," exclaimed our hero, taking him by the hand, "forgive me my cruel, my unjust suspicions of your noble, generous conduct; how have I wronged you!"

"Hear me out," replied Mr. Bently, "and I have done. From this moment you are at liberty to decide for yourself; to return, if you wish it, to your parents. But first weigh the probable consequences. You know better than I can paint to you how frequently the promises of amendment, on the part of your father, have been broken. Will you plunge him again in that degraded state from which sorrow and remorse alone had power to draw him? or, by remaining for a year or two longer in the position I have placed you, give time for his good resolves to take root, habits of temperance and virtue to grow confirmed, attach him to a home of respectability, instead of the tavern and its evil associations? You have your choice."

The first impulse of Richard Markham was to decide on returning to his mother. What prospect, however alluring, could be balanced against her kiss and smile of welcome—restoring happiness to her—feeling her arms around his neck, her tears upon his cheek?—and had he answered on the instant, such would have been his choice; but the gray, piercing eye of his benefactor was fixed upon him with a warning glance. His thoughts reverted to the memorable cottage in the Belvedere-road. He remembered how frequently he had heard his mother declare that she would rather see him dead than dishonoured—witnessed his sister's tears for bread when her sorrowing parent had none to give.

One rash act might renew the trials and temptations again: he dared not risk it.

"Decide for me, sir," he said—and the strong agony of filial affection wrung him as the words escaped his lips—"let your wisdom guide my inexperience. I understand you now, and will not murmur at your decision."

"Or refuse me your hand, Richard, when I again come to Jersey to see you," observed Mr. Bently, moved almost to tears by the noble conduct of his grandson.

The boy grasped his hand warmly, and raised it to his lips.

During the rest of the holidays, the old man remained upon the island, the companion of his grandson, who soon became so strongly attached to him, that the termination of his visit was looked forward to with regret.

From that day all restrictions were removed. Richard Markham was allowed the same amount of pocket-money as any other boy.

How he longed for the return of his friend Harry!

CHAPTER XXX.

The darkness of his horrid vices has Eclipsed the glimmering rays of his frail virtues;
His cruelties, like birds of prey, have plucked
All seeds of nobleness from his false heart;
And now it lies a sad, dull lump of earth.—LEE.

THE next time Tom Styles presented himself at the residence of his unprincipled employer, the latter had no occasion to inquire the result of his visit to Jersey; he read in the looks of the ready tool of his long scheme of villainy, the confirmation of the fears which haunted him. His wealthy uncle, so stern and relentless towards his erring daughter, had fixed his affections upon her son, whom he had saved,—snatched from the very threshold of a career of crime.

A scowl knit the brow of the manoeuvring nephew: the discovery was a most unpalatable one, for it entailed the necessity of an act which might place him in the power of his confederate, a thing he had much rather have avoided.

"I need not inquire the answer, Styles," Carus exclaimed: "the old man is a greater fool than even I gave him credit for."

"It is George Markham's boy," said his visitor; "he is at school with a clergyman, where only the sons of gentlemen are received, and his grandfather has been twice to visit him there. It seems his heart is quite wrapped up in him. No doubt," he added, weighing every word he uttered, "in order to increase its effect, 'but he intends to make him his heir.'"

"Perhaps," muttered Carus, bitterly.

"Or at least a partner in the firm. That is what I should have liked to have been."

His hearer smiled: he perfectly comprehended the indirect manner by which the speaker let him know the price attached to the service which he imagined would be required at his hands.

"And that you would have been, Styles," he replied, "had I been left the sole head of the house; but with another to consult, I fear it will be impossible."

"Why, you don't intend to put up with it?"

"What can I do?"

"You told me to return for instructions."

Now these were the very things Mr. Carus Kearns resolved not to give. The ambitious hint the speaker had thrown out alarmed him; he had no intention of paying so enormously for a service which he could perform with less risk himself.

There is no confidence in the bond of mutual villainy; its perpetrators can never trust each other.

"I should have had occasion to employ you," he observed, "had the affair turned out otherwise; but, as it is—"

"You will submit to be robbed," exclaimed Styles, in a tone of surprise, not unminged with contempt.

"What can I do?"

His visitor replied only by a meaning look.

"Mr. Bently is master of his fortune; and free to dispose of it as he pleases."

"You will see this boy step into your place, then?"

"Even so; if it cannot be avoided."

"But it can be avoided," observed his accomplice, lowering his voice to a whisper; "and I feel so indignant, that were I only assured you would deal fairly by me, I'd find the means of preventing your uncle making a fool of you."

"By violence!" said his employer; then after a pause, he added, "Violence is out of the question, at least with my consent. I might not hesitate at a stroke of finesse—but crime, never! never! I must often trust to the chapter of accidents, and leave events to take their course."

"Means to try it himself," thought Styles, and he too took a resolution, the results of which will appear hereafter.

Carus paid him for his visit to Jersey and before dismissing him, gave him strict orders during the ensuing month to keep a strict eye upon the proceedings of the new firm of Thornton and Markham, and report to him by letter daily.

"Wants me out of the way," was the conclusion the disappointed ruffian mentally came to, but without suffering the slightest symptom of discontent to appear, either by word or look.

Styles quitted the chamber with the conviction that he was an ill-used man. He felt disgusted at the want of confidence, the meanness of Carus in undertaking his dirty work himself, when he had so fitting an instrument at hand.

"He may do it himself," he muttered; "but I will take care and be paid for it: with all his cunning, he shan't rob me. Doesn't like the idea of my being a partner. Maybe my chance is as good as his, though he is Mr. Bently's nephew, and I one of his discharged clerks. No, no, Mr. Carus; I have worked for you long enough: it's time I thought of myself."

The blow which Carus meditated, was intended to achieve a double purpose. The first was to remove from his path one who threatened to prove a dangerous rival in his designs upon the fortune of his wealthy relative; the second, to wound the heart of the woman he hated, through its best affections, love for her lost boy. Singly, it is doubtful whether either of the motives would have proved sufficiently strong to induce him to incur the risk of such a crime; but united, they proved irresistible.

In his evil imagination, the ruffian gloated over the disappointment it would cause his uncle, the agonies of Rachel, and the remorse of George Markham; he thought not of himself, the probability of detection, and the punishment which, sooner or later, overtakes the murderer. Calculation for once was drowned in passion; prudence, in revenge.

There was no feeling of pity for the victim—for the young life he was about to sacrifice—the hopes, aspirations, dreams of the future to be silenced and closed for ever; but, on the contrary, a fiend-like determination to persevere, reckless of everything but the gratification of a wild, insensate hate.

That same evening there chanced to be a masquerade at Her Majesty's Theatre. The opportunity of purchasing a disguise was too good to be lost; and about midnight Carus Kearn entered one of the numerous shops in the Haymarket in which costumes were let or sold. In one of these he purchased himself a pair of artificial mustaches and a military undress.

"I shall never be recognised in these," he thought. He had pondered well over the crime, and calculated every chance, as he thought, of detection. Like other criminals, yielding to the storm of passion, he imagined that he had guarded against every contingency. The fool should have remembered that a clue—fine as the lightest thread of gossamer which waltzes in the summer air—is sufficient to guide the avenging hand of justice when Providence directs the blow.

Whilst making his purchase, a fellow dressed in a greatcoat, his hat pulled over his brows, stood at the window, peering in and watching his every movement.

It was his agent, Tom Styles, who dogged him from the shop to the theatre.

"That is not the only use," thought the ruffian, "Carus Kearn intends to make of his purchase. Mean humbug! to take the bread out of an honest fellow's mouth by doing his dirty work himself!"

"I'll see," he added, after a pause, "if two can't play at the same game: hide-and-seek ain't so difficult to learn."

It was now midsummer, and this time Richard Markham saw the approaching holidays without regret. The explanation which had taken place between himself and his benefactor—for our readers must recollect that the boy still remained in ignorance of the real tie between them—had removed a weight from his heart. Formerly he had reproached himself with his fine clothes and altered position as with a crime, whilst those so dear to him were in poverty and suffering; but now that he knew such to be no longer the case, he waited patiently till his father's habits should be considered sufficiently reformed to admit of his being restored to him again.

Added to all this, he anticipated a visit from the merchant for whose kindness he began to entertain a feeling bordering upon affection. Like his mother, he had been endowed by nature with a grateful heart.

The day at last arrived on which his schoolmates were to return home. Richard accompanied them to the pier—a thing he had never been permitted to do before—and saw them embark.

For the last month the grateful boy had occupied all his leisure time in making sketches of the most interesting views of the island. These he had placed in a small album, and requested Harry to give to Mr. Morton. He had not forgotten his kindness to him.

"To my father!" exclaimed his friend, astonished at the request.

"Yes."

"But why to him?"

"Did not you tell me that he wished to have one or two drawings of the bays?" replied our hero, evasively; for he recollected the promise he had made, and scorned to break it, even indirectly.

"That's true."

"Besides, he is your father, Harry, and, I have no doubt, a kind one: quite reason sufficient for my sending them."

Fortunately the bell of the steamer rang, and there was no time for further explanation on the subject. The speaker had purposely delayed giving the book to his friend in order to avoid it.

Having watched the vessel till it had rounded the point and disappeared behind the rocks, Richard Markham and his tutor returned home.

"Do you expect Mr. Boucher, sir, this vacation?" he inquired.

Boucher was the name his grandfather went by on his visit to the island.

"I do," answered the clergyman, "but not for several days. I am quite as anxious as you can be to see him," he added, "for I feel proud of the progress of my pupil. But what is the particular motive of your asking?"

The youth informed him of a desire he had long entertained to take a pedestrian tour round the island and visit all the bays. As he was now almost a young man, and the tour under ordinary circumstances unattended by danger, the Reverend Oneas Brown at once gave his consent, and it was agreed that our hero should start on the following morning.

Those who are truly admirers of nature and have been accustomed to seek her beauties in the remote track far from the haunts of men, may imagine the delight with which our hero—who, to an artist's eye for the picturesque, joined a poet's enthusiasm and appreciation—gazed upon each fresh scene which some sudden turn in the road, or the ascent of a precipitous rock unfolded to his view; the sense, too, of liberty added to the enjoyment of the balmy air laden with health upon its wings.

In our progress through life we have visited many lands. There are few nooks in Europe but are as familiar to us as the village green on the skirts of which we were born, and over whose verdant turf we have often chased the flying ball in company with our school-companions: and yet we know of few more agreeable spots than Jersey, its extraordinary variety of hill and valley, landscape, and sea view. One must be well acquainted with the island to understand how so many attractions can be crowded into so small a space; and when understood, the wonder will increase.

Richard Markham not being pressed for time, indulged in that dreamy love of leisure which is one of the great pleasures of a poetic temperament. There was not a point of view which he neglected, or did not pause to contemplate with increased admiration and delight, for each appeared more attractive than the former.

On the third day of his tour he reached a picturesque cluster of rocks which inclose one of the numerous bays in this island, and, by stretching into the sea, seal it hermetically from the rest of the land; so that a person left there at low tide would have no chance of escape unless by boat, or the basket and cord by which the fishermen descend who put to sea to follow their perilous occupation, and return by the same means, leaving their barks attached to the rocks below.

The scene was a most tempting one, and Richard felt a strong inclination to sketch it. But how to descend puzzled him. He was not strong enough to let himself down, although many of the sailors were in the habit of doing so—for it required a grasp of iron, and a steady eye.

Just as he thought of abandoning his project of descent, a gentleman in a military undress, to all appearance a tourist, like himself, made his appearance on the rock.

"A lovely scene, young gentleman," observed the stranger, approaching him.

"Very, sir."

"An artist, I perceive."

"Only an amateur one."

"Are you about to sketch the bay?"

"Such was my intention," replied Richard Markham, "but I fear I must forego it."

"Why so?"

"I dare not trust to my own unassisted strength to manage the rope, and there are no other means of descent."

The stranger approached cautiously to the edge of the rock and peered over, regarding the bay very attentively for several minutes.

"Is there not a path round?" he inquired.

Richard explained to him how completely the bay was isolated from the rest of the land—a mere segment of sand scooped out, as it were, from the sides of the rocks, which at each extremity ran far into the sea.

The gentleman regarded the rope attentively, and the rude but strong machinery to which it was attached. To all appearance nothing could be more secure.

"I have an artist's feeling myself," he said, "and can understand your disappointment. You are not very heavy, and the windlass regulates the descent, so, if you like to try, I will let you down."

The offer was thankfully accepted by our hero, who, placing himself in the basket, in which he had previously arranged his traps, gave the obliging gentleman the signal to let him down. At first the stranger did so very carefully, watching the rope as it uncoiled itself from the cylinder. When the basket was about a third way down he paused, held the crank by one hand, and drew from his pocket a large clasp knife.

"Better cut the rope," he muttered. "No one sees me. It will be but one crash, and all will be at an end."

The blade stuck, and the speaker proceeded to open it with his teeth.

Whilst thus occupied, a carriage might have been seen winding slowly along the road. It contained the Reverend Oneas Brown and Mr. Bently. The latter had arrived sooner than he had been expected, and, in his impatience to behold his grandson, started with the worthy clergyman in quest of him.

Richard, who felt naturally very much surprised at the pause in his descent, called out to know the cause; and became alarmed on receiving no answer from above. In the event of anything having occurred to derange the machinery, he knew that his destruction would be inevitable.

Just at the spot where he hung midway between heaven and earth, like Mahomet's coffin, only in a far less satisfactory manner, jutted a portion of rock, sufficiently broad for a man to rest upon. A singular vibration of the cord warned him there was no time to lose. He sprang from the basket and reached the place of safety just as the rope broke.

An instant later and he would have been dashed to pieces.

So entirely absorbed was the assassin in the accomplishment of his horrible design, that he neither heard the rolling of the wheels over the turf nor the footsteps of those who quitted the carriage and advanced towards him. The ruffian had drawn himself to the edge of the rock upon his hands and knees, and was peering down, when the clergyman, in a tone of horror, exclaimed—

"The rope has broken!"

The intended murderer started to his feet at the words.

"It has been cut," added the speaker.

"Cut!" repeated the terror-stricken merchant.

On hearing the voice of his uncle, Carus Kearn started to his feet and fled, not doubting but he had fully accomplished his execrable design. A fellow dressed in a blouse and slouched hat, such as are generally worn by the peasantry of the island, who had all the while been watching him, started off in pursuit.

"Alas!" exclaimed the clergyman, in a tone of the deepest anguish, "the poor boy is killed!"

At the word "killed," Mr. Bently uttered a deep groan, and fell senseless to the ground.

Alarmed by the cries of the driver and Mr. Brown, several of the fishermen hastened from the cottages at a distance. No sooner were they informed of what had taken place, than two or three of them started in pursuit of the murderer.

"My boy! my poor boy!" murmured the merchant.

One of the fishermen, the oldest of the group which had gathered round the carriage, listened.

A faint cry was heard.

"Are any of the boats out?" he inquired.

"Not one," replied his companions.

"It must have been the poor fellow's ghost then."

The cry was repeated, and the more superstitious would have fled, had not the clergyman restrained them.

"Heaven, perhaps," he observed, "has miraculously preserved him. I cannot leave my friend. But some of you ascertain his fate; you shall be well rewarded."

Animated by the hope of gain, and acknowledging the possibility, although they doubted the probability, of any one escaping from such a descent, the men crept to the edge of the rock, and one of them discovered Richard Markham, seated on the projecting point which had afforded him a refuge.

Their first care was to unwind the rest of the rope; fortunately, there was more than enough to reach the place on which our hero was seated. That ascertained, one of the fishermen made a loop at the end, and his companions lowered him down.

It was a moment of intense suspense to all, for the doubt was whether he would be enabled to swing himself sufficiently near the projection, and even in the event of his doing so, whether the momentum, should the youth attempt to catch hold of the rope, might not drag them both off.

A shout announced that the first part of the attempt had succeeded: the man had obtained a footing on the rock.

"What has occurred?" demanded Richard Markham; for it never entered into his imagination that the rope had been purposely cut.

"An accident, sir."

"I thought so. The gentleman must have been very much distressed."

The honest fisherman remained silent. He judged that it would not do to unnerve the youth by telling him that his life had been attempted.

Although the gallant boy assured him that the precaution was unnecessary, the experienced sailor insisted on fastening him securely to the cord by means, not only of the loop, but his cravat, before he gave the signal to hoist him up.

The precaution was a wise one; for once in the air, the light weight of our hero permitted the rope to vibrate like the pendulum of a clock; and, ten to one, had his safety depended on his grasp alone, that it would have failed him, and he had been dashed to pieces.

So bewildered did he feel when once more secure on terra firma, that it was some moments before he recognised either his tutor or Mr. Bently. The latter, overwhelmed with joy at his escape, and still pale with terror and agitation, could only offer up a silent prayer of thanksgiving.

"My dear boy," exclaimed the Reverend Mr. Oneas Brown, "accept my congratulations."

"My escape has indeed been miraculous," replied our hero, "but I felt the rope was breaking, and contrived to obtain a footing on the rock."

"Breaking!" groaned his grandfather: "it was cut."

"Cut!" repeated Richard, with astonishment.

"Who could have committed such a cruel action? I have never wronged any human being that I am aware of."

Mr. Bently's resolution to conceal the tie between them gave way, in the presence of the danger the speaker had escaped. He pressed him to his heart, acknowledged him to be his grandson, and vowed henceforth he would encircle him with such protection that villainy should be disappointed of its aim.

"My grandfather!" repeated the still bewildered boy, gazing on the old man's agitated countenance.

"This, then, explains all." Before returning to the residence of Mr. Brown, the merchant called the fishermen around him, and distributed the contents of his purse to them. All were rewarded liberally, except the man who had descended in search of our hero. He had not received a single guinea.

"What is your name?" inquired the merchant.

"Jacob Tawgelle, sir," replied the honest fellow, in a tone which evinced surprise, rather than disappointment.

"Come to me to-morrow at the residence of this gentleman," said Mr. Bently, "and you shall have no reason to complain of my liberality; the service you have rendered me is one that a mere gratuity cannot repay. I must see that your future days are placed beyond the reach of want."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

GAMBLING.

EXTRAVAGANCE is a bad thing at any time of life, but especially a bad thing to start with. It is one of those things which strives after that which we in reality least need; it seldom proceeds honourably in the acquisition of those luxuries it is ambitious to display; it is seldom contented with what it attains; and, in most cases, ends in miserable ruin.

"In my young days they lent me cash that way, which I found very troublesome to pay."

But the chief thing is that extravagance commonly swallows up the virtues; and how to get money by any means—not stopping to inquire whether the means are honourable or not—is the grand problem which has to be solved. Ridiculous as are the excesses of extravagance, repugnant as they are to the right-thinking man, they frequently involve the thoughtless in irretrievable mischief.

Gambling is one of the commonest forms of extravagance, and one of the most prolific sources of criminality. It is the maelstrom in the ocean of life. Against its dark waters, the young especially should be warned; for he that has once entered the current, is borne rapidly and irresistibly forward to that fearful vortex which has already swallowed up its thousands and its tens of thousands.

So frightful is this evil of gambling, so monstrous are the miseries which flow from it, that it appears almost incredible for any sane person to approach it without fear. The hopes it has blighted, the homes it has riddled, the characters it has blasted, the criminalities it has occasioned, the lives which it has cost, all stand forth so plainly that every one who inquires at all must understand how base and vile a thing it is. Yet notwithstanding all this, notwithstanding the families which have been ruined, and the men who have drifted from vice to vice till they have found themselves in the hulks, a penal settlement, or the condemned cell, as guilty of blood, the vice still holds its powerful sway, and is in no want of votaries.

Of course no man deliberately enters on any course of vice for the purpose of utterly ruining himself, body and soul. He does not calmly make up his mind to pursue a certain line of conduct which must inevitably hurl him into inextricable ruin. If he thinks about it before hand at all, he makes a particular exception of his own case. He admits, perhaps, that as a principle the thing is bad, that it has been the bane of tens of thousands, that it has drawn its votaries from every class of society; but he fancies he can stand against it; he will go just so far, and not one step further; he knows when to stop and when to retreat; and, in the panoply of his self-confidence, is willing to do battle with every assailant. He is not so insane as to ruin himself with his eyes open—not he! He would not blast the hopes of his family, and send down the gray hairs of his parents with sorrow to the grave—not he! He would not deliberately plant a dagger in his own heart, or bring disgrace upon his name—not he! but he may still indulge in the excitement for a time; and—so wide awake is he—conscious of all the deceit, and stratagem, and fraud that may be attempted, that he may defy them all, and come away unscathed.

Gambling, as well as all the confraternity of vices, is deceitful. It wears no repulsive aspect; it finds its auxiliaries and best allies in amusement and pleasant company. It wears a "fast" look sometimes, and puts on, along with its sporting trim, a shrewd and cunning manner that commends itself to the uninitiated. It seems to say, The moral portion of the world is slow and dreary, and behind the age; no young man of pluck would care to be of that number. We are the go-ahead, enjoyable section of the community, who are bent on making the best of life and seeing all we can, and not willing, with these self-vaunting moralists, to ride to the grave in a mourning coach with the blinds up. Do you smoke? Do you know the points of a horse? Do you keep a book? Do you play? Do you know anything of those fashionable places known as gaming-houses? Do you frequent a billiard-room? You don't! Why, every man—so says the fascinating gambler—does one, or other, or all these things. They are the indications of manliness. They indicate that a man is a man, and not a milk-sop. Come to So-and-so's billiard-room to-night, and I'll initiate you into the scientific principles of the side stroke.

The poor dupe sees nothing but the recreation. He cannot understand that there is any harm in ivory balls or coloured cards. Then he is gradually shown that the principal amusement of these bloodless battles on green cloth arises from staking something on the chances. He bets. His attention is absorbed by the gay company, the exhilaration of the hour, the excitement connected with the thought that he may win, or the pleasure of knowing that he has won already—he does not stake much at first, but increases as he goes on. He has only come for a little amusement, or to gratify a friend. But he knows not where he stands. He knows not that he is breathing a deadly atmosphere; that beneath the fair exterior and enticing manners of the company before him, every bad passion is concealed. Perhaps their language surprises once or twice, and he is ashamed of it—blushes that he has blushed. His heart, fresh, buoyant, and confiding, contrasts with theirs; they evidently know so much more of life than he does, and he is afraid they should detect his innocence—but all this passes away after a few visits. He exchanges his warm affections for cold-heartedness; his sense of honour for base principle, and his generous sentiments for brutalising selfishness.

The objections which lie against the system of gambling, apply to every description of gambling and every amount staked. It does not signify, as far as this question is concerned, whether you bet a penny on the spinning of a teetotum or a fortune on the running of a horse. It matters not how trivial the stake, or how firm may be one's resolution never to stake large sums, and not to become an habitual gambler. The most inveterate gambler, who is dead to all moral considerations and human feelings, whose swindling operations are carried on upon a gigantic scale, commenced his career by some insignificant bet—at most a bottle of wine, a bundle of cigars, or an oyster supper. No man reaches the lowest depth of villainy by a single step; his progress is gradual: step by step he descends. One restraint after another is removed; one moral principle after another is shattered; the process of hardening the heart and blunting the sensibilities goes on from day to day. Conscience is hushed, until, bereft of every virtue, lost to all honour, humanity partakes the nature of a fiend.

Gambling is established on an unjust principle. It takes the property of another without rendering an equivalent. This is its specific design. This it openly starts with. It differs from theft chiefly in this particular,—that both parties agree to fleece each other; each is willing to run the risk of being robbed, for the opportunity of attempting to rob his opponent. Of course, in many instances, direct plunder is closely associated with gambling. Marked cards, loaded dice, preconcerted schemes, feed jockeys, hocused horses, then take the place of the "jemmy" of the burglar, the bludgeon of the foot-pad, or the pistol of the highwayman. But where the gambling is so far fair that neither takes an undue advantage of the other, and both risk their money on a chance, a direct violence is done to the moral nature of man. He pursues a career which is ruinous both to himself and his opponent. If he does not lose his money, he loses that sense of integrity which is more valuable than money. He offends against the great law that gives stability and prosperity to society; disturbs the relations of the principles of right and justice to the peace and welfare of the community; and were his example universally followed, all honourable dealings would be at an end, mutual confidence would be broken up, and the bonds of society severed.

The influence of gambling on the life of a gambler is utterly destructive of business habits. The brilliant fortunes made and marred by the fall of dice, the accidental position of a card, or the revolution of a ball, unfit for the more toilsome exercise of productive industry. The mode of gaining money by gambling seems so much easier than by daily toil, and the inducement it appears to hold out to its votaries by the promise of independence and freedom from care, overcome the scruples of a not over-scrupulous conscience. Ordinary business grows insipid in the gambler's estimation. Its routine becomes less and less interesting. His customers abandon him, and he enters upon a career of disgrace and infamy.

Young men in subordinate positions or in places of trust are in more danger than the wealthy. They cannot play the gambler's game for any lengthened time without involving themselves in serious difficulties. Thus it is so many have been ruined for life. They have gambled away everything they possessed, contracted "debts of honour" they were unable to pay, have borrowed the money from their employers, intending, of course, to replace it, have been suspected, taxed with their crime, and have had their youthful prospects blighted by a felon's doom.

And then gambling is destructive of domestic peace and of social happiness. Home has few attractions. The feverish anxiety of the gamester is never satisfied with its calm enjoyment and scenes of innocent delight. The fascinating influence of gambling is upon him; that master passion of his soul forbids all other enjoyment, it engrosses his thoughts, it absorbs his affections. It may be that a faint word of kindness escapes his lips, that a tender ray of affection sometimes crosses his heart, but both are speedily forgotten under the power of the tempter and the tyrant whose sway he is unable to resist. The ancient nations sometimes played for their wives and children as well as house and lands, and though the former are not now ostensibly put forward, they are in reality gambled away with the rest. The gamester deprives his children of a father's love and care, his wife of a husband's solicitude and tenderness, his family of a name, and himself of reputation. He brings himself and all belonging to him to beggary, and even robs them of an honoured grave.

And then gambling leads to other vices. Sins are gregarious. As soon as one is well received and established in the heart, "he taketh unto him seven other spirits more wicked than himself." Intemperance is one of the attendants of gambling. With his betting companions the youth often for the first time tastes strong drink—a few glasses of sparkling champagne! By drink he is excited to play, he drinks to sustain his courage, drinks to celebrate his success, drinks to forget his losses—so that gambling and drink keep the poor victim in a constant state of excitement, like the shuttlecock, beaten to and fro by those two bats until he falls, an idle, broken, useless toy, and is kicked out of the way or trampled under foot.

Other kindred vices there are associated with gambling, and the crimes which it has led to are registered in the Newgate Calendar. The Rugeley murder taught the lesson that the betting man may be led into any enormity—even the murder of his friend—in the service of the gambling demon to whom he has literally sold himself. Instances of murder in connection with gambling are fearfully numerous, especially in America; and where it has not led to crime, it has, in still more numerous cases, led to suicide—the gamester having lost all, utterly and thoroughly bankrupt, has put an end to his life, and crushed, in a frenzy of guilt and passion, into the presence of his Maker.

Considering gambling in the abstract, regarding its wide-spread influences, and looking at its fearful consequences, we cannot too forcibly urge on our young men to avoid every form of gambling, to shun the company of gamblers, and never, on any occasion or any pretence, to bet. In staking the smallest sum, you stake character and reputation; and the first downward step may plunge you headlong into a gulf of ruin and despair.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.

Pessimists are apt to assert that every good action is inspired by a selfish motive. Without agreeing with them in this depreciatory opinion of human nature, we must admit that it is borne out in many instances by the reports of the Charity Commissioners, as was shown in an article which appeared in a recent number of this periodical. There is so much that is interesting, for different reasons, in these reports, relative to the bequests of our ancestors, that we offer a few more extracts from the same source. We commence with a donation made for the benefit of occasional residents in a building in our immediate vicinity: that of Robert Dowe, who, in 1705, gave fifty pounds to the vicar and churchwardens of St. Sepulchre, to the end that they should cause the bell of St. Sepulchre to be tolled on the morning of each execution at Newgate, and cause an exhortation to be delivered to the condemned. In pursuance of his will the sum of £1 6s. 8d. was paid annually out of the parish estate to the sexton; who, however, is not permitted to deliver the exhortation, that having long since been rendered unnecessary by the appointment of a chaplain to the prison of Newgate.

From executions to funerals seems a natural sequence. We find that Thomas Knighton, of Slapton, left, in 1629, property to be in part devoted to the payment of the expenses of all funerals of labourers, their wives and families, of that place, and to provide entertainment for the mourners.

The state of London streets after nightfall in bygone days, with respect to light, may be inferred from the following bequests:—John Cooke, being desirous of affording light to passengers going through Thames-street or St. Michael's-lane, left by will, in 1662, to the churchwardens and vestrymen of St. Michael's, seventy-six pounds; one pound of which was to be laid out in the establishment of a candle, "to be of eight in the pound at the least," to be hung out in a lantern, at the corner of St. Michael's-lane and Thames-street, from nine o'clock at night till four in the morning, from Michaelmas till Lady-day.

A more liberal amount was bequeathed for a similar purpose by John Wardall, who gave to the Grocers' Company a tenement called "The White Bear," in Walbrook, with instructions that they should pay four pounds yearly to the churchwardens of St. Botolph, for the purpose of maintaining "a good and sufficient glass lantern, with a candle," to be fixed at the north-east corner of the parish church of St. Botolph, that passengers might go to and from the waterside all night with more security.

A farm at Threding-green, near Farnham, is subject, by the will of David Salter, to the payment of seventeen shillings per annum for ever; fifteen shillings to be spent for the purpose of relieving the parish clerk, another poor man, and four poor women, of the parish of Farnham-Royal; the money to be laid out in the purchase of six loaves, at twopence apiece, and twelve-pennyworth of herrings; the said bread and herrings to be brought into the parish church on every Sunday morning in Lent; and on every Easter Sunday morning, and there distributed among the said poor people; and two shillings to be expended for a pair of kid gloves, to be given to the parson of the parish for the time being, yearly, on the first Sunday in Lent. The gloves being apparently intended as a bribe to the clergyman to induce him to abstain from throwing any obstacle in the way of his, the testator's, obtaining a cheap immortality.

The bequests of certain quantities of herrings are numerous; and from the terms in which some of these bequests are couched, one is induced to infer either that poor people were very poor in the good old times, or that herrings were then a very expensive and recherché comestible. The churchwardens of Felsted, in Essex, distribute, as the gift of Lord Rich, on Ash-Wednesday and the six following Sundays, twelve herrings to each of a certain number of poor householders, who, to be eligible to share in this munificent donation, must be people of irreproachable character and have never had the misfortune to inhabit a workhouse.

In some instances a bequest of herrings is commuted for a trifling sum of money, in which case the poor do not appear to us to get the best of it. We cannot think, for example, that sixpence is a fair equivalent for eighteen herrings. Messrs. Finnis and Smithet were bound by a covenant in their lease to distribute to each of twenty-four poor people—inhabitants of the Isle of Thanet—nine loaves of bread and eighteen herrings in the first week in Lent; and likewise in the middle of Lent. In addition to this they were bound to give to twelve poor inhabitants of the aforesaid Isle, two ells of blanket; and yearly, in every week from the "Invention of the Holy Cross" to the feast of St. John the Baptist, to give to every poor person coming to Salmstone Grange a "dish" of peas. At the time the commissioners made their inquiries, the above-mentioned parties were in the practice of providing, annually, fifty-six pounds of dough, which was made into thirty-six loaves, and distributed at the prescribed period together with sixpence in lieu of the herrings. The blanketing was properly distributed, but as for the peas, they had not been seen for many years; probably because the word "dish" being an indefinite term, it had been construed by the lessees to mean a dish of the very smallest dimensions, consequently, not holding enough peas to make it worth the while of poor people to fetch them.

In some instances gifts were distributed, the origin of which was lost in obscurity, there being neither document nor traditions respecting it; as in the parish of Ducklington, where the rector had, as far back as the memory of man extended, paid ten pounds, which was at one time invested in veal or apple pies, which were given away in church, but subsequently in the purchase of bread given indiscriminately to all who applied for it, according to the number of their families. Not a few farmers were among the applicants, in order, as they said, to keep their right up.

In the previous article on this subject which appeared in this paper, we referred to the bequest by "a maid deceased," of a halfpenny loaf to every person residing in Hampstead. A similar bequest was made by Robert Grainger to the poor inhabitants of Godmanchester, to be divided among them by the churchwardens for the time being, who, however, suffered that duty to devolve upon the baker who made them.

It occasionally occurs that a benevolent individual thinks a little cheese would not be amiss with so much bread. Of this way of thinking was Mr. Richard Crowshaw, goldsmith, of the parish of St. Bartholomew, by the Royal Exchange, who, by his will, dated April 26, 1531, directed that £100 should be invested to provide two shillings weekly for ever, to be expended in the purchase of good cheese, to be divided among those poor people who received bread from different charities in that parish. The report states that the £100 was received by the parish officials, and that two shillings was paid weekly to a cheese-monger, who, once a month, distributed it in the shape of butter or cheese to eight poor women.

The bequest of William Higgs, of Hornchurch, deserves to be mentioned here, not from any oddity in it, but for the thoughtful kindness it displays towards a portion of the community not too much thought of. His will is of comparatively recent date, 1809, and directs that the dividends on £50 stock in the four per cent. bank annuities, should go to purchase a round of beef, plum-pudding, and ale, for the benefit of the children of the charity school of Hornchurch, Romford, and Havering. The above to be cooked and set hot before the children on the day on which the annual charity sermon should be preached on behalf of the school. The same to be continued for ever.

A contrast to the preceding is furnished by the will of Edmund Harman, who directed six and eightpence to be paid to the clergyman who preached the sermon on St. Thomas's day in Tainton Church, and a quarter of barley-meal, to be made into loaves called "cobs," and distributed among the poor children. These bequests were paid out of Lord Dynevor's estate.

Another bequest, which would doubtless have been very acceptable to the "poor children" after devouring the cobs above-mentioned, was made by William Clapham, who directed that the sum of four shillings and fourpence should be paid annually towards supplying the poor scholars of the free school in Giggleswick with a "potation" on St. Gregory's day. While on the subject of potations, we must not omit to mention that William Cooper made a will in 1621, which gave twenty shillings a year out of lands called Whitbars, in Slinford, Sussex, fifteen shillings of which he directed should be expended by the churchwardens and overseers upon a drinking, "in as good sort as they could," for the poor of the parish, the "drinking" to come off yearly on the feast of the Purification of the Virgin; the other five shillings to the said churchwardens and overseers, "to drink withal themselves for their labour and pains therein." No doubt William Cooper was looked upon as a "jolly dog" in his day, when the estimation in which a man was held depended less on the learning he held in his head than on the quantity of drink he could carry away in his stomach.

In testimony of his gratitude to Providence for preserving him in his travels by sea and land, as well as against malice and practice at home, Sir Thomas Coningsby founded at Hereford a hospital for a chaplain and eleven poor old soldiers or mariners, at the head of whom should be an old soldier of the name of Coningsby, who was to be called the Corporal of Coningsby's Company of Old Servitors, and styled in all their speeches and writings Commander of the Hospital. Touching the apparel of the "Old Servitors," he ordered that each should have, when admitted, a fustian suit of ginger colour, of a soldier-like fashion, seemingly laced, a soldier-like jerkin with half sleeves, and a square shirt, down half the thigh, with a monocado or Spanish cap, a soldier-like sword, with a belt to wear as he goeth abroad, a cloak of red cloth lined with red baize, reaching to the knee, and a seemingly gown of red cloth reaching to the ankle, also lined with red baize, to be worn in the hospital and the city of Hereford, the cloak to be worn in more distant walks and journeys. He further directed that whenever the company went to the cathedral or other public place, the chaplain and corporal should march at the head of the company, the other members following two abreast, all wearing their swords, if the law would permit them.

Perhaps the occupier of a certain farm in Yapham derived small gratification from the compulsory receipt of three shillings and fourpence, the supposed value of a pound of pepper, in return for which he was bound to take care of the minister's horse whenever the minister went to that place to officiate.

At Minehead, in Somersetshire, the commissioners found there existed a fund derived from the dividends on a sum of £1,197 7s. 7d., invested in consolidated bank annuities. The origin of this sum is very curious. In the reign of Charles the Second, an act was passed by which it was enacted that from the 2nd February, 1660, the importation of cattle from beyond the sea, should be deemed a public nuisance, and that any cattle so imported should be seized, one half to go to the person seizing them, and the other half to the poor of the parish in which the seizure should be made; the same applied to the vessel bringing the cattle. Some nine or ten years after the passing of the act, an attempt was made to import a lot of cattle into England, from Ireland. These were landed at the port of Minehead, upon which they were seized, together with the ship, and sold in pursuance of the act, and the proceeds invested by the churchwardens in the manner above-mentioned, and in the purchase of a farm of twenty acres. The income accruing from these two sources is laid out annually in coats, cloaks, blankets, and in gifts of money to the poor.

It is possible that George Staverton may have been actuated by a benevolent motive when he left £6, chargeable annually on his house at Staines, for the double purpose of recreating and regaling the poor of Wokingham, by insuring that a bull should be forthcoming every year for the purpose of being first baited, and then eaten by the said poor. The hide and offal to be sold, and Welsh stockings and boots to be purchased with the proceeds, and given to poor children. The baiting was continued until 1823, when the corporation refused any longer to sanction it. This excited great discontent among the populace, and on at least one occasion, they broke open the stable, and baited the animal in spite of the authorities; and we have an indistinct recollection of having once seen the bull, when taken out for a similar purpose, turn upon his tormentors, and hunt them, and finally throw one of them over a bridge into the water.

Among our numerous readers in London may be some "poor maidens of unblemished reputation" who may be benefited by learning that Richard Bevis, in 1602, left certain property, out of which his executors and their assigns were to pay four pound annually, for ever, to the churchwardens of the parishes of St. Mary Arches, St. Olave, St. John Bow, and All Hallows-on-the-Walls, in sums of twenty shillings to each parish, to be paid to one or two poor maidens on her marriage, provided she had lived in service for not less than two years in one of the above parishes. If any years pass without applicants, the money is allowed to accumulate, and the next claimant receives the twenty shillings together with the arrears; or if there were two claimants the money was to be divided between them. The two years of service were to immediately precede the marriage.

The town of Reading, however, is perhaps the richest in England in respect to rewards to female servants for long service. John Blagrove, of that town, directed in his will that on every Good Friday morning for ever, his successors in certain property, situate in and about Reading, should pay to the mayor £10 in a new leather purse, £6 13s. 4d. of which was to be paid to a young woman who had lived at least five years in one situation in Reading. The mayor and aldermen were to elect one woman out of each of the three parishes into which Reading is divided. As the fairest way of deciding who among the competitors should receive the money, the testator directed that dice should be provided, and the woman who threw the highest number was to be considered the winner. Subsequently to the establishment of this fund, Martin Annesley, with a desire to alleviate the disappointment of the two losing candidates, made a gift to the corporation of an amount of stock sufficient to produce the annual sum £14, £4 of which was to be paid to the woman who threw the next highest number to the winner in the aforementioned charity; and £3 to her who was fortunate enough to throw the lowest. The other £7 was to be paid in like proportions to the two unsuccessful candidates for a sum devised by the Rev. W. Boudry and J. Richards, also for the purpose of rewarding good maidservants who should remain at least five years in one situation. In this case the amount paid to the "lucky maiden" was considerably larger than in the former, she being entitled to receive the residue of the income derived from certain property, after the payment of all reasonable expenses. The two latter benevolent gentlemen seem to have had a keen eye for a profitable "job," for they expressly stated that the servants of the mayor and aldermen should be excluded from competition as long as three eligible candidates could be found who were servants of other persons. The mode of deciding the contest was the same as in Blagrove's charity—viz., by throwing the dice.

In 1740 Mrs. Rachel Veasey, desiring still further to encourage maidservants, gave to the vicar and churchwardens of the parish of St. Lawrence, in trust, £805 South Sea stock, with the dividends, on which they were to pay, among other things, four guineas each to two servant girls who had lived not less than two years in one place, in Reading. The same to be given yearly, on St. Thomas's day.

We must not omit mention of Archbishop Laud's charity. That unfortunate man provided that, in every third year, twelve poor girls should receive portions of £25 each.

It is interesting to compare these rewards left by our ancestors for servants who should remain in one place for a lengthened period, with those conferred by the Agricultural Association, which held its meeting not long since in Buckinghamshire, and of which Mr. Disraeli is the pride and ornament. All our readers must remember the pompous speeches with which they accompanied the presentation to an old man—as a reward for fifty years' service, in one place—of a sovereign and a pair of breeches.

IDLENESS.

I HAVE heard much talk of the pleasures of idleness, yet it is my firm belief that no one ever yet took pleasure in it. Mere idleness is the most disagreeable state of existence, and both mind and body are continually making efforts to escape from it. It has been said that idleness is the parent of mischief—which is very true; but mischief itself is merely an attempt to escape from the dreary vacuum of idleness. There are many tasks and occupations which a man is unwilling to perform; but let no one think that he is therefore in love with idleness; he turns to something that is more agreeable to his inclination, and doubtless more suited to his nature; but he is not in love with idleness.

A boy may play truant from school because he dislikes books and study; but, depend upon it, he intends doing something the while—to go fishing, or perhaps to take a walk; and who knows but from such excursions both mind and body may derive more benefit than from books and school? Many people go to sleep to escape from idleness—the Spaniards do; and according to the French account, John Bull, the "squire," hangs himself in the month of November; but the French—who are a very sensible people,—attribute the action "a une grande émeute de se désennuyer;" he wished to be doing something, say they, and having nothing better to do, has recourse to the cord.

RUINED.

"THE man is ruined—hopelessly ruined!"

The words startled me.

"So bad as that?" said the individual to whom the remark was made.

"Even so bad."

"Of whom are you speaking?" I ventured to ask.

"Of Jacob Atwood."

I started to my feet. He was one of my old, intimate, and long-trying friends.

"Ruined, did you say? That man ruined? Impossible!"

"There is no doubt of it. I received my information from those who have the best right to know."

"What has he done?" I asked, eagerly.

My question was received in silence, as if the meaning were not clearly apprehended.

"Is he a defaulter?"

"No." The answer showed surprise at my question.

"Has he betrayed an honourable trust reposed in him by his fellow-men?"

"No, sir; his integrity is without question. In all his public relations he was true as steel to principle."

"What then? Has he placed any portion of his property beyond the reach of creditors who have just claims upon him?"

"He has given up everything—even to the furniture of his house. Not a shilling has been retained, and he goes forth into the world a ruined man."

"O no," said I, speaking out warmly; "not in any sense a ruined man. The merchant may be ruined, but, thank God! the man is whole."

The little company looked at me for a moment or two, half in surprise.

"The man is all right," I went on. "Only the scaffolding on which the workmen stood who were building up his character, has fallen. Erect, calm, noble, half divine, he stands now, in the sunshine and in the storm. Around his majestic brow the clouds may gather; upon it the tempests may beat; but he is immovable in his great integrity."

Some smiled at my enthusiasm. To them there was nothing of the moral sublime in the ruined merchant. Others looked a little more thoughtful than before; and one said, feebly—

"There is something in that."

Something in that! I should think there was.

It was the first intelligence I had received of my friend's worldly misfortunes, and it grieved me. In the evening I went to see Jacob Atwood. The windows of the elegant residence where he had lived for years were closed. I looked up at the house—it had a deserted aspect. I rung the bell; no one answered my summons.

I could not repress the feeling of sadness that came over me. The trial must have been severe even for a brave heart like his.

"I must find him," said I. And I did find him; but far away from the neighbourhood where merchant princes had their palace-houses. The house into which he had retired with his family looked small, and mean, and comfortless, in comparison with the elegant abode from which he had removed. I rung and was admitted. The parlour into which I was shown was a small room, and the furniture not much better than we often see in the houses of well-to-do mechanics, or clerks on moderate salaries. But everything was in order, and scrupulously neat.

I had made only a hurried observation, when Mr. Atwood entered. He looked something careworn—his face was paler than when I last saw him, his eye a little duller, his smile less cheerful. The marks of trial and suffering were plainly visible. It would have been almost a miracle had it been otherwise. But he did not exhibit the aspect of a ruined man. He grasped my hand warmly, and said it was pleasant to look into the face of an old friend. I offered him words of sympathy.

"The worst is over," he answered, with manly cheerfulness, "and nothing is lost which may not be regained. I have found the bottom, know where I am, and there is strength enough left in me to stand up securely amid the rushing waters. The best of all is, my property, which has been apportioned to my creditors, will pay every debt. That gives my heart its lightest pulsations."

"I heard that you were ruined," said I, as we sat talking together; "but I find that the man is whole. Not a principle invaded by the enemy—not a moral sentiment lost—not a jewel in the crown of honour missing."

He took my hand, and grasping it hard, looked into my face steadily for some moments. Then, in a subdued voice, he made answer—

"I trust that it is even so, my friend. But there were seasons in the worse than Egyptian night through which I have passed, when the tempter's power seemed about to crush me. For myself I cared little; for my wife and children everything. The thought of seeing them go out from the pleasant home I had provided for them, and step down, far down, to a lower level in the social grade, half distracted me for a time. For them I would have braved everything but dishonour. I could not stoop to that. And so I passed the fiery ordeal, and have come out, I verily believe, a better man. No, no, no, my friend, I am not ruined. I have lost my fortune, but not my integrity."

And so the man stood firm. It was not in the power of any commercial disaster to ruin him. The storm raged furiously; the waves beat madly against him; but he stood immovable, for his feet were upon the solid rock of honour.

WANTING IN LOVE TO EACH OTHER.

Oh! there's a theme to make each dream,
And power to make each hour

As light and sweet as the bloom at our feet

Which is culled from the May-day flower.

Men seek too high for things that are nigh,

Foregoing the help of a brother;

Selfish and blind is the state of the mind

When wanting in love to each other.

Oh! there's a plan to make each man

Happy the whole day through,

Nor need he to roam to better his home

Would we find him but work to do.

There's plenty of soil on which to toil,

And add to the golden dower,

Would men be but wise, and speedily rise

In loving and aiding each other.

Oh! there's a way to make each day,

And power to make each night

Bright as the moon and the sun's afternoon,

Would men be but wise and unite.

There's plenty for all, the great and the small,

And plenty to give to our brother;

We too often waste in our hurry and haste

By wanting in love to each other.

RIGHT REV. SAMUEL WILBERFORCE, D.D., BISHOP OF OXFORD.

THE eminent services of William Wilberforce, the illustrious philanthropist, have conferred an immortality on the family name. Instead of pursuing a career of ambition, this celebrated man resolved to give his abilities, influence, and energies to the cause of human progress. The "odious traffic in human flesh" particularly engaged his attention, and to the abolition of the slave trade he devoted his whole heart and soul. He entered upon life with an income of ten thousand a year, besides the savings of his minority and a considerable inheritance from his uncle. His personal expenditure was by no means extravagant. He did not marry till nearly forty; and his family, when he had one, was not expensive. It was supposed he would leave his children affluent provided for, and so he did, but not in the monetary sense of that term. Misfortune fell upon him. The immediate cause of the disaster was a speculation into which the family were duped. Wilberforce himself had, it was always understood, no personal concern in the affair, but was involved as a guarantee for one of his sons, through whom he lost fifty thousand pounds. But this loss, large as it was, would not have ruined him, had he not impaired his resources by years of unbounded and unostentatious charity. In a letter to his eldest son, the good man says: "I never intended to do more than not exceed my income, Providence having placed me in a situation in which my charities of various kinds were necessarily large. But believe me, there is a special blessing in being liberal to the poor, and on the families of those who have done so; and I doubt not my children will fare better, even in this world, for real happiness, than if I had been saving twenty or thirty thousand pounds of what has been given away."

This anticipation has been wonderfully realised in the case especially of his third son, the present Bishop of Oxford, who by talent of no ordinary kind has risen to the episcopal bench, and whose abilities have invariably been employed in the advancement of popular education.

The subject of our sketch was born in 1805, and was educated at Oriel College, Oxford. There he attained high classical and mathematical honours; and there also, at the age of three-and-twenty, he married the daughter of the Rev. John Sargent. The early death of this devoted and affectionate woman is said to have considerably deepened the natural gravity of his character.

Dr. Wilberforce owed his first preferment to his father's old friend and colleague, Lord Brougham. The history of Brougham's liberality in this instance is not so generally well known as it deserves to be.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT REV. SAMUEL WILBERFORCE, D.D., LORD BISHOP OF OXFORD. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

He not only ministered to the wants of Wilberforce, which any chancellor would have done, but the activity of his mind discovered the exact wants of the tried champion of liberty, and by delicate attentions to the sons he conferred, without appearing to do so, just the very things which the father most required.

As a preacher and an orator, Bishop Wilberforce is studiously elegant as well as naturally graceful. He is scholarly, pensive, and highly intellectual; he is neither fiery in his sermons nor stormy in debate, and consequently, it is sometimes said he is unimpressive. But he is a thinker who appeals to thinkers—a subtle logician, somewhat metaphysical; but he argues with so much benevolence that he wins golden opinions from those who are opposed to him either in religion or politics.

His intellectual cast of mind, and the elegant simplicity of his style, are observable in those literary productions which he has issued at different times; amongst these may be mentioned "Agathos," "Eucharistica," "Note-book of a Country Clergyman," "The Rocky Island," and several volumes of sermons. Though we may differ from many of the principles set forth in these productions, we cannot but acknowledge that the ability which they exhibit is of no common order, and that they evidence the matured intellect and cultivated taste of their author.

But that which peculiarly distinguishes the career of Bishop Wilberforce, and which favourably contrasts with that of some of those who occupy seats on the same bench, is the interest which he has always taken in educational movements. He is not of that number who would shut out the light of knowledge from the public; he is not one of those who make education the privilege of a class—the birthright of the titled or the wealthy; he has no fear of any evil consequence resulting from the universal diffusion of useful information; and, whether as a humble vicar or a spiritual peer, he has maintained the same consistency of conduct, and invariably advocated the right of the people to education. He has done good service in this noble work. At the educational conference last year he took an active and very useful part, presiding over that section which had for its object the evidence afforded by the reports of her Majesty's inspectors as to the early age at which children are taken from school. At the inaugural meeting he availed himself of the opportunity of reminding the distinguished personages whom the subject had drawn together, that the great question of our day was not how to provide schools for children, but children for the schools. Of course this is the main difficulty. The impediments in the way of educating the children of the humbler classes are not removed by the erection of new schools; old obstacles have to be removed, and parents and employers awakened to the necessity which exists for the education of the young in all those branches of knowledge which are calculated to make them useful members of society. No man knows this better, or more earnestly advocates education, than the Bishop of Oxford; and in joining the crusade against ignorance he sets a worthy example.

As a churchman Bishop Wilberforce has been eminently successful. He is among the youngest on the episcopal bench. His early preferments were—rectory of Brightstone, archdeaconry of Surrey; rectory of Alverstone; canonry of Winchester; chaplaincy to Prince Albert; deanery of Westminster. He was consecrated Bishop of Oxford in 1845; he is Chancellor of the Order of the Garter, and Lord High Almoner to the Queen. He is the patron of thirteen livings, and the annual value of his see is £5,000.

THE SIEGE OF RHODES.—IV.

THE second part of the Memoirs of Caoursin is known, as we have said, as the Recital of the Adventures of the Unfortunate Zizim. Bajazet and Zizim, sons of Mahomet II., disputed the inheritance. The two princes, at the head of their respective armies, encountered each other on the road to Bures, in Asia. Zizim, after performing prodigies of valour, was defeated and pursued, and, by a strange turn of fortune, he, who, under the command of Missah, was one of the most daring assailants during the siege, was compelled to seek an asylum with the grand master of Rhodes.

Caoursin, who appears to have played an important part in the romantic adventures of this fugitive prince, narrates, with much feeling, the story of his strange vicissitudes. In the spirit of true chivalry, the grand master hospitably entertained his former enemy. The accompanying engraving represents a banquet given on his arrival. Anubsson, the grand master, and Zizim are seated opposite one another, under a canopy, at a table furnished with a repast. Two other groups occupy the other part of the picture.

ZIZIM DINING WITH THE GRAND MASTER OF RHODES.

At the back the attendants are bringing in provisions; at the side and under the arched entrance are a number of musicians playing on various instruments to "enchant the Mussulman prince." "But," says Caoursin, "Zizim was more surprised than flattered by our manners. Our mode of eating was very inconvenient to him. He tasted our meats on the point of a knife, and regarded everything with wondering curiosity. When our musicians essayed to charm his ear, he seemed but little to appreciate their attention. The only thing he regarded with admiration was the antics of a Turkish slave who had escaped from the mines, and who indulged in an uncouth dance to the harsh dissonance of a barbarous instrument."

The asylum which Zizim found at Rhodes excited the indignation of his brother Bajazet, who threatened the island with his vengeance if the prince was still permitted to remain concealed there, and offered an annual grant of forty thousand crowns to the grand master, on condition that the refugee should be given up, or kept under surveillance. The alternatives were embarrassing; for a host to turn traitor or to become a gaoler was neither Christian nor chivalric. The grand master despatched ambassadors to the pope and other Christian princes, soliciting their advice as to the brother of Bajazet. Caoursin, bearing the missives from the grand master, proceeded in company with the prince. Zizim wished to land in Hungary, at Sicily, or Egypt, where the enemies of Bajazet were numerous: but policy did not allow of this step, and Zizim was taken to France, while Caoursin proceeded to negotiate the affair at Rome.

Louis XI. gave him but a cool reception; but he was allowed to take up his residence at a small town belonging to the Knights of Malta. There he passed the interval during which the negotiations were being conducted by Caoursin at the papal see. At last permission was obtained for him to come to Rome, the pope offering him an asylum in that city, and thither he proceeded immediately on the receipt of the invitation. It was a strange spectacle, that of the entrance of a Mussulman prince into the metropolis of christendom, and it was made with extraordinary pomp.

Innocent VIII., who had heard of the cruelties committed by the Turks on the Christians in the East, attached considerable importance to the visit of Zizim, and founded fresh hopes upon it. No sooner did Bajazet receive intelligence of his brother's reception, than he forwarded an embassy to Rome, making a similar offer to that which he had submitted to the Knights of Rhodes. Unlike those gallant chevaliers, however, the pope accepted the terms, and engaged to hold Zizim as a hostage for the good faith of the infidels towards Christians in the East. This state of things lasted about three years. About that time (1492) Innocent VIII. died; and, unhappily for the exile, Alexander VI. was elected to the papedom.

The first thought of the new pope was to secure the person of Zizim, to use that prince for or against Bajazet as the exigencies of the case might require, in opposing the enterprise of the adventurous Charles VIII. On entering Italy at the head of his army, assembled for the conquest of the kingdom of Naples, Charles, who remembered having seen the young Ottoman prince in France, was anxious to relieve his misfortunes. Alexander immediately threw the refugee into the castle of St. Angelo, and kept him in strict confinement. Besieged by the French army, he was at last, however, compelled to sign a treaty, stipulating for the deliverance of the Turkish prince into the hands of the king of France. Zizim was accordingly liberated, and went with Charles VIII. to Naples. On the road, he fell sick of an unknown disease, which baffled the skill of his physicians, and terminated fatally on the 25th of February, 1493. Little doubt could be entertained of the real cause of his death. He had been poisoned by the treachery of Alexander, who thus sought to defeat the schemes of Charles VIII.

Caoursin returned to Rhodes, and spent his latter days in that tranquillity which his long and useful services had so well earned. He arranged the statutes of the order, and on his death, in 1501, the office of vice-chancellor, which he had held so long, and the duties of which he had so ably discharged, devolved on Barthelemy Poliziano.

The execution of the manuscript from which our designs are accurately copied, is a beautiful specimen of the condition of art in the fifteenth century. It is evident that very great pains have been bestowed upon it by its producer; there is so much delicacy of detail, so much careful elaboration, so much judicious arrangement in every one of the compositions, that the talent of the artist cannot be doubted for a moment, nor its value to the antiquarian overestimated. It is certainly one of the most curious and interesting manuscripts in the Imperial library.

LOVE LEVELS ALL RANKS.

CHAPTER II.

Give me back, give me back the wild freshness of morning! Its tears and its mists are worth evening's best light.

MOORE.

WE left our young heroine in the act of informing Betsy that she had got her father's permission to accompany Mr. Wiley to London; but if her master saw no objections to the trip, Betsy was instantly alive to all that could be urged.

"And who was to shell the peas, and dust, and sew up that dozen bags her father had brought in the day before?"

"But I'll not always be working like you, Betsy," the child said, indignantly.

"And why not, miss, I'd like to know, bless us? And the child's wits! What's to hinder, when your father earns his honest penny in the sweat of his brow? It's all ailing of books, and young gentlemen, and nonsense. The child's head is turned;" and Betsy shook her own over the ironing-board in a spirit of prophetic foreboding.

But the project was carried out, nevertheless, and Christine, wisely rejecting the offer of Betsy's best ruffled collar, which would have enveloped her like a cape in its ample dimensions, and the fringed parasol which had been the pride of her heart for many a Sunday, could scarcely believe the reality of her good fortune when she found herself in simple gingham frock and wide cape bonnet seated between her father and Mr. Wiley on their way to the city.

She did not heed the disorder and squalor of its environs, looking to the crowd of buildings, the fluttering flags beyond; and, when they really came to the gay shops, and bustle and glitter of a thoroughfare, she seemed suddenly to be transported to fairy-land. It was a never-to-be-forgotten day. Mr. Wiley gave up the morning to his little pupil; and unmindful of fashionable friends or acquaintances whom he might meet, sought out what he knew would best please her. There was an enchanted palace of a picture-gallery, where, at first, she shrank back from the lovely ladies who seemed coming forward from the tall golden frames to meet her; and where, afterwards, she stood dreaming before soft, sunlit landscapes with summer showers drifting up over them, or tall mountains rustling blue and dim in the distance. After that, while the spell of artistic beauty was still upon her, she found herself grasping her companion's hand tightly as they stood in the dim interior of a church, such as he had described to her, watching the light from the stained windows flicker over the kneeling figures of the few worshippers, while the solemn swell of the organ, and the deep-toned voices of the choir thrilled her to tears, not of sadness, but a tender, mournful happiness she could not describe.

When they went out into the sunshine and the stir again, it had lost much of its interest to her, and she was not sorry to hear Mr. Wiley say, "Now we will go and see my mother, and rest awhile;" though, the evening before, as they had planned their day's amusement, she had dreaded this visit most of all, for she knew she should be afraid of such a grand lady as his mother must be.

"Do people really live in these tall, beautiful houses?" Christine asked, as they came to the palaces built by the Divoses of this later generation. And the splendidly dressed women that she passed were marvels of beauty and grace, outshining the lilies of the field in their fluttering raiment.

"This is my mother's house," Mr. Wiley said, at last.

It was not one of those tall, fine houses, though many of them stood close beside it. So Christine had courage to enter, clinging to Mr. Wiley's hand closer than ever as the servant who opened the door eyed her curiously.

Still, the house was unlike anything she had ever imagined in the elegance of its old-fashioned draperies and dark, heavy furniture. There were mirrors, too, in which she saw herself as if she had been some one else, a shy, shrinking figure, leaning against a great arm-chair covered with heavy brocade now faded from its original brightness. More pictures, though she could not make them out in the dim light; and marble figures on pedestals, motionless and white.

It was a relief when her friend came back again, saying, "Now, then," in his old, familiar tone, and led her up the broad staircase, and through an upper hall to his mother's own room. The lady, reclining in an easy-chair by the open window, was very like her only son in voice and manner. She seemed to understand the child's shyness, and began to talk of the flowers Christine had brought, and thank her for them and for the care and attention Henry said she had given him.

"You have made him well again," she said, making the child sit down on the cushion at her feet, and looking so fondly into her son's face as he tossed the hair back from his broad, white forehead, and threw himself at length upon a lounge near them.

After a while Christine began to feel less strange and shy as she sat there with her hand in Mr. Wiley's, as they always walked about the garden at home, and the mother and son talked on of their own affairs, not flattering her with notice. Their conversation was of some cousin who had come to stay with Mrs. Wiley; and presently they heard a gay voice singing through the hall; and Henry started up with a sudden crimson flush upon his face as the door opened, and this cousin Caroline appeared. School-girl as she was, she seemed already a miniature woman of fashion in dress and ornaments, and a certain coquetry of manner when she saw who was with her aunt.

For Christine, only a half curious, half contemptuous glance that the child scarcely noticed, so absorbed was she in the beauty and grace of this sudden apparition; but on her cousin fell all her most bewitching smiles, and a playful war of words instantly began between them.

These were the grand events of the day, as Christine thought them over in the gray evening light, once more seated in the humble conveyance that had brought them to the city. She had grown wonderfully older and graver, suddenly, as if she had encountered some enchantment such as she had read of, where people were held for years in what seemed the passing of an hour. An enchantment, indeed, from which she was never to be set free, though she could not understand it then, had changed the whole current of her life, and had given new hopes, and purposes, and aims to be worked out slowly in the dreaming girlhood on which she had now fully entered.

CHAPTER III.

"The daughters of the year,

One after one, through that still garden passed.
Each, garlanded with her peculiar flower,
Danced into light, and died into the shade;
And each, in passing, touched with some new grace,
Or seemed to touch her, so that, day by day,
Like one that never wholly can be known,
Her beauty grew."

FIVE years of seed-time and harvest passed. The day talked of by Mr. Wiley had arrived. A railroad, upheld by broad, gray arches of masonry, spanned the sluggish stream, and in part the empty common, trailing its clouds of dust and vapour high above them, and yet leaving the leafy greenery of the gardener's home scarcely sullied by the intrusion.

The land and its products had fulfilled the prophecy and doubled in value, thanks to its noisy neighbour. Still the old life went quietly on; the same frugal industry turned the rich brown soil in spring, and watered the tender plants in the droughts of summer. Outward changes there were: greenhouses filled with rare exotics, and graperies, where clusters almost like those of Eschol hung basking in the sunshine, stretched through the upper garden; and hither, as the city crept nearer and nearer to them, came many a gay party to lounge, and admire and carry away their brilliant spoils.

It was here that the gardener himself was chiefly to be found. His skill and unwearied superintendence guided every helping hand; but the passion of his life was gratified in this more delicate fostering of bud and blossom. Many a visitor stopped to talk with him of other pursuits than those to which his life had been devoted, and all respected the honest simplicity and uprightness of character which he still preserved, the heritage of his Scottish forefathers. Sometimes, but rarely, strangers caught a glimpse of a young girl simply dressed, with no other ornament than the flowers which she wore in the braids of fair hair, wound about her head in an old but graceful fashion.

The house and flower-garden were her especial domain. The house had grown gradually to show the all-pervading taste of a refined and tasteful mistress.

Well-filled book-shelves were the only additions to the furniture of the sitting-room; but the round table had its place near the window, and never wanted its vase of the choicest blossoms, arranged with the same innate love of adornment that had dictated the prodigal bouquets of roses, and blue flags, and peonies, in which the child had delighted. In the window-seat were to be found a work-basket, and a volume or two most prized at the moment; for this was Christine's favourite nook, where she worked, and read, and dreamed away those hours rescued from busier household tasks.

She had never seen her friend since the day of his sudden departure, still kept fresh in her memory by the bitterness of a loss she had forgotten must come. She had not even heard from him after the one package of books he had promised her, and the precious note of remembrance which accompanied them. But the impulse which that friendship had given to her inner life had never passed away. In all things she desired to approach that atmosphere of knowledge and perception in which he lived; and her father, happy to find that she did not pine for companions and the novelty which all young people crave, was well content to furnish such aids as he could to her vigorous self-culture. Nor were they the less dear companions and friends. She neglected no housewifely arts, because they ministered to his comfort; and, for her sake, he roused himself to new interest in pursuits that he had loved in his own youth.

June with its prodigal floral treasures had come once more. Waving foliage, clustering vines, whole beds of spicy pinks, and fragrant mignonette and heliotrope, clumps of old-fashioned garden flowers, and, over all, the pendent blossoms of the acacias, transformed the gardener's cottage to a bower of beauty. Christine's tasteful hands were busy weaving bouquets for the city visitants that thronged the walks; and splendid equipages were drawn up beneath the grateful shade of the willows that bordered the water-course. It was no rare thing to see ladies, as gaily attired as those she held so unapproachable in that grand holiday of her childhood, strolling through the walks, peering curiously at the narrow windows of the cottage, and lavishing epithets of pleasure and admiration on the occupant of this new Eden; while Christine watched them from her sheltered nook, detecting what was false in tone and manner, and unconsciously assuming the more gentle and womanly charm of real elegance and good breeding.

"They toil not, neither do they spin," she often thought, contrasting her lowly lot, void of envy or jealousy, with their butterfly existence, but wondering, nevertheless, if her life would always pass devoid of the change and excitement in which they seemed to live.

"Quick as you can, Christy," said her father's voice, rousing her from such a day-dream. The throng had not set in as yet; and, standing at her window, she had watched, idly, the dismounting of a tall, dashing equestrian, who had strolled away towards the greenhouses with her attendant cavalier. "Old Jacob brought in the order from that gentleman on horseback, and they have but a little time. You are to use plenty of white rosebuds and heliotropes, of course." And away went the busy gardener, leaving the basket of freshly culled buds and flowers for her to arrange.

It did not seem fitting, from the glance she caught of the haughty girl who had so lately passed her window—this selection of pure and delicate blossoms.

"I should have chosen pomegranate bells, and crimson fuchsias, scentless japonicas. She is not gentle or loving;" and she thought so the more as, going to seek her father when her task was ended, she came suddenly upon the pair as they stood before a glowing pyramid of tropical bloom and verdure. They did not see her for the leafy screen at the angle of the narrow pathway; and, startled into sudden shyness, she stood hesitating whether to retreat or advance; a picture herself in her waiting attitude, her simple dress of white according well with the fair throat and unstudied, graceful poise of her well-shaped head with its banded hair. "No; she is proud; she will not return his affection: she cannot understand it." And all this was plainly read in the flashing, half scornful smile of the beautiful woman who pulled so carelessly leaf after leaf of the crimson rose she held, and scattered them on the floor through the white fingers gleaming with jewels. Her cheek, just shaded by the floating plume of her riding-hat, had a colour almost as deep and glowing; and she stood with her eyes looking full into the face of her companion, who had just ceased to speak as their unwilling confidant came upon the scene.

"Once for all, Henry," she said, speaking slowly and distinctly, "let us understand each other. I have always loved you as much as I am capable of loving, perhaps. Being your wife is out of the question. We are both too poor; and I for one have far too expensive tastes: greenhouses, for instance," she added, laughing lightly. "Come, let us go."

As she turned, Christine could not have escaped without what must have been an awkward encounter to all. She shrank closer behind the orange-trees that sheltered her, but she could not avoid seeing the faces of both as they passed. One strangely familiar; the broad, white forehead contracted now as if with pain, the lips compressed on the ivory handle of the riding-whip he carried. Yes! it was her old friend, too much absorbed in stifling the present pang of wounded pride, and perhaps affection, to heed the past; following the careless steps that had trodden down so relentlessly all bloom and verdure from the future.

To be so near—to know his secret—to see his pain—and yet be passed in forgetful unconsciousness, when her life had been one long, grateful ovation to him! It was hard—very hard!—this abrupt awakening to the reality of their position, and what she must needs have been to him—a passing figure on a busy scene; her very remembrance blotted out! The lady is free again. Yes, she understood it now. The haughty school-girl had grown to the heartless woman of fashion, coldly rejecting love for ambition.

She felt stunned and guilty as she stole away and gained the house again. The sun was obscured by the heavy cloud of a rising shower; the room had suddenly grown low and gloomy; the breath of the heliotrope, from the flowers she still carried, sickened her; and, with a gesture of impatience, she flung them far out into the lawn to wither and die there.

"I have dreamed of this meeting so often," she said to herself, passionately; "of thanking him for all he has done for me, of triumphing in what I have achieved alone, because he told me that I had but to will, and to be what I know I am. And he has never thought of me! Why should he? Why have I expected it? Why should he, indeed?" she groaned inwardly.

Not that she had dreamed of love, either given or returned. Boundless gratitude and the simplest admiration were what she had treasured up for him; but seeing him so spurned had awakened a new emotion. It was as if some one had trampled a flower in the dust, and she had stooped to gather it, and wiped the petals carefully, and placed it in her bosom, knowing all the while that it would wither and die there.

The bright freshness of June did not return again. The shower came slowly down in great, black drops, and heavy, distant mutterings of thunder then passed on, without refreshing the heated soil, leaving a sultry atmosphere and low, trailing clouds behind. It was the commencement of one of those feverish heats that sometimes come thus early in the season with the intensity of August. It might have been the heavy air, so unrefreshing even in the early morning, that took away all zest in her favourite pursuits. As it was, the simple pleasures of her life had suddenly palled upon her. A restless discontent, that made all duty irksome, took the place of the cheerful activity her father so loved to see. This selfish bitterness of spirit, this struggle against her solitary lot in life, for a time blinded her to the change in him. The drought, of necessity, called for more active exertion on his part, and he had by no means the strength of early manhood to meet it; and Christine's sad awakening came with the burning fever and ravings of delirium that summoned her to her father's sick-bed.

Self-reproach could not restore to her the great blessing of her life, which she had so unthankfully overlooked—her father's love and companionship. The bitter remorse of her long and solitary watch was unavailing. Only in death came loving recognition to those heavy eyes, and a blessing, which she took for pardon also. Now she was, indeed, alone; no friend, no relative that she could claim; no one to turn to for comfort or counsel. The narrow grave held all; and she lay in the darkened room, shutting out light and sound, almost incapable of realising the extent of the calamity which had overtaken her.

But daily life will not be cheated of the servitude it exacts from all by grief.

"If I might be so bowld, miss," said old Jacob, appearing on the threshold, his torn straw hat held respectfully in his hand. He had long been employed upon the place, a contemporary of Betsy, who still reigned in the domestic department, as he did among the labourers that were now necessary where the gardener and himself had once accomplished all.

Christine had, for the first time, forced herself to enter the common sitting-room, where she knew her loneliness would be more keenly felt. It had been tenantless from the first of her father's illness, save for the gloomy occupation of the last two days—the straight and motionless form that had been carried from thence to the grave. Everything still held the formal aspect of the funeral—the chairs ranged against the wall; the books and work laid out of sight; the bird, removed from its accustomed place—the shade of the vines above the window—sang elsewhere. Christine leaned back in her mother's chair, and elevated her eyes with a sudden feeling of suffocation. What a blank and desolate future stretched away before her!

"If I might be so bowld," said the old servant again, rousing her from this miserable trance.

"Jacob, is that you? Yes; come in." And thus bidden, he ventured to unfold his errand.

"If miss could tell me whether the men was to go on with the ditchin', and if thim new beds was to be laid out the day?"

Hitherto he had managed as well as he could without direction, but he could not go on so always, and he wished to show her his zeal in her service.

"Indeed, Jacob, I do not know; I have not thought. Cannot you manage for yourself what ought to be done?"

"Mayhap the mather left some directions; and it's not always a poor man like me can be usin' his own wits."

"But to-day, Jacob; do as you like to-day. I will try to think."

She only grew the more bewildered, until the old man's words suddenly came back to her mind: "Mayhap the mather left some directions." The few keys of the house were in her own possession; and, for the first time in her life, she opened the desk which had been the mysterious admiration of her childhood. The little drawers, inlaid with some dark, foreign wood, it seemed almost wrong to open them; and everywhere were traces of the methodical neatness which had kept the garden in its exact and beautiful order. Bills and receipts, recently filed, filled the desk itself. A few letters were in one compartment; in the next, a little packet, tied with a white riband, and lying upon withered rose-leaves, the few letters of her mother's courtship, the last flowers that she had gathered, preserved sacredly. And then she came upon a lawyer-like packet, sealed and bound with red tape, but directed in her father's hand, not to herself—the well-known name stood out clear and unmistakable: "For Henry Wiley, with the charge of all I may leave behind." The date was long ago—the summer of his visit to them; and Christine understood how one of those long talks, which had interested her so little, had resulted in this inclosure, doubtless the "last will and testament," which alone could guide her since he was gone.

The address was given in full, so that there was no obstacle to forwarding the packet at once, or sending to apprise him of its existence. The quick bound of glad anticipation at seeing the only one she had ever called friend in this her hour of need, was followed by pain, and doubt, and indecision. But the choice was not hers, and she accepted her father's guidance for her, resolving that the old bond should never be alluded to, or even be suffered in remembrance.

"He does not know. It will only be for a little time of grave formality, our intercourse," she said to herself, after a long and miserable conflict. So the packet was sent to its destination; and, once more roused to life and its interests, she awaited the result with feverish impatience.

The twilight of the day in which her messenger had been despatched, long before she could reasonably have expected a reply, the garden gate swung to, its sharp click sounding through the stillness, and a firm, quick tread came up the gravelled walk. Christine knew instantly that he had come. As a child, that step had summoned her to meet him; but now she sat quite still, pressing her hands together, while her heart almost stopped beating. Then, if the day had brought any little grief or trouble, she had stolen her hand into his, and leaning against his shoulder, told it all, to be soothed and comforted. Now, when all her desolate loneliness came suddenly back upon her, she must meet him with the formality of a stranger, summoned only by business, not sympathy.

He came hastily into the room, for the doors were thrown open to the summer night, but paused as she rose with an outward calmness that mocked the tumult within. She had seen for herself the little change time had wrought in him; but he had thought to find the child he had left weeping silently by the great clump of hawthorn.

"I beg your pardon, madam." It was the courtesy of the stranger, not the greeting of a friend. "I thought only of finding Christy, my little friend." Then, as she approached still nearer, and offered her hand silently, the truth seemed to flash upon him, and he stopped suddenly.

"It cannot be Christine, surely. I had forgotten how years go on. Why did you not write to me before—before it was too late?"

He had, indeed, thought only of the child, and had come out with the feeling of interest newly awakened to take her away to his mother's house. Now, seeing this grave and gentle woman so strangely confided to his care, he scarcely knew how to act, or what suggestion to offer.

"I sent for you, Mr. Wiley, because I did not know of another living person to whom I could go for advice, and my father had directed me to you. He never had forgotten you, I think."

"Did he know I had been away all this time, pushing a young man's fortune in the world? I came here once, just after my return, but I was ill, miserable; and I hurried away without asking for any one."

If she had not been a silent witness to the truth of this, she might not have comprehended how, being so near them, he had turned back from the threshold.

"I must go back to-night"—he felt instinctively that his first plan had failed, of carrying her with him; "but I will come again to-morrow and bring my mother, if she is able. You are all alone. It will not do for you to remain so in this solitary place."

"What am I to do? I do not know. You must tell me if he left any wishes for me to fulfil. It is all so sudden, I do not comprehend it yet."

"You must talk to my mother, Christine, and think of me as your brother now and always. I was your brother, you know, when we said good-by. Let us begin there again."

"If we could but do so," she thought, wistfully, grateful for his kindness, but with a heavier heart each moment that they sat there, so separated by time and circumstance.

"But Henry, my dear," said the more practical Mrs. Wiley, "indeed this is a great deal to take upon yourself, the care of a young, uneducated girl, probably romantic and wilful."

"She is not what you think, mother, if you were only strong enough to drive out there. I do not know where she has been educated, but I always told you they were not common people; and her manner is excellent, only so grave and quiet—too much so, after such a loss as she has had."

"She was very shy, if I remember her—a plain, nervous little thing. I should have thought her grief would have been more boisterous."

"And I thought to find the same, and then imagine my surprise when this tall, graceful girl came forward. Indeed, she must not be left alone; it is not right or proper."

Mrs. Wiley thoughtfully rinsed the delicate china cup she held, and refilled it for her son. It was a comfort to have him with her again after his long absence, and she could not bear to deny him anything. Still, she knew his enthusiastic temperament and headlong impulses often carried him too far. So she put off her decision, and promised to accompany him.

She went unwillingly, for, in the first place, she had come to be a confirmed invalid, and the exertion was a great deal for her; then, again, it was a most embarrassing position. If she offered this "young person," as she called her, mentally, a home, how was she to be placed in the household? Not as a dependent, for Henry had assured her she was secure from want; nor yet as a companion, bred as she had been, and tainted in all probability with the associations of her childhood. "Still, we must do something. They were certainly very kind to Henry years ago, and her father must have placed a great deal of confidence in him," was her last thought as the carriage stopped at the gate.

In her isolated and unconventional life, Christine had not yet assumed the outward garb of mourning. She stood at the house door in her usual simple dress of white, marked only by a black ribbon, fastening it at the throat; pale and grave as Mr. Wiley had described her, but more lovely than even he had thought, seeing her only in the dusk of evening. All latent thoughts of patronage faded away from his mother's mind as she came forward to meet them; and she urged her son's plan, as if her own, with a warmth that surprised as much as it gratified him. And Christine, lovely, grateful, yearning for a woman's sympathy, ceased to reason with herself, and for the time at least consented to become her guest. The more willingly, that, now the excitement was over, the utter loneliness and isolation of her position had forced itself upon her in the long sleepless night which had followed Mr. Wiley's interview. And thus her new life began, transplanted to the sphere for which she had so often yearned, and surrounded by the solicitude and care of a home. She was very grateful to them both, and happy in being able to serve in any way the gentle invalid lady, condemned to many weary hours of pain and seclusion. As for Mr. Wiley—she deceived herself, as many a wiser woman has done, with the thought of self-conquest—was he not her brother?

At her own home, old Jacob and Betsy nodded out their wise opinions over the kitchen fire, while Mr. Wiley came and went with the authority with which the will had invested him, caring for the orphan's interests as if they had been his own; but these ancient gossips knew nothing of the scornful yet bewildering beauty that haunted his daily life, with a mocking jest at his wondrous philanthropy, and a luring glance belying her proud words.

But this could not always be. The shelter was grateful, but the orphan could only rest, not remain there. She had no real claim upon them. She knew not but that she must labour for her daily bread. Sometimes she coveted such a necessity; her spirits were sinking beneath this forced inaction and the uncertainty of the future. This was what she believed, but in truth she had overtasked herself. Living beneath the same roof; seeing daily that her old faith was not a deception of childhood, but that he was in reality noble and generous, thoughtful and earnest in heart, the old dream became a living reality, and she loved him.

"Do not go. Can you give me half an hour—for business?" explained Mr. Wiley, as he saw his ward's startled look. She had risen to follow his mother from the breakfast-room, for of late she had steadily avoided being alone with him.

"I am sorry to trouble you, but I have arranged everything as far as I could without your approval; and I think—I scarcely know how to tell you; but I think there had better be a sale."

She understood his hesitation, she thought. It was a hard thing to tell her that she had no claim on any home; but she had prepared herself for it. She knew how much her father had expended on his late improvements without having lived to realise the expected increase from them; and she was glad the crisis had come, and she was to know exactly her position and her future dependence. Yet it was hard to think of that home—she had been born and they had died there—passing into the hands of strangers. It must have been so in any event, for she herself could not have assumed the responsibility and care connected with it. That was the only comfort.

"I must see it once more." That was all she could say for a sudden quivering of voice and lip, as she turned to the window to gather composure as she could. In the close city square, on which it opened, the leaves were already falling, and the grass was dry and withered. The first melancholy gusts of autumn whirled the dust from the street in a blinding cloud. She had been with them so many months, yet it scarcely seemed a day; and this was the very room into which she had first been ushered, when, as a child, all was strange and dream-like in the great city. It was not less so now as she leaned, unconscious of the pressure, against the hard framework of the window. How came she, an inmate of this house, the daily companion, almost friend, of the lady she had then looked up to with all a child's awe and reverence? And soon this also would seem unreal, when she should go forth to win her bread among strangers; but she said to herself many times that she was glad the time had come.

When she turned, the room was empty. He was ever thus thoughtful and considerate for his mother, who poured forth continual praises of his almost womanly thoughtfulness and care—and invariably for her; though she had been so cold and thankless, he must have thought her so. Alas, if he only knew how much it cost her to preserve this barrier between them! Even if there had been no other love to engross his heart, what could she have hoped for, poor, friendless, uneducated, inferior in every way to the woman he should marry?

Many delays had arisen, and October's first frosts had withered the foliage and blackened the borders before her wish was accomplished, and she stood once more, and for the last time, in the home of her childhood. She shivered as she gathered her shawl more closely about her, and wandered through the silent, sheltered alleys alone. Even in this little time there were traces of neglect. Dead leaves encumbered the lawn, or had gathered at the crosswalks, as they had never been suffered to remain in her father's lifetime. The first climbing rose that her mother's own hands had planted was broken from its fastenings, and hung down trailing and drooping to the ground. The few dahlias and chrysanthemums that remained in blossom only mocked the general decay. There was nothing to keep her there; and yet she walked up and down, beneath the leafless trees sighing in the wind, with a swift though unsteady step, a whole lifetime crowded into one wintry twilight. The gray sky, the cold, piercing wind, the withered foliage, the fallen leaves, suited her bitter mood. "Homeless, friendless—save for charity—withered and unclasped, like the rose-tree," was the burden of her thought. Then she stood quite still by the hawthorn, and lived over again the evening that had first brought change and anticipation to a hitherto untroubled life, looking around with a troubled, yearning gaze on these familiar haunts, that memory might do her work as faithfully, and hold them all in keeping for future years.

She did not know of the pitiful, watchful gaze that had followed her all that weary time, or the work that recollection was doing in another heart.

When she turned at last, and came slowly towards the house which she so longed yet dreaded to enter, the faint gleam of the western sky was lost, and night had gathered over all things. She groped her way blindly, for tears as well as darkness, to the room sanctified by all she had ever known of household love; and the long-suppressed sorrow gave way to sobs and bitter moaning that shook her whole frame as she leaned her head on the mantle above that desolate hearth.

"Christy!"

She knew it was madness, but the passionate impulse of the moment could not be resisted. She felt those kindly arms open to receive her; she craved their shelter but for one brief, delirious moment; and so she lay, drawn, as in years gone by, close to a heart beating as strongly as her own, while the circling arm pressed her closely, more closely still.

"If you would but love me, Christy, and let me be your home."

It was part of the dream; and she shivered as she had done in the blast without, when she said "love you!" knowing all that divided them, forgetting nothing of that even in her momentary madness.

"When I think of the little child that nursed and tended me so patiently, years ago," he went on to say, "who had even then such a solitary loving heart; when I see all that she has wrought out unaided; when I know what a daughter she has been, and will be to a mother who needs a daughter's care, the false enchantment of boyhood fades away from a heartless, soulless woman; and I know who holds a nobler sway, if she will but reign, if she will but wait and prove me."

Still she did not answer.

"Only one thing has kept me silent since I first began to picture you always in our home, loving, and gentle, and womanly, as now, yet these, of right, as my wife"—and he stooped lower for an instant, until his cheek almost touched the white passive face lying on his breast—"when I came to know that you would be almost an heiress, and that other claimants for what I coveted would not be lacking, or that the world might say I had urged my suit unworthily. But you will not think it, Christy. You knew me long ago; and I had meant to try the test, and stand aside for a time, but I could not. How could I help gathering you here—here—and seeking a right to comfort you?"

It was not all said at once, but brokenly, as if he had guessed the current of her thoughts, and followed it.

"My father loved and trusted you," she answered, in the stillness of the room, that seemed yet shadowed by his presence; "and I—" She could not tell him in words what he had always been to her; but hid her face once more upon his breast, and let the gesture speak.

She had found the only home that could replace that which she was leaving for ever.

[In our next number will appear the opening chapters of a truthfully descriptive and highly instructive tale, entitled, "Hope Evermore; or, Something to Do"—a tale of the Ragged Schools, and illustrative of the advantages of Temperance, by a writer of high repute.]

INFLUENCE OF MOTHERS.—Newton sinned away his early advantages, and became an abandoned profligate; but the text and hymns his mother had fixed in his mind in his infancy and childhood were never effaced, and finally fastened him to the cross. Cecil tells us that, in the days of his vanity, though he withstood so many pious endeavours, he never could resist his mother's tears. Wilson, late Bishop of Calcutta, in his narrative of intercourse with Belington, the assassin, says he could make him feel nothing till he mentioned his mother, and then he broke into a flood of tears. "In the morning sow thy seed; and in the evening withhold not thy hand."

Chemical Experiments.

The ordeal of fire.—In the year 1851 a French chemist, M. Bontigny d'Evreux, surprised the learned people who had come together at the British Association not a little, by inviting them courteously to accompany him to an ironfoundry hard by (Messrs. Ransome and May's, at Ipswich) and see him perform his ablutions. Now the operation of washing one's hands, though a very necessary operation, is usually nothing particularly agreeable to look at; but when a gentleman like Professor Bontigny expressed his intention of washing his hands in a bath of molten iron, glowing from the furnace, the case was something peculiar. Not only did M. Bontigny fulfil his promise, but he convinced all present, that each and every one could do the same with impunity by following his instructions. The fact is, that if the human hand, slightly moist—as all human hands are—be tranquilly thrust down into molten iron, and tranquilly removed, the laws of nature are such that the skin cannot burn; on the contrary, a feeling of coldness is experienced when it touches the molten metal.

The only points of danger to be anticipated are, lest the hand be dashed into the molten bath instead of quietly immersed in it, and lest the metal be cooled down to such a degree that solidification take place whilst the fingers are immersed in it. The hotter the molten metal, the less danger there positively is, so that when the experimentalist, not able to command the aid of molten iron, uses molten lead as a substitute, as in a lecture-room, for example, he had better take the precaution of moistening his fingers by contact with the tongue before subjecting them to the molten ordeal. The rationale of this curious phenomenon is as follows:—Fluids of various kinds, when they come into contact with very hot bodies, rise in vapour, and sheath with a vaporous layer the exterior of the heated body. In this manner the moisture of the hand supplies a layer of vapour, cutting off all contact with the molten metal; and in like manner, a red-hot ball of silver may be dipped into water without perceptibly affecting the latter for a considerable time. Moments pass, and the silver ball may be seen to continue red-hot and glowing, unaffected by the water around it in any degree. Soon, however, when the silver ball has cooled below a certain pitch, contact ensues, and the water boils turbulently over. Many cases of steam boiler explosions are determined, doubtless, by similar agency. A boiler, from some cause, becomes so exhausted of water that portions of the former are heated to redness, the consequence being that, a layer of vapour interposing itself between the boiler and the water, steam is no longer generated. The engineer now lets in a gush of water, and, strangely enough, the boiler explodes at the instant of its cooling. Wherefore? Because, when cooled to a certain pitch, contact ensued between its sides and the water charge.

For the successful performance of the experiments mentioned, namely, dipping the fingers in molten iron or lead, not the slightest precautions are necessary beyond those mentioned. Nevertheless, to make security doubly sure, the skin, previously to the experiment, may be immersed in a solution of sal ammoniac—a body which readily evolves vapour when brought into contact with a hot surface. An individual, having his feet protected in this manner, may deliberately walk across red-hot bars of iron.

To place a teakettleful of boiling water upon the naked hand without injury.—Whilst a teakettle is boiling upon the fire, and for a few seconds after its removal, a layer of steam exists between the bottom of the teakettle and the water which it contains. Now the layer of steam in question is a bad conductor of heat; wherefore the teakettle may be taken direct from the fire and laid flat upon the hand without giving rise to any disagreeable perception of heat. I have heard the success of this experiment attributed to a deposition of soot upon the outside of the teakettle. This is an error: a perfectly clean teakettle, heated over a charcoal fire, which deposits no soot, may be handled as described above.

To fill with smoke two apparently empty bottles.—Rinse out one bottle with hartshorn and another bottle with spirit of salt; next bring the bottles together mouth to mouth; both will at once be pervaded with white vapours. The vapours in question are composed of sal ammoniac—a solid body generated by the union of two invisible gases.

To reduce tin instantaneously to white powder.—Take a piece of tin-foil—not tin plate, which is merely iron plate covered with tin—lay the foil in a saucer or upon a plate and pour upon it strong aquafortis. Violent chemical action will at once ensue, ruddy vapours will be evolved, and the tin-foil

THE PALACE IN THE FORT OF ALLAHABAD.

ALLAHABAD.

ABOUT four hundred and seventy miles from Calcutta, near the confluence of the Ganges and the Jumna, stands the ancient city of Allahabad. It is said to occupy the site of the Palibothra, which took rank amongst the finest cities of the old world. The excellency of its position on two great navigable rivers renders it one of the most eligible seats in India for extensive commerce; but the natural advantages which it undoubtedly possesses have not been rendered available in modern times.

The condition of Allahabad is so reduced from its former greatness, and its decayed mud houses afford so striking a contrast to the stories of its ancient palaces, that the natives call it Fakeerabad—an expression equivalent to the City of Mendicants, or Beggar-town.

There is, however, a certain description of sanctity attaching to Allahabad. The extraordinary junction of the sacred rivers—for it is supposed that the Sereswati unites itself underground both to the Ganges and the Jumna—has given an importance to the city which it would not otherwise possess. Thousands of pilgrims from all parts of India annually visit its neighbourhood, for the purpose of bathing in the holy streams. "When a pilgrim arrives, he sits down on the bank of the river, and has his head and body shaved so that each hair may fall into the water, his sacred writings promising him one million of years' residence in heaven for every hair so deposited. After shaving he bathes; and the same day or the next performs the obsequies of his deceased ancestors.

"The tax accruing to government is three rupees each person; but a much greater expense is incurred in gifts to the Brahmins sitting by the river side. Many persons sacrifice their lives at this holy confluence by going in a boat, after the performance of certain ceremonies, to the exact spot where the three rivers unite, where each devotee plunges into the stream with three pots of water tied to his body. Occasionally, also, some lose their lives by the eagerness of these devotees to rush in and bathe at the most sanctified spot at the precise period of the moon when the immersion possesses the highest efficacy. The Bengalese usually perform the pilgrimages of Gaya, Benares, and Allahabad in one journey, and thereby acquire great merit in the estimation of their countrymen."

The number of pilgrims to Allahabad has in some years amounted to two hundred and twenty thousand.

One of the most interesting structures at Allahabad is the fortress represented in our engraving. It was erected in the year 1583, by the famous Indian Emperor Acbar.* It is a building of very great extent and remarkable strength. Since the British have held possession it has been thoroughly repaired, and rendered all but impregnable. It completely commands the navigation of both rivers, and is regularly and strongly defended. With the exception of this fort there is little to interest the visitor in Allahabad. The town itself, with its paltry houses, is unattractive and unimportant. It has been in the possession of the British since 1765, but the European residences are few and insignificant.

On the breaking out of the revolt at Benares, the mutineers of that station marched on Allahabad, and were joined by the native troops. A frightful slaughter ensued. The officers were at their mess, when the alarm-bugle was sounded to bring them on parade, where they were shot down right and left. Nine young ensigns were bayoneted to death in the mess-room; fifty Europeans were murdered, the treasury plundered, the prisoners released from gaol, the whole station destroyed—house after house stripped and fired. The Sikhs on this, as on so many occasions during the insurrection, behaved splendidly, and rendered most efficient service. The fortress was most gallantly defended, a steady fire being kept up on the city night and day. This was continued till the Madras Fusiliers and other reinforcements came up; they marched out, drove the insurgents from their position, and took possession of the city.

will crumble to white powder. Only one metal besides tin (antimony) gives rise to a similar result when similarly treated. Hence an action like that described points to either tin or antimony. But tin is a tough, and antimony is a brittle metal; wherefore the discrimination between them, even by the agency of this one test, is complete.

To reduce metallic lead to the state of powder, which burns immediately on coming into contact with the air.—Dissolve sugar of lead in distilled water, and pour in a solution of tartaric acid, until a white powder ceases to fall. Collect this white powder, dry it, and when dry, pour it into a little glass bottle. Coat the bottle with clay, and dry the clay in an oven. Next lay the bottle amidst some unlighted charcoal, light the charcoal, and raise the heat to redness. Continue the application of heat until smoke no longer escapes from the bottle; finally dextrously stop the mouth of the bottle with a pledget of clay. Remove it now from the fire and allow it to grow cold. The bottle will hold a mixture of charcoal, resulting from the burned tartaric acid, and finely-divided lead. If the contents be poured out, they at once take fire. Several metals burn readily when reduced to the condition of fine powder. Iron is a notable instance of this, but the method of obtaining iron in powder is beyond the competence of a beginner.

To make a liquid which feels cold to the touch, but which renders the hands and face when smeared with it luminous.—Immerse a piece of phosphorus, about the size of a pea, in an ounce or so of ether. After a time, portions of the phosphorus will dissolve, yielding an ethereal solution of that substance. If the hands and face be rubbed with this solution, which is perfectly innocent, the operator will seem on fire, and will pass for a very respectable ghost.

INFERIORS is a term which many are ever ready to apply to those beneath them in station. Men may be our superiors without being our equals, and many may be our nominal inferiors to whom we are by no means equal.

The Matron.

NO. X.

VARIETY is charming, whether in nature or art. Variety is more than charming in cookery, for it is conducive to health, and consequently to happiness.

If our poor soldiers had been blessed with a "Matron" to plan and cater for them, they would not have been nauseated with sodden beef on every day of their lives. When we grow tired of our food, we dislike it: when we dislike our food, it disagrees with us: when food disagrees with us, we fall ill, and not unfrequently die. The monotony of the dinners in our army goes far to account for that frightful mortality England now deplores. There is no economy effected by this stupid sameness: on the contrary, it is most extravagant. By its deleterious effects it wastes human life, and it wastes the treasure of the state into the bargain; for when blunders and neglect have caused the death of one poor soldier, another must be recruited, and this is no small item of expense.

Don't tell me that all this is not a matron's concern. It is the concern of the great English family. None of us ought to look on with indifference and behold our sons, or other people's, hurried to an untimely grave when a little good management might have substituted health and joy for gloom and disease.

I invite those in authority to listen to my advice, and also to procure all the back numbers of "The Matron." They may find in them many a thing it concerns them to know, and of which they seem at present lamentably ignorant. In the meantime I beg my own dear readers to be all the more attentive to the truths I have propounded, and which passing events have illustrated.

In my last number I recommended a dinner to which the master of the house could safely invite a friend. It consisted of roast pork, apple-sauce, peas-pudding, savoy cabbages, and potatoes. I hope the guest had a good appetite, and enjoyed the repast, and that all the family did justice to the dinner. Of course they did not eat up all the meat. Cold, and with cold apple-sauce, the remainder will make an excellent dinner for the next day, with the addition of greens and potatoes. Pancakes ought to follow, because a good quantity of nice dripping from the hot roast pork of the day before, is just what is wanted to fry them. Now for a good receipt for pancakes:—

Break four eggs in a basin, add four tablespoonfuls of flour, and a little salt; beat all well, mixing by degrees half a pint of milk, a little more or less according to the size of the eggs. It must form a thick batter. Add a little powdered cinnamon, or any other spice you fancy. You may make the batter with only two eggs; but then you must use a little more flour and milk. Place the pan on a clear and moderate fire; put in it some of the pork dripping and melt it. A small teacupful of batter will make a good sized pancake. Pour it into the boiling fat. When set, and one side brownish, lay hold of the fryingpan at the extremity of the handle, give it a sudden but slight jerk upwards, and the cake will turn over on the other side, which when brown dish up. Fry one cake for each member of your family, and let them be eaten with sugar, and with lemons, if easily procured.

I can fancy I hear some pale-faced, unhappy wife saying to me—

"Ah, ma'am, what's the use of your teaching me the best way to have my house tidy, my hearth bright, and my bit of dinner tempting, since my husband never gives me a kind word, nor even a smile, do what I may; and when things go wrong in his business, I tremble to hear his step in the passage."

Yes, there are such men as this poor woman's husband—to the disgrace of our country be it spoken—men who vent all their irritation on their unfortunate wives. Is this manly? is this Christian?

I have not spared cross, sulky wives, and I shall not spare surly husbands. They are sure to make homes wretched; even if they are married to saints upon earth.

We all have our trials; and we know very well that the masters of families have their full share of trials. But they should come home in a kind spirit, and endeavour to take counsel with, and procure comfort from their wives, not increase their sorrows by spreading terror and misery where peace and love might reign.

Men have to endure a great deal of fatigue and much contradiction and disappointment in their battle with life; but women have often to endure still more in the performance of their home duties. House-keeping is full of difficulties. In home economy—and economy is only another word for management—there is the very essence of difficulty:—viz., multifarious details. True, women have good heads to combat with and conquer these difficulties; but when they have done so their efforts should be appreciated. Clever though women may be, they are very sensitive. Sneers and harsh words chill their energies, and diminish their powers; and in the very nature of things, an angry, unjust man cannot have so good and useful a wife as the considerate Christian husband; and how can the surly man expect to have kind, gentle, and amiable children? His precepts will be of little avail, if his example has recommended vulgarity and harshness. The ill-temper of either husband or wife suffices to render home unhappy.

As the irritation occasioned by the trials of life tempts us all (in our turn) to indulge in ill temper, we should earnestly implore divine aid to assist us in conquering this evil propensity. Good humour is the sunshine of home. In its genial warmth all the flowers of life expand.

Hannah More, one of our best moral writers, has a little poem so completely in harmony with my advice, that I think I cannot do better than quote a few verses of it for your edification.

"Since trifles make the sum of human things,
And half our sorrows from our foibles springs,
Oh, let the ungentle spirit learn from thence,
A small unkindness is a great offence.
To bless mankind with clouds of flowing wealth,
With power to grace them or to crown with health,
Our little lot denies; but heaven decrees
To all, the gifts of ministr'ing to ease.
Large bounties to bestow, we ask in vain:
But all may shun the guilt of giving pain.
The tender offices of patient love,
Beyond all flattery and all price above;
The mild forbearance of another's fault,
The taunting word suppressed as soon as thought;—
On these heaven bade the choicest gifts descend,
And crushed ill fortune when he gave a friend."

A friend! And what friend should be more kind, gentle, and forgiving to a wife than her own husband? Has he not taken her away from every other friend? In this respect, the humblest married woman who reads these pages, is as worthy of attention as the royal bride, Princess Frederick William of Prussia—for each has left her kindred to follow her husband, and if either is unhappy, the husband is responsible—responsible, at least, for any unhappiness caused by his indulgence in ill temper.

SIR HUMPHRY DAVY.

It is a fact that no man lives without a history which is invaluable to every other man. The remark holds true in regard to the poorest and most ignorant: the pauper who wears out his life in the loneliness of the workhouse, the beggar who solicits alms in the streets, and the obscure, who are not known a yard beyond their own habitation—have each a history which, if it could be properly written, would prove full of pathos and interest. Truly has the poet written "The proper study of mankind is man," and to this study we find ourselves again and again turning with an enthusiasm ever new and young. But, alas! how many noble lives have remained unwritten; and, comparatively speaking, how few biographies challenge the attention of the student who wishes to understand the life of the centuries which have passed away, never to return. A few names only stand out with the brilliancy of fixed stars, and by a powerful fascination fasten our gaze upon them. HUMPHRY DAVY takes his place among them. He was born at Penzance, on the shore of St. Michael's Mount Bay in Cornwall, on the 17th of December, 1778. He was one who even from his cradle gave promise of something bold and adventurous in his future career; for it is left on record that he was a strong, brave infant, that he walked at nine months old, and that before he had arrived at the age of two years he could speak fluently; before even he had learned his letters he could say his little prayers, and detail with eloquence the stories which had been related to him. He had an exceedingly quick perception, and very retentive memory, inasmuch that before he had learned to read he could repeat by heart a considerable part of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." Notwithstanding that his natural powers were of a very high order, in the school to which he was sent he made but little progress. Young as he was, he was disgusted with the manner in which knowledge was offered, and at the indiscriminate ear-pulling, which was his master's favourite mode of punishment. Still, his schooldays on the whole formed a happy period in his life; for his companions in study, finding him an attractive story-teller, lavishly heaped upon him the kindness which only boys can bestow, and only boys truly appreciate. And even as a boy he began those experiments which made his manhood's life so remarkable and useful; so true is it that when we turn our eyes upon the early history of men of genius, we shall find the child the father of the man, prophecies of coming power, and in the actions which at the time attracted but little attention, the germs of deeds which caused the world to pause and wonder. Upon leaving school at the age of fifteen, he seems to have spent a whole year in uncertainty as to what he was to be and do in life. He had no one to advance his worldly interests, and his choice of a profession was left very much to himself.

After having lived for some time in an unsettled state, studying in a desultory manner by fits and starts, and yielding to the allurements of occasional dissipation, and the amusements which constitute the delight of active youth, as fishing, shooting, swimming, and solitary rambles, he was apprenticed to a surgeon then practising in Penzance.

Upon the death of his father, he suddenly became a thoughtful, serious youth, and formed plans of study which he studiously carried out; allotting so much time per day to the various pursuits in which he felt an interest, particularly theology, botany, chemistry, and physics. The manner in which he acquired knowledge was chiefly through his own observations and experiments. For awhile he allowed the ardour of his mind to be wasted by engaging in a vast number of pursuits, but gradually he concentrated all his energies upon the study of chemistry, and soon commenced experiments which undoubtedly laid the foundation of his future eminence. One of these experiments having attracted public attention, an offer was made to him to become an assistant in the pneumatic institution at Bristol, which office the youth accepted; and in this city he found his means of improvement greatly increased, and he also acquired the friendship and esteem of many who were most distinguished in science and literature. As yet he had never visited London; but his fame had excited some attention in the metropolis, and when he journeyed thither in 1799, he was received with the greatest respect by men no less eminent than Coleridge, Gregory, Southey, and Watt. Encouraged by the general approbation which his experiments called forth, he rushed into print, and published essays on light and heat, which, although containing many erroneous views, plainly indicated an original and ingenious mind. His attention to the study of chemistry at this time was most intense and assiduous, and he ran the risk of all enthusiastic students, that of burning himself out before he accomplished anything great and lasting. But a little rest fortunately restored him from a dangerous and painful illness; and when not quite twenty-three years of age he was engaged in the service of the Royal Institution of Great Britain in the capacities of assistant lecturer in chemistry, director of the laboratory, and assistant editor of the journals of the institution, allowed to occupy a room in the house, and received a salary of one hundred guineas per annum. His success at the Royal Institution immediately succeeded his appointment. He did not allow his enviable position to damp his ardour or to be other than a healthful spur to increased exertion; but his splendid career really commenced when he delivered his introductory lecture in the theatre of the Royal Institution to a crowded and enlightened audience. This lecture was afterwards published, and contained an eloquent exposition of the advantages to be derived from the study of the sciences. The most eminent men of the day now began to attend his lectures, and such was his progress in knowledge that the managers of the institution dignified him with the title of Professor. The success of his varied experiments made his lectures extremely popular, while the articles which he occasionally published in the Journal of Science attracted the attention and sympathy of scientific men throughout the country.

Our space will not allow us to examine in detail his various and important discoveries, and a bare mention of some of them must suffice. He paid particular attention to galvanism, tanning, and agricultural chemistry. He prosecuted the most minute inquiries into the nature of the alkalis and earths hitherto undecomposed. He overthrew Lavoisier's theory in respect to the nature of oxymuriatic acid, and gave an entirely new view of the combinations of phosphorus and sulphur. But his grand discovery was that of the safety-lamp, one of the most beneficial applications of science to economical purposes yet made, and by which thousands of lives have been preserved. Upon visiting the mines in Scotland, he became practically acquainted with the dangers which the miners daily incurred, and, with a benevolence eminently characteristic, he gave his whole attention to the remedy; and at last invented a lamp which the miner could use in defiance of fire-damp. This invention, the certain source of large profit, he presented to the public, not caring to secure to himself the benefit of it by a patent. His memorable words on this occasion were these:—"I have enough for all my views and purposes; more wealth might be troublesome, and distract my attention from those pursuits in which I delight. More wealth could not increase my fame and happiness. It might undoubtedly enable me to put four horses to my carriage, but what would it avail me to have it said, that Sir Humphry Davy drives his carriage and four?"

He was not spared to enjoy a green old age, for when fifty years old the grave opened to receive him. He died covered with honours. The College of Trinity in Dublin testified their sense of his high scientific merits, by conferring on him the degree of LL.D. The honour first of a knight and then of a baronet was granted him, and upon the death of Sir Joseph Banks, the venerable president of the Royal Society, Davy succeeded to the chair, which he retained till forced to quit it by ill health. He left behind him a name of which every Englishman may be proud, and an example by which the poorest child of genius may be stimulated to mental activity and industry.

TO MY SISTER.

ELLIE, there's a timid luster
Dreaming in thy soft, dark eyes,
Like a tender starlight trembling
In the midnight's mystic skies;
And thy features are as faultless
As if carved by Grecian art;
And men bow before thy beauty—
But I love thee for thy heart.

There are thoughts of winged brightness
Hiding in thy spirit's cells,
As young humming-birds of summer
Hide among the lily-bells.
May no sudden autumn drive them
Rudely from their fairy nests;
To fly on through chill and tempest
With worn wings and bleeding breasts.

Last night in the dreary darkness,
When the haunted winds went by,
Fires burned within my bosom,
Till I thought that I must die;
And I felt that it was fearful
To go out alone, alone—
Through the shadow and the silence,
To the eternal and unknown.

Yet the dimness and the mystery
Of the lands beyond the grave,
And the deep and thundering echoes
Of each dark and chilling wave,
That seemed breaking near to sweep me
Down in Death's unsounded sea,
Could not fright this heart, my sister,
From the angel-thought of thee.

We have heard the fairy legends
Of the twilight's dreamy time,
From the same sweet lip together
Falling like a magic chime;
And we've left our home and wandered
Through a waste of Upas dew,
Yet mid wind and blight and blackness,
I have ever found thee true.

It were more than death to leave thee,
Idol of an ardent heart;
And I often ask the angels,
May we never, never part.
Yet the years must bring us changes,
And wherever thou mayest go,
Ellie, may thy fate be brighter
Than thy sister hopes to know.

A HEARTY LAUGH.—What a capital, kindly, honest, jolly, glorious thing a good laugh is! What a tonic! What a digester! What a febrifuge! What an exorciser of evil spirits! Better than a walk before breakfast, or a nap after dinner. How it shuts the mouth of malice, and opens the brow of kindness! Whether it discovers the gums of infancy or age, the grinders of folly or the pearls of beauty; whether it racks the sides and deforms the countenance of vulgarity, or dimples the visage or moistens the eye of refinement—in all its phases, and on all faces, con-torting, relaxing, overwhelming, convulsing, throwing the human form into the happy shaking and quaking of idiocy, and turning the human countenance into something appropriate to Billy Button's transformation—under every circumstance, and everywhere, a laugh is a glorious thing. Like "a thing of beauty," it is a "joy for ever." There is no remorse in it. It leaves no sting, except in the sides, and that goes off. Even a single unparticipated laugh is a great affair to witness. But it is seldom single. It is more infectious than scarlet fever. You cannot gravely contemplate a laugh. If there is one laugher, and one witness, there are forthwith two laughers. And so on. The convulsion is propagated like sound. What a thing it is when it becomes epidemic!

Small Change.

THE British soldiers found in Delhi an idol with large diamond eyes. That idol was unlike the ghost of Hamlet's father. It had speculation in its eyes.

He who finds pleasure in vice and pain in virtue is a novice in both.

SEE what I am, not what my father was, is an old and excellent Arab saying.

ALL men might be better reconciled to their fate if they would recollect that there are two kinds of misfortune at which we ought never to repine—that which we can, and that which we cannot remedy; regret being in the former case unnecessary, in the latter unavailing.

"WOULD you not love to gaze on Niagara for ever?" said a romantic young girl to her less romantic companion. "Oh, no," said he, "I shouldn't like to have a cataract always in my eye."

WHY PRUDENT MEN PROSPER.—The origin of wealth is in a moral feeling—self-denial.—"Here is something I will not consume or throw away—I will take care of it, store it up for the future use of myself or others." The man who first said and acted thus, laid the foundation of a virtue upon earth.

DID you ever think of the principal mistakes in friendships? Mrs. Browning says: "I have observed that disappointment here arises chiefly, not from liking our friends too well, or thinking of them too highly, but rather from an over-estimate of their liking for and opinion of us."

A POSTMASTER, puzzling out a very uncertain superscription on an Irish letter, jocosely remarked to an intelligent son of Erin who stood by, that the Irish brought a hard set of names to this country. "That's a fact, yer honour," replied the Irishman; "but they get harder ones after they arrive here."

"I AM not afraid of a barrel of cider, sir." "I presume not; I guess the barrel of cider would run at your approach."

THE CLOCK.

A mechanic his labour will often discard,
If the rate of his pay he dislikes;
But a clock—and its case is uncommonly hard—
Will continue to work though it strikes.

"I AM willing to split hairs with my opponent all day if he insists on it," said a very distinguished lawyer in a speech at the bar. "Split that then," said the opponent, pulling a coarse specimen from his own head and extending it: "May it please the court, I didn't say bristles."

A WRITER of much merit says, that with a wife a husband's faults should be sacred. A woman forgets what is due to herself when she condescends to that refuge of weakness, a female confidant. A wife's bosom should be the tomb of her husband's failings, and his character far more valuable, in her estimation, than his life; and vice versa.

"SURE, and I'm heir to an immense estate under my father's will. When he died, he ordered my elder brother to divide the house with me; and, by St. Patrick, he did it—for he tuck the inside himself, and gave me the outside."

LOVERS must not trust too implicitly to any of their five senses. A tender swain reproached his fair one with letting a rival kiss her hand, a fact that she indignantly denied. "But I saw it," "Nay, then," cried the offended fair, "I am now convinced you do not love me, since you believe your eyes in preference to my word."

In fishing, we have occasionally seen a big pike watching a bait, and evidently weighing the chances between getting a good dinner and being a good dinner. He should have been able to weigh very accurately—he had so many scales.

MR. HATCHER, a gentleman of considerable talent, has advertised to bring out a volume of eastern poetry. Inasmuch as the poetical genius of the east end seems to be yet in the egg, we are pleased to see that it is to have a Hatcher.

LIGHT, like the circulating blood which returns to the heart, is supposed to return to the sun, after having performed the functions for which it was emitted from that body. Even so will the soul, our intellectual light, return to its divine source when released from the body, to whose earthly purposes it has ministered.

POETS have been called the "Johnny Horners" of the world, all except the pie with the thumb in it. They are crowded into the corners everywhere. The humblest newspaper has its poets' corner, and so has Westminster Abbey.

SMART.—A lady, describing an ill-tempered man, says, "He never smiles but he feels ashamed of it."

ERRORS.—A man should never be ashamed to own that he has been in the wrong; which is but saying that he is wiser to-day than he was yesterday.

Our Editorial Table.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE AND TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

Commencing with the next number (No. 16), CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER will be published by Messrs. PETTER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, Ludgate Hill. If any difficulty should be experienced in obtaining the necessary supply, in consequence of the greatly increasing demand, application is requested to be made to Messrs. Petter and Galpin direct. All the back numbers of the Paper have been reprinted, and may be had upon application. In order to give every person an opportunity to commence with the New Series, no extra charge will be made for the back numbers of the New Series until further notice.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO OUR READERS.—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ANOTHER NEW TALE.—In our next number will be commenced another new and original tale, truthfully descriptive and highly instructive, by one of our most popular authors, entitled "Hope Evermore; or, Something to Do"—a tale of the Ragged Schools, and illustrative of the advantages of Temperance.

CHINA.—With our next number will be published a splendid Panoramic Map of China. This map, which is remarkable for the accuracy with which it has been designed and the care with which it has been engraved, equals in size the Panoramic Map of India, which was published with No. 1 of the new series of this Journal. The price of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, No. 16, New Series, together with this beautiful Panoramic Map of China, inclusive, will be three-halfpence. In addition to the Panoramic Map, there will be in the number an engraved plan of Canton. On the back of the Panoramic Map will be published an elaborate and carefully prepared view of Hongkong, with the approaches to Canton from that important settlement; and also a mass of statistical and general information, giving a clear insight into the history, products, and capabilities of this vast empire. The events now occurring in China, both political and religious—the deep interest which is felt concerning a country which contains upwards of three hundred millions of inhabitants, or nearly one half of the population of the whole globe—its "crockery metropolis," exclusive customs, ancient colonisation and history, &c. &c., will necessarily render this Panoramic Map and accompanying engravings, upon which no expense has been spared in the drawing, engraving, and electrotyping, of great value and interest, both on account of the engravings themselves and the information which the letterpress supplies. Should our subscribers or the trade experience any difficulty in obtaining the necessary supply of this number, the demand for which cannot fail to be very great, they will oblige by applying direct to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard.

EMILY, LOUISA, and Co. wish to present their minister with a gown, and ask us of what material it should be made, and by whom. It may be made of silk, or of fine bombazine; but it will require to be made by a regular robe-maker.

A BAD WRITER, C. H. E., and OTHERS.—The yearly volume of "The Art Treasures Exhibition" will be completed in May next. "Casell's History of England" will be brought down to the present time.

HUGH CHURCH, SAWNEY, and OTHERS.—We advise you to place no confidence in the persons to whose advertisements you refer.

A LOVER OF NATURE.—You may obtain silk-worms' eggs by applying to Bennet, seedman, centre row, Covent-garden. The inner leaves of young co-lestices may be used for the food of the young worms till they can be supplied with mulberry leaves.

MARY GRIFFITHS.—Surely you and your friends can never get a newspaper, or you would have known that Prince Frederick William of Prussia was a very frequent visitor at the palaces of Queen Victoria for nearly twelve months previous to his marriage with the Princess Royal of England.

A YOUTH. We approve of your wish to be thoroughly well acquainted with the history of your own country, and we gladly further your views by recommending to your attentive perusal the Vols. I. and II. of "Casell's History of England." These books will procure you as much amusement as instruction; and their pages offer that which is so rarely to be found—an impartial history.

J. F. C.—The time for which an apprentice is bound begins from the date of his indentures. All "verbal understandings" are null and void in law.

FLORENCE ADELAIDE need be under no apprehension, as her husband cannot claim the child until it is seven years old. After that age all children, whether male or female, are, in law, the property of the father.

OUR CONSTANT READERS.—Our constant readers have not yet acquired the virtue of patience. Yet we have strongly recommended it in our columns. Owing to the number of our correspondents, we cannot undertake to answer all letters by return of post, but our readers must have confidence in us, and they may rely on being answered in due time, provided their questions are not irrelevant.

M. HOLMES.—The letters u and y are either consonants or vowels, according to their position. In the word useful, u is a consonant, therefore one must not say a useful man, but a useful man. In the word uninformed, the u is a vowel; consequently an uninformed man is correct, and a uninformed man would be ungrammatical.

E. J. E. T.—We advise you to treat the slander with the contempt it deserves. Your own good conduct will prove the best contradiction. But if the malignity of your enemy induces him to persevere in spreading reports injurious to your reputation, your only course is to indict him for defamation of character.

HENRY.—For full particulars respecting Schamyl, the Circassian chief, we refer you to No. 29, vol. I. of the old series of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER.

KNOX.—The word Lerathan is of Hebrew origin. We answer your last question first, because it is the most sensible of your queries. As to the question how you should behave in the company of a young lady who is, according to your own account, very fond of you, your heart should dictate the answer. But are you sure the young lady is so fond of you? A vain, boasting man is generally the aversion of the fair sex.

BEILINDA.—The best way to preserve the teeth is by attending to the following rules:—Bear in mind that the teeth are bones, thinly covered over with a fine enamel, and that this enamel is more or less substantial in different persons. Whenever this enamel is worn through, by too coarse a powder, or too frequently cleaning the teeth, or is destroyed by a scorbutic humour in the gums, the teeth cannot long remain sound. The teeth are to be cleaned, but with great precaution, for if you wear the enamel off faster by cleaning the outside, than nature supplies it within, your teeth may suffer more by this method than by total neglect. A very safe dentifrice can be procured as follows: Cut a slice of thick bread into squares, and burn it till it becomes charcoal. Pound it, and sift it through a fine muslin. It is then ready for use.

HORACE.—If you wish to form an idea of the divisibility of matter, consider the formation of animalcule, and also the subtlety of scents. It is computed that the millionth part of a grain of musk divides itself into seven quadrillions of parts in scenting a room.

LADY ETHEL.—Your case requires very serious consideration. The jealousy that is the result of ardent passion may be cooled by the chilling influence of time, but there is a jealousy of which egotism and envy form the principal part. When this is the case, the chances of cure are slight indeed. The great French moralist tells us that jealousy is born with love, but does not always die with it. In our opinion, when it outlives love, it is hardly more than a compound of those unamiable feelings we have just mentioned, viz., envy and egotism. "Lady Ethel" begins her communication by putting a question; in our turn we question her. Is your lover amiable, kind, and generous in everything that is unconnected with his love for you? If so, you may reasonably hope for his reformation, and fearlessly place your happiness in his hands. After marriage, love may and ever ought to be as powerful a feeling as before, but it is no longer a restless fever, a sweet delusion, or a bewildering delirium. Courtship is a dream, marriage is a reality. Realities bring men home to themselves, and to rational views, and if "Lady Ethel's" suitor is an amiable young man, and afflicted only with a lover's jealousy, this evil feeling need not haunt him as a husband, supposing our correspondent is ever on the watch to avoid giving him the slightest cause for jealousy.

G. Y.—G. Y., and other inquirers on this subject, will find the following an excellent receipt for whitening the hands. Take a wineglassful of eau-de-Cologne, and another of lemon juice, then scrape two cakes of brown Windsor soap to a powder, and mix well in a mould. When hard it will be an excellent soap for whitening the hands. To make a fine orange marmalade, we recommend you to take very pale Seville oranges, to cut them in quarters, take out the pulp, and put it into a basin; then pick out the skins and seeds, put the peels in a little salt and water, let them stand all night, then boil them in a good quantity of spring water till they are tender, then cut them in very thin slices, and put them to the pulp. To every pound of marmalade put a pound and a half of double refined sugar beaten fine. Boil gently twenty minutes. If it is not clear, boil it five or six minutes longer. Keep stirring it all the time, and avoid breaking the slices. When it is cold, put it into jelly or sweatmeat glasses, and tie them down with brandy paper over them.

JANE OSBORN.—We recommend you to send your portrait immediately. A lover's constancy is strengthened by gazing on the likeness of one to whom he has plighted his troth.

QUESTIST.—Of Caramania, in Asia Minor, the chief cities are Satalia and Barasso.

LETITIA.—"Letitia" writes to us complaining of the cessation of the visits of a young man who was always in attendance while Christmas lasted. Perhaps he has left her because the mince pies and plum puddings are all used up. If so, he is a mere cupboard lover, and quite unworthy of "Letitia," who (being, as she tells us, a constant reader of our Paper) gives proof of sense and judgment.

EDWARD JONES.—For an excellent solution of the difficulties of our mother tongue, we recommend our readers to consult "The English Language," by Professor Fowler, in "Casell's Educational Course."

BEN BOLT.—The following receipt for removing ink-stains only applies to the light parts of your jacket. Get a pint cup or narrow-topped jug, full of boiling water. Place the stained part on the top of the cup, dip it in, then draw it tight over the top of the cup, and while wet and hot, with your finger rub in a little salt of sorrel; the acid should remain on the stained part for half an hour before it is washed. As salt of sorrel is a powerful poison, the paper should be marked poison, and kept carefully locked up when not in use.

A. A.; C. C.—As the friends of "A. A." and "C. C." we congratulate rather than condole with them on the coolness of the young ladies. It is shocking to think of youths of eighteen losing their valuable time in idle flirtations. Our advice is, Cease to waste thought in idle conjecture, return, heart and soul, to your business, whatever it may be; and if, by good conduct and energy, you achieve wealth and reputation, be certain of this, that young ladies will not be so ready to quarrel with you for nothing.

S. M. B.—Your letter does you great credit, and we shall be happy to assist you in your laudable desire to improve. You say you have taken in "Casell's Educational Course." In the first instance, give your chief attention to the treatise on "The English Language," and, for delighting as well as elevating your mind, study "Science Popularly Explained." We advise you to leave shorthand to your husband, and to endeavour to add the French language to your list of acquisitions. French is taught with admirable clearness in a beautifully illustrated periodical entitled "The Ladies' Treasury," published by Ward and Lock, Fleet-street.

Y. Z.—The particulars of Joan of Arc's tragic end are as follows:—She was wounded and taken by the English while she was defending Compiègne. The University of Paris, probably anxious to conciliate the Duke of Bedford, then regent, charged Joan with heresy and witchcraft. She was tried by Cauchon, Bishop of Beauvais, with five other French bishops, one English bishop, assisted by a Dominican friar, vicar of the inquisition, and by the doctors of the University. She was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and to fast on bread and water. At length, being accused of having dressed herself once more in men's clothes, which had been left with her on purpose to tempt her, the judges, who surely had no right to condemn her, since she was a prisoner of war, declared her a relapsed heretic, and condemned to the flames a woman who had saved her king and country.

ANNIE.—There is noble feeling in "Annie's" lines, but they are much too crude for insertion in our paper.

GOLEAR.—If "Golear's" affections are still disengaged, we strongly recommend his immediately relinquishing the acquaintance of the young lady. He should do this both for his own sake and for hers. For his own, because it would be a serious evil for him to be led to form an attachment that displeases his parents; and for hers, because attentions from him may prevent the young lady's receiving proposals of marriage from some other gentleman at liberty to choose for himself.

H. W.—Philip II., who projected the invasion of England, was the identical Spanish monarch who married Queen Mary, daughter of our Henry VIII. But he was not a widower when he planned the conquest of England; he had become the husband of a third wife, Elizabeth of Valois, whom he survived; and finally he married a fourth wife, by whom he had a son. This son succeeded him. Though it appears that Philip II. could not live single, he was by no means under women's influence. His whole energies were bent on exterminating the Reformation. While carrying on his preparations to attack England, every part of his vast empire resounded with the noise of armaments, and every art was used to levy supplies for the great design; but all in vain. The "Invincible Armada" was scattered to the four winds. What the tempest spared, English skill and bravery destroyed. Great was England's triumph on this occasion; but greater still the lesson furnished by the unanimity of our naval commanders. Lord Howard of Effingham, seconded by those great captains, Drake, Hawkins, and Frobisher, was nothing daunted by an enemy whose fleet, dislodged in the form of a half-moon, stretched seven miles from one extreme to another. The British navy was strong with all the strength of unity. The admiral, Lord Howard of Effingham, was a Roman Catholic, but he fully relied on his Protestant captains, commanders, and men; whilst they on their side felt that, whatever might be their admiral's creed, so great was his loyalty, and so dauntless his courage, that he would defend his queen and country "against a world in arms."

H. SULLIVAN.—If you have reason to suppose that your visits excite the least uneasiness in the lady's husband, you should discontinue them, how conscious soever you may be of the purity of your own motives; but it would be foolish to give up a pleasing acquaintance in the vain hope of silencing ever-prating busybodies.

EXCELSIOR.—After the timid manner in which "Excelsior" commenced her letter, we did not expect so bold a request as the loan of a talisman to judge of gentlemen's characters at first sight. We have not yet been entrusted with Ithuriel's spear, but when it reaches us we will, if agreeable to our fair correspondent, test the character of any of the aspirants to her hand. As to bronzing "Excelsior's" Paris plaster figures, our various engagements leave us no leisure for the undertaking.

ROBERT MACFARLANE.—A pursuer is an inferior officer who has charge of the provisions of a ship of war, and has to attend to their quality and to their preservation and distribution among the officers and men. The situation is one of considerable responsibility, and the person who fills it must be well acquainted with the quality of all articles of ordinary consumption, and keep a faithful account of their reception, bestowment, and distribution.

DRAGON.—Apply to the bandmaster of the regiment into whose band you desire admittance, stating your qualifications and your wishes. There are generally many applicants for all such situations, and without a personal interview with the bandmaster, we think you would have little chance of success.

ELLEN SHIRLEY.—"Ellen Shirley" is quite right in supposing that the spring is the season for studying botany. Plants are classed by their blossoms, not their fruits. We cannot recommend her a better work on this subject than the "Outlines of Botany," in "Casell's Educational Course." "Ellen" should never take a country ramble without having it in her basket or reticule. It abounds in illustrations, and it simplifies the science of botany by its judicious explanations.

BLACKSMITH.—Big Ben, for the faulty manufacture of which "poor Mr. Warner was put in the corner," is not the largest bell in Europe by a great deal. The biggest specimen of bell foundry in Europe is the great bell of Moscow, called the "Empress Anne's," weighing 432,000 pounds. Then come several other Russian bells, and then the great bell of Vienna, cast from cannon taken from the Turks at the siege of the city in the seventeenth century. The great bell of St. Paul's weighs 11,400 pounds.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARTLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXI

We but teach
Bloody instructions, which, being taught,
Return to plague the inventor. This even-
Handed justice doth commend the ingredients
Of the poisoned chalice to our own lips.

SHAKESPEARE.

It is now time that we return to St. Faith's and the simple race who inhabited it, lest our readers should lose some portion of the kind interest which, with their usual benevolence, we doubt not they already begin to feel for poor Simon Gee, the weaver, and his industrious little wife Hester. If the kind-hearted old man had yielded to the inspiration of his own feelings, he would instantly, on the disappearance of Lillian, have set out in quest of her, but his friends represented that he had no clue to guide him in the search, that Mr. Thornton had already sent notice to the police throughout the district,—in short, that he was far more likely to behold his niece by remaining at home, than in starting on a hopeless voyage of discovery without compass to direct his steps.

Hester—a most important point in deciding him—despite her grief, which fully equalled her husband's, was of the same opinion; and Simon waited day after day till hope grew fainter, and he could endure the state of suspense and uncertainty no longer.

More than once, when his wife returned to the cottage after any temporary absence, she had found the poor fellow seated at his loom, his hand still grasping the shuttle suspended over the warp motionless, and so intently absorbed in his grief that even her return failed to disturb him. It was evident that this state of things neither could nor ought to endure. His heart was breaking. Any change, even though it terminated in disappointment, was preferable.

Hester was not the only person in the village who suffered from this access of melancholy which rendered her husband's loom idle, although, as his better half, it affected her more closely. More than one farmer's wife was waiting for the thread she had spun being returned to her in the shape of good stout linen cloth; in fact, it was a general calamity, and the matrons of St. Faith's very naturally laid their heads together, to consider how best to put an end to it.

It was resolved that Simon Gee should start from home, for a week or two, in search of Lillian. Those who advised the step had not much confidence in his finding her, but the change, it was considered, would work wonders.

Still it was not without certain, or rather uncertain, misgivings that Hester consented to the step which the general interest, in some sort, rendered imperative, and prepared the viaticum for her husband's departure.

As may be supposed, its contents were not extravagant: a change or two of linen, an extra pair of shoes, and five pounds carefully sewn up in the waistband of his—had the Greeks or Latins ever worn the garment in question, we might have spared our own modesty, and that of our readers, by alluding to it under its classical name; but, as they have not done so, we must use an algebraical sign—, not doubting but it will be generally understood what it stands for.

The inhabitants of St. Faith's were nearly all assembled to bid the weaver good-by, and God speed him on his way. Many, and no doubt exceedingly profound, were the cautions, advices, and informations which accompanied their kind wishes. Farmer Minter, who had been twice in London, and consequently looked upon as an authority, warned him emphatically against the cheats of the metropolis; to let no man know where his money was concealed, or how much he carried with him. A second gave him a letter to his brother-in-law, Edward Jones; at the same time assuring him that although he, the writer, had not heard of him for some years, Edward Jones would kindly welcome him for his sake; and added, that although he had forgotten the name of the street in which his relative resided, Simon would have no very great difficulty in finding him out, seeing that he was a tailor, an excellent workman, and consequently must be well known in London.

It was not without pain that Hester saw him depart. Hitherto she had entertained rather a high opinion of her husband's sagacity. In her judgment he was not half so simple as the neighbours considered him. But as the time drew near her confidence abated; and she took a precaution which, however unusual, might not, as she imagined, be without its usefulness.

She caused the parish clerk to write Simon's name and address on a piece of parchment, with a request that in the event of his losing his way, or anything occurring to him, he might be sent home and all expenses should be paid.

This she stitched carefully on the back of his waistcoat, and gave him strict injunctions on no account to remove it. The old man promised, and the mind of his wife became partially at rest.

His leave of absence extended for a month.

The time had already elapsed. The weaver, faithful to the long-meditated design of his earlier years, had visited Lincoln, heard great "Tom," proceeded as far as Norwich, and listened to the renowned St. Peter's Mancroft peal; made the acquaintance of the ringers, who, in honour of his arrival, had rung a triple bob-major, consisting of three thousand six hundred and seventy-five changes, the greatest honour Simon had ever received; indeed, in after years, he frequently boasted of it, and when exercising his craft with his companions in his native village would frequently pronounce dogmatically upon any disputed point, by citing the authority of the Norwich ringers.

Hester had received only two letters since his departure, which said letters had been duly read to her friends and neighbours, and commented upon. Despite his utmost endeavours and patient inquiries, he had obtained no intelligence of Lilly; but the remedy had answered: his mind seemed to have recovered its tone.

The brother-in-law of the London tailor was the only one amongst those who heard the letters who did not coincide in the opinion that Simon had displayed great prudence and cleverness on his journey; for, strange to say, he had neither been robbed in London, nor fallen in with those who are only too anxious to exploit, as our French neighbours term it, the simplicity of the rustic visitor to the metropolis; perhaps that very simplicity had been his protection.

The farmer's judgment may be deemed rather hasty, when we state that it had no other foundation than the old man's not succeeding in discovering Edward Jones in London—so plainly too as he had written the address.

Faithful to his promise, the traveller returned to his village on the very day his leave of absence expired, and, we need scarcely observe, was warmly welcomed by the simple inhabitants, who looked upon him with increased respect, since he had seen strange places. They were never tired of listening to his descriptions, especially those of London, the size of St. Paul's, the traffic in the streets, and the number of carriages. More than one silly hinted that he used the traveller's time-honoured privilege, when he asserted that there was more stone in St. Paul's than would build six halls as large as Sir Norman Boothroyd's, or a wall round Meldown Park.

It was evident that the journey had done Simon

Gee a considerable amount of good. It had roused him from that dreamy state of sorrow which is far more dangerous than strong excitement and violent despair, simply because it is more lasting; and, having devoted two or three days to the gossiping natural after a journey, the old man fell once more into the quiet routine of ordinary life: his shuttle might be heard all day by those who passed his cottage-door. The loom was once more at work; and there was little doubt but the good wives of St. Faith's would soon cease to have cause to reproach him for delay in returning their home-spun thread converted into good honest cloth.

In other words, the weaver was making up for lost time by working hard all day; and his industrious little wife, who had seen her purse diminished with regret, began to feel that after all the five pounds had been well laid out.

Had there been another weaver in the place, the result might have been different.

For many years Simon Gee had been accustomed, after a hard day's work, to pass an hour in the clean, well-sanded parlour of the "Boothroyd Arms." Formerly he had been only a listener; travel had made him one of the orators of the society. The clerk no longer pooh-pooh'd his opinions, but, like many other potentates, made an alliance with the enemy he at one time affected to despise, or at any rate to disregard.

We know ourselves of a similar instance, only in a more exalted sphere.

The rustic coterie were assembled as usual. The party consisted of Mr. Minter and the parish clerk, Absalom Myers, Simon, the landlord of the house, and one or two farmers, yeomen, and cotters—for there was very little distinction of rank in St. Faith's.

A report had been circulated that Sir Norman had let the Hall for three years to an exceedingly wealthy city merchant, a friend of Mr. Thornton's; and they were discussing the pros and cons—the probabilities and improbabilities of such being the case.

"The news be ower good to be true," observed one. "It be some tyrannical, purse-proud upstart, like himself," said another.

A third suggested that such was not likely to be the character of a friend of Mr. Thornton's—a remark in which all agreed; for the county magistrate had increased in popularity since the fatal affair of New Year's eve; and there were even rumours of an intention of bringing him forward to represent the county, in the event of a general election taking place.

Anything to mark their abhorrence of their landlord.

"After all," said Mr. Minter, "it may be only a rumour. Sir Norman, in my opinion, is too proud to let the Hall to any one under the rank of a lord."

The parish clerk shook his head knowingly. "What does he mean, Absalom?" demanded several.

"That Farmer Minter be wrong for once."

"Well, that bea't often the case," ejaculated Simon Gee, who felt doubly grateful to his neighbour since the interest he had shown and the steps he had so promptly taken on the night of Lillian's disappearance.

All agreed to this; but requested the clerk to explain himself. No doubt he had heard something from the rector, who, in the event of any change of residents at the Hall taking place, would be one of the first to know of it.

"Well," replied Absalom, drawing himself up complacently, for he felt flattered at having regained a portion, at least, of his former importance, "the fact is that Meldown Park is let."

"Art thee sure?"

"Certain."

"To whom?"

"A very rich city gentleman," replied their informant, "named Bently. He might have been Lord Mayor of London, if he liked—I heard Mr. Thornton tell Dr. Poundtext so myself; but he refused,—and sheriff as well."

Lord Mayor of London! The assertion was listened to with wonder; for in the minds of his hearers, after the crown, it was the greatest of all earthly dignities; in fact, it was a question with them whether, in the city of London, it was not something greater—an idea very generally entertained, we believe, by those who have the honour of having been born within the sound of Bow-bells.

"I wonder if the gentleman is to have the Home Farm as well," observed Mr. Minter.

This was a point on which the parish clerk, who certainly was in vein that evening, could also gratify the curiosity of his hearers. "Such had been the arrangement of the affair at first, but a very unexpected obstacle had altered it."

"An obstacle!" exclaimed several.

"Yes: the steward refused to give it up."

"Refused!" repeated Simon Gee, with unfeigned astonishment; "why, it is not his. Sir Norman has never granted a lease of it."

"No."

"How can Silex refuse to give it up, then?"

"Those who can explain why his master has kept him as steward so many years after he became incapable of attending to the property must tell you that," answered Absalom, knowingly; "we all know that the old man can twine the baronet round his finger."

"Ay, and untwine him too," added several.

"Make him do as he pleases."

"That be right," added the landlord of the house. "Sir Norman and his lady had both promised my cousin, who married Fletcher's daughter, the house and few acres of land which lie between the South Lodge and the common. Lawyer Marshall had received orders to draw out the lease—he told me so himself—when Mr. Silex stopped it, and let the place to Harry Turner, who had greased his palm for his good word."

At this there was a cry of shame; and many speculations were hazarded as to the probable cause of the old man's unbounded influence over a mind naturally so self-willed and despotic as their landlord's.

One suggested one thing and another another; but all agreed that it could arise from no good—that the steward possessed some hold over his master which the latter dared not brave.

"He is a bad man," exclaimed one of the company, raising his glass of ale to his lips. "Here's confusion to the steward, Mr. Silex!"

The toast was drunk with laughter, mingled with loud shouts of applause. Before they had subsided, the door of the little parlour opened, and a man, wrapped up in a heavy top-coat, made his appearance. The first impression was that it was the subject of their conversation himself, so striking was the resemblance.

"Talk of the devil and—you know the rest," whispered the master of the house, who was the last to perceive the mistake.

"It bea't he."

"It be uncommon loik."

Such were the observations of his friends.

Meanwhile the stranger—who was no other than the steward's twin brother, the returned convict—deliberately folded up his coat, hung up his hat upon a peg, and took a seat, which happened to be disengaged, nearest the fire. An awkward pause had followed his entrance into the room; the speakers being too simple-minded to conceal their embarrassment.

"A cold night," observed Mike.

"Very," said the landlord.

"I have arranged with the landlady to pass the night here; but don't let me disturb you, gentlemen. I shall only take one glass, and warm myself by the fire, before I retire to my room."

All the party assembled in the parlour assured the speaker that they were not in the least disturbed by his presence; that the parlour was a public one, open to him as well as to themselves, and that they had only been talking about the weather and local matters.

The stranger smiled and called for a glass of gin-and-water; he knew exactly how much credit to give to these assertions, for he had overheard a portion of their conversation by listening a few instants at the door before he entered.

The likeness between Mike and the steward was too apparent to escape observation; in fact it might be considered extraordinary. The same long, spare body, thin legs, small head. The only difference was in the teeth; the shark-like set of Andrew's were wanting.

"You are no stranger in these parts, I presume?" observed Mr. Minter, addressing him.

"Never here before," was the reply.

"Indeed!"

"Or heard of the name of the place till the other day."

This appeared still more remarkable, but as the speaker could have no ostensible reason, as his hearers believed, for denying his knowledge of St. Faith's, they believed him, and felt somewhat more at their ease respecting him.

Mike noticed that every eye was fixed upon him, and if he only turned his head or glanced aside, winks and mutual signs of intelligence interchanged. At first he felt somewhat annoyed—the reason of the company's extraordinary conduct did not strike him.

"You don't receive many strangers in this place, I suppose?" he muttered.

"Not many."

"I thought not."

"Why so?"

"Because you stare at them so hardly," replied the returned convict. "I have travelled a great deal in my time both in England and the colonies," he added, "but never experienced such a reception in any house of entertainment I might drop into. But it is Devonshire fashion, I suppose," he added, with a sneer. "I always heard that it was a hundred years behind the rest of the country, and now I am convinced that it is so. Your health, gentlemen, and better manners to you, each and all of you."

Strange to say, this address, which, under other circumstances, might have called forth anything but an agreeable reply, was exceedingly well received. It broke the spell of reserve, and raised a laugh which each felt disposed to join in. How could they feel angry, when each felt that the speaker had cause to complain of the peculiar manner in which his appearance had been received amongst them.

"You are right, quite right," replied Farmer Minter. "But neither the landlord nor any of my friends here meant the least offence. The fact is, we were speaking of a person who is well known amongst us when you dropped in."

"What has that to do with me?" demanded Mike.

"Only that you resemble him as close as one pea does to another," said the former. "In fact, we took you for him at first, didn't we?"

The question was followed by a general assent.

"May I ask the gentleman's name?"

"Mr. Sillex."

"What is he?"

"Steward to Sir Norman Boothroyd, the lord of the manor, and owner of Meldown Park and the adjoining property."

"Ah! very likely," ejaculated Mike; "but I never heard either of him or his master before, that I am aware of."

We need not remind our readers that this was a falsehood, but truth was not one of the gentleman's virtues, whatever other qualities he might possess.

"You have raised my curiosity," added the speaker; "I should like to see the man whom you say is so very like me. No doubt, but he is a good, honest fellow."

There was a general silence.

Mike repeated the observation.

The same result.

"Why, what are you afraid of?" he added.

The word had the desired effect; it released the tongues of the farmers.

"Afraid!" exclaimed several of them; "not a bit. If old Andrew Sillex has any good in him, it has yet to be found out."

"Indeed!"

"The fact is, sir," said Mr. Minter, thinking that Mike was hurt by the comparison, "that the party in question does not bear the best reputation amongst us; and having said that, we had better let the subject drop. You can have no right to feel offended; the resemblance we observed between you is only a personal one."

"Offended!" repeated the convict, with a chuckle. "Oh, no! On the contrary, I am rather amused at it. I know I am no beauty; but foreign travel does wear a man sadly. And so this Mr. Sillex—I think that is the name you called him by—is a sad rascal, is he?"

"A very sad one."

"Miserly, perhaps?"

"He'd skin a flint!" shouted one of the party. "Why, he hasn't bought a suit of clothes for these twenty years—wears all his late master's old ones."

"Is he rich?"

"Very."

"And revengeful?"

"Spiteful as a badger, and has teeth like one," answered the parish clerk, who, being in a perfectly independent position, to which the parishioners had elected him, did not hesitate to express his opinion. "It's my belief he would rob his own brother if he got the chance."

Mike grinned. It was long since he had come to the same conclusion.

"Well," he said, "I intend to remain here for a day or two. I am travelling for my health. Most probably I shall have an opportunity of seeing the person you describe. I am fond of strange characters. He will be quite a study to me."

"Remain here some days!" repeated the landlord.

"Yes."

"Where do you come from?"

"London. Devonshire, they say, is a very healthy place, and I think so. It may be fancy, but I feel as if I were better already."

On hearing that the gentleman came from London, Simon Gee, whose amour propre had been slightly piqued more than once by the doubts the parish clerk had expressed of his veracity, appealed to him to confirm some of his statements, especially the one respecting the size of St. Paul's, and the number of passengers, the vast amount of traffic, &c. &c., in the streets.

The stranger did so; and this naturally led the old man to relate the cause of his visit to the metropolis, and the fruitless result.

"Lost a child!" exclaimed the astonished Mike.

"Yes."

"What was her name?"

"Lillian," replied the weaver, "but we used to call her Lilly."

"Better and better," thought Mike; "I shall learn all I am anxious to learn here. Two birds with one stone. Clever as Andrew thinks himself, he will find that I have outwitted him."

And the ruffian chuckled with delight.

"Come, Simon," exclaimed Mr. Minter, who thought the stranger was pushing his curiosity rather further than the shortness of the acquaintance justified, "it will soon be time to be jogging. But before we separate we must have the old song."

There was a general cry for the "Bell."

In addition to his many other accomplishments, Simon Gee could sing. As a matter of course, the subjects of his songs were generally taken from his favourite art, or in some way connected with it. The one now called for had long been known in St. Faith's by the name of Simon's song; and the old man, after the usual display of modesty—the fear of having a cold, or not being quite in tune—sang the following ballad, to a simple, easy air:—

THE BELL-RINGER'S SONG.

The old church bell, how it booms from the tower,
Sullen and sad as the lone midnight hour;
Life's course it has marked on the dial of time,
From infancy's years to my manhood's wild prime.
And now that my thin locks are whitened by age,
And time in life's volume has reached the last page,
The old church bell with a moral divine,
As it booms from the tower, still marks my decline.

Cold and sadly it sounded as, torn from my heart,
One by one I beheld all life's treasures depart;
Wife, children, and friends, it has tolled to the grave—
I but linger a wreck on humanity's wave.
But time's surge as it rolls shall attain the glad shore,
Where each tempest of passion and feeling is o'er;
And the old church bell bid my steps cease to roam,
As it booms from the tower to welcome me home.

"Bravo!" cried Mike, at the termination of Simon's song; "it was rather a plaintive strain. I should have preferred something a little merrier."

"No doubt, sir," replied the bell-ringer, "but my thoughts are not very merry ones just now, so you must excuse me."

The party was soon after broken up, and the stranger retired to his room after directing the landlord to call him at an early hour the following morning.

On their way home, Minter and Simon naturally exchanged observations of the extraordinary resemblance between Mr. Sillex, the steward and the new guest at the Boothroyd Arms. The weaver, who was one of the most unsuspicious persons in the world, regarded it merely as an accidental likeness, a caprice of nature; not so the former, who expressed himself of a different opinion.

"Can't make it out," he said, "but blood is thicker than water, and if Andrew Sillex had ever had a brother—"

"Ever had a brother," interrupted the little weaver. "Why, didn't you know that the steward had a brother?"

"Never heard a word of it till this moment," replied the astonished farmer.

"Oh yes. But you were a boy at the time that Mr. Sillex first came to these parts, or you must have recollected the quarrel between him and Sanders, the late baronet's head groom, who threw it into his teeth that his own brother had been transported."

"This, then, is the man!" exclaimed his hearer. "I thought there must be something more than accident in such a likeness."

"But the gentleman said he had never heard of the name before," observed the bell-ringer.

"Pshaw!" said the more experienced farmer, "a lie would cost him nothing. My curiosity is roused. I'll keep an eye upon him; mark my words, but we shall hear of his visit to the Home Farm soon."

Here the speakers separated.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Mine enemy hath found me; and, worse than all,
It is an enemy that shares my blood—had the same
Nurture with me.—HEIR OF THE SEAT.

MR. ANDREW SILEX—who, since his return home, had laid aside his suit of black, till circumstances should again render a visit to London necessary, and donned his usual attire—was seated in the little oak-panelled room in the Home Farm, which served him for an office. Upon the table before him lay the rent-book, copies of leases, receipts, bills, and in short, all the miscellaneous papers which belong to a large property, and the management of it.

The furniture, like the inmate, was exceedingly old-fashioned: half a dozen high-backed chairs, covered with faded brocade—which, in the days of Queen Anne or the first George, perhaps, had worn the freshest gloss—one or two cabinets, and a large iron safe of such massive construction, that it would require the united strength of half a dozen men merely to move it.

The lid of the last-named piece of furniture, if it might be called so, was open, and disclosed a miscellaneous collection of valuables: bags of coin, carefully sealed; papers labelled, and a variety of articles of plate, tarnished for want of use.

On the top of the chest was a parchment carefully folded: it had all the appearance of a will; this parchment the old man took up and read through once or twice without uttering a word by way of comment. Whilst thus occupied his brother entered the room. So cat-like and stealthy were his footsteps, and so absorbed the attention of the reader, that the latter failed to perceive he was no longer alone. The intruder took a seat and regarded him attentively. The chair creaked as he sat on it, but even that failed to attract the attention of the steward.

"Twelve years more," murmured the old man, aloud, "and Alan Boothroyd's child would have been of age."

The convict noted every word he uttered.

"And on Sir Norman's death, entitled to half the estate. I don't see why I should content myself with less."

"Nor I," thought the intruder.

"I will not. I have earned it by my silence, the long years I have waited for the enjoyment. What can Sir Norman or his wife object or complain of? Alice will be rich, too rich for a girl, and I spare them the ignominy of an exposure, of holding them up to the scorn of the world, screening them probably from the hand of justice. No, no! it must be half; not a penny less, I am resolved upon it."

"And quite right, too," exclaimed Mike, aloud.

His brother dropped the parchment hastily into the iron chest, and closed the lid before turning round to ascertain who it was who had dared to intrude upon his privacy; for it was an understood thing at the Home Farm, that when occupied in the oak room, no one should break in upon him.

"Mike!"

"Andrew!"

Such were the exclamations which broke from the lips of the two brothers, who, having uttered them, stood for some time surveying each other in silence. The countenance of the steward expressed rage and mortification at being thus followed, as it were, to his lair. The features of the convict, on the contrary, denoted extreme triumph in having outwitted, as he considered, the prudent, cautious Andrew.

"You here!" exclaimed the former, after a pause.

"Yes. I told you I should find you out."

"You did," answered the steward, bitterly.

"And I have kept my promise?"

"You have," muttered his brother, in the same tone.

"You see, Andrew," said his visitor, "after the loss of that blessed child, whom I took to as naturally as if it had been my own, I felt quite lonesome like in the old place in the Belvedere-road, it were so silent and solitary, especially at nights, when the wind howled round the chimney and gables, making low moaning sounds, just as she used to do. The fact is, I could stand it no longer; so I sold off the furniture—it didn't fetch me much, I promise you—and started to see you—couldn't keep away any longer!"

"And what do you expect to find here?"

"A welcome," replied the convict, boldly, "such as I would have given you had you come to me; and," said Mike, "I am tired of living alone. We are brothers—henceforth let us be companions and pals."

"You are mistaken, then," said Mr. Andrew Sillex, striking the table before him with his clenched hand. "This house is not mine. I have no home to share with you, and if I had—"

"You would refuse it?"

"Exactly."

"You think so," answered Mike, in a mocking tone; "you only think so. Your heart is better, much better than you give it credit for being. For in that case, I should forget that we are twin brothers, go to the nearest magistrate, and make oath that Andrew Sillex, the steward of Sir Norman Boothroyd, came to me on a certain day, and made arrangements for my receiving the stolen child of Alan Boothroyd, the co-heiress of this estate here. Lady Boothroyd brought her to me, and agreed to pay me fifty pounds a year for keeping her, and five hundred in the event of her death."

"The daughter of Alan Boothroyd?" repeated the steward, turning exceedingly pale.

Mike nodded in the affirmative.

"The co-heiress of this estate?"

"You said so yourself."

"This would lead to an investigation, which neither you nor your mistress would come out of with clean hands," resumed the convict. "Child-stealing is a serious offence, and ain't no more allowable in the rich than the poor."

"And where did you learn this pretty, romantic story?" demanded the steward, trying to look unconcerned.

"Partly in the cottage from Simon Gee."

"You have seen him?"

"And spoken with him," replied his brother; "and partly from your own lips."

"And have you no fear?"

"What have I to fear?" interrupted Mr. Sillex's visitor. "The certificates are all right; you can't get over them. The child died a natural death,—what people may think and say is quite another thing; I've nothing to do with that. I ain't got no character to lose: no one respects me."

"If it's money you require," exclaimed the steward, impatiently, "name the sum, and although I am a poor man, I will if possible content you. But here, I tell you once for all, you cannot remain."

"And here, I tell you once for all, I am determined to remain," answered his visitor, with the most provoking coolness. "I am tired of living by myself, more especially since Jack left me. In London no one will associate with me, for all the neighbours know that I am a returned convict. If I change my abode, it is the same thing—the police are sure to whisper it; but here, in the country, residing with you, acknowledged as your brother, who would venture to suppose such a thing, or, if they did, to breathe it? Ain't you quite as much lord of the manor as Sir Norman Boothroyd himself?"

"You had better take my offer," said Mr. Sillex.

"I tell you I will not take it. It's a home I seek. I want to be respectable again, and there is no other way of my being thought so. You know the consequences if you refuse me."

The features of the steward, which, during the discussion, had grown exceedingly red, now turned very pale; and once or twice he wiped the drops of cold perspiration from his brow with the back of his long bony hand, the same hand whose nervous grasp had so startled the nervous system of Jack, when he placed it caressingly upon his neck.

"It is in vain to struggle with our destiny," he said; "I submit."

"And I am to remain here?"

"Since such is your choice; an evil one, I fear, for both of us."

The tone in which the permission was granted, and the observation which accompanied it, did not escape the notice of Mike, who recollected the warning Jack had given him on the night of his being forcibly sent to sea.

"Look you, brother," he exclaimed, "fair play."

"What do you mean?"

"That I am not to be dealt with as cunningly as—"

"You dealt with Lillian," interrupted the steward. "Is that your meaning, fool? If I had any such wish or intention, I should have welcomed you, instead of refusing you an asylum beneath my roof. It is I, rather, who have cause to fear. Have you forgotten what the boy Jack said about the arsenic?"

It was Mike's turn to look confused.

"The warning has not been lost upon me. Hence arose my objection, that is to say, my chief one, to your remaining. There can be no confidence between us, nothing but mistrust and terror. You will do well, therefore, to reflect before you decide."

"I have reflected."

"And decided?"

"Yes."

The tenant of the Home Farm rang the bell. It was answered by a middle-aged female; to judge from her appearance, a very determined person. Her iron gray hair, being worn over a roll, displayed to its full extent a lofty, wrinkled forehead. Her eyes were dark and deep-set in the head, but it was in the mouth that the character of determination was more particularly displayed; in fact, the development almost amounted to ferocity, so thin were the lips, and so tightly was the superior drawn over the inferior one.

"Margaret," said her master, "my brother has arrived."

The woman regarded Mike long and curiously.

"You will prepare a chamber for him."

"Which?"

"The one over the north porch."

"It has not been slept in since—"

"I know, I know," interrupted Mr. Sillex, hastily; "but you can see to its being well aired. My brother likes retirement, and as he will remain here for some time, it will be as well to arrange for his accommodation at once."

The woman withdrew with a dissatisfied air. It was evident that, whatever her master might feel, she anticipated no great pleasure from the presence of an additional inmate at the Home Farm.

"Umph!" muttered Mike, as Margaret withdrew; "rather a singular looking person for a bachelor's housekeeper. I should have preferred a younger."

"She suits me," replied his brother.

"And a better tempered one."

"I find her obedient enough. But never mind my domestic arrangements; you must be content to take them just as they are. I am too old and too much accustomed to them to change, even for the pleasure of your society. You will not complain of her manner long,—soon he used to it."

There was something so like a sneer in the last observation, that Mike mentally asked himself whether it did not convey a covert threat—in fact, he began to apprehend that there might be more danger in the housekeeper than in her master, and determined to be upon his guard against both.

"Have you any luggage?" inquired Andrew Sillex.

Mike muttered something about a bundle which he had left at the village inn, where he had slept the preceding night. A messenger was sent for it, with directions also to pay the bill, and answer no inquiries.

"Whilst you remain here," said the steward, addressing his unwelcome visitor, "it is my wish and advice that you frequent the village inn as little as possible, and make no acquaintance with the inhabitants of St. Faith's."

"For fear I should hear how rich you are!" exclaimed Mike, with a grin.

"For fear your having been a transported felon should be thrown in your teeth," replied his brother, calmly. "You are mistaken if you imagine the circumstance unknown; a servant of the late baronet once openly reproached me with having a brother a thief, in the Manor Court, before all the tenants."

"And what did you do?—discharge him?"

The steward smiled, and shook his head negatively.

"That would not have been revenge," he said.

"You are right. What became of him?"

"He ruined himself."

"How so?"

"Turned thief. A considerable quantity of plate disappeared from the Hall. This occurred a year or two after the scene at the Manor Court. At first it was supposed the house had been robbed. Detectives were sent for from London. They soon discovered that the thief was one of the household, and recommended that the trunks of all the servants should be searched."

"And wor they?"

"Yes."

"And the plate?"

"Was found secreted in the box of the very man who had reproached me with having a brother a thief," answered Mr. Sillex, calmly. "Poor fellow! I shall never forget how strongly he asserted his innocence. My master and I did all we could to save him; but it was of no use. The laws were very severe in those days; and so they hanged him, Mike, for breach of trust."

The returned convict gave a low chuckle. The speaker looked at him with such well-affected surprise, that the disposition to mirth increased, and he indulged in it till the tears ran down his cheeks.

"Capital!" exclaimed Mike, as soon as he could recover himself sufficiently from his fit of mirth to speak.

"What was capital?" demanded his brother, with well-acted astonishment, as if he had been narrating one of the simplest circumstances in the world.

"Why, hanging the fellow, to be sure," was the reply.

"I did not hang him."

"Not with your own hands," observed Mike; "of course not—that would have been a clumsy contrivance; but you tied the cord round his neck quite as effectually as though you had done so. Placed the plate in the babbler's trunk, eh?"

"Nothing of the kind," answered the steward, calmly. "I was absent from Meldown when the event occurred—had been so for some time, on business for my late master, and only returned a day or two after the discovery. I bore the wretched man no ill-will—why should I? It was the truth he told, and I had always a great respect for the truth, Mike. You look incredulous," he added; "but I can give you a proof that I entertained no resentment towards him, not only in the efforts I made to save him, but in my conduct to his widow, who has remained with me ever since."

His brother gave a long, low whistle—"Whew!"—a habit he had when anything struck him in a new light, or broke suddenly upon his comprehension.

"Well," he said, "that was kind, exceedingly kind. I scarcely gave you credit for so much benevolence. And so the widdie has remained with you ever since?"

"Yes."

"In what capacity?"

"As my housekeeper."

"The woman I have just seen?"

"Even so," said the steward.

The peculiar sound was repeated. Mike saw—or imagined he saw, which with him was much the same thing—a clue to the whole affair. His brother had induced the woman, he doubted not, to place the plate in her husband's trunk, and permitted him to suffer for it. And he began to think that he acted imprudently in trusting himself into the hands of two such very decided personages. Evidently it was not a little they would hesitate at, to remove any one from their path that interfered either with their interest or safety.

Perhaps he was right; but time will decide whether he was so or not.

Our readers doubtless will naturally ask what could have been the motive of Mr. Andrew Sillex in making this extraordinary confidence—a confidence which he must have known would infallibly excite the suspicions of his brother. A little reflection will give the clue to his mode of reasoning.

Mike was naturally of a bitter, sarcastic temper, and he well knew would not fail to make many pointed and disagreeable allusions to his housekeeper, indulge in hints that must naturally create a feeling both of hostility and alarm, and consequently predispose her to assist him in any project he might entertain against him; for Margaret seldom forgave either an insult or an injury.

He was not wrong in his calculations.

The first time her master hinted to her his intentions respecting his brother, the woman refused to have anything to do with the affair; which, as she said, was none of hers: Mike had never offended her.

Sillex smiled.

"When he has," she added, "it will be quite time enough for me to take part against him—besides, is he not your brother?"

Her hearer might have asked whether the man whose death they had compassed between them—for the convict's suspicions of the transaction were founded on truth—had not been her husband; but he forbore; he had no wish to arouse an ill feeling against himself—Margaret being the only person, perhaps, in the world whom he feared to cope with.

He had not long to wait: the scheme worked as he could have wished.

One morning his housekeeper sought him in the little oaken room, which she, of all the servants employed on the Home Farm, alone presumed to enter. Her features were more than usually pale; but there was a fire in her deep-sunken dark eyes which lit them up with an expression yet more terrible than their fulness.

"Well, Margaret," said the steward; "what is it?"

"I have been insulted," replied the woman.

Mr. Sillex shrugged his shoulders.

"By your brother."

The gentleman guessed as much.

"And by your contrivance."

"My contrivance!" repeated Andrew. "You are unreasonable. What interest can I possibly have in setting Mike to insult you?"

"Who else could have told him my tale?" demanded the housekeeper, fixing her flashing eyes fiercely upon him.

"The first person in the village," replied her master, "whom he questioned upon the subject. Why affect this surprise? Your furious jealousy against your husband, your threats of revenge against him, are well known. There is not an old servant on the estate but believes that you placed the proofs of a crime he had never committed where they were found by the officers of justice. You must have seen this general feeling in the manner in which all the inhabitants of St. Faith's avoid you."

The woman wrung her hands and groaned in the agony of recollection and remorse at the part she had enacted in the fearful drama.

"Do they also know who tempted me?" she answered at last.

"Perhaps not; but they suspect it. I am scarcely more beloved by them than yourself," answered Mr. Silex. "But they fear me; now, they only hate you. I can either serve or injure them; you can do neither; therefore they are silent where I am concerned, and speak out boldly respecting you."

"Injure them or not," exclaimed the woman, in a determined tone, "your brother must not remain here."

"How is it to be prevented?"

"By sending him away."

Mr. Silex gave one of his peculiar laughs.

"You forget he is my brother."

"And you forget that the man I sacrificed to your resentment was my husband."

"A faithless one."

"Granted."

"You had proof of that."

"Ample," exclaimed Margaret. "Had there been a doubt, I would have perished rather than have injured a hair of his head. It was on account of this very Mike that you first vowed his destruction. The presence of the man was a silent reproach to me, but his words, his hints, his sneers have become an insult. I repeat, he must quit the Home Farm."

"And I repeat," said the steward, "that I dare not send him away."

"You are in his power?" said the woman.

"To a certain extent."

"And would gladly be released from it?"

"At any price. But you have refused me your assistance in the only way by which I dare venture to rid myself of him."

"I promise it to you now," replied Margaret, in a cool, determined tone. "You are going in the morning to the market at Tiverton. Take your brother with you."

Her master nodded assent.

"Contrive to dine early," continued the speaker, "and return to the Home Farm without supping. The cormorant will be sure to demand food on his arrival. I will have it prepared for him."

"You are aware how suspicious he is," observed the steward. "From the day he first intruded himself here he has never tasted of any food that we have not first partaken of."

"I know—I have seen it," muttered the housekeeper. "But that will prove no obstacle to my revenge. We will both of us eat freely in his presence."

"Both of us," repeated Andrew, fixing his eyes upon her.

"I as well as you," answered the housekeeper.

"You have only to observe one precaution: your brother is passionately, greedily fond of stewed mushrooms. Do not assist yourself to the dish; only take such ones as I shall give you; those you may partake of freely."

"I understand you."

The next day the steward of Meldown Park invited his brother to accompany him to the Tiverton corn-market, which Mike readily assented to, for he began to tire of the monotonous life he led at the Home Farm. As they drove from the house in the gig, Margaret made her appearance with a small basket on her arm.

"Going to the village?" demanded her master, carelessly.

"Only to the home-croft," replied the woman.

"The dews have fallen plentifully, and if I am not mistaken in my calculation, I shall gather an excellent dish of mushrooms."

Mike smacked his lips at the word, and the vehicle drove off.

Margaret smiled bitterly as she gazed after it.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

AMUSEMENTS.

WE propose in this article to offer some few general remarks on the subject of amusement. We have no sympathy with those who would shut out amusement and relaxation of all kinds from society. We believe that human nature requires amusement, and that there is sound philosophy in the old couplet—

"All work and no play Makes Jack a dull boy."

But, first of all, we have to consider the

on this question:

From time immemorial there has been a difference of opinion among men, and women, too, concerning amusements. There has been a class of sedate, sober people, who have invariably opposed nearly all amusements which another class of more buoyant and light-hearted natures have felt themselves irresistibly impelled to seek. One has whined, and scolded, and snarled at amusements; the other has pleaded for them in right good earnest, and sometimes with a tart sharpness. This difference of opinion has created a war of words, and not unfrequently a war of spirit, which sometimes has been very bitter between the opposing parties. To an observer of this wordy contest, there must often have appeared more real harm in the angry and bitter spirit of the controversy, than in the indulgence of the recreations condemned.

AMUSEMENTS DESERVING ATTENTION.

Of course, on the principle that it is not worth while to quarrel about them, it may be urged amusements are scarcely worth our attention. But so far from such being the case, this question of amusements is one that not a little interests the happiness and well-being of society, and demands our calm consideration. Time is money, and thought more. Whatever is to affect the time and thoughts of men in this great world is vastly important. That which affects their time and thoughts affects their characters, and their characters affect their moral standing, and what affects their moral standing affects their peace and happiness. Then this subject is of immense importance, rising in solemn grandeur before us, and is more than a question of momentary fun and frolic, but one on the decision of which hang immense and far-reaching consequences.

AMUSEMENT A NATURAL INSTINCT.

In the first place, it may not be amiss to observe that amusements are natural. It seems that the great and beneficent Creator has written in the heart of every living thing the command, "Amuse thyself." And all beings that are natural yield an agreeable and joyous obedience to this divine command.

What mean the frolics of the lamb, the gay prances of the horse, the jocund sports of the dog, the gambols of the squirrel amid the tree-tops, the dances of the birds to their own music, on light, fantastic wings? What means the general joy of the animal creation, spoken out in their sports, their endless diversity of amusements, as varied and gay as the colours among flowers, or the forms of beauty on the clouds of heaven? What means the gladsome gaiety which rings through the morning air of spring, and gives gladness to the sweet hour of sunset? What means the joyous influence which steals into our own hearts when we go out to make nature a friendly visit, provoking us to sing with the birds and frolic with the lambskins? What means that merry-making inspiration which creeps, in the spirit of mirthfulness, along our every nerve, when we meet with a company of friends who have made glad our hearts with a thousand smiles? What mean the games, plays, feasts, festivals, dances, bonfires, and illuminations which are found in all countries and times, and among all nations of the earth, if they do not declare that amusements are as natural as breath, and as universal as life? What mean the innocent jokes which are flung, in playfulness of spirit, at each other, among all people? What mean the glancing coruscations of wit which glitter in the circles of the best men and women of which our world can boast? What mean all the little pleasantries which pass from tongue to tongue like electric sparks of joy, wherever human beings find pleasure in each other's society? They must be regarded as nature's argument for amusements. Moreover, the instructions of mental science are clear upon this point. That teaches that the Creator of the human mind has written out His will upon this subject, in the faculty of mirthfulness which He has given to every human creature, as a part of its mental character.

PROMOTIVE OF HEALTH.

There is much in this world that is dark and gloomy. There are a thousand little troubles, trials, and disappointments, which vex and make us sad. There are hardships, toils, and fatigues, which would wear down and make gloomy our spirits, were it not for this merry-making fellow within us, who spices up life most admirably with his jocularity and sport. Nothing is more paralyzing to the mental energies, or more destructive of moral power, than a fixed and sullen sadness, or a cold, cheerless, benighted state of mind.

Cheerfulness is absolutely essential to the mind's healthy action, or the performance of its proper duties. The mind unmoved by the spirit which dwells in amusements, unvisited by the gales of mirthfulness, is like the ocean sleeping in the cold lap of earth, unmoved by a breeze and unstirred by a tide. It is still, pulseless, powerless, and will soon become stagnant, dead—a great pool of corruption, in which no living thing can dwell, from which no healthful influence can go out. And, as a healthy and uncontaminated body is necessary for a pure and elevated mind, it follows that the intellectual, moral, and social condition of the being within is improved by the vigour and glow of health given by the cheerful influences of amusements. But the question more difficult to decide to the satisfaction of all is, as to what amusements are proper, what gives the glow of health to the physical and moral man, and impair not in any manner the rightful and proper action of either. Some amusements are good and some bad. In nothing is sound judgment more needed than in the choice of amusements. It does not follow that because amusements are proper and useful, everything is proper that is amusing. Very much of the good of amusements depends upon the kind, and still more the amount.

EXCITING AMUSEMENTS DANGEROUS.

There is always a tendency in the human mind to go to some extreme, to the end of the road it is travelling. Extremes in amusements, like extremes in everything else, are injurious. Whenever they are made unduly exciting, or are carried to excess, they become absolutely evil. They dissipate the mind, intoxicate the brain with the wild enthusiasm of delight, waste the solid energies of the soul, destroy the equilibrium of the faculties, break up their harmonious action, and establish a positive discord within; besides being injurious to the health. To be drunk with amusement is as injurious as to be drunk with alcohol. It is a paralysis of all lofty purposes and moral vigour. A trifling, good-for-nothing thing is a soul intoxicated with amusements.

It is the evil of this excess in amusements that has stamped them with a stigma in the minds of many of the more sedate. They have seen the evil, and deplored it. There is a greater tendency to abuse amusements than almost anything else, on account of their exhilarating effects. They produce a sort of intoxication in the animal spirits, which imparts itself to the mind, and leads it on in a bewilderment of superabundant life, not unfrequently to an injurious excess. Among real lovers of amusements they are almost always abused. They are permitted to occupy too much attention, and the giddy maze of their follies becomes a whirl of dissipation. There is great danger of this among active, buoyant, high-spirited youth. Those of such a nature should be extremely cautious in the kind of amusements they choose, avoiding the most exciting, and in the influence they permit them to have upon their minds. There is great danger in excesses. They should be avoided always. The most scrupulous watchfulness should be entertained by every such youth against these excesses. The gay dream of merriment should never become bewildering, should never unfit us for the performance of our duties, should never make cheerless and uninviting the solid avocations of life.

MENTAL ENJOYMENT.

People usually seek amusements, as they say, "for the fun of it." They seek to "kill time," to dissipate sorrow, for their stimulating effects, &c. They have no high purpose in view, and hence receive no real benefit from them. To have their proper influence, amusements must be sought, not simply to spend a pleasant evening, but for their healthy and invigorating influence upon the body and mind. We should seek them for their real utility. We should enjoy them because we feel that they are right; because they are of real service to moral and accountable beings; because they increase our capacities for real enjoyment; because they harmonise our powers, quicken our activities, accelerate the pulses of both the inner and outer life, humanise our feelings, and refine our sympathies. Most intense is the pleasure of amusements thus rationally enjoyed. They are not then merely animal pleasures, but mental enjoyments. They should really stand side by side with the institutions of morality and religion as aids and not enemies to these. There are many excellent and useful amusements which have become degrading in the eyes of most good people from their abuse. They have done real evil, have sown the seeds of vice, and brought forth rich harvests of woe. They have been prostituted to evil till they are now altogether corrupt in their influences. They might be mighty engines for moral good, whereas they are instruments of untold corruption. They have not been sought and enjoyed with a proper view, and have been abused on this account. This abuse has very naturally brought reproach upon the amusements themselves.

THOUSANDS of men breathe, move, and live; pass off the stage of life and are heard of no more. Why? They did not a particle of good in the world; and none were blest by them, none could point to them as the instrument of their redemption; not a line they wrote, not a word they spoke, could be recalled, and so they perished—their light went out in darkness, and they were not remembered more than the insects of yesterday. Will you thus live and die, O man immortal? Live for something. Do good, and leave behind you a monument of virtue that the storms of time can never destroy. Write your name, by kindness, love, and mercy, on the hearts of the thousands you come in contact with year by year. And you will never be forgotten. No, your name, your deeds, will be as legible on the hearts you leave behind, as the stars on the brow of evening.

If we would regard amusements as a part of our education—a part of the moral training which we must receive to perfect our natures and refine our sympathies, very differently would they be viewed. Much, very much, might well-conducted and well-chosen amusements do to render us more interesting and agreeable to each other, more graceful, free, and natural in our manners, and more ready and able to perform well our various duties in life. Much more cheerful, refined, kind, and happy might society be made by the influence of proper amusements, sought with a view to refine, elevate, and gladden the whole moral and physical being.

LABOUR AND RELAXATION.

To be really useful, amusements should be intimately blended with all the labours of life. Instead of being entirely separated from everything else, and apart by themselves at some chosen place and time, they should mingle with, and colour with a ray of brightness, the whole web of life. They should be made so easy of access, so much at hand, and so easily attained, that without much effort, or expense, or loss of time, they might gladden life with their sunshine every day. When they are sought only at certain seasons of festivity, at long intervals of time, and then with great pomp and clat, they are almost sure to be abused. They generally result in absolute evil. They become scenes of improper excitement, and not unfrequently of trouble and discord. They engage too much the thoughts, fix too strongly the attention, they bewilder and dazzle too much the mind. And when they are over, no good can be determined upon with any degree of certainty, and often much evil is clearly the result. Such amusements are unnatural and improper, and should be everywhere discouraged. To be profitable, amusements should be frequent and simple—such as give grace and vigour to the body, animation and buoyancy to the mind, refinement to the manners, and harmony and happiness to the whole being. To do this, they must be skilfully and frequently intermingled with the business, and duties, and ordinary occupations of life. They should give cheerfulness, vivacity, and peace, to every-day life. And in seasons when they can, they should be sought out in doors, in the open, health-giving air, among the bright, gay things of nature—on the hills, amid the vales; in the groves, by the sparkling cascade; where there is life and beauty—where everything has a voice of instruction and a song of joy. And they should be made, so far as possible, intellectually and morally interesting. They should be mingled with our studies, interspersed with our labours, and woven into the web of life; but should always be directed by judgment, and sanctioned by virtue, propriety, and rectitude.

HOME ENJOYMENTS.

It is a clear dictate of reason that the chief scene of amusements should be at home. Around home clusters all that the heart holds dear. Here is the scene of the most of our labours and trials. Here are our chief joys, our bitterest sorrows. Here are nearly all our real experiences in life. Here are our comforts, and here should be our supplies; and here should be the scene of our gaiety, merriment, and pleasure. Here should be the real music of life. Here should be its gladdest pleasures, its mirth and brightness. There is but little danger from an excess of home amusements.

Disipation is usually found abroad. Injurious amusements are nearly all away from home. The evils of amusements are absent from this sacred place. At home amusements may be guarded from all harm. Associates and associations may be such as they should be. Amusements may here be varied at pleasure, and directed at will.

After reason why amusements have become objects of dread with many people is because they have been driven from the sacred protection of the fireside; they have been exiled from the only place where they can be safely indulged in, and banished to places from which, in truth, modesty and virtue ought to shrink back. They have been forced amid associations corrupt and evil. Having been found in bad company, they have been dishonoured. If they had been kept at home, where they should be, they might still have been honoured guests of that blessed sanctuary. Thousands of youth have been ruined, or greatly injured, in a moral point of view, by feeling compelled to go away from home for the amusements which their natures impelled them to desire.

A proper amount of labour, well-spiced with sunny sports, is almost absolutely necessary to the formation of a firm, hardy physical constitution; and a cheerful and happy mind. Let all youth not only learn to choose and enjoy proper amusements, but let them learn to invent them at home, and use them there, and thus form ideas of such homes as they shall wish to have their own children enjoy. Not half the people know how to make a home. It is one of the greatest and most useful studies of life to learn how to make a home—such a home as men, and women, and children should dwell in. It is a study that should be early introduced to the attention of youth. It would be well if more were written upon this subject, and we purpose in a future article giving some few practical rules and hints as to the best and cheapest kinds of recreation.

THE ICEBERGS.

FIERCE from his ebony throne
The frost-king rose in wrath,
Shaking the depths of his icy zone,
As he rushed on his wayward path.
The wild winds flew to his aid,
At sound of his bugle's blast,
And they launched the barge that their liege had made,
And the armament swept past.
On o'er the silent deep,
The thousand fleets were free,
Unlocked from a century's frigid sleep,
By the inner open sea.
The boreal lights shone red
On each lofty glittering spar,
And the full white sails to the sea outspread
Shook their giant folds afar.
Solemn, and grand, and pale,
Like a band of spectres grim,
Their stern brows wreathed in an icy veil,
They moved through the twilight dim.
And the white gull raised her wing,
And fled from the fearful sight
Of the armament of the fierce frost-king,
As it sailed in awful might.
On till the ardent sun
Met the serried phalanx bold;
When he hung to the tall masts every one
Banners of molten gold.
Gems might not dare to shine,
Nor pearls from the dark sea caves,
By that troop that flashed on the troubled brine,
As they met on the ocean waves.
Minarets pierced the blue,
Changing to every shade
That the rainbow over the fountain's dew,
Or the storm-cloud e'er displayed.
Columns of marble gray,
Adamant architrave,
Palaces decked for a festal day,
Seemed aloft on the surging wave.
Even the palm-tree's head,
Carved by the genii hand,
Grew on the brink of the water's bed,
And towered from the crystal strand.
On to the work of death
Went the frost-king's armament,
Decked with the gems that his icy breath
To their sculptured forms had lent.
Bark built by mortal power
Dared not to try its wrath;
And the seaman trembled, lest any hour
He should wake in its fearful path.
Sons of the ocean saw
Their wonted prowess vain:
And gazed at the giant fleets with awe,
As they sailed o'er the trembling main.
Silent as death, afar
They shine in their beauty fair;
'Tis the frost-king's armament of war.
Ah, mariner, beware!

SOLITUDE.—One ought to love society, if he wishes to enjoy solitude. It is a social nature that solitude works upon with the most various power. If one is misanthropic, and betakes himself to loneliness that he may get away from hateful things, solitude is a silent emptiness to him. But as after a bell has tolled or rung, we hear its sounds dying away in vibrations fainter and fainter; and, when they have wholly ceased, feel that the very silence is musical, too—so is it with solitude, which is but a few hours of rest between strains of life, and would not be what it is if it did not go from activity to it, and into activity from it.

NOW AND TO-DAY.

Our to-days—how inadequately are they appreciated! Now—in which all the blessings of life are alone included—with what strange indifference do we turn from its rich offerings; to feast our eyes on gardens of delight, that spread away, temptingly, in a future that for ever mocks us with the unattained! There are pearls and diamonds scattered all along the paths we are treading, but we cannot stop to gather them for looking at the mountains of gold that gleam against the far horizon. All of our unhappiness springs from neglected or misspent hours and to-days. The present moment is God's loving gift to man. In it we weave the web of our future, and make its threads bright with sunshine, or dark with evil and suffering.

"Come and kiss me, papa," cried a voice full of music and love.

But papa was in the passage below, with coat, hat, and gloves on, all ready to go forth to the day's business, and little pet Louis was up in his mother's chamber, only half dressed.

"Haven't time now; I'll kiss you when I come home," papa answers back, and then starts from the house in a hurried manner.

A pearl lay at his feet, and Mr. Edwards had failed to lift the precious thing. He would have been so much the richer for life.

"Dear Lu!" he said to himself as he moved along the street, "that kiss would have done us both good, and consumed but half a minute of time; and I hardly think I shall find another half minute so richly freighted with blessing to-day."

At the corner of the next square, Mr. Edwards waited four minutes for an omnibus. It was lost time. Four minutes spent with dear pet Louis, how full of pleasure they would have been—how fragrant their memory through all the day?

When Mr. Edwards arrived at his office neither his morning newspaper nor his bookkeeper was there. So, he could neither get at his books, which were in the fire-safe, nor glean from his Express the commercial news or state of the markets. No customers were in at so early an hour. And so Mr. Edwards passed the next twenty minutes in comparative idleness, his mind burdened just enough to make him feel uncomfortable, with the thought of little Louis quivering over the coveted parting kiss.

At the end of twenty minutes, the bookkeeper arrived. The honey of Louis's parting kiss would have sweetened the temper of Mr. Edwards for the day. Without it, under slight annoyances, his spirit grew sour. He spoke to the bookkeeper with slight impatience, and in words of reproof for being late. A sick child was the excuse; and as he looked into his clerk's face, he saw that it was pale with trouble and watching.

Mr. Edwards sighed. The pressure on his feelings was heavier. Everything, during that day, seemed to possess a strange power of annoyance; and to the failure to lift a pearl from his feet in the morning, was added many failures of a like character.

"Will you please to buy an almanac?" said a childish voice near him.

"No, I do not please," was the gruff reply of Mr. Edwards. He spoke, as he looked up, on the moment's impulse. The timid, half-frightened face of a tender child, scarcely a year older than his darling at home, glanced upon him for an instant, and then he saw only the retreating form of a little girl. Before his better feelings prompted a recall of his repulsive words, she was in the street, and out of sight.

This was a little thing in itself, but it told sharply on the feelings of Mr. Edwards, who was naturally a kind-hearted man. He sat very still for a little while, then, sighing again, went on with the letter he was writing when the little almanac-seller disturbed him at his work. Another "now" had passed, leaving a shadow instead of the sunshine it might have bestowed.

"Can you help me out to-day? I have a large note falling due."

"I cannot," replied Mr. Edwards.

The neighbour looked disappointed, and went away.

Now that neighbour had many times obliged Mr. Edwards in a similar way. Our merchant had no balance over at his bank. That may be said for him.

But he had money payable on demand, and could, without inconvenience, have helped his neighbour. He remembered this after it was too late. The "now" had passed again, and left upon his memory another burden of unquiet thought.

And so the hours of that day passed, each one leaving some "now" unimproved—some pearl lying by the wayside—some offered blessing untouched; and when, at a later hour than usual, Mr. Edwards turned his steps homeward, he felt as if he had lost instead of gained a day.

Dear Louis! Away, faster than his feet could carry him, went the heart of Mr. Edwards towards his darling boy. Somehow, the father's imagination would present no other image of the child, except one that showed him in grief for the kiss denied that morning.

"Where is Louis?" were the first words spoken by Mr. Edwards, as he entered the room where his wife was sitting. It was at least an hour after dark.

"In bed and asleep," was the answer. At another time this answer would have produced no unpleasant feelings; now it was felt almost like a painful shock.

Mr. Edwards went to the chamber where Louis lay in his little bed. The gas was burning low: he turned it up, so that the light should fall upon his face. How beautiful it was in its childish innocence! How placid! And yet the father's eyes saw, looking as they did through the medium of a troubled state, a touch of grief upon the lips, and a shade of rebuking sadness on the brow of his darling.

"Precious one!" he said, as he bent to kiss the pure forehead. "I wronged both your heart and mine."

It seemed to him, after the kiss and confession, that the sleeper's face had a more peaceful, loving aspect. For many minutes he stood gazing down upon his unconscious boy; then murmuring to himself, "It shall not be so again, sweet one!"—lowered the gas to a taper flame, and went with noiseless footsteps from the room.

For the gain of half a minute to business, in the morning, what a loss had there been to love and peace and comfort for the space of hours! Let us take care of our nows, and our to-days; for herein lies the true secret of happiness, and the true philosophy of life.

UNHAPPY FAMILIES.

THE number of unhappy families is greater than is generally imagined. My peculiar condition in life has long been such as to enable me to speak on this subject from personal knowledge. In every neighbourhood scenes occur daily, which, if the curtain were raised which hides them from common observation, would strike us with painful surprise. Such scenes I have witnessed where their occurrence had been least expected. Many households, supposed to be united in the bonds of love and fraternal affection, I have found divided and torn by discord and strife.

The domestic relation has been ordained by Providence, and made a source of the highest enjoyment. How sad the thought that any "root of bitterness" should be permitted to spring up within the sacred precincts of this earthly paradise, to poison its joys! And how strange, as well as sad, that this should so often happen in families bearing the Christian name! So far as my observation extends, most of the unhappiness of families proceeds from the mistakes of parents. Proper conduct on their part seldom fails to render them happy in each other, and happy in their children. If such is not their condition, they will probably learn from an impartial examination, that they have themselves had no slight agency in their domestic infelicity.

Some parents are naturally discontented, and pre-disposed to complaining and repining. They seem determined to be unhappy; at least they will not try to be happy. Nothing can satisfy them. They look on the dark side of everything, and allow the most trivial untoward circumstances to give them uneasiness. Though possessing the ordinary comforts of life in superabundance, they imagine their lot to be a peculiarly unfortunate one, and attribute their unhappiness to the faults of others. They never look for the cause within their own breasts, although they see thousands in less favoured circumstances—many in absolute want—comparatively contented and happy. In general they are governed by Christian principle; but "in whatsoever state they are," to be therewith content, is a lesson which they have never practically learned. I have sometimes doubted whether such persons were not more deserving of pity than of blame. Endeavour to convince them that their repining is without sufficient cause, and you incur their displeasure, and are charged with cruel insensibility to their misfortunes. No family in which either parent is thus disposed, can be a happy one. The unhappiness of a single member of a household, like leaven, pervades the whole mass.

Others are of an excitable, irritable temperament. They are strangers to that capital grace which "suffereth long, and is kind—is not easily provoked." Taking fire at the least offence or indignity, real or imaginary, not only are they destitute of peace and enjoyment themselves, but they keep the whole family in perpetual disquiet. Mrs. M. is a lady of high respectability, esteemed for many good qualities. Her prevailing fault is to be "hasty in her spirit—to be angry." The slightest mistake of a child or servant throws her into a violent passion, which vents itself in harsh and censorious language. Nor are children and servants the only victims of her wrath. He whose rank and authority entitles him to "reverence," does not always escape the infliction of her censure. The inflammability of temper is a fruitful source of those domestic broils which afflict and disgrace so many families.

Many parents are rendered unhappy by disrespectful and undutiful children. But this evil, too, may be generally traced to the errors of the parents. The want of filial respect is the natural consequence of the unkind and disrespectful manner in which the children themselves are treated. In general, kindness and respect will be reciprocated: hence we find that, in most cases, unkind children have been trained by fretful, fault-finding, scolding parents. Mrs. G. is habitually chiding her children, and telling them how bad they are; and, as in the case of Mrs. M., the severest reproofs are administered for trifling faults, or unintentional errors—sometimes on mere surmise, or wrong accusation. To this wrong on her part, is not unfrequently added the cruelty of suppressing the very natural attempt of the child to defend itself against the unjust charge. I have known the mere expression of opinion, in respectful tones, treated as a serious offence. Mrs. P. was engaged at a piece of work. A daughter, almost attained to womanhood, suggested a different, and as she thought, a better way of doing it. Whereupon the mother, conceiving this an impeachment of her judgment, flew into a rage, and administered a bitter rebuke to the "saucy, impudent girl," for assuming to know more than her mother! A copious flow of tears indicated the intensity of the girl's grief.

The unkindness of others appears in excessive rigour. Their children are denied the means of innocent enjoyment. A reasonable favour or gratification is either bluntly refused or is granted with such reluctance or with so many obnoxious conditions, as to render it scarcely worth the taking. There may indeed be excessive indulgence in things in themselves right and proper; and it may sometimes be difficult to determine whether the wish of the child should be gratified. A prudent parent, however, will seldom fail to judge correctly; and the children of such parents will generally acquiesce in their decision.

The spirit-crushing treatment which I have here exposed, alienates that filial regard which is indispensable to domestic felicity, and which gives parents such moral power in the government of their children. It begets an inimical, malevolent feeling towards parents, which often finds utterance in disrespectful language, and becomes the occasion of an outbreak which is perhaps followed by a lecture from the parent on the sin to which the child has been so cruelly provoked. Such treatment also induces in children the habit of lying. To avoid the dreaded "scolding" which the commission of a fault usually incurs, they attempt concealment by prevarication or equivocation; or, if that is not deemed sufficient, by positive denial, or direct falsehood. Disobedience, too, is produced by the same cause. A child may be compelled to do the bidding of a parent whom it does not reverence or respect. But true obedience regards the wishes and feelings of the parent, and springs from love and affection, which every wise parent will endeavour to secure.

Not the least of the bad effects of the error upon which I am animadverting is, that it blunts the moral sensibilities, and renders them impervious to religious impression. Or, if a salutary impression happens to be made, it is speedily eradicated. An angry word, or an undeserved censure, banishes the subject, and inflicts a sting which rankles in the mind for days, and unfits it for calm and profitable contemplation of religious truth. How often do parents thus counteract the force of pious counsels, and wonder why they are not more effectual! Low ideas of religion must children entertain who are told that "her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace," when, from morning till night, a smile is not seen upon the countenance of their instructors, nor a pleasant word heard, nor a peaceful hour enjoyed. Surely, either religion must be underrated, or the piety of the parents questioned, by their children.

Another consequence of these parental errors is their transmission. Children thus trained, imbibing the spirit and following the example of their parents, in their turn inflict upon their own families the same evil, which in its progress of descent will scarcely stop with the "third and fourth generations."

MR. JOHN WALTER, M.P.

MR. JOHN WALTER, M.P., ranks among the celebrities of our time—not only on account of his parliamentary services, but for his connection with the daily press.

The newspaper press has made such gigantic strides in recent years, that it bears no resemblance to the feeble productions of the time when the leviathan of journalism was launched upon society. The Times was established on the 1st of January, 1788, by the grandfather of the present proprietor, and afterwards carried on by the son—the late Mr. John Walter, of Printing-house-square. This gentleman was the author, and up to 1847 was the chief upholder, of the great power and influence which that journal possesses. Mr. John Walter, the present member for Nottingham, is the son and representative in the Times office of the gentleman who made the Times what it still is—the leading journal of the first country of the world.

Many years ago—we have it upon the authority of the paper itself—the publication of the Times was of very little importance in a pecuniary point of view. Although the press generally had struggled on for more than two centuries, it was still in its infancy as a political power, and scarcely a year passed without government prosecutions to crush the little spirit it did show. To send an editor to gaol was an event of ordinary occurrence; and the first Mr. Walter often paid heavily in purse and person for opposition to the ruling powers. Under such circumstances a connection with the press was anything but enviable. The last-named gentleman conferred no great boon upon his son when he admitted him into a share in the Times. The concern was not only unprofitable, but its maintenance had become a source of gradually increasing expenditure.

The zeal and skill of the younger Mr. Walter soon caused a marked improvement. In 1803 he became sole manager, and henceforward devoted the whole of his energies to increase the value of the property. In this he succeeded to an extent beyond his expectations. By degrees the paper ascended in the scale of public favour. It exhibited great talent in all its varied departments, and began to assume that political power and influence which now directs and concentrates public opinion in such a manner, that it often modifies, stimulates, or nullifies the legislative proceedings of the country. Mr. Walter was not distinguished so much by brilliancy of talent (though by nobody in the world was talent sought out with more discernment or trouble, or rewarded with more delicacy and munificence) as by the more sterling possession of strict integrity in the management of his journal. As it grew in public favour, its influence and support were sought by successive ministers and government authorities. All sorts of inducements were held forth to secure the approval of the editor of the Times. "Early information 'as a favour,' 'ministerial boons,' and other advantages, in the most 'desirable forms,' as Mr. Walter himself observed, were frequently offered, and always refused. Hence the power of the Times with the public; its perfect independence constituted its greatness. "It would scarcely be possible," says a distinguished writer, "to enumerate or describe the whole of what, not merely the Times, but all the journals of the civilised world owe to Mr. Walter. He first imparted to the daily press its vast range and celerity of information, its authentic accuracy, its universal correspondence, its lucid arrangement and marvellous despatch, and, more than all, its dignity in the social scale, and its political position as the fourth estate of the realm. Mr. Walter was the first to apply steam power for the purposes of printing.

As we have already furnished a detailed account of the progress of the Times,* it is unnecessary to say more than to express our admiration for the manner in which that journal is conducted.

As Englishmen we are proud of the Times, and we have just reason for being so; not merely because it is an evidence of skillful and successful enterprise, but because the Herculean power of that Colossus of newspapers has exercised a mighty influence for good over the destinies of the world. Although it has occasionally set itself against public opinion, and sometimes advocated principles and upheld practices which have excited the wonder and indignation of all true-hearted and far-seeing men, yet, in the main, the Times has been right, and has wielded its power on the side of truth and justice. As a censor, an advocate, a reformer, it has done good service; convincing by its arguments, withering with its sarcasm, commending by its eloquence, it has become one of our national institutions. It has attacked home abuses, and held up to contempt and ridicule some petty clique of job-mongers; it has uttered its trumpet tone of scorn or indignation, making monarchs tremble, and ministers stand aghast; its grand impersonality has been felt as a predominating power, exerting an unexampled influence over the course of the whole world's affairs.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

JOHN WALTER, ESQ., M.P. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

What Englishman is there who, mindful of these things, is not proud of the Times? Who that thinks at all about the work it has accomplished, but is thankful for its existence? Who, that considers the enslaved condition of the continental press—bound hand and foot, and gagged by censors—but rejoices in that liberty which insures the safety of so true and powerful a champion as the Times? It was by the extraordinary exertions of the Times that one of the most remarkable frauds on the mercantile public was exposed. The labour and expense of the service thus rendered to the commercial community, as well as the lawsuit to which its proprietors were in consequence subjected, called forth a noble testimonial from the bankers and merchants of London to the public-spirited and disinterested course pursued by the Times on that occasion. But the noblest work ever accomplished by the Times—a labour which will continually reflect upon it the brightest lustre—was that of its unflinching and energetic exposure of the condition of our army in the East. If before the outbreak of the Crimean war the Times had never been felt as a gigantic power, it fully asserted itself then. It laid bare the true state of our brave fellows dying in the trenches through sheer neglect; it pointed out the absurdities of that military routine which, blind and deaf to everything but its own idle forms, suffered our men to rot in one place, and their huts and rations in another. The Special Correspondent of the Times, with a pen more eloquent and graphic than had ever yet been wielded by newspaper scribe, exposed the official neglect and mismanagement in all that regarded the life, comfort, and efficiency of our gallant army. These pictures, backed by earnest, vigorous, and persevering censures, excited the wrath of the guilty, but awoke responsive echoes in the true British heart, and enforced those reforms which, but for the Times, would never have been undertaken.

The name of Walter is so identified with the journal, that we cannot mention the one without drawing attention to the other.

As a member of parliament, the late Mr. Walter was distinguished for his sound views and political foresight. The subjects upon which he most frequently addressed the house were the working of the new poor law, the conduct of the commissioners at Somerset House, and the general condition of the pauper population throughout the United Kingdom. His first attempt to procure the appointment of a committee of inquiry into the whole subject was not successful; and his renewed endeavours to accomplish that object did but partially realise the expectations which he had a right to indulge. A committee, the inquiries of which were restricted by the terms of its appointment, was at length granted. It would be a long and dreary history to narrate the manoeuvres by which the ministers of that day defeated the wise and benevolent purposes with which Mr. Walter laboured in procuring the appointment and endeavouring to direct the labours of that committee. The principles upon which he proceeded are already well known to every reader; and a history of the transactions in which he was then engaged would tend rather to expose the vices which marked the characters of his adversaries, than to illustrate the virtues which adorned his own.

On the 28th of July, 1847, this remarkable man, full of years and honours, submitted to the fate of all, and was succeeded by his son, the present member for Nottingham. He was elected by the constituency of that borough the day after his father's death, and has enjoyed the confidence of the electors ever since.

Mr. Walter inherited many of his father's business and social qualities, as well as the immense property resulting from a long life of fortunate industry. Mr. Walter has continued his father's work in a very worthy manner. Exhibiting the same enterprising spirit, the same generous appreciation of literary talent, and the same integrity of purpose, he has brought the Times newspaper to its present importance in the political world.

Mr. Walter was born in 1818. He was educated at Eton, and afterwards matriculated at Exeter College, Oxford, where he took second-class honours in Classics. In 1837 he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, and was returned member of parliament for Nottingham in the same year. Mr. Walter is known in political circles as a "liberal conservative," and professes to support those measures which obtain the common support of moderate whigs and moderate Tories. He is married, and has a family. His seat at Bearwood, in the county of Berkshire, is one of the finest in England, the park, lakes, and pleasure-grounds being of extraordinary extent and beauty.

By the aid of Mr. Mayall's excellent photography, we are enabled to present a faithful likeness of Mr. Walter. It represents the man "as he is to-day" with remarkable fidelity.

THE CITY OF CANTON.

THOUGH Peking is the metropolis of the Celestial Empire, the residence of the emperor, and, therefore, ostensibly the head-quarters of Chinese power and magnificence, it cannot be compared, for commercial importance or merchant wealth, to its southern sister, Canton. Lying more in the pathway of European trade—at an easier distance from India, and therefore also from England, and in the immediate neighbourhood of the island of Hongkong, till now our only possession in the empire, the chief city of the south is becoming an object of greater interest, day by day; and, considering the magnitude and variety of the trading operations in which we are engaged with its inhabitants, it is much to be desired that new regulations should be made with regard to the admission of our countrymen into its streets and squares. To the blandishments and promises of the Chinese commissioners, it is to be hoped our rulers will reply, in the words the Celestial citizens of Canton are fond of inscribing over the doors of their shops and warehouses, "Gossiping and long sitting injure business—former customers have suggested caution—no credit given."

The city of Canton, as shown in the plan accompanying this article, is built on the eastern bank of the Pearl river, which flows out from Canton into the open sea, at about sixty miles below the city. The Pearl river is formed by the junction of three streams, the northern, eastern, and western rivers. The name "Pearl river" is ascribed to the alleged circumstance of a merchant who, several centuries ago, is said to have sailed up Canton river with a bundle of pearls under his arm—a careless proceeding resulting in the loss of his precious burden, which slipped from his grasp and fell into the river, finding a readier market than the unfortunate owner either desired or anticipated. Like London, Canton would be nothing without its suburbs; and these are more than usually interesting to Europeans, from the fact of their being restricted entirely to the space outside the inner south wall of Canton, in their trading operations with the native Celestials. We will now proceed to describe to our readers the accompanying plan of Canton, and to give them, as far as we are able, an idea of the topography of this southern capital of the Chinese empire.

Canton is a square-looking, compactly-built city, surrounded by a strong wall on all four sides,—the south side lying along the banks of the Pearl river. Three large forts, the Red Fort, and the Dutch and French Folly, serve as additional defences on the river side (all these are now, or soon will be, in our hands). There is a large population, nearly a million in all, a circumstance that renders Canton like the Irishman's hot potato "easy to take, but plaguy difficult to hold," for the Celestials inhabiting Canton are a trifle treacherous, and much given to stabbing men in the dark. The city is divided, for purposes of police regulation and superintendence, into square departments of about fifty yards each furnished with gates and walls. The streets, about 160 in number, are narrow and close,—the population being much crowded, and unhealthy in consequence. To the north of the city is seen the hilly district, called the "White Cloud Mountains," strengthened with forts served by clumsy and ignorant gunners who wasted powder in a way that excited the contempt and pity of our blue-jackets. The Chinese encampment marked on our plan was occupied by a force of Mantchoo Tartar troops. The five-storeyed pagoda at the north-west angle of the wall, is described as being "no pagoda at all, in the proper sense of the term." It is simply a red brick building five storeys in height, strengthened with artillery, and defended by Chinese artillerymen, who couldn't serve their guns. The English and French took the building at the bayonet's point; and the British flag and the tricolour were planted simultaneously on its roof, where they floated victorious side by side. Towards the centre of the city a large space is covered by the government offices and "departments," the government house towering in the midst. Right through the midst of the city runs the straight street of benevolence and love; and to the south, the great public school occupies an entire division of the town. Proceed further south still, and you come to a strong wall, fortified, and furnished with heavy gates, and marking the southern boundary of the Chinese city.

But we have not yet got to the end of Canton. This wall is merely one of those barriers by which the Chinese of the present day think to keep out the English, as the great wall, built by their ancestors, kept out the Mongol and Mantchoo Tartars two thousand years ago. Shut out from the inner sanctuary of Chinese society by this mass of brickwork, dwell the representatives of the people at once the support of the Chinese nation, the upholder of its commerce, and the chief thorn in the side of its rulers. The British factory—at the south-east corner of the principal suburb—is the small lump of leaven that leavens the whole mass of persevering, purposeless, short-sighted Chinese industry. These factories are utterly inadequate—in size and accommodation—for our large and increasing trade. They are built on a muddy flat, on the bank of the river, scarcely above high water mark. It is hardly necessary to add that they are damp and unhealthy. The government of China, however, refuse any additional space to its chief and most important customers. It is to be hoped that a word or two on this subject will be said when the treaty comes to be concluded at the end of the present Chinese war.

From the time when the Canton trade was thrown open to private ships, a peculiar branch of industry, which had been pursued for years with much pertinacity and success, increased greatly year by year. This branch of industry was "opium smuggling." Opium is to the Chinese an immense luxury. Underfed as many of them are, the sedative effect a small dose has upon the system has rendered the use of opium as habitual among them as the use of spirits has unfortunately become among too many of our own countrymen;—and they are determined to obtain it under any conditions. The government officials played a deep game with the traders and with their own people—affecting to check the traffic, in accordance with the orders of their government, and secretly conniving at its continuance. Thus an internal smuggling trade was established, which would have been prevented had the Chinese government been sufficiently acute to place, once and for all, a high duty on opium, and then to allow its legal introduction.

The oppressive measures taken by Mr. Commissioner Lin in 1839 against the Canton merchants occasioned the breaking out of the first Chinese war.

By the beginning of January, 1840, the disagreements which had been gradually increasing assumed a very serious aspect. On the 5th the Emperor issued an edict, directing that the trade with England should cease for ever. The Chinese now became determinedly hostile, and an attempt was even made to burn the British fleet. Four thousand English soldiers, fifteen men-of-war, and several steamers had accumulated by the month of June, and a blockade was established from Ningpo to the mouth of the Kiang. A truce was afterwards concluded, and Commissioner Lin was degraded from his office. But the Chinese broke the truce, and in 1841 hostilities were resumed. After some brilliant successes obtained by our countrymen, the island of Hongkong was ceded to the British, who took formal possession of it. The Chinese agreed, moreover, to pay 6,000,000 dollars as the expenses of the war. The emperor disapproved of this arrangement, degraded the minister who had concluded it, and hostilities were resumed.

From that time till August 29th, 1842, the British continued a successful warfare along the Chinese coast, taking in succession Canton, Amoy, Shanghai, and many other places. Several truces were made, and broken by the Chinese; until, on the 29th August, a treaty of peace was signed before Nankin on board the Cornwallis; Sir Henry Pottinger representing the British, and three first-class mandarins the Chinese nation.

The chief advantages we obtained by this treaty were—1stly. That the Chinese nation paid 21,000,000 dollars towards the expenses of the war.

2ndly. That the five ports—Canton, Amoy, Foo-choo-foo, Ningpo, and Shanghai were thrown open to British trade. Consuls to reside there, and regular tariffs of duties to be established and approved.

3rdly. Hongkong was ceded to the British government as an absolute possession.

Thus ended the first Chinese war.

The commencement of the second is just the old story over again. Emboldened by a long peace, the Chinese recommenced their system of annoyance: Commissioner Yeh acting equally on the principles by which his predecessor Lin had regulated his conduct in the last war; opposing imperturbable effrontery and obstinacy to all attempts at remonstrance and all demands for redress. On the 18th October, 1856, the second war began, in consequence of the famous "lorcha" dispute. The history of our second war, as far as it has gone, singularly resembles that of the first. Again Canton is in our power, and Commissioner Yeh is now our prisoner. The Chinese fortifications are as inadequate to resist Admiral de Saumarez in 1858, as they were to repel Captain Elliot in 1840, and no one who knows the energy of our plenipotentiary, Sir John Bowring, can doubt but that our next treaty with China will give us new and important advantages, by taking from the hands of the Chinese some of the weapons wherewith they, seeking to injure us, have inflicted deep wounds on themselves, their commerce, and their national prosperity.

The opium traffic has been the cause of much misunderstanding, and is still the subject of great difference of opinion. That opium is introduced into the Chinese dominions in large quantities, there is no doubt; but the fact of its effects upon the people is not so well proved. Opium, the prepared juice of the poppy, is said to have a slightly stimulating and, at the same time, a soothing effect, when taken very moderately; in medicine, it is invaluable. When taken in excess, it acts as a slow but sure poison. The Chinese people are greatly addicted to its use; and scantily supplied with food, as many classes among them are, the want of opium would be felt as a hardship among them. The government, however, looking at the terrible effects the excessive use of opium has produced among the people, discountenance its importation, and hence misunderstandings have frequently arisen. The true question at issue is not, however, whether opium shall be imported into China or not; but whether England shall continue her intercourse with the Celestial empire on terms incompatible with her own honour and dignity. The nation has been appealed to, and has with one voice answered no. Thus we are involved in a contest with China; a contest, however, in which no great complications are feared. The result can only be that our relations with that country shall be placed on a new basis; that intercourse shall be free, and commerce relieved from the fetters cast around it by speculating mandarins and lying government officials of the Yeh class, who deceive the people for their own purposes, and can be brought to terms only by the power of an armed force.

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER I.

To work! to work! with hope and joy:
Let us be doing what we can;
Better build school-rooms for the boy,
Than cells and gibbets for the man.

ELIZA COOK.

The lamps were lighted in the streets of London. The shops were one blaze of beauty and of gas.

It was the end of February. Parliament was sitting, like a hen, hatching something; but what, time will prove.

London, like so many of her daughters, is a candle-light beauty. Mother and daughters had arrayed themselves in their best, and all was hope and expectation; for the season had commenced. This alludes, of course, to all, more or less, connected with the great joint-stock banking-house of Dives and Co. The season is bright and gay only for them.

Lazarus and his large family hide from its glare in dark lanes and blind alleys. There they die of want and perish of their sores, within reach of abundance and succour. Their "season" is to come; and if ignorance, famine, and desperation drive some of them to sins that shall shut them out for ever from Abraham's bosom, will the blame and the penalty be theirs alone?

The scribes and Pharisees may and will pass over on the other side, but the good Samaritan will halt on his way and pour into the wounds of that robbed and beaten wayfarer, THE POOR, the oil of pity, and the wine of help. Help for his wasted body, help for his perishing soul, help for his hungry, ragged little ones, who cannot serve two masters, and who, if we do not "compel them to come in," where they can be brought into the fold of the Good Shepherd, must fall a prey to him who, as a roaring lion or a stealthy serpent, is still—as of old—lurking about, seeking whom he may devour.

Night was setting the example of early closing to the shopkeepers of our great metropolis—an example they seemed little inclined to follow: for what is the wear and tear of body or mind, when weighed in the balance with silver and gold?

While the vain, the idle, and the wealthy turn night into day, and purchase by lamp-light, Thrift and Industry will not refuse to sell—and "Early-closing" will be still the shopman's dream.

On the night to which we allude, an elegant carriage stopped at a private house in Jermyn-street.

Two ladies alighted, when the door was opened by a neatly-dressed maid-servant.

They were both young—the one twenty, the other some years more.

The elder of the two, Miss St. Ange (Ellen St. Ange), was very plainly dressed, and had a soft Madonna face, and small, slight figure. The other was fashionably attired, and remarkably beautiful both in form and feature; but a dreary expression of ennui and discontent marred the lustre of her eyes and the sweetness of her smile.

"Is Mrs. Golightly ready, Ruth?" asked Miss St. Ange of the tidy maid-servant.

"Oh yes, miss," answered Ruth; "Missus has had her bonnet on this hour and more."

"Be here at ten, Mortimer, and wait for us if we are not back," said Miss St. Ange, gently, but in a tone of command.

The tagged and powdered footmen and the burly coachman touched their hats, and, as soon as the house-door noiselessly closed on their young mistress, the carriage rattled away, and so did they.

There was some mystery—of that they were all convinced: but even their coarse minds—aye, far coarser, beneath their master's gay livery, than those of their poorer brethren in fustian jackets of their own—knew their young lady too well to suspect her (as they would have done any other) of "meeting a young man on the sly."

"Taint no use to trouble our 'eads about it," said Burley, the coachman. "I wotes we turns in 'ere, and takes a glass of summut stiffish. I does understand good liquor; but womankind, high or low, wor olls a riddle to me."

While her attendants were enjoying themselves in their way, Ellen St. Ange and her friend, Augusta Pemberton, had been shown into the "parlours" which formed the "home" of Mrs. Golightly.

Augusta Pemberton's palace home was in Carlton-terrace, and Ellen St. Ange's in Belgrave-square. Mrs. Golightly was a sort of companion chaperon to the latter; but she had the love of what she called "a hole of her own," common to those who have been doomed to dwell in the mansions of others; and Ellen had a wise, kind habit of letting people be happy in their own way.

Mrs. Golightly was only Mrs. by courtesy—brevet rank, as she said, a little grimly. She had been a teacher or a governess from sixteen to sixty; and though in humble and dependent circumstances, the habit of command had given her a somewhat imposing air and dictatorial manner.

It is said every woman has a chance of changing her condition at least once in her life; if so, Mrs. Golightly's was yet to come.

She had no liking for mankind, and mankind returned the compliment: there was no love lost between them. She had very strong notions of woman's superiority and supremacy; but she did not find them exactly borne out by Scripture; and as she was religious, and wished to be thought so, she was silent as far as wives were concerned, only occasionally remarking that Adam was no great things as a husband, and his sons had not improved in successive generations. Single women, she contended, had every right and privilege of the male sex.

She was very tall, muscular, and bony, with marked features, a good head, a kind heart, and an accomplished mind; but she was very exclusive, and very jealous. The only person she loved was Ellen St. Ange. Mrs. Golightly was certainly very good, but a little too conscious of her goodness, and too proud of her piety.

Her appearance was singular. She reprobated crinoline and resisted hoops, and would persist in wearing a good-sized bonnet on her head (instead of her back). As her mother had been a Macgregor, she generally wore the Macgregor tartan; and her skirt, cut to a convenient length for walking (she was a great walker), showed an inch of white cotton stocking, and a pair of thick leather boots.

Common sense certainly presided at her toilet; but common sense has so long been banished from the wardrobes of England, that Mrs. Golightly was often followed by idle boys, and told she was a "regular Guy," and asked "who was her hatter."

Mrs. Golightly had her bonnet on, her tartan dress, and scarf, her walking boots, and her worsted gloves. She rose to embrace Ellen St. Ange, and bow to Miss Pemberton, with a large alpaca umbrella clutched in one hand, and a capacious black bag in the other. She did not look altogether pleased. She was the soul of punctuality, and Ellen was a few minutes beyond the appointed time.

Ellen took out of her pocket a written list, and said, "Will you, dear Mrs. Golightly, run your eye over this list, and look out those few things? I want to take them with us."

Mrs. Golightly took up a candle, and with the list retired into the next room.

"As soon as she returns," said Ellen, "we will send for a cab, and then, dear Ada, we will drive to—"

"To the mysterious and enchanted hall which is to cure me of the apathy which is creeping over my spirit—this morbid disgust of life and all its misnamed pleasures. I doubt it, Ellen. The disease has made too rapid and too fatal a progress. I feel, O Ellen! I feel the want—"

"The want of a want, Ada; and that want I am about to supply. You want an interest in life; you want aims and objects worthy to occupy the great, warm, woman heart that now beats so faintly in your breast. The poisoned-sugar-plums of flattery, and the sparkling, intoxicating champagne of pleasure, are not food for your soul. You want nothing of the rich—they want nothing of you; 'The Poor' want everything of you—and you want everything of them."

"Of them, Ellen? What have 'The Poor' to give?"

"All you require: Christian work for a Christian woman; a labour of love; something to do worth the doing; something that will entitle you to that best praise—'She has done what she could.'"

"Dear Ellen, you are an enthusiast; but you cannot warm my heart even by the glowing fire of your own. For me, the wine of life has lost all its sparkle. I cry out—like the Pontic monarch of old—for some fresh pleasure; I would give a kingdom, if I had one, for a new delight."

"And you have, Ada, and I take you at your word; you shall give it. You shall give this tinsel world of fashion, of which you are the Elective Sovereign, the acknowledged Queen. But here comes Mrs. Golightly. Have you got all the things together, dear friend?" asked Ellen.

"Yes, I hope I have forgotten nothing," said Mrs. Golightly, in the resigned voice with which the jealous always betray a sense of wrong. "But when you, my dear, are not so entirely engrossed by Miss Pemberton's agreeable society, your young head is better than mine—"

"But no heart is better than yours, dear old friend!" said Ellen, rising and following the stately Golightly into the adjoining room—her maiden bower—"I have told you why I so want to interest Ada in our work, so don't be jealous, dear old friend."

"Oh, certainly not; it's all very right and proper: only if I'm to be lightly cast aside—"

"Why, who could cast you lightly aside?" said Ellen, laughing, as she placed her small, soft hand on the square, high shoulders of the stalwart dame.

"Be my Minerva, an example shown To all her sex for strength of mind and—bone," she added, gaily, "help me to fill Ada's heart with better things, and then you shall have me all to yourself again. Have you sent for a cab?"

"Yes. But why have you dismissed the carriage?"

"Oh, dear friend, are we not told not to let our right hand know what our left hand doeth. What have papa's powdered, pampered footmen to do in the scene that awaits us? And are not the pompous evidences of opulence almost an insult to our starving, perishing brethren?"

"You are right, my darling, always right. I am ready to do what you wish."

CHAPTER II.

I was a stricken deer that left the herd
Long since; with many an arrow deep infixt
My panting side was charged, when I withdrew
To seek a tranquil death in distant shades.
There was I found by one who had himself
Been hurt by the archers. In his side he bore,
And in his hands and feet the cruel scars.
With gentle force, soliciting the darts,
He drew them forth, and heal'd, and bade me live.

COWPER (The Task).

MRS ELLEN ST. ANGE whispered her directions to the cabman, and they set off. They soon emerged from quiet Jermyn-street, and entered the busy, bustling thoroughfares of the town. Falling behind a string of carriages bearing the sons and daughters of Vanity to some gay haunt of worldly pleasure, they progressed at a very slow rate, and now and then they halted entirely.

But the streets of London at night have a deep, exciting interest for all who can think and feel.

The great thoroughfares are so broad and bright, the narrow courts and alleys so dark and dreary. Ada Pemberton, the spoilt child of Wealth and Luxury, the idol of Society, and Leader of Fashion, she who had been protected not merely from sorrow, but from the pain of witnessing it, shuddered to see three ragged, bare-footed, wolf-eyed, children of Famine, one of whom looked in face, form, and bearing like a gentleman's son, and was yet the most ragged and lean of the three, glaring in at shops, where smoking rounds of beef and legs of mutton, and steaming mounds of plum-pudding, were being deftly carved by rosy, white-aproned men, who had such radiant smiles and soft words for customers, and such scowls and abuse for those three hungry, unremunerative, ragged watchers.

An impulse of pity made Ada throw some silver among those famished, longing little outcasts; but in the scramble that ensued, two strong ticket-porters (passing accidentally) got all, save one fourpenny-piece. These fellows, with their unexpected booty, hastened off to "The Rose and Crown."

The boy who had secured the fourpenny-piece was the one whose superior air Ada had noticed. He rushed into the shop, and came out with a slice of suet pudding, which he divided equally among his ragged mates, only a morsel a piece.

The other boys—whose motto was, "Every man for himself"—secretly voted him a "stupid," a "soft-head," and a "muff." They had fallen in with this poor runaway from a school, who, to escape a flogging, which he deemed disgrace, had braved all "the whips and arrows of outrageous fortune;" and had all but died of hunger in a cellar.

He had learnt at his mother's knee to share whatever she gave him with his brothers, and the habit stuck to him when those brothers were English Kafirs, and when to share was almost to perish.

The little city Arabs and the runaway school-boy after this continued to glare in at the cook-shop window, hungrier and more sick at heart than before.

"So much for impulsive, promiscuous charity, dear Ada," said Ellen.

"Yes," languidly replied Ada. "There's not much encouragement to be charitable in London: one is always taken in. The very twins I have wept over, noticed, fed, and dressed, turn out to be hired; and the pretended mother, who sighs and groans on our doorsteps, is a rank impostor. The old man who got two sovereigns out of me last week for his burnt down house, set fire to it himself (it seems) to compel a fire insurance company to build him a new one, and he is committed for arson."

"You will always be taken in, Miss Pemberton," said Mrs. Golightly, somewhat haughtily, "unless you take the trouble, as we do, to investigate and inquire. It is not money only that is wanted, but time, labour, thought, experience, judgment, and discrimination. These I devote to the poor, and I consider myself something of a philanthropist, though, like the apostle, 'silver and gold have I none.'"

"And Ada will follow your example," said Ellen, anxious to conciliate. "You will help her to bestow her charity wisely."

"Oh, look, look there!" cried Ada, shrinking back in the cab, and covering her face with her hands.

Even Ellen St. Ange, more used than Ada to sights of horror—alias of vice and poverty—grew cold and pale; and Mrs. Golightly set her teeth and clenched her hands.

They were wedged in by several carriages, and transixed close to a gin-palace. It was one blaze of light, bright with its own corruption, as many foul things are, and the pavement and everything near was distinct in a flood of light, like sunshine. The broad sheets of plate-glass glittering in that brassy glare, the handsome white porcelain and ormolu branches that held the gas burners—the landlady, wreathed with smiles, sparkling with bugles, gay with founces, and inflated with crinoline (but with that settled scaly red in her cheeks and across her nose, which destroys beauty and betrays its bane)—her portly husband, with his purple face, fungus nose, and irritable manner—all were in keeping with the bright bottles of liquid fire, the rows of pewter pots (silver bright), the fancy barrels, the plated taps; but in strong and hideous contrast were they with the pinched, blue, ragged, restless, wasted wretches, inside and out; beings with pale faces, sore eyes, red noses, lean, trembling, palsied hands, and fetid breaths, creatures given up body and soul to that evil spirit Gin, or kindred spirits equally deadly and destructive; miserable, deluded beings, with whom it was—

"Drink, drink, drink!
While the cock crows up aloof,
And drink, drink, drink!
While the stars shine thro' the roof."

Working men with wives and children starving at home, and even women who had pawned their wedding-rings, and their shivering children's clothes—as they would have done their own bodies and souls, for drink.

All this is very terrible; but this is to be seen in any low populous neighbourhood, wherever a gin-palace rears its brazen head.

But what had so shocked and terrified the ladies in the cab, who were compelled to remain where they were, and distinctly to see all that passed, was a not very uncommon tragedy, that had assembled a crowd, growing denser every moment, at the entrance of this public-house.

A poor young woman—who seemed to have little on except an old petticoat, a thin faded gown, and an old tattered, web-like shawl, but with a baby at her lean, wasted breast, and a little half-naked child tottering by her side, clinging to her scanty, ragged skirt—had, with that courage often found among wretched wives of her class, dragged her husband some ten minutes before from "The Rose and Crown," to which the ticket-porters had repaired to spend the money Ada had meant for the starving boys.

Poor wretch! She flattered herself she should be able to lead him home, before the publican should (as he had often done before), kick him penniless and insensible into the gutter, at the hour of closing.

Ada and Ellen had remarked her at that moment with lively interest.

She was young and delicately pretty, in spite of raggedness and want.

"The babbies have had nothing to eat all day, Ben," she said. "I hope thee hasn't spent all thy wages, measter, and what I got at the pawnshop too?"

"Noa, noa, wench, there be shot in the locker yet," hiccupped the brute.

"Give it me. Oh, give it me, Ben!" said the poor wife, crying bitterly.

"Yees, I se give it thee well, thou jade," answered Ben, with the fierce, sudden anger of inebriety—"I'll teach thee to come following, and jawing, and blubbering after me. I'll give it thee!"

"Oh don't 'ee, don't 'ee, daddy," said the little girl; "don't 'ee give it mammy. If ye must lick somebody daddy, lick me. Mammy's been so bad all day, fit to die, daddy! Oh, give mammy some money to buy a dust o' tea, and a mite of sugar, and a loaf, and a ounce o' salt butter. Sixpence I'll do, daddy! and I'll run for my life to get it at the tay grocer's, we're so hungry, dad!"

Just at this moment the wretched little family, whose progress had kept pace with that of the carriages, came into the full glare of another gin-palace.

The road to vice and ruin, on the Broadway to the gates of death, has its baiting places at brief intervals, where the travellers on that dread journey refresh and recruit themselves, and go on more speedily after each halt.

The gin-palace at which they stopped now was about ten minutes' walk from that whence the wretched wife had dragged her ruffian husband. Here he suddenly twisted his arm away from his wife's and darted into the bar, asking with well-simulated composure for a glass of liquor.

His wife hastily giving her babe and little girl into the care of a kind applemoan, sitting at her stall, and with whom she was acquainted, rushed in after him, just as, having tossed off one glass of gin, he was holding it out for another. The first glass was the overwhelming drop.

Rashly she caught his arm, and held it back, saying, "Thee'st had too much, Ben; thee shalt have no more. How can thee, Ben, have the heart to spend every shilling thee earn'st, or that I can get at the pawnshop, on liquor, and we all a-starving at home? The babbies are crying with hunger, and I've not had a drop or a bite this blessed day. I'm downright sick for want of a cup o' tea. Where's all I got at the popshop on Aunt Esther's warm coverlids and silk patchwork quilt? She little thought where they'd go to, dear old soul. I give em' up for the rent, Ben, and you've squandered it all in liquor, you have; and now every stick's been seized; the place is as bare as the back of my hand. You'll drive me to accept brother's offer, you will! I can't see my children starve, and I won't, so that's what it is! If thou drinks a drop more, this blessed night, Ben, I'll take the poor little things and off to Natt's, that I will; so mind that, Ben! It's all along of low company, and drunken, idle chaps. But I won't stand it no longer; so come home. Home, indeed! a fine home you've made it."

Some half-drunken brutes, irritated at her remarks about low company, &c., laughed aloud: one said—"Well, she do wear the breeches, she do, and no mistake!" and another answered, "The gray mare's the best horse, Ben." And all jeered and twitted Ben.

"We'll see that," said Ben, shaking off his stupor, and quite mad with rage and drink, he seized with one hand a pewter pot that hung near him, and staggering after her, with the other hand he caught her by the dull, ragged, long back hair (coiled round a broken comb)—that hair that had once been so glossy and so neatly braided.

She gazed at him as she might have done at a tiger whose claws were in her scalp.

Alas, she knew his symptoms well. She saw his was no longer maudlin—he was mad. She struggled to free herself, but in vain. He raised his arm, and with the quart pot he struck her savagely on the temple.

It was this blow that Ada saw. "Oh do not, do not strike her," she cried, involuntarily, unconsciously, vainly.

At that very moment, while her eyes and Ellen's were straining to see what became of the woman, who had fallen down as if shot—and while Mrs. Golightly was exclaiming, "There's a type of the modern husband," the cabman turned sharply round the corner, hiding from their distended eyes the woman so savagely beaten down.

Ada sank back, sick and faint, saying, "Oh, I hope the brutal wretch has not hurt her much!"

"Oh, I trust not; but it was a heavy fall," replied Ellen. "I did not see the blow struck. It was your cry, Ada, made me look round, and then she was on the ground."

"It was a cruel blow," replied Ada. "But the wretch being drunk, I hope his arm had lost some of its vile strength; and yet he felled that delicate little woman as 'butcher felleth ox.'"

"I hope," said Ellen, "she sank on the ground to avoid more violence. The bystanders always take part with any one on the ground."

"Men in his rank of life bruise the flesh of their wives, those in a higher sphere their spirit," said Mrs. Golightly; "they're all of a piece."

What would they all have thought and felt, had they known the ghastly fact that the blow they had seen dealt was a fatal one. The wife was dead—the husband was a murderer!

Yes, that blow had fallen heavily, fatally on the throbbing temple of the poor wife. She fell with a low moan; the drunken husband exclaiming, "None o' them games, missus; you're up to a trick or two, but I knows a thing worth two o' that 'ere, and here goes for a good rouser." He was about to kick her poor frail body with his hob-nailed shoes, when three policemen rushed forward. Two laid fast hold of Ben, and one raised the woman. She had ceased to moan. The glare of the gas fell full on a pinched face, ghastly white, stained with blood, and on which the unmistakable change was already wrought.

"You have done for her, you have, and for yourself too, my man!" said one of the police. "It's my belief she's dead."

"Dead!" hiccupped the drunken man; "noa, noa, never say die. She ain't dead, not she; she's a-shammin'. She's ollys a-shammin' summut. She shammed starvation, and got her brother, hump-backed Natt, to interfere—interfere atween man and wife. He'd better just, and I'll settle his hash, I'll cook his goose; I can see she ain't dead. I could rouse her."

"Dead! dead! dead!" was repeated by the crowd, drawing back in horror and in awe. And children who had never seen death, and those around who knew the "fell sergeant" well, felt equally that it was death.

The poor victim, before she entered the gin-palace after her husband, had, as we have said, asked a kind applemoan, whom she knew well, and who was keeping a fruit-stall close by, to hold her baby, and look to her little girl.

The famished baby had made good use of his time, for nestled in the warm and ample bosom of the kind applemoan, he had discovered that she too was a nursing mother, and one overflowing with the milk of human kindness.

Her own baby had been buried by the parish the day before. But the very poor have not time for outward mourning. If they weep at all, it must be while they work.

"Poor baby!" said the applemoan, "thou'rt welcome, thou'rt kindly welcome." And at the same time she gave the little hungry girl the piece of bread and herring she had provided for her own supper; a charitable act which doomed her to go herself supperless to bed. Shall she lose her reward?—surely not.

CHAPTER III.

Hark, hark! for bread my children cry:
A cry that drinks my spirits up.
But 'tis in vain—in vain to try;
Oh, give me back the drunkard's cup—
This cursed chain, 'twill make me mad—
'Twill make me mad.

ELIHALET NOTT.

A DENSE crowd soon gathered round that spot, where a pool of blood told the tale of wife murder.

A body of the police were already there. The dead woman was taken into "The Good Intent."

A woman killed by a drunken husband was not very welcome, where all buyers and sellers alike "rose up early to follow strong drink." A surgeon had arrived, and had pronounced life extinct.

An inquest must be held on the morrow.

The husband, who had seen his wife carried into "The Good Intent," was madly struggling to get at her, offering to fight the "peelers," as he called the police, and anon, with a momentary glimmer of intelligence, calling on his Esther, and crying and howling bitterly for his Esther, his wife.

The kind applemoan had hidden from the little girl the father's crime and the mother's doom. Herself pale with horror, she did not join the crowd to gratify an idle curiosity; she diverted the child's attention from the fatal scene to the rosy apples on her stall, and taught her how to pile them up in little heaps, "three a penny."

"I wish we could have given something to that good, kind, dear applemoan; I mean the one who took charge of those little ones. She had such a nice, loving face; and I should so like to know that the poor wife was not much hurt. It was such a savage blow, and she so weak and worn. I suppose the applemoan and her stall will be there to-morrow. I should like to drive early there, and inquire, and reward her, too," said Ada, pale and shivering.

"We shall see her again to-night," replied Ellen.

"Do you know her, then?" asked Ada, much surprised.

"Yes; and you shall know her too."

"She is a good soul," said Mrs. Golightly; "but I fear she'll never read. The pains I've taken with her would almost have taught a rhinoceros; but all in vain."

"Oh! she'll surprise you yet," said Ellen; "reading with some of them seems to come all at once, like swimming. You will see another singular character to-night, Ada," she added; "a sweep—a master-sweep, but one who yet works at his grimy trade, and will do so to the end, although he has ample means to live in ease and idleness, if idleness ever could be ease; and the same hand which you may see in the morning black with soot, will, in the evening, lay down the ruddy gold, or delicate banknote even, to aid in any cause that promotes the good of the poor. His name is Jem Goodman. But what is this? another crowd, and I fear another crime."

They had slowly moved away from the scene of death; and the murdered woman was by this time stretched on a table in "The Good Intent."

It was a table round which men habitually met to booze. Often had "Tippling Ben," her husband, caroused at that very board. He was dragged off by the police till the inquest had been held, to be kept in custody at the station-house. Some few expected a verdict of wilful murder, but the majority were confident it would be manslaughter only; in either case a warrant would be obtained, and in the meantime "Tippling Ben" was in charge.

Such tragedies as Esther Darrell's death (in London) are not "nine days' wonders;" nine minutes are more than people can give here to other people's business, if they would mind their own.

Invererate toppers, who did not like the presence of Death, had staggered off to the next gin-palace, and the landlord and landlady, having no customers to help, helped themselves, and did not go to bed sober.

The crowd, Ellen had remarked, was this time gathered round a baker's shop; a man, literally starving—in that stage of hunger which is such agony to endure—had stolen a loaf. The baker gave him in charge, and the police had him by the bare, haggard throat. It was harrowing to see how this man, once a lawyer's clerk, and well-to-do, in the animal instinct of gratifying his hunger, seemed indifferent to disgrace, impending imprisonment, everything but the passionate desire to retain the bread he had stolen, and to stuff some of it into his mouth. When at length it was torn from his iron gripe, a howl like that of a famished wolf, burst from that human throat, and he then moaned piteously.

While all this was going on outside, in an adjoining shop, where, through the plate-glass, women half-naked, and barefooted children, looked in on warm wadded mantles, red woollen skirts, soft fleecy hose, and velvet slippers lined with fur, and where bright ribbons, delicate laces, and gorgeous silks were displayed—

A lady, whose dashing equipage waited at the door, was shut up in the great mercer's private room, to which she had been most mysteriously invited and efficiently escorted, having been examined and detected in secreting about her well-fed, richly-attired person two pieces of lace—a collar and a veil!

She was a lady of rank and fortune, and she had rosewood drawers and mahogany wardrobes, full of laces, collars, and veils at home.

She offered a very handsome douceur, her custom, and her patronage, to be let off.

The mercer was a phrenologist. He decided that Lady Plume had acquisitiveness very large. He said so with a very wise look to his partner, touching at the same time a bump in his own head, which bump was, sooth to say, frightfully developed, and its existence proved by his present readiness to be bribed.

"A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind."

Guided by his own predominant organ, he, in spite of the opinion of his partner, who hated the aristocracy, compromised the felony.

Lady Plume shed a few tears, offered her white jewelled hand to both partners, and was conducted to her carriage amid bowing shopmen by the great mercer himself.

She drove home to a large dinner-party, and dashed past, on her way, the starving wretch who, for stealing a loaf, was being dragged off in the custody of two policemen.

CHAPTER IV.

Dare we condemn the hearts we leave
To grope their way in abject gloom,
Yet conscious that we help to weave
The shroud-fold of corruption's loom?
Shall we send forth the poor and stark
All rudderless on stormy seas,
And yet expect their spirit-bark
To ride out every tempest breeze?

Go, teach the orphan girl to sew.

ALFRED TENNISON.

AND now they have left the gay, bright thoroughfare that leads to St. Paul's. They have passed through Farringdon-street, feebly lighted and very desolate, and after a few minutes of "darkness visible," they have stopped at a building of rude exterior.

Some ragged children were at a door, which they suddenly pushed open, and then rushed up stairs.

The ladies, ordering the cabman to wait for them, got out.

Mrs. Golightly also pushed that door; it opened on a narrow flight of deal steps bearing recent traces of mirth feet.

Ellen beckoned Ada to follow her.

"Who lives here, Ellen?" said Ada, drawing back.

"Charity, surrounded by her little ones," said Ellen. "Fear nothing. You will get more good here than you ever did where marble stairs, richly carpeted, led to gilded saloons."

"I never got any good there," said Ada, bitterly; "so go on, I'll follow thee."

"Shall I lead the way?" asked Mrs. Golightly, preceding them.

"Oh, Ellen!" said Ada, "my heart is sick with all I have seen to-night. Starvation glaring in on plenty; drunkenness urging to brutality; that poor wretch who stole a loaf dragged to prison!"

"You will be more moved yet, Ada," said Ellen. "You have seen poverty goaded to crime; now you will see poverty led to virtue."

So saying, she ascended the narrow stairs, and pushing open a door, Ada found herself in a large upper room, lofty, very well lighted with gas, and filled with many hundreds of children, boys and girls, in every variety of rags and wretchedness; men and women of all ages, and many classes; but all in the worn, ragged, faded livery of poverty; almost all with that pinched look about the nose, that blue shade round the mouth, that anxious expression in the glassy eye, which long privation stamps upon the human face divine. They were all divided into tables or classes, and seated on forms. At each table an earnest teacher (paid or unpaid, alike kind and zealous) presided. Some few of these ragged pupils whom charity and zeal had compelled to come in, and who had been hunted out of filthy dens of crime and sensuality by brave city missionaries, whom nothing could daunt, deter, or disgust, worn out with long exposure to cold, wet, and hunger endured by day and night, soothed by the warmth, and lulled by the sympathy that contrasted so strangely with the ban and the abuse to which they were accustomed, fell fast asleep, and none thought of rousing them.

There were fine, soldierly-looking men, who had braved death in battle abroad, brought down at last by famine at home.

There were pale brows, where Intellect ought to have presided, but Vice had dethroned him, and reigned there instead. Intemperance or other sensuality had brought even genius to this spot.

On most of those faces (even on the least prepossessing) there was attention; on many there was reverence.

TREBIZOND, IN ASIA MINOR.

Ada, as she looked timidly round, awed and abashed, in the venerable presence of misery, felt a spasm in her throat, a chill at her heart, and hot tears rushing to her eyes.

She understood Ellen's drift now. They were in a Ragged School. Yes; they were in the "Green Fields Ragged School."

TREBIZOND

WITHIN the last three or four years we have been manufacturing histories at a more rapid rate and of a more interesting character than was generally expected in these latter days. Places chiefly attractive to the commercial community and the enterprising speculator have assumed new importance. A little while ago the Turko-Russian business was on hand, and the Black Sea shores, instead of being simple places of trade, resounded to the rattling sound of musketry and the roar of artillery. Happily, this came to an end; and while India was a new field of action and engrossed public attention, the Black Sea resumed its old aspect—quiet folks, hunted out of their homes by the demon of war, came back again, and peaceful trading vessels ploughed the waves of the Euxine.

On the south-east coast of the Black Sea is the city and seaport of Trebizond. The ancient name of the city was Trapezus, and it was originally founded by settlers from Sinope, who there, at an early period, founded a colony.

Sinope was a parent city, the mother of many children, who in course of time—as daughters will—outshone their mother, and cast the poor dowager into the shade. Trebizond, of all her daughters, was the most successful. It was wooed and won by Commerce, and, with rising credit and a princely fortune, had the honour of entertaining Xenophon and his Ten Thousand at the close of their memorable retreat. Its celebrity outlived many a more pretentious city: for its ships rode the waters, and fortune gave them favouring gales, when the boastful empires of antiquity had crumbled into dust. When the Greek empire was subjugated at the period of the Crusades, its duke, of the Comneni family, assumed the dignity of Emperor. This empire of Trebizond lasted two hundred and fifty years, when the Turks seized it (1460), and have, with varying fortune, maintained their hold of it ever since.

The town of Trebizond is picturesquely situated on the descent of a hill, the foot of which is washed by the sea, while the heights form a background of surpassing grandeur, and impenetrable defence. The central portion of the city is surrounded by a battlemented wall. On either side of this wall there is a deep valley or ravine, across which bridges have been thrown, and which present, with umbrageous trees, and climbing plants, and jagged and broken masses of rock, a romantic and interesting scene.

Trebizond has two harbours flanking the sides of a small peninsula which projects from the town into the sea. The eastern harbour is most used; it is better defended from the winds, and affords safer anchorage. Previous to the Turkish occupation of Trebizond, it was the seat of an extensive trade; but the exclusion of foreign vessels from the Black Sea interfered with its prosperity, a prosperity which was again to be enjoyed, as there is no doubt of its being the natural emporium of all the countries south-east of the Black Sea. The treaty of Adrianople, which opened the waters of that sea to European vessels, gave new impetus to the rising tendencies of Trebizond; while more recent events have given to it an importance which it did not before possess.

Trebizond within the walls is exceedingly picturesque. The houses are mostly built of white stone, roofed with red tiles, surrounded by a garden planted with tall trees and fragrant flowers; so that the town from the sea presents the appearance of a forest inclosed with castellated walls.

ROBERT BLOOMFIELD, THE POETICAL SHOEMAKER.

THE highly-gifted author of "The Farmer's Boy" was the youngest child of parents who resided in a village not far from Bury, and was born December 3rd, 1766. His father pursued the business of a tailor, while his mother was a schoolmistress, and instructed her own children with the others. Robert thus learned to read almost as soon as he could talk. About a twelvemonth after the birth of the future poet, the worthy tailor died, leaving the mother a widow, with six small children. She seems, however, to have looked her trial bravely in the face, and to have summoned up all her resolution to meet it in a spirit of resignation, and to provide for the fatherless children. To her youngest son, who was the last tender tie between herself and her departed husband, she was most ardently attached; he was one very strongly calculated to draw forth the deep and holy sympathies of a mother, for he looked, at eleven years of age, too small and frail to be ever able to get his living by hard labour. At this time he had a brother in London who was maintaining himself by shoemaking; and who, upon his mother's account of Robert, cheerfully and affectionately offered to take him and teach him to make shoes, while another brother offered to clothe him. The mother, on this, took coach for London with her boy, for she said she never should be happy if she did not put him, herself, into the hands of his future protector. She charged her son George, the shoemaker, as he valued a mother's blessing, to watch over Robert, to set him a good example, and never to forget that he had lost his father. George Bloomfield nobly and tenderly discharged the duties belonging to the trust imposed on him. He had but poor quarters in which to receive and welcome the young orphan, for he then worked in a miserable garret, with two turn-up beds, and five companions.

At first, Robert was allowed to enjoy himself as he best could under the circumstances, and was not put to anything like constant work. He was the little messenger of George and his fellow companions. At noon, he went for their dinners, when there were any to fetch; and generally did their errands for them. Thus early, however, did he begin to manifest an amazing thirst for knowledge, and an aptitude for literary pursuits. The workmen were scarcely able to afford many luxuries, but the luxury of a stale newspaper was at their command, and they had been in the habit of reading it in turn; but soon after Robert entered the garret, they appointed him sole reader to the company. At his age, and with his defective education, he frequently met with words which he could not understand; and as this continued to be really a source of grief to the lad, his good brother George contrived to buy him a second-hand dictionary, by the help of which he could in a very little time read and comprehend the long and elaborate speeches of Burke, Fox, and other statesmen. His mind was also improved by coming in contact with other influences of an elevating character.

There was in his day a preacher of the name of Fawcett, who, by his peculiar eloquence, was attracting a large congregation in a dissenting meeting-house in the Old Jewry. He had all the power of a grand actor of tragedy, combined with the familiar freedom of a writer in a magazine. Over young Bloomfield's nature he exercised a mighty influence: the lad, though forced to stand in the aisle, would never, if he could possibly help it, be absent from the meeting-house on the Sabbath day. Through Fawcett's preaching, Robert not only gained the most enlarged notions of Providence, but learned to accentuate what he called hard words, and otherwise improve himself. He also went occasionally to a debating society, and waded through an extensive history of England, besides reading books of travel and of geography. These last, however, he always read as a task, and to oblige the workpeople in his brother's garret.

The "London Magazine" was at that time rather popular, and its contents were richly prized by young Bloomfield. The pages in it which were most interesting to him were those devoted to review, for here he became aware of what scholars and writers were doing, and what critics said of their efforts and performances. A favourite portion of the magazine also was what was styled the "Poets' Corner;" and ere long he surprised his companions by reading to them a song which he had composed for the magazine, and which, with much trembling, he sent to the editor thereof, who straightway inserted it.

This was his first appearance in print; and, as is natural, fired his ardour and ambition to become a literary man. He sent several poetical compositions for the "Poets' Corner," which were also inserted, and gave bright promise of what he would accomplish hereafter. He was still very young—quite a boy indeed; but the fire of genius shone forth from his youthful eyes, while his industry and power of application levelled the mountain of ignorance which impeded the full and eloquent expression of his naturally fine gifts and faculties. So hard a student did the boy become, that his brother and the workmen in the garret began to treat him as their superior, and to seek instruction from him.

There now fell in his way books of a poetical character—Milton's "Paradise Lost" and Thomson's "Seasons;" these books Robert literally devoured, assimilating to himself the deep and glowing thoughts of the authors, and reproducing them in images of beauty fresh from the glowing mint of his own ardent imagination. His poetical tendencies were also deeply strengthened by a short residence in the country, when a temporary misfortune obliged him to return to the home of his mother. Here, with his mind teeming with the fine illustrations with which Thomson's book is filled, and in the midst of the most splendid rural scenery, he, no doubt, by his deep thoughts, laid the foundation of the poem which perhaps more than any other will keep his name alive in the world—"The Farmer's Boy." In the quiet happiness of his fond mother's society, and in retracing the fields where he had first looked on the holy face of nature, far from the smoke, the noise, the contention of the city, he imbibed that love of rural simplicity and rural innocence which fitted him in a great degree to be the writer of such a pastoral.

After having spent two delightful months in the country, Robert returned to London, this time to work in right good earnest for his living. He was not above his work, nor did he fail to do it most creditably and successfully, although occasionally he was filled with the most ardent aspirations for sufficient scope in which to manifest his powers. At twenty years of age he was as good a workman as his brother George, but at the same time he kept up an acquaintance with those literary pursuits and studies which so cheerfully relieve the dull monotony of toil. He studied music, and became a good player on the violin; but, having fallen a victim to the tender passion, he tells us that "he sold his fiddle and got a wife," a comely young woman of the name of Mary Anne Church, of the town of Woolwich. Like many poor men, he got a wife, and had to get household stuff afterwards. It took him some time to get out of ready-furnished lodgings, but by dint of hard working, perseverance, and womanly contriving, he purchased a bed of his own, and hired a room up one pair of stairs (let the address be remembered), at 14, Bell-alley, Coleman-street. In this garret, amid six or seven other workmen, his active mind employed itself in composing "The Farmer's Boy."

Young Bloomfield was at this time a ladies' shoemaker, and worked for a Mr. Davies, of Lombard-street. He was of slender make, of about five feet four inches high, and very dark complexion. He was the embodiment of mildness of temper, and goodness of disposition; and was universally praised by those who were best and most intimately acquainted with his character. His book, when it came to be published, excited general admiration and respect for its author's abilities; literary men vied with each other in the high praises they lavished on it, paid a just tribute to living worth and merit, and did not wait for the tomb to present a tardy and unproductive wreath.

It is beautiful to contemplate the pure and holy love he cherished towards his mother, and indeed for all his beloved relatives; and when the literary world was eloquent in his praises, and review after review proclaimed his talents, it is touching to read the words of his affectionate brother George: "I have in my mind's eye a little boy, not bigger than boys generally are at twelve years old. When I met him and his mother at the inn, he strutted before us just as he came from keeping sheep, hogs, &c., his shoes filled full of stumps of nails in the heels. He looking about him, slipped up; his nails were unused to a flat pavement. I remember viewing him as he scampered up: how small he was! I little thought that that little fatherless boy would be one day known and esteemed by the most learned, the most respected, the wisest, and the best men of the kingdom."

DUST.

From whence does it all come? You may sweep your room twice every day, and you will find that a cloud arises every time the broom and the floor make acquaintance. You may dust every article of furniture, every book, every picture; you may take care to shake your duster out of the window, and your own clothes out in the yard; you may wipe all about the book-shelves and the floor with a damp cloth; and yet, after all your labour, there will be dust. Dust flying in the air; dust settling on the books and tables; dust on the pictures, on the flowers—dust, dust, everywhere. It is discouraging.

You think, perhaps, that 'tis because the room in which you sit is so large; you think that if you were in snugger quarters, there would not be so much of this annoyance; you therefore move into a smaller apartment, but you are worse off now than you were before. You can't turn around quick, nor even heave a sigh, without setting in motion ten thousand tiny particles of dust. You may sweep till your broom falls, and dust till your arms fall off, and the story will be always the same. Even out at sea, where the good ship rides the billows, thousands of miles from land, the dust gathers. It matters not how much the sailors rub the masts and holystone the decks, the dust will gather, even amid the salt spray of the sea. It is for ever flying and settling wherever there is any solid substance on which it can alight. Where it comes from is no mystery, when we remember what sort of things are ever about us, and what sort of things we are.

"Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return," is written on clothing, on wood, and iron, and steel, just as truly as it is on our frail, perishing flesh; and the changing and sifting back to its despised original is going on before our very eyes, in each thing that we look upon. Constantly—some rapidly, others with a slower waste—but certainly, all things are returning whence they came. 'Tis enough to make one fear the dust—to make one feel a horror at the atoms falling on one's garments, and one's limbs, to read and understand their language. That language is all of decay and death; of earth, the grave, and worms; of darkness, forgetfulness, and despair. At least, if one cannot look beyond the dust, and see, and take hold of, the eternal life.

How carefully and purely should we step through the world, did we but read, as we walk, all that is written for our admonition and warning. But we go hastily, with careless eye and dumb heart, taking little heed when we should be most studious. Many there be who have deep skill to read the dark sayings written on ancient rocks, who yet have never understood the plain language of the gathering dust.

The Matron.

NO. XI.

Good temper is the sunshine of life, whether in the Queen's palace or the shepherd's hut. But I own it is much easier to be ever recommending good temper than to be ever exercising it.

In my last number I spoke of the misery occasioned at home by a thoroughly ill-tempered man. Such men, alas, exist; but in this highly favoured Christian country I am inclined to hope they are not very common. There is some good feeling among us still. The husbands that abound are men who are "easily put out," as the saying is. Therefore every good, prudent housewife will do well to consider what things do "put out" her husband. From my experience and observation, the horrors of a washing day, and the worry and disobedience of children, are the things that generally "put a man out." Therefore, on the subject of the family wash, and on the management of children, I propose giving a few useful hints.

On coming home tired, and expecting a little comfortable refreshment, warmth, and rest, what can be a greater trial to a man's temper than to find tubs of dirty water by the fireside, wet linen in all directions, and, worst of all, a wife forgetful of her husband, and caring only about the wash?

"How can I help it?" I hear the good lady reply; "you wouldn't have me leave the clothes, and sheets, and blankets dirty? I'm sure I see enough in print about the harm of neglect in washing."

"You are quite right," I reply; "cleanliness is a duty to ourselves, to our families, and to our neighbours; but I am sure it may be carried into effect without destroying the comfort of your husband's fireside."

Of course, with rich people who have plenty of space and plenty of servants, the husband hears and knows nothing of the discomforts and difficulties of the washing-day; but what I am now anxious to do is to assist those who are not rich in conquering the evils of this difficult domestic duty.

In the first place, "Well begun, is half done." If this saying applies to anything, it does most especially to a family wash, for, with good preparation, clothes are washed in less time and more thoroughly than where no sensible precautions have been taken. A receipt for a "washing preparation," that lessens labour and does not injure the clothes, will be welcomed by my female readers of all classes.

The night before your wash, dissolve half a pound of soda in one gallon of boiling water, and pour it on a quarter of a pound of quicklime; cut up the soap you intend using for the wash, and pour the clear water from the lime and soda upon it. It will form a soft mass, ready for use on the next morning.

But the clothes themselves require preparation on the preceding night. Let them all be put into soak, but on no account place them all together. Let the fine things be in one tub and the coarse ones in another. Of the linen, rub with soap the places that are most soiled; for instance, the front and sleeves of children's pinafores, the wristbands and collars of shirts, and the most greasy parts of tablecloths.

Mind also to fill the copper with soft water, and to rinse the tubs, and wipe them inside and out.

As a general rule, do not allow foul clothes to accumulate to such an extent as to require more than a day to get them up.

Save in other things, that you may have a good active washerwoman when you have a large wash about. In fact, the washing-day requires all your intelligence and all your good management. The object you should have in view is this, to see that the washing is got through well, and yet so expeditiously that your husband and children may not have to pay for their clean clothes by discomfort and dangerous exposure to damp air.

Now for one of those rules that should be written in gold—"Never prefer things to persons." There is no property, no clothes, no furniture, no, nor money, nor jewels, that is half as valuable as the health and comfort of your husband and children. All your care, forethought, and method should be used to promote the real happiness of home. Take care that your zeal about the means does not make you lose sight of the end. Many respectable mothers and wives err in this respect, in the north country especially. A little anecdote—related by one who knew the Scotch well—will illustrate this.

A lady visiting a humble cottage in the neighbourhood of her own estate, was struck by observing that all the attention of the goodwife was given to airing clothes at the fire, while the Goodman, a poor, helpless, shivering invalid, was trembling with cold, and excluded—for the sake of the precious clothes—from all the benefit and comfort of the blazing faggot. The lady could not avoid interfering, and her disgust was not lessened on hearing that the poor old man was kept in the cold, and his life perhaps sacrificed, in order to make way for the airing of his own dead clothes, or grave clothes!

Here was a fine instance of preferring things to persons, and a proof of the old saying, that "there may be too much of a good thing."

On the other hand, there may be too little.

There may very easily be too little attention to method, arrangements, and preparations for the household wash, respecting which I give the following advice:—

Never attempt washing such heavy things as bed-hangings and counterpanes except in summer or early autumn. Put flannels and coloured things by themselves. Do not use the washing preparation for them.

Wash the coloured things in the usual way, with common soap, while the white things are boiling. For woollens make a good lather. In order to do this, put half a pound of soap in a gallon of water, and boil it till the soap is dissolved. Wash your woollens in water as warm as your hand can bear, adding the prepared lather according as it is wanted; then wring the woollens, and placing them in a rinsing-tub, cover them with boiling water. As soon as they are cool enough to be handled, wring them; then rinse them well in hard water, and for drying spread them out as straight and smooth as possible. So much for woollens; now for a few words about drying, which should follow the washing (I am now alluding to the family wash) as quickly as possible.

Fine weather is so indispensable for drying, that we advise young wives to put off all other household occupations (excepting what is quite necessary) in order to take advantage of fine weather for washing, or rather for drying.

By the way, lace should never be boiled, only scalded.

A few words more, and I take leave of the wash-house for the present. Keep your tubs half full of water, or they will leak and fall to pieces. Have a large bag for clothes-lines, and another for clothes-pegs, and keep these articles (viz. the pegs and lines in their respective bags) in a dry place.

Although I am tempted to give a few directions about mangling, folding, and ironing, I shall reserve these for the first convenient opportunity, because I can fancy I hear anxious mothers asking me how I mean to treat the management of children? I answer that it is my intention to give receipts, rules, and advice, to promote the health, happiness, and real welfare of children, from their infancy till they are twelve years old. As to the receipts for promoting health, I do not promise any magic nostrums, cabalistic charms, or mesmeric wonders. A few judicious receipts for diseases common to children is all I undertake to give, but these receipts will have good authority, and the use of them is only recommended where the danger is not imminent, and where medical aid cannot readily be procured. In following these receipts, mothers will act more wisely than in listening to the advice of some ignorant old women, who pretend to know everything. Great ignorance and credulity still exist on matters relating to the healing art. Your neighbours abroad recommend you to place common earthworms on a child's throat to relieve him in the croup! and an acquaintance of my own swallowed a live spider to cure herself of an ague!

Small Change.

ALSO, AND LIKEWISE.

A COUNSEL ONCE, of talents vain, a quaker rudely treated,
Who often in his story plain, the word also repeated—
"Also!" said brief, with sneering wit, "won't likewise do as well?"

"No, friend, but if thou wilt permit, their difference I will tell—
Scarlett's a counsel learned, we know, whose talents oft surprise;
Thou art a counsel, friend, also, but surely not likewise."

WHAT is the difference between a field of oats and an author? The oats are usually cut down, and authors are generally cut up.

"JOHN! you took a bad half-sovereign of the inn-keeper the other day. Did you get rid of it?" "Faix, yer honor, I did." "And where did you pass it, John?" "Between two pennies, at a turnpike, yer honour."

"PLAZE sir," said a Hibernian, during the panic, to a professional money-lender, "ye'll discount this bill for me?" "Can't do it," replied the man of business; "it has so many days to run." "True, for ye; but it's December, and the days are all short."

WITNESS cross-examined at Bow-street by counsel: "How do you live?" "Pretty well, sir—generally a joint and pudding at dinner." "I mean, sir, how do you get your bread?" "Oh! I beg pardon; sometimes at the baker's, and sometimes at the chandler's shop." "I mean to ask you, sir, how do you manage to live in London?" "By opening all the windows to let in all the air." (Witness ordered to stand down.)

CHILDREN'S QUESTIONS.—"What does cleave mean, papa?" "It means to stick together." "Does John stick wood together when he cleaves it?" "Hem! it means to separate." "Well, then, pa, does a man separate from his wife when he cleaves to her?" "Hem! don't ask foolish questions, child."

Is there any word which contains all the vowels? Unquestionably.

WHEN is a punster most like an outlaw? When he is robbing Hood (Robin Hood).

POOR LETTER H.—Rowland Hill made a good remark upon hearing the power of the letter H discussed, whether it were a letter or not. "If it were not, he said, it would be a very serious affair for him, for it would make him ill all the days of his life."

YOUTHFUL INSTRUCTION.—Instruct your son well, or others will instruct him ill. No child goes altogether untaught. Send him to the school of wisdom, or he will go himself to the rival academy kept by the lady with the cap and bells.

A BOY being rebuked by a clergyman for not attending church, said he would do so if allowed to change his seat; but that as it was, half a dozen old women, with their mouths wide open, sat between him and the preacher, and took all the best of the sermon, so that when it came to him it was "pretty stuff."

CONCLUSIVE.—An American paper says, when you see a gentleman at midnight sitting on the step in front of his house, combing his hair with the door-scraper, you may judge he has been out to an evening party.

A PERSON in delicate health being asked by a friend, "If he would venture on an orange," replied, "No, I thank you, I should roll off."

"You Don't, Don't You?"—"Mister, I say, I don't suppose you don't know of nobody who don't want to hire nobody to do nothing, don't you?" The answer was, "Yes, I don't."

Two persons of a satiric turn met a neighbour and said, "Friend, we have been disputing whether you are most knave or fool." The man took each of the querists by the arm, so that he was in the middle. "Faith," said he, "I believe I am between both."

THE most remarkable instance of indecision we ever heard of was that of the man who sat up all night, because he could not decide which to take off first, his coat or his boots.

EXPLICIT ANSWERS.—"Where's the rake, Sambo?" "Wid de hoe, massa." "Well, where is the hoe?" "Wid de rake, massa." "Well, where are they both?" "Why both togedder, massa. You pleases to be berry 'ticular dis morning."

ON DIR.—The submarine wires intend to prosecute an editor for saying they were deranged.

WHY AND BECAUSE.—Why is a blade of grass like a note of hand? Because it is matured by falling dew.

Chess.

Problem No. 24. Mr. J. PHENIX.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in five moves.

Problem No. 25. By DOMINO.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

F. P. HALL.—The solutions forwarded with your letter of the 2nd February are correct. We are afraid that the alteration which you suggest could not be conveniently adopted.

WILLIAM HIGGS.—We hope your doubts have been removed by the published solution of Problem No. 14. In Problem No. 15 Black should play his P to B 8, and exchange it for a Knight, if White move as you suggest.

A. JOYCE.—Is there no Literary Institution in your neighbourhood at which chess is played? We shall be happy to furnish you with the information which you require on your favouring us with your address on a stamped envelope.

JOHN GILBERT.—The Problems with which you have favoured us are much below our standard; nil desperandum—try again.

PAWN.—We do not clearly understand your first question. Any bookseller will procure the works you require.

L. B. H. (Huddersfield).—Your solution of Problem No. 14 is correct. See answer to "William Higgs" as to Problem No. 15. In Problem No. 16 Black has several defences against your proposed mode of attack.

A MECHANIC (Pittoneum).—"Kt from QR 5 to Kt 7" means Knight from Queen's Rook's fifth square to Knight's seventh square. The square on which the King is placed is called the King's square, the square in front of it the King's 2nd square; and the same rule applies to all the other pieces.

Solutions of Problems by R. T. (Southport), No. 18; J. W. Bird, No. 18; J. F. Cadman, Nos. 14 and 15, and Enigmas Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8; G. Farrow, Nos. 16 and 17; John Gilbert, Nos. 14, 16, and 17; T. Simpson, Nos. 14, 15, 16, and 17, and Enigmas Nos. 6, 7, and 8; George Vaughan, Enigma, No. 6; W. Mr. John S. will be happy to play any subscriber to the FAMILY PAPER a game of Chess by correspondence Address, 11, Laygate-street, South Shields.

Our Editorial Table.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE AND TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

Commencing with the present number (No. 16), CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER will be published by Messrs. PETTER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, Ludgate Hill. If any difficulty should be experienced in obtaining the necessary supply, in consequence of the greatly increasing demand, application is requested to be made to Messrs. Petter and Galpin direct. All the back numbers of the Paper have been reprinted, and may be had upon application. In order to give every person an opportunity to commence with the New Series, no extra charge will be made for the back numbers of the New Series until further notice.

JANIE.—If a young lady and a gentleman, both being musical (vocally so), meet in society, there is no objection to their singing duets together; but as everything bordering on forwardness takes from woman's modest dignity, we think the proposal that they should sing together should come from the gentleman, or from a third party. If a gentleman goes out of his way to see a lady home from a party or a lecture, it is graceful and proper in her to thank him. There is a certain arrogance in taking all attentions as a right; it is more amiable in ladies to receive them as favours.

A COUNTRY GIRL has no idea of the difficulty of obtaining an engagement at any theatre, or of the numerous requirements, and the disheartening competition. It is next to impossible to obtain the slightest footing on boards which, in our opinion, it is better for a young girl to scrub than to tread. "A Country Girl" has evidently not received an education to fit her for the higher walks of the drama, and the lower ones are far more laborious and less remunerative than domestic service. Steps taken unknown to parents by girls of eighteen are generally strides on the road to ruin. We advise "A Country Girl" to improve her mind by judicious reading, and to think no more of the stage.

SCHOOLBOY.—The Queen's family name is D'Este. The name Guelph, commonly supposed to be that of the Royal Family of England, is only the name of a religious faction, of which the Electors of Hanover represented the head.

ESTHER.—A poached or fried egg is much more digestible than a boiled one.

R. PAPER.—In speaking to your wife, call her by her christian name. In speaking of her, say "Mrs. Paper," or whatever her real name may be.

NAN WILLIS.—All depilatories are dangerous. A low forehead is not a defect in a woman. The Venus de Medicis is remarkable for the lowness of hers. Nature is so good a workwoman, art never improves her design. If one eye is weak, the other always by sympathy is affected more or less; and reading must be discontinued while there is any inflammation or affection of the organ of sight.

TIMOUR asks our opinion of a young lady who would grant the request of a married man when he asked her to give him a kiss. We should think very ill both of the young lady who granted, and the married man who asked for such a token of affection.

KITTY REDBURN seems to us to be over sensitive. This sort of quizzing is as common as it is ill-bred, and if our fair correspondent did not suffer it to annoy her, it would cease to amuse her assailants, who would relinquish it for some other sport.

NED MUSGRAVE.—In affairs of the heart such as yours really to be, it is very difficult to advise without a more intimate knowledge of the parties than one letter can convey; but as, from the frank, candid, and manly style of your epistle (and, we may add, of your behaviour to the lady you love), we feel an interest in your welfare, we suggest that you should address your former enslaver once more. Write to her in an open, affectionate manner—ask her to make exile seem like home, and a winter in Canada appear an Italian summer, by sharing them with you. Insist on a decisive answer; and if she rejects you, and is willing you should emigrate alone, be sure she does not love you, and look elsewhere.

"If she be not fair for thee,
What carest thou how fair she be?"

STANDING is informed that when a gentleman is walking with a lady, whether she be his friend, relative, or intended, he should give her the inside, unless it happens to be muddy, rugged, or in any other way ineligible. It is a gentleman's bounden duty, in all matters, to consult the convenience of the ladies before his own. Whatever is best is woman's right, and the more civilised a country becomes, the greater is the deference paid to the gentler sex.

J. NICHOLLS.—The third finger of the right hand is the engaged finger; but many ladies who are affianced wear the ring on the third finger of the left hand. We can give "J. Nicholls" no unerring text by which to distinguish the real from the false, among his female acquaintance. We should imagine, from our knowledge of the fair sex, that no unengaged lady would run the risk of being supposed to be affianced by any gentleman whose proposals would be acceptable. "J. Nicholls" hand is a good one for a gentleman, but too formal and mercantile for a lady.

W. M. SKINNER.—We cannot insert arithmetical questions or enigmas unless accompanied by correct solutions.

BREVITY.—Your verses were duly received, but we cannot promise their insertion.

ARAMAIS.—Similar "Scraps about Birds" have appeared in numerous publications.

D. JOINER.—Indian ink requires no preparation "to make it flow freely from drawing-pens," except rubbing it on a clean earthen plate or ink-stone with a sufficient quantity of soft water.

W. O'MIROON (Dover Castle).—To complete the tale of "The Young Pretender," you require No. 206, and also the Supplement, with index and title, to complete Vol. IV.

GENERAL KNOWLEDGE modestly asks us to furnish her with "a list of the best works now in publication which will afford her an insight into general knowledge, enable her to converse freely on the principal topics of conversation, quicken the memory, and give a good tone to the mind." Verily, she must choose for herself, for such a list would require a large volume.

J. WILLIAMS.—The streets you inquire about have long since changed their names. "Grub-street" is now known as "Milton-street," "Rosemary-lane" as "Royal Mint-street," &c. &c.

SCOTIA, EDIN, DAVID, T. G., and LAND O' CAKES have sent us conjectural replies to an inquiry as to the name of the mother of King David. It is a matter of no importance; and as the Bible, the only reliable authority on the subject, furnishes no answer, the inquiry and conjectures are equally vain.

SCOTIA.—Your inquiries should be directed to the Secretary of the Post-office.

VAIN BEAUTY.—You have done what all our correspondents do not do—chosen an appropriate name. You are dissatisfied with the shape and colour of your arms, and with the hairs that are growing upon them, and also with your general complexion; and wish us to recommend cosmetics which will make your arms appear white and round, which will remove superfluous hairs (which are they?), and which will improve your general complexion. Were we to do this, would it not assist you to become an artificial, as well as a "vain" beauty?

ORTON.—Fish is much less nutritious than flesh; but the oily kinds, salmon, eels, herrings, &c., contain more nutriment than cod, haddock, or flounders.

J. O. S.—Your notice would depend entirely on the terms of your tenancy.

EXTRAORDINARY.—Your wall must be damp, or you would never have had so much trouble in your whitewashing operations.

A NERVOUS SUFFERER.—We recommend you to have nothing to do with persons of the class to which you refer.

GRAZIELLA.—Green paper on walls is favourable to the eyesight. It has been said, however, that arsenic enters largely into the manufacture of green wall-papers, and that it is consequently highly deleterious to the general health. With regard to a treatise on botany, you cannot do better than purchase Cassell's "Outlines of Botany," forming part of the invaluable "Educational Course."

NERO.—We do not think you would have any chance of a successful engagement as "hotel porter" in Canada.

PENLOPE.—For the discovery of glass (one of the most beautiful things in use) we are indebted to chance. Glass, according to Pliny, was originally found under the following circumstances: Near a river issuing from Mount Carmel, some nitre merchants made a halt. They found no stones on which to place their pots, so they made use of some of their pieces of nitre for this purpose. The fire they had kindled gradually dissolving the nitre, it mixed with the sand, and a transparent matter flowed. This matter, when cold, became glass.

A. T. C.—Our advice is, have nothing to do with "the Grand Duchy of Baden money distribution."

JOHN HURST.—You should apply to a magistrate: he can protect you against your wife's carrying off and selling your property, but a magistrate cannot grant you a divorce. If, however, you can prove your wife's infidelity, there is no doubt of your being ultimately able to procure a divorce, and that without the ruinous expenses that attended such proceedings before the new marriage law. But, observe this, until you have taken some legal step, your wife's ill conduct does not free you from her, nor make it less incumbent on you to support her. We feel it our duty to tell you that you did very wrong in accepting work that separated you, for the whole of the week, from your wife. There is much truth in the old saying, "Wives losing their husbands, oft lose their good name."

GILES DE RETZ.—The handwriting is no certain indication of character. Those who have studied the rules of the Model Copy-Books, published by Ward and Lock, will learn to write an excellent hand, without becoming on that account excellent characters.

SUI GRATULATUR.—Carrying on a correspondence cannot constitute an engagement; for the formation of which, an offer of marriage, made and accepted, is perfectly necessary.

TOMICUS.—We refer "Tomicus" and all other correspondents anxious to receive particulars about Valentine's Day and its patron saint, to "Cassell's Illustrated Almanack" for the present year, 1858. In this almanack they will find the subject treated at length, and also obtain much valuable information on other subjects. The almanack only costs 6d.

ANXIOUS INQUIRER.—You had better draw up an advertisement, stating your qualifications, and insert it in the newspaper of the greatest respectability and the largest circulation in your native town.

LOUISA.—You write to us describing yourself as a maiden desperately in love, even in danger of committing suicide, and this for a man so bashful, that he has not had courage to reveal his love for you! Are you sure he feels any? But supposing he does, and that he is too timid to own his partiality, we advise you to treat him with the indifference all cowards deserve, and to employ your penetration in selecting a worthier partner from among the other admirers you mention.

FIDDLER DICK.—Beware of the rash attempt of effecting a cure by scalding your face. Extensive scalds are often fatal; and, should you recover from their effects, your face would, in all probability, be more scarred than before. Dr. Cox makes the following observations about smallpox marks:—"Long observation has convinced me that nothing so effectually removes these disfigurements, as gently rubbing the face with a soft towel immediately after washing. This practice is free from the objections to be made against external applications. It quickens the circulation of the blood, producing exfoliation and the formation of new tissues, and, at the same time, restores to the cheek its healthy colour, which is generally lost by confluent smallpox."

A HOPEFUL LOVER.—There is an earnestness about your communication that deserves a prompt reply. Seek a personal interview with the lady and declare your love. Charming as timidity is in a maiden, it is by no means fascinating in a man; and, though true love has its misgivings in both sexes, it is your duty to repress and conquer such feelings.

INURBANUS.—We consider ourselves a manual of English etiquette, and we do not think it necessary to recommend any other.

C. M. W.—We advise you to be frank. You need not hurt the feelings of the diminutive individual who loves you in vain, but you should distinctly inform her your affections are another's. "You must be cruel only to be kind."

A YOUNG LAWYER.—A Portrait of Lord Campbell appeared in No. 5 of our New Series.

UNE JEUNE FILLE.—An excellent receipt for improving the hair is the following:—Mix nine parts of good olive oil and one part of liquid hartshorn. Rub in a little of this on alternate days. For a scent-bottle we can recommend you nothing more refreshing than eau de Cologne.

TWENTY-ONE.—We refer you to the Royal Marriage Act, by which you will find that the children of the sovereign can only marry members of Royal families and professors of the Protestant faith. The marriage act was passed in consequence of the union of the Duke of Gloucester, George III's brother, with Lady Waldegrave, and that of the Duke of Cumberland with the widow of Colonel Horton.

S. D.—Why is "S. D." so anxious to curl his hair? He should leave such blandishments to the ladies. However, we do not like to refuse his request. He would be disappointed if we only suggested the well known methods of curling tongs and curling papers; therefore, we furnish him with the following receipt to make a curling fluid. Melt a bit of white beeswax, about the size of a filbert kernel, in 1 oz. of olive oil; to this add one or two drops of otto of roses.

IVANHOE.—Wash your head two or three times a week in a lather of soft water and curd soap, taking care to dry your hair thoroughly. A receipt for a curling fluid is given in the answer to "S. D."

A. B. C.—We are anxious to give your distressing case our best attention. For your satisfaction we can assure you that all the symptoms you mention may result from the irregular action of the liver, and that this irregular action may be caused by indigestion. Avoid heavy suppers. In fact, persons in your condition should give up suppers altogether, and take something substantial with tea. Never eat cheese, and when you have the choice, take mutton in preference to beef; for beef disagrees with weak stomachs. At dinner drink plentifully of clear fresh water. Before retiring to rest, use the flesh brush until you have produced a glow on the skin. Read amusing books, and never allow a tale or an anecdote in our FAMILY PAPER to escape your notice. Accept invitations from friends; go on any excursion that does not entail much fatigue; encourage your companions to talk of their own affairs, their own hopes, fears, and sorrows. You will find we all have our trials. By giving your thoughts to others, you prevent their preying on your own mind. Pondering over griefs, real or imaginary, is worse than "an idle waste of thought." It is a habit that depresses the spirits, and consequently injures the digestion. Seek the cheering society of ladies in general, but beware of falling desperately in love with one in particular, since, from your own account of yourself, you are young and have your fortune to make. You should obtain a competency before you think of marriage. Attention to your business, whatever it may be, is a duty your own good sense will point out, but the recovery of your health and spirits is the paramount question at present. We believe you may obtain that desirable object by following the advice we have just given you, supposing you resign yourself to the Divine will in all things, and constantly implore aid from above, on every measure you adopt.

MATTHEW MEANWELL.—There is no objectionable disparity between a man of thirty-three and a girl of eighteen. The objection (in your case) is the unlawful nature of the connection you are projecting. Your deceased wife's sister can never (as the law of England stands) be your real wife, and all the children you might have by her, would be illegitimate.

J. N.—A good durable black is procured by boiling together logwood and cider in an iron pot. Mind you add water for the evaporation.

SELINA.—We advise you to endeavour to retain your native simplicity. Artificial airs and graces will not improve you.

A YOUNG HEIRESS.—You may be certain that your parents have good reason for their decision.

AN OLD MAID.—Refer to "Hoyle's Games."

LETTY.—"Letty" has been deeply in love with a young man, but she has quarrelled with him. She has an offer from another gentleman, whom she only esteems as a friend. "Letty" wishes us to advise her about accepting or rejecting her second suitor. We do not consider ardent love necessary to happiness in matrimony. But then, if a woman is not in love with the man she accepts, she must have no tenderness for any other. Unless "Letty" is certain that her first inclination is quite conquered, she cannot innocently accept another offer.

RANK AND FILE.—"Smiles and Tears," and "Latson," were both commenced in No. 1, New Series.

 We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "PHASES OF LIFE," "DICK TARLETON," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Judge we by nature?—habit can efface,
Interest overcome, or policy take place.
By actions?—these uncertainty divides.
By passions?—these dissimulation hides.
Opinions?—these still take a wider range:
Find, if you can, in what you cannot change.
Manners with fortunes, humours turn with climes,
Tenets with books, and principles with times.—POPE.

WHEN Carus Kearn fled from the scene of the attempted crime, which he firmly believed he had accomplished, our readers will recollect that he was followed by Styles, who felt annoyed at not having been employed on the occasion. It was a breach of confidence between them.

Impelled by his guilty terrors, the unworthy nephew proceeded at a rapid pace, till he reached one of the innumerable narrow gullies worn by the streams in the sides of the hills, and shaded with luxuriant foliage. Into one of these he threw himself, but had scarcely recovered his breath, when his pursuer, leaping through the interlacing underwood, stood before him.

Not recognising his confederate in his disguise, Carus drew a pistol from his belt.

"Hold hard!" exclaimed the ruffian; "don't you know me?"

"You here!"

"Of course I am. Badly managed, Mr. Carus; you had better have trusted me, and not have been seen in it yourself. Penny wise and pound foolish."

So his hearer began to think. Speaking aloud, he muttered something about never supposing that his uncle would have chosen to visit the island again so soon, and added, "that the cards played badly."

"Because you deal them badly," was the reply.

"He cannot have recognised me."

His confidential friend expressed himself not quite so satisfied upon the point.

The assassin had been seen by more than the speaker. Several of the fisherman, stimulated by the liberality of Mr. Bently, and natural indignation at the crime, were upon his track, and their voices might now be heard, calling to each other as they beat the underwood, like sportsmen in search of game.

"It's all up with you," exclaimed Styles; "you had better have trusted me."

Carus Kearn was not only a man of expedients, but of great promptitude in action. He had but one chance of escape.

"Give me your blouse and hat," he exclaimed, at the same time tearing off his own disguise.

The hitherto ready tool of his villainies would have refused, for he had not the slightest idea of bearing the brunt of another man's crime, but the cold touch of the pistol barrel which his employer held to his head, and the determined expression of his blood-shot eyes, decided him: he reluctantly stripped them off.

The instant he had done so Carus put them on; then, turning upon him, fired, having only hesitated to do so till the change was effected.

Styles fell on his face, and the ruffian, believing he had accomplished his purpose, fled. It was the second attempt he had made during the hour to take the life of a fellow creature, and, in both instances, without success. The fellow was not even wounded, the bullet having passed between the arm and his side.

"That is the way you provide for your friends, is it?" muttered the fellow; "very well, Mr. Carus Kearn, at last I know you."

The report of the pistol brought the fishermen to the spot, and, despite the assertions of his innocence, the speaker was secured. How could they doubt his guilt? the military undress coat and cap they had distinctly recognised were lying beside him.

That night Styles slept in the prison at St. Heliers, and information of his capture was at once conveyed to the merchant.

The narrow escape of his grandson had revealed to Mr. Bently a secret he was far from suspecting; namely, that the high-spirited boy had won a place in his affections, which, in the tumult of affairs, he had deemed could never be filled again. How many men vainly pride themselves on having acquired a stoicism, which, after all, is merely artificial,—pronounce their feelings dead, when, in truth, they are only faded for the want of human sympathy. The dew falls, and, like the flower, the leaves of the heart unfold again. The danger Richard had incurred was alone wanting to convince the old man how inexpressibly dear the poor boy had become to him.

That was not the only change produced on him. What the reasoning of Peter Mangles had failed to effect, recent events, and a full conviction of Richard's integrity, had, in some measure, achieved; and he now began to doubt whether he had not too harshly judged the conduct of his son-in-law in the affair of the Indian securities.

Conscience whispered to him that he had.

There was something sickening in the doubt; and he resolved, cost what it might, that his mind should be satisfied upon the point, one way or the other. And the morning after the adventure on the cliffs he quitted the residence of the Reverend Oneas Brown, in company with its owner, to visit Styles, whom he believed to be the author of the crime, in the prison of St. Heliers. Richard would fain have accompanied him; but his grandfather, for reasons of his own, wished for Richard's absence on the occasion.

"I must see the ruffian alone," said the old man. "For once I am determined that cool reason shall sit in judgment; affection must not stand beside to prompt and influence its conclusions."

"But prejudice may," answered the youth, boldly.

"Not now," replied his relative. "Time was when such might have been the case, but I am changed; and humiliating as the conviction, in one sense, must be to me, by heavens, I know of no circumstance that can afford me more pleasure than the proof that I have been deceived in my opinion of your father; that his son will have no cause in after life to blush for the author of his being. Weakness, passion, folly, excess,—all, save crime, may be forgiven. That is irreparable."

"Except by penitence," mildly observed the clergyman, who was present at the conversation.

"Irreparable in this world," added the merchant; "I spoke not of the future."

By the influence of his companion, who was well known and exceedingly respected in the island by the authorities, Mr. Bently obtained a private interview with Styles, whom he found in no very cheerful mood, pacing the courtyard of the prison.

He felt that his position was a critical one. His assertions of innocence disbelieved; proofs terribly against him. Bitterly did he curse the tempter who had first led him into crime.

A ray of hope, a very faint one, gleamed athwart his mind, when he beheld his former employer enter the courtyard of the prison. He knew his firmness, when he had once decided on the accomplishment of an object,—his wealth and influence, how much he would sacrifice to achieve it. Now it was evident that Mr. Bently wished to conceal from the world the interest he had taken in his grandson; to continue the system would be impossible if once he were brought to trial,—everything then must be made public.

Hastily weighing all these things he came to the conclusion that, unfavourable as appearances were, his case was not so very desperate.

"So," said the merchant, eyeing him sternly, "this is the result of your dissipated, idle, worthless career—a felon! I told you, when your bad conduct forced me to dismiss you from my counting-house, what would be the result; did I not?"

"You did," muttered the ruffian, sulkily.

"It has made you a murderer!" exclaimed the old gentleman, solemnly.

"No, it ain't," answered the prisoner, boldly, "for the boy is not dead,"—he had learnt that fact from one of the turnkeys—"and if he were it wouldn't affect me. It was Carus who tried it on."

Mr. Bently noticed the accusation by a look of incredulity and mingled contempt, so monstrously improbable did it appear.

"You may stare and affect to disbelieve me," continued Styles, "but it is true. What interest could I have in the lad's death? Ask your grandson to describe the man who assisted him to descend the rocks and then cut the rope: confront me with him. I ask nothing but fair play."

"Wretch!" groaned the old man, beginning to suspect that the man was speaking truth. "What injury had the son of George Markham ever done him that he should seek his life?"

"And what injury had his father ever done you," demanded Styles, boldly, "that you should have cast him off to starve? Married your daughter without your consent; pshaw! his blood was as good as hers, his name as respectable; besides, he had her mother's sanction. But you listened to nothing but the evil spirit of pride and revenge within you; promised your nephew to make him your heir. Now, it seems, you have altered your mind, repented of your injustice to George, and think to atone for all by making it up by kindness to his boy, when you know the loss of him is breaking his mother's heart."

There was a truth in the coarse but energetic retort of the criminal, which caused the cheek of the wealthy merchant to turn pale. A day, one little day before, and he would have turned from the speaker in indignant silence; but now he condescended to justify himself to him.

"George was a drunkard," he replied.

"Not when you turned him out of the counting-house," exclaimed the prisoner.

"But he became one."

"After he had struggled as few men struggle to hold a position in the world, and failed for want of a friendly hand to aid him; he was crushed—ruined."

"Not by me," said Mr. Bently, eagerly.

"By you. It's no use denying it. True, you never employed direct means; there was no occasion, when indirect ones answered your purpose as well. He was known to be your son-in-law—the son-in-law of one of the wealthiest merchants in the city. Men naturally wondered why you never assisted him. Did you ever explain the cause? No. If asked respecting him, what was your reply? 'I have cast him off; never speak of him again.' This naturally created a doubt, and you know what a doubt can do in the commercial world. A panic came at last; many a firm fell, not half so honest as George Markham's. Had you but made a sign, he might have been saved; but you remained silent, immovable as your pride, and he fell too."

"Then it was," added the speaker, emphatically, "that he was made a drunkard."

"Made a drunkard," repeated his hearer, slowly, "explain your meaning."

The prisoner smiled knowingly. He had succeeded in raising the curiosity of his visitor, and this was all he wished.

"What is it you would hint?"

"O, nothing; nothing," ejaculated the ruffian; "but it shall all come out on my trial, if I am tried. I shall speak plainly enough then. It will be a rare feast for the newspapers. How the great city houses will chuckle at the disgrace of their great rival in business. All Lombard-street will ring with it."

"What mean you?"

"When it shall be known that Carus Kearn, one of the partners of Bently and Company—ah, well! no matter what."

"Speak, man!" exclaimed the merchant, indignantly, "if you have the slightest hope of obtaining forgiveness of heaven."

The prisoner interrupted him with a half chuckle, half whistle, to intimate how little that consideration weighed upon his mind.

"Or my forbearance," added the speaker.

The second observation arrested the cynical smile upon his lip. The forbearance of Mr. Bently was something tangible, and bearing on the point he wished to arrive at—his escape from the hands of justice.

"I shall say no more till my trial," he replied, in a more respectful tone of voice. "Where would be the good? I can't see it."

The last words were accompanied by a look which plainly indicated that the price he set upon the information which it was in his power to afford, was his personal safety; it was evident that to secure that he would consent to anything.

Mr. Bently reflected for a few minutes, during which prudence struggled with resentment.

"But suppose," he said, "that you should not be brought to trial?"

"In that case," exclaimed Styles, eagerly, "I will confess everything."

"The meaning of the words, 'Then it was that George Markham was made a drunkard?'"

"That too," answered the agent of Carus Kearn.

"And the hint respecting my nephew?"

"I shall keep that secret till after I am cleared of this precious job," replied the fellow, with an air of reviving confidence, for he felt that circumstances were getting more favourable to him. "I must have some security that you will keep faith with me."

"You have my word."

"Humph!"

"Is not that sufficient?"

"For ten thousand pounds—twenty—nay, fifty, for the matter of that," replied the ex-clerk, "because the payment would be dependent on your will; in the present case, the will may exceed the means."

"Be it so," said the merchant. "If you deceive me you will still be in my power, for you cannot quit the island without my knowing it: I have only to give your name to the sheriff to prevent it. How did my nephew know of my visits to Jersey?"

"Caused you to be watched. Your absence from the city on two occasions without leaving your address, even with Peter Mangles, first excited his suspicions. When he discovered your visit to the school, he readily guessed the rest."

"The villain!" murmured his uncle.

Styles shrugged his shoulders to intimate that there was little doubt but the epithet was a correct one.

"The ungrateful villain," repeated Mr. Bently.

"My sister's son too! whom I had destined to be my successor in the firm, whom I have treated like my own child; better!" he added, "far better."

"You may well say that," observed the prisoner.

"But his hatred to George?"

"Bah! George was in his way, and you see that Carus has few scruples how he removes any one whom fortune or accident may place between him and his interests. No sooner was your son-in-law a bankrupt, than your nephew, who caused more than one of his speculations to fail, found me out and proposed to employ me."

"In what way?"

"To promote the ruin of the man he hated. He it was who supplied me with the means of leading George Markham to the tavern, of teaching him to become a drunkard, and directed me to lead him home, when in a state of intoxication, by the street where we were sure to encounter you and Peter Mangles. Your triumph would not have been half complete if you had not witnessed it; besides, there was the danger that at any moment you might relent and his victim be saved, and the best way to stifle all returning pity or sentiment of forgiveness in your breast was by exposing the vice and degradation of your son-in-law."

"It was deeply laid," observed Mr. Bently.

"And cleverly executed," added Styles. "I did my duty, and earned the price of my services."

"Fearfully!" replied his hearer. "The tale you have told me has rent aside the mask, and revealed to me the true nature of the serpent I have cherished."

"Oh! you don't know half your obligations to him yet; but you shall, if you act up to your promise, and get me out of this precious scrape, which after all I don't deserve, and none but a fool would have fallen into."

"Or a villain," exclaimed the merchant, indignantly.

"True," said Styles; "but I can be a useful one."

The gentleman thought so too, and forbore to press him with further questions till the charge should be dismissed.

This, the evidence of our hero easily accomplished. He distinctly swore that Styles was not the person who assisted him to descend the rocks and afterwards cut the rope.

Before quitting the island, Mr. Bently had one more conference with the intended assassin. It took place privately in the library of the Reverend Oneas Brown, and, at the request of the guilty man, without the presence of a single witness.

"Now," said the merchant, when the ruffian presented himself before him, "I have kept my promise."

"You have, sir," answered the man, respectfully, "and I feel grateful to you."

"You must now perform yours."

Styles seemed to hesitate.

"Do not trifle with me," exclaimed his former employer. "The grasp of justice is merely loosened—a word, and her iron hands encircle you again. Remember that, if guiltless of the actual attempt, you were indirectly an accomplice—that all escape from the island is hopeless."

"I know that, sir."

"Why do you hesitate, then?"

"Because what I have to say is so extraordinary, so improbable, that I question whether you will believe me."

"Proceed. I am the best judge of that."

"In the first place, you suspect George Markham of having abstracted securities to the amount of ten thousand pounds from the firm during your absence in India?"

"I do."

"And of having negotiated them while he was in business?"

"Yes."

"You suspect him wrongfully, then; for it is my belief he knows no more about them than his son does, who was not born at the time the robbery took place."

"Whom do you suspect?" demanded Mr. Bently, eagerly.

"It could only be one of two persons," replied Styles, hesitatingly; "Peter Mangles—"

"Stop!" exclaimed the gentlemen, indignantly. "The man you have named is the very soul of honour, integrity, and truth. More than a dozen times he has rejected my offers, nay, more, my entreaties, to accept a share in the firm, which his industry and talent for business has long merited."

"I said one of two persons," remarked the ex-clerk, submissively.

"True! true! and my anger at what appeared an unprincipled slander, was somewhat premature. The other—"

"Is your nephew, Carus Kearn."

"Equally improbable," replied the merchant, although in a less confident tone. "He never had the keys of the iron safe."

"Were there only one set, sir?" demanded Styles.

"But that is a question which, perhaps, I ought not to ask; you can best tell whether it bears upon the transaction or not. All I know is, that at the time the securities were stolen, Carus was involved deeply in railway speculations."

"He never speculates," interrupted the astonished merchant.

Tom Styles smiled significantly.

"It is provided against in our articles of partnership, that he shall enter into no private speculations without the permission of the head of the firm."

"That he did speculate, I know," said the informant, resolutely, "and lost heavy sums. I know, too, that your wife discovered it, and remonstrated with him upon the subject; what else she discovered I am unable to tell. She died before your return."

Mr. Bently fell into deep thought.

"Suddenly, very suddenly."

His hearer started as if something had stung him, for there was a marked emphasis, almost a solemnity in the tone in which the words were uttered.

"A letter she wrote to you could not be found. Who could have had an interest in concealing it? Certainly not George Markham or your daughter, since they relied upon it to obtain your forgiveness of their hasty marriage."

"Proceed," uttered or rather groaned Mr. Bently, upon whose brow large drops of perspiration began to gather—a sign of the agitation and agony he endured.

"Immediately on your return to England you dismissed your son-in-law from the counting-house?"

"I did."

"And your daughter from your home?"

"True, true."

"Who gained by that? Carus—for it increased his prospect of inheriting your great wealth. He rose in favour with you daily. You increased his share in the business, confided everything to him. Now, sir," added the speaker, "will you please to answer me one question?"

"Certainly."

"Who selected the clerk you sent out to India to assist your correspondents there in managing the English branch of their business?"

"My nephew."

"And you sent him against the advice of Peter Mangles?"

"I thought it was jealousy of Carus's influence which prompted the old man's objections. Peter never spoke out."

"Because he is too honest to have done so," was the reply. "He had nothing but suspicions; and for that matter, no more have I; but when I know a man to have committed one act of villainy, I never hesitate to believe him capable of a second. It is a natural consequence, as plain as the rule of three."

His hearer regarded him like a man half stunned by a heavy blow. Every word the speaker uttered was noted, perfectly understood; and yet something else, which he had not uttered—a something far more terrible—appeared to occupy his mind, engrossing every sense and feeling.

"I have one thing more to ask, and I have done," resumed Tom Styles. "When you sent out the clerk recommended by Carus, had the securities been realised?"

"No."

"Have they been realised since?"

"Yes."

"I have done, sir," said the man, quietly. "I have told you all I know, and more,—all I suspect."

"All!" repeated the merchant, emphatically, and at the same time fixing his piercing gray eyes upon him, as if he would read his very soul.

The ruffian remained silent: either he had nothing more to tell, or was resolved to conceal the remaining portion of the dark knowledge in his own heart.

"I believe that at last you have acted honestly," said Mr. Bently, rousing himself like one who has to contend against a sudden stupor. "Are you attached to the man (he could not call him nephew) who has hitherto employed you by any other tie than that of interest?"

"Not in the slightest."

"He has no hold upon your fears?"

"No more than upon yours, sir," replied Styles; "and yet it is not my intention to go near him again: I would starve first!"

"From repentance, I trust."

"No," said the fellow, bluntly; "from a feeling of prudence. He has already attempted my life, in order to screen himself; and now that I have laid bare his character to you, he would find some means of paying his debt to me—never consider it cancelled till I was in my grave. I know him!"

The merchant groaned in mental agony—perhaps at hearing such an opinion of the utter depravity of his nephew, perhaps at a vague suspicion, the very shadow of which was too terrible to be contemplated with calmness; for it was enough to appal reason, and shake his faith in human nature for the rest of his days.

"In that case," he said, "you would have no objection to enter into my employment?"

"Not the slightest, sir."

"You will proceed to London," continued Mr. Bently, giving him money, "by the first packet, and, if wise, absent yourself from your usual haunts. In a week's time seek me at my private residence; I will then give you further instructions. Be faithful—to your own interests, I mean; and you shall find that, although I employ you in no questionable business, I can act as liberally as those who have done so."

"And Sheriff Godfrey, sir?" said the man, pocketing the money.

This was in allusion to the instructions which had been given to that respectable officer not to permit him to quit the island.

"The restriction shall be removed."

"Ah, sir," said Styles, looking at him earnestly, "I begin to feel that the lesson old Peter Mangles sought to impress upon me when a boy was a wise lesson. Honesty is the best policy for all of us. Had I followed his advice, instead of being as I am—a homeless, ill-considered vagabond, ready to do any man's dirty work—I might have been a respectable clerk, in the receipt of three or four hundred a year. Sharples, who was my junior in the counting-house by two years, I am told, is in the receipt of quite as much."

"Quite," replied the merchant. "Before we part let us clearly understand each other. Although I pay you liberally for the services I require, I place not the slightest confidence in you."

"I know you can't. I have been too great a villain; but, thank heaven, not a murderer!"

There was something so bitterly regretful in the tone in which these words were uttered, that Mr. Bently was struck by it.

"Repentance," he added, as he finally dismissed him from his presence, "may do much—not the mask which worn-out vice borrows of hypocrisy, but true repentance springing from the heartfelt sense of past unworthiness. Go," he said, "and pray that your age may be better than your youth and manhood have been."

Tom Styles walked out of the room with a downcast air. For the first time in his life, perhaps, he felt the bitter degradation arising from the conviction that he was not an honest man.

No sooner was he alone, than the calmness which Mr. Bently had struggled to maintain utterly abandoned him, and he gave way to a violent paroxysm of passionate sorrow—yielded to a feeling which evidently unmanned him.

"I must be satisfied," he murmured, "even if I read the secret from the grave! No, no! it is too horrible to think upon! bad, heartless as he is, Carus cannot have acted with such monstrous ingratitude; there must be a limit even to his crimes. Even if guilty," he added, after a pause, "how could I accuse him? my sister's son! bring dishonour on my gray hairs—on all—all who share his blood, or are connected with him: better let the suspicion rest barred in my own heart for ever."

But the suspicion—which we need scarcely inform our readers referred to the manner of his wife's death—would not rest. It haunted the speaker more constantly even than his shadow, for at sunset shadows are no longer visible; and it was in the lone sleepless hours of the night that the suspicions of the speaker became more vivid. It was present in his dreams, and the first thought of his waking hours.

"I am incapable of deciding," he concluded, "and must consult my old friend Morton on the subject."

Before leaving Jersey Mr. Bently arranged with his grandson's tutor that he should steadily pursue his studies of Hindostani. "It has now," he said, "become doubly of importance to me."

"Not from the desire of wealth, I trust," observed the clergyman.

"No," replied the merchant. "I am rich enough—too rich. Had I been a poorer man, I had been happier, and others spared much guilt."

"I do not understand you."

"How should you?" said his guest. "Your position and secluded residence spares you from mingling in the passions and pursuits of the world. Envy no man," he added, "who is prosperous in his search of wealth, for his path is beset with thorns. Why I wish Richard to perfect himself in the language of the East is that his destination is India."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the clergyman, with surprise.

"Yes."

"And you can part with him?"

"I must."

"Why must, when you are so wealthy?"

"It is necessary to clear the honour of his father."

"I understand," replied Mr. Brown. "He will, I am assured, require no other incentive. But the late danger alarms me for his safety."

"Fear not," exclaimed the merchant. "I will provide for that. It is enough that I know my boy to be menaced. I will set those to watch over him whom his enemy cannot corrupt. You may trust to his grandfather's love and prudence."

In his parting interview with his grandson, the wealthy merchant explained much that the boy had hitherto been kept in ignorance of. It was enough. Richard learned that he was to vindicate his father's name, and he required no other incentive to exertion.

"Before another year has elapsed!" he exclaimed, as he bade his relative farewell, "I shall be prepared to start for India."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

And shall we all condemn and all distrust,
Because some men are false, and some unjust?
Forbid it, heaven! far better 'twere to be Duded of the fond impossibility,
Of light and radiance which sleep's visions gave,
Than thus to live suspicion's bitter slave.

HON. MRS. NORTON.

THE conversation with Tom Styles and the dark hints which that worthy person gave, produced a painful effect upon the morbidly sensitive mind of Mr. Bently. The world had lost its brightness; for confidence in his fellow creatures was shaken. Perhaps one of the most difficult lessons in life is, to get over the baneful feelings which repeated acts of deceit and treachery from those we most confide in, engender. His daughter had deceived and disappointed him; now his nephew—and the last blow was, if possible, far more painful than the first.

"We build our faith on ashes," murmured the old man, as he sat one morning at breakfast, after his return to London, in the luxuriously furnished library of his private residence. "I wish I had old Peter Mangles' confidence in my fellow creatures. But it is destroyed, never to return. And this boy, whom I have permitted to grow, as it were, around my heart, to supply his mother's vacant place there, doubtless he will one day turn and sting me by some act of yet more monstrous ingratitude.

"No, no, I wrong him," he added, after a pause; "hitherto, I have found him truthful and sincere. I must see Morton; in his shrewd sense and knowledge of the world I may find counsel for my mind's disease,—it is a mental physician I require, and not one for the body's ailments and infirmities."

With this resolution the speaker started from his home and drove to the house of the friendly lawyer, whom he fortunately found in his office. The shrewd man of the world was in earnest conversation with his son Harry when he entered, and saw by the countenance of his client, that something painful had occurred; the fact was that he felt surprised at his visit, for he believed him to be still in Jersey.

"You had better leave me, Harry," said his father; "I have business to attend to; and that is a thing, you know, I never neglect."

The boy rose with a disappointed air to quit the room, but the visitor, remembering how warmly Richard had spoken of his schoolfellow, his unvarying kindness and friendship, held out his hand to him. The old man felt a pleasure in speaking with any one who had betrayed an interest in his grandson.

Harry withdrew, for he was about to pay a visit with his mother and sisters, and Mr. Morton and his client were left alone.

"What has occurred, my dear sir?" demanded the former.

"I am almost heartbroken," replied his visitor; "my faith in my fellow creatures is beginning to abandon me."

"Why judge all from one?"

"Because all seem leagued against my happiness," answered the old man, mournfully: "first my child, then my nephew; and later, no doubt, my grandson."

"This is folly," exclaimed the man of law; "pardon the word, it is not the lawyer but the friend who speaks. You heard what my son said at your last visit. Since his return home, scarcely a day has passed that he has not importuned me upon the same theme; and he is not a lad to form a friendship upon light grounds; you heard yourself the enthusiastic terms in which he spoke of Richard."

"He may be deceived."

"Youth is seldom so upon such points. But you have been to Jersey; in fact, I thought you were still there."

"I have been."

"What brought you back so soon?"

"The life of my grandson has been attempted," exclaimed Mr. Bently, in great mental agony.

"His life?"

"Yes."

"By whom?"

"One who has eaten of my bread for years," replied the merchant, "to whose orphan state I proved a father,—my nephew, Carus Kearn. Now do you wonder that I am wretched?"

"Horrible!" ejaculated Mr. Morton.

"That is not the worst," added his visitor.

As collectedly as his agitation would permit, Mr. Bently proceeded to describe not only the manner of the attempt, but the conversation he had had with Tom Styles, and the doubt, the horrible doubt, it had engendered in his mind respecting the death of his wife.

"Assist me, counsel me," he said, as he concluded the sad tale; "for I feel like a child, nerveless and incapable of deciding for myself."

"The first step," replied the lawyer, after a pause, "is to secure, no matter how, at the risk of exposure or not, the safety of your grandson. I feel so interested on that point, that were you capable of neglecting the duty I would see to it myself."

"Thank you," murmured his client, grasping his hand, "thank you. You are the friend I require. Yes, yes, the poor boy's safety before every other consideration."

"However praiseworthy the motives of your conduct," continued Mr. Morton, "I have ever considered your right to separate Richard from his mother as a questionable one. But let that point rest; we have no time to discuss it now; his safety is our first consideration."

"The very first," repeated the merchant, emphatically.

"How do you intend to act?"

"You must advise, assist me."

"It can only be done by one of two ways," observed the lawyer, after a few moments' reflection.

"Name them."

"The first is by employing the evidence of this man Styles to bring your nephew to justice."

"And so proclaim to the world that I have adopted my grandson,—that he is living under the care of the clergyman with whom I have placed him, enabling his father to claim him; for my right to the boy vanishes before his: any sacrifice rather than that."

"You cannot mean to deprive your daughter for ever of her son."

"No," said the merchant; "only till her husband is reformed. We all know how weak the heart and resolutions of the drunkard are. His boy restored to him, George Markham would soon forget his promises of amendment."

"Perhaps not."

"I will not risk it."

"In that case," said the lawyer, "I must discover some resolute, intelligent person to reside upon the island and watch over Richard's safety. It will not be difficult to find such a man—in fact, I think I can place my hand upon him already; but it will be expensive, for his fidelity must be beyond temptation."

"Spare not for gold," answered the merchant, in a tone of indifference: "I am cursed with too much of the yellow dross already. When will you see him?"

"This very day."

"And he must depart—"

"As quickly as possible," replied Mr. Morton.

"The sooner the better," urged his client; "for I cannot sleep while danger threatens my poor boy. In my dreams I see him struggling with his assassins. Had you beheld him, as I did, clinging to the projecting rock, down the fearful precipice where villainy had cast him, you would wonder that I retain my reason."

"It must have been a terrible moment," observed his hearer.

"It was, indeed."

"I will see the person I allude to. He is a retired officer of the army, a man of energy and parts, who quitted the service in disgust at the favoritism of the system, which leaves merit to pine in obscurity, and prostitutes patronage to family and political influence. He possesses a kindly nature, and I am convinced will feel a pleasure in watching over the safety of your grandson and heir."

"My grandson only," said the merchant.

The lawyer smiled.

"Spare no expense," added the speaker. "I cannot rest till I know Richard is placed under his guardian care. That done, I leave your discretion and friendship to take the necessary steps to ascertain whether the dark suspicion of foul play in my wife's death is well founded or not."

"It is a delicate point," said the lawyer, musingly, "and difficult to ascertain; but not impossible. Should your fears be realised—"

Mr. Bently groaned in agony at the supposition.

"How would you act?"

"Bring the murderer to justice," exclaimed the old man, passionately, "though my heart broke with the shame of the disgrace."

"You are right. No consideration ought to screen a murderer," observed his adviser. "But we must proceed cautiously, not to alarm your nephew, whom I advise you to treat as usual; or excite the suspicions of your servants, several of whom, doubtless, witnessed the death of their mistress."

"Several."

"Learn from them all the particulars you can glean; it is not a difficult matter to set such persons talking; and send the memoranda to me."

Mr. Bently promised to do so, and took his leave.

That same day Mr. Morton had a long interview with Lieutenant Marsh, the officer he had alluded to. They had known each other from boyhood, and a strong feeling of friendship and confidence existed between them. He at once undertook the duty assigned to him.

"When can you leave?" demanded his friend.

"At a day's notice."

It was accordingly arranged that he should do so; and, armed with letters to the Reverend Oneas Brown, explaining the object of his taking up a residence in the island, Lieutenant Marsh quitted London for St. Heliers. It is needless to say that his appointment was most lucrative: such a protector for his grandson was not a man whom Mr. Bently felt disposed to bargain with.

"I will watch over him," said the gallant fellow, "as I would over my own boy. Danger shall only reach him through my heart."

The merchant and lawyer both wrung his hand as they separated.

Meanwhile, the uncle of Carus Kearn had not forgotten the directions of Mr. Morton respecting his servants. He had gleaned from the housekeeper all the particulars of the symptoms which preceded his wife's death, which the good woman attributed to a bilious fever.

Having sealed the memoranda, her master despatched it by a sure messenger to his lawyer.

Mr. Morton was seated at breakfast a few days after the departure of his agent, charged with the surveillance of our hero, for Jersey; to all appearance never had the worthy man been in better health. He had promised to accompany his wife and children to the Gardens in the Regent's-park; as it was not often that he stole a day from his professional pursuits, the visit was looked forward to as a pleasurable event.

The morning papers were lying upon the table. He was deeply engaged in the columns of the leading journal, when a sudden exclamation escaped him. It was one of surprise.

"Singular!" he muttered.

"What is singular?" demanded his wife.

"An account of a murder, my love—or at least, a supposed one. A case of poisoning, in which the symptoms are so unusual, that—by-the-by," he added, "I fear that I shall not be able to accompany you to-day."

The lady and the children looked, as they felt, disappointed.

"But to make amends, I promise you all a day at Richmond."

"With your society?"

"Yes."

The exchange was accepted; and the gentleman finishing his breakfast, descended to his private office, from whence he despatched a note to Dr. Billington, one of the most eminent practitioners of the day, requesting to see him as soon as possible. It was the same gentleman who had attended Mrs. Bently in her last illness. In a few hours the doctor was with him.

"Hipped, my dear sir, nothing more," said the son of Æsculapius, after listening to the symptoms which the lawyer, with all the skill of a special pleader, set forth as the cause of his sending for him. "You are as healthy, both in body and mind, as I am; a day or two's change of air will set all right."

"I rejoice to hear it," replied the lawyer, "for I place great confidence in your opinion; and yet the cleverest of the profession are sometimes mistaken."

Dr. Billington smiled.

"Here now," continued the speaker, taking up the paper, "is a suspected case of poisoning. Allow me to read it to you."

"Certainly."

"The deceased was taken suddenly ill after retiring to rest. The medical man called in treated her disorder as a bilious fever, the symptoms being the same."

"What were those symptoms?" demanded the visitor.

"Sickness, great depression of the spirits, pains in the abdominal region, accompanied by intermitting spasms of the heart."

"The last are unusual," observed the physician.

"And an injection of blood—not bile—in the vessels of the eye."

"That is still more remarkable."

"And yet one of our first medical men pronounced and treated her case as one of bilious fever. A second one being called in—a man who had practised in India—declared that she had been poisoned."

"Absurd!"

"And yet, doctor, the post mortem examination proved that he was right; for in the intestines and stomach of the deceased a strong decoction of the Lignea Lumeasferia—a plant found only on the higher ranges of the Himalayas—was discovered, and proved to be the undoubted cause of her death. The first physician had heard of but never seen the fatal drug."

"Few have seen it," replied Dr. Billington; "for it is not used for medicinal purposes in this country, and could only be met with in the cabinet of some enthusiastic botanist."

"Do you think its presence could be detected?" inquired the lawyer.

"Certainly."

"After death?"

"Yes."

"How long?"

"Years, perhaps," replied his visitor. "But there is something peculiar, my dear sir, in all this, with you lawyers the reason seldom appears. I now perceive that your sending for me to consult upon your health was a mere pretext; the real object was the subject of our present conversation. Am I not right?"

"You are."

"I could have sworn it," said Dr. Billington. "But are you dealing quite fairly by me, Morton? We have known each other quite long enough to deal, act, and speak without disguise. Explain yourself."

"You attended Mrs. Bently in her last illness?"

"I did."

"It was sudden?"

"Very."

"Now, then, answer me; were the symptoms which preceded her death similar to those which I have just described?"

"I know not the motive of such an extraordinary question," replied the physician, "but it is too serious a one to be trifled with. They were."

"And you had no suspicion of foul play?"

"None; or I should have done my duty."

"That I am certain of," exclaimed the lawyer, extending his hand to him. Then solemnly added, "I must now do mine."

"You say," continued the speaker, after a pause, "that the drug you named is not generally known in Europe, and only to be met with in collections of the curious?"

"I did."

"Are you quite sure that it is not to be purchased in London?"

"Quite," answered the physician,—"that is, in the ordinary way of trade. The Apothecaries' Company have it, but I am certain do not sell it. Stay," he added, suddenly recollecting himself,—"there is an old man whom you may have noticed in the city, from his flowing beard and oriental costume—a Hindoo dealer, named Moorad: it is just possible that he may keep it."

"I must see the man," exclaimed Mr. Morton.

"Nothing more easy," replied his friend; "he resides in Clerkenwell. I am personally known to him, and will accompany you; my carriage is at the door."

In less than an hour the speakers reached the abode of Moorad, whose ostensible trade was that of a dealer in Turkish rhubarb and simples, although it was whispered that he sometimes dealt in merchandise of a more questionable kind. This suspicion—for it amounted to nothing more—caused him to be looked upon with dislike, not unmingled with dread, by his neighbours; not that their opinion ought to be taken as a proof that he merited the evil reputation they gave him, for the ignorant are generally superstitious and the timid unjust. They could not understand the reserve of the old man—the solitude in which he lived; for during the thirty years he had resided amongst them no one had ever been admitted beyond the precincts of his little shop, which, summer and winter, he invariably closed at sunset.

Moorad was seated smoking one of those long Egyptian pipes so prized throughout the East, when the two gentlemen made their appearance. The only evidence he gave of being conscious of their presence was by a slight elevation of the eyebrows.

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the physician, as he inhaled the almost stifling atmosphere of the place, "opium." "The Hakim is welcome," said the old man, laying down his pipe. "In what can we pleasure him?"

"I require a drug," replied the physician, "which I have vainly sought to procure in the ordinary way. It is extremely rare in this country."

"Moorad has many rare drugs," replied the dealer.

"And curious?"

"Moorad has many drugs that are curious."

"I require a small quantity of the Luneasferia," said the gentleman.

The instant he pronounced the name of the drug, a close observer might have detected a slight lowering of the eyelids, as if to concentrate the gaze—a sure sign with an Asiatic that he is upon his guard.

"The Hakim knows its properties?" observed the dealer.

"Certainly, a subtle poison; used also medicinally in the East, but rejected in Europe on account of the minute care necessary in administering it. Have you any?"

"I have had it in my time," answered the master of the shop, evasively; "but it is a thing so seldom asked for that it does not pay for keeping."

"You have sold it then," exclaimed Mr. Morton, incautiously.

"I did not say that," replied Moorad, sharply.

"Deal frankly with us," said the lawyer; "we are prepared to pay."

At the word "pay," the eyes of the old man glistened; he regarded Dr. Billington significantly, then turned them on the speaker, and from him glanced to the door.

"You must leave us," whispered the physician.

"Why so?"

"He will not speak in the presence of a witness."

Mr. Morton took the hint and quitted the shop. In about half an hour he was joined by his companion.

"Have you succeeded?" demanded the lawyer, as they entered the carriage.

"Partially."

His friend looked disappointed.

"I have obtained a small quantity of the drug, with which I intend to make certain experiments."

The old rogue was too much upon his guard to inform me of the tests by which its presence may be recognised. But I shall discover them with patience and time. I feel certain he knows them," he added.

"Did he confess to whom he had ever sold any of the infernal poison?" asked Mr. Morton.

"No; upon that point he was dumb. And yet I offered him a liberal price—a hundred pounds."

"In gold?"

"No, in notes."

"Try him in gold," said his friend; "I have heard that Orientals are far more impressionable than Europeans. The sight of his idol may tempt him. Double the sum if necessary. The man who has once bartered his conscience must have his price."

"Reasoned like an Old Bailey lawyer," exclaimed the physician, laughingly. "On my next visit to him I will try it."

(To be continued.)

TO A ROSE FOUND BLOOMING IN THE GARDEN AT CHRISTMAS.

DEAR relic of the brighter hours, why lingerest thou alone,
Where late, with gay companions, thy fragrant beauty shone?
The daisy and the daffodil lie slumbering by thy side,
Their fleeting splendour withered—for long ago they died.

The bees that in the summer time would sip thy honeyed breath
Are hid within their wintry beds, or sleep the sleep of death;
And the linnet, and the swallow, too, have sought a warmer home,
So, in the garden's desert waste, thou reignest all alone.

I'll place thee 'mongst the Christmas wreaths, that deck the festive shrine;
Thy paler beauty shall unite with evergreen and pine.
Was it for this thou'st lingered, through winter wind and storm,
To welcome in the blessed day on which the Lord was born?

The violet and the hyacinth await the spring's first breath
To call them from their snowy graves, and break the chains of death.
Fit emblem of that wondrous sleep we know must come to all,
A prelude to a longer life—a waiting for the call.

Thou'rt welcome, then! thou bringest us sweet memories of the past;
For memory's garden still is green, nor feels this chilling blast.
I mind me of the lovely one a year ago we laid
To slumber on a little while, within the church's shade.

Dear Fanny, how we loved her, and we thought she'd pass away
When the autumn leaves were falling, before the shortest day;
Yet lovingly she lingered till the wintry time had come:
Then—angels gently bore her hence up to her heavenly home.

And the winter spread its snowy shroud, above her narrow bed,
And the cold wind whistled rudely, as the solemn words we said;
But we knew our darling felt it not, though she lay beneath the sod,
For her ransomed soul was resting in the bosom of her God.

For her ransomed soul was resting in the bosom of her God.

tion in finding their own double, an intimate unto whom they may reveal all their secret thoughts, all their darkest fears, all their brightest hopes. Inexperienced in the ways of the world, unsuspicious of men and manners, the young readily make friends. Novelty charms them. They are delighted with a new companion. He is everything that could be desired. After awhile they detect certain flaws in his character, certain asperities in his temper, certain uncongenialities in his mental constitution. A more experienced person would have expected this. The young expect nothing of the sort. They are grievously disappointed, and are ready to trample their idol underfoot.

When we begin to make acquaintance with the world and to choose companions for ourselves, it is necessary to exercise considerable judgment. We should choose our friends as the Vicar of Wakefield's wife chose her wedding gown—something that will wear well.

Cynics sneer at friendship; but who with a warm heart cares for a cynic's sneer? They tell us that friends are not to be found—that the thing called friendship, like the word which indicates it, is but an empty breath. They will not admit the sincerity of disinterested attachment. They make a bitter jest of old familiar faces, bosom cronies, and tried friends. "I have lost a friend," said one, in a burst of feeling. "A friend!" said the cynic, "happy art thou: I never found one."

But who ever supposed the cynic would ever find one? He has not the right spirit within him. He has no fervour and no enthusiasm; and what is friendship without both? What is friendship without a heart? What is a heart without warmth in it—without a good blazing fire of attachment? Who can expect any one to linger beside the cynic's empty grate?

Friendship must be reciprocated, or it is not likely to last. As iron sharpeneth iron, so does the face of a man his friend. As glimmering, half red embers laid together get into the brightest white glow, so are the delights of friendship kept alive by being brought together.

Some people forget their friends, and then rail against them. They cease to see them, forget to ask after them, never write to them, or keep a corner in their hearts for them, and then, when they in their turn become indifferent, complain that there is no such thing as true friendship in the world.

"Friendship," says an elegant writer, "is a vase, which, when it is flawed by heat, or violence, or accident, may as well be broken at once; it can never be trusted after. The more graceful and ornamental it was, the more clearly do we discern the hopelessness of restoring it to its former state. Coarse stones, if they are fractured, may be cemented again—precious ones, never."

There are certain elements which belong to true friendship, and without which it can exist only in name. These are similarity in disposition, kindred tastes, a generous, disinterested, affectionate spirit, elevation of character, and firmness of principle.

A SIMILARITY OF DISPOSITION.

The petulant and the submissive, the impetuous and the considerate, the enterprising and the timid, may indeed exercise over one another an influence for good; the quick impulses of the one may be checked and directed by the more thoughtful character of the other; but there must be in the main the same sort of disposition, otherwise there can be little of that enduring liking which makes up friendship.

It must be the same sort of disposition, otherwise there cannot be that appreciation of each other's conduct that there should be. The timid may, by check and counter-check, by doubts and fears and hesitations, irritate the impetuous, and destroy all sympathy. And the dashing impetuosity of the enterprising and adventurous may terrify the more gentle and docile instinct of the mild and timid. If, however, it is the same sort of disposition—the very same metal cast in different moulds—then there is a reciprocity existing which rightfully bears the sacred name of friendship.

If May and December can never agree, if the inhabitant of the tropics is ill adapted for the severity of a polar winter, and if the Esquimaux would verily melt beneath a tropical sun, difference of disposition is no less striking, nor are its likings and its dislikings, its sympathies and its non-sympathies, less apparent. "Can two walk together except they be agreed?"

KINDRED TASTES

is another important element in true friendship. Here we may observe that a great many idle, and worse than idle, intimacies are contracted under this plea. Pleasure-seeking people, having a general liking for balls, routs, card-tables, theatres, and amusements of all kinds, suppose, or profess to suppose, that indulgence in the same pursuits, enjoyment of the same amusements, makes them friends. Nothing can be further from the truth than this. They may enjoy the same pleasure with the most opposite tastes. Motives of all sorts may influence them in frequenting such and such places, in going here, there, and everywhere in search of amusement. It may be from anything but an innate and cultivated taste of the particular pursuit which they follow.

What we mean by kindred tastes, is a real liking for the same thing. Reading, for instance, may be a favourite employment for leisure hours, and the congenial friends may appreciate the same description of reading and the same authors. Or music may be equally agreeable to both, and each may appreciate the works of the same composers, or some branch of science or art may awaken the sympathies and call forth the energies of both. In any one of these instances the friends are naturally drawn closer together, and, having one thing in common, they feel themselves more than ever united.

There must be much to interfere with lasting intimacy when, instead of having any taste in common, their tastes are as wide as the poles asunder,—when each is so wedded to his own particular pursuit as to have no interest in any other. One so musical that he is never so well pleased as when calling forth or listening to sweet sounds, or discoursing on the various merits of different composers; the other so absorbed in reading that he has no thought or feeling for anything else, and regards as a most disagreeable interruption the notes of a musical instrument, and who knows nothing, and cares nothing, either for Handel, or Mozart, or Balfe, or Verdi.

Of course there are many people who are not so wedded to one thing as to ignore every other. People of enlarged sympathies and cultivated tastes can appreciate every effort of human genius in literature, science, or art. Such have—notwithstanding some personal predilections—kindred tastes, and are as different from the worshippers of one idea as they are from that great negative school which knows nothing, likes nothing, feels for nothing, and cares for nothing.

is also essential to true friendship. The true friend gives the key of his heart to his chosen friend, and along with that an interest in all that he possesses. He is no "cupboard friend," very kind and mightily agreeable in the days of his friend's prosperity, and either shunning him altogether or liberal only in advice when adversity overtakes him. These sort of friends have been known in all ages of the world. Of such the story of the patriarch of Uz is an example; and of such the proverb of Job's comforter says quite enough. The true friend never forsakes on account of a change in circumstances. His friend is the same to him whether fickle fortune smiles or frowns. He would neither fawn in time of prosperity nor slight in the hour of adversity; and whatever his hand can find to do to help his friend, that thing he does in right good earnest.

This generous and affectionate disposition leads friends to be carefully watchful lest they should cause annoyance or pain without being conscious of it. They know each other's tempers, and like skilful skaters avoid the dangerous parts. It makes them jealous also of one another's honour and good name. They neither decry a friend behind his back nor listen patiently to any attack on his character or reputation. They feel as tenacious about all that concerns him as they do about themselves, and are as watchful of his good fame as of their own.

But to do this requires

ELEVATION OF CHARACTER.

A man must be thoroughly in earnest when he is devoted heart and soul to the interest of his friend. It is not the kind of friendship—falsely so called—which is so common in the world. Those friends who are so united in every enjoyment, so devoted to one another that their attachment would seem to be of the right sort, often grow cold and turn away and find new friends within the twelvemonth. But with such there is no elevation of character. Their loves and likings are the mere caprice of the moment, the result of an ardent temperament, or the impulse of a vulpine sagacity. There is nothing enduring in such friendship. The elements of which it is built are unsubstantial. It is a castle in the air, that a change in the wind will instantaneously dissolve. True friendship must be built on sound principles. Integrity must be the architect; there must be a solid foundation of morality, and the superstructure must be built up of the virtues, while truth enlightens, affection warms, and candour ventilates the edifice.

FIRMNESS OF PRINCIPLE

of course belongs essentially to elevation of character. Integrity, honour, and virtue, are loftier attributes of the mind than any warm attachment of the heart. Loyalty to religion and morality is incumbent on every right-thinking, right-feeling man. Friendship loses its greatest charm when it is stained with the blood of virtuous principle. In fact, it ceases to be friendship when it calls for any such sacrifice.

In the ardour of youthful confidence, with habits unformed and principles swayed by the slightest breath of influence, the heart is easily taken captive. The citadel of the affections is surrendered to a foe who utters the password—Friendship. Craving the interests of social life—longing for some kindred spirit with whom to associate after the toils of the day, many an unhappy youth is led astray. Attracted by the social and apparently generous qualities of some companion, they bestow upon him their friendship and their confidence. But ere they are aware of it insidious poison is infused into their moral nature, and they discover themselves plundered of their character, and with all their aspirations blighted. "The companion of fools shall be destroyed." Instead of shrinking back at the first impure word, they have drawn closer to the centre of the contaminating circle, and have only too late found out their danger.

Let it constantly, then, be borne in mind, that the friend whose friendship is worth possessing must have upright principles, solid qualities of mind and heart. With such a friend you may enjoy the truest pleasure. We can, to such a friend, discharge the heart of its fulness, and double our joys by imparting them, while we lighten our sorrows by having another to share the burden. "No receipt," says Lord Bacon, "openeth the heart, but a true friend, to whom you may impart joys, fears, hopes, suspicions, counsels, and whatsoever lieth upon the heart to oppress it, in a kind of civil shrift or confession."

Such friendships are lasting. They call the attributes of our highest nature into action. They bring us out of ourselves. They make us frank, hearty, and hopeful, cherishing the spirit of the rhyme:—

"My own friend, my old friend!
Time's a soldier bold, friend,
Of his lofty prowess
Many a tale is told, friend.
He can mock the conqueror,
Raze his strongest hold, friend,
Fool the stern philosopher,
Win the miser's gold, friend.
But though human nature
Has so frail a mind, friend,
What the tyrant cannot do,
Is to make us cold, friend!"

MR. BROWNLEE'S VISITOR.

MR. BROWNLEE felt comfortable. It was evening, and late in December. Outside the wind had a cold, sharp whistle, and the snow, with which it was laden, had been weaving, since early morning, a shroud for the waning year. Within, the grate glowed, the gas burned brilliantly, wife smiled, and children played in happy unconsciousness of cold, or want, or suffering.

Mr. Brownlee was in his pleasant sitting-room, the walls of which were hung with pictures, the windows draped with curtains, and the floor carpeted with yielding Brussels. He sat by a centre table, on which were new books and the latest numbers of the best monthlies.

Now, all this was calculated to make a man feel comfortable; and Mr. Brownlee was entitled to what he enjoyed, for he was an honourable, intelligent, active, and successful merchant, a good citizen, a loving husband, and a wise and tender parent.

"Wasn't that our bell?" Mr. Brownlee asked, looking up from the page of a book.

"I think so," answered Mrs. Brownlee, and both listened, as the servant moved along the passage. A man's voice was heard.

"I shouldn't wonder," said Mr. Brownlee, "if that were Mr. Lewis." There was a shade of dissatisfaction in his tones.

"Mr. Lewis," said the servant, entering the sitting-room a few moments afterwards.

"Ask him to walk up stairs."

The servant retired. Mr. and Mrs. Brownlee looked at each other; but as their children were present, neither made any remark. But it was understood between them that the visit of Mr. Lewis was mutually regarded as something bordering on an intrusion. They were feeling very comfortable, as we have seen, shut in from the chilling wintry blasts, and with every comfort around them; and the presence of any stranger, just at that time, could scarcely help being unwelcome.

"Good evening, Mr. Lewis." Mr. Brownlee's voice was kind, if not cordial.

A man plainly, he might say coarsely, dressed, entered the room. His manners were far from being polished; though his rather pale, care-worn face had in it many indications of a natural refinement.

"Good evening," he responded, giving an awkward nod. "Good evening, ma'am," was added, with a nod in turn to Mrs. Brownlee. And then he came forward and took the chair that was offered him, and drawing up to the fire, warmed himself.

"Heavy storm, this," remarked Mr. Brownlee.

"Yes—the snow lies above a foot deep. But you are very comfortable here." And Mr. Lewis glanced around the pleasant room.

"How is your wife to-day?" inquired Mrs. Brownlee.

"Something better, thank you, ma'am. I haven't been able to see her, but the nurse told me that she slept last night, and has less fever to-day. I feel very much encouraged. Oh, dear! If she only gets over it, I shall be so rejoiced!"

"How many children have you?"

"Four, ma'am, and the youngest is just about as old as that dear little girl now in your lap. Oh, dear! It was hard for her to be separated from her mother; but harder for the mother. I'm so in hopes she'll get safely over it soon. I talked with the doctor to-day, and he says that he's no doubt all will come out right."

"I hope so, indeed," said Mrs. Brownlee, kindly.

"How pleasant it is here!" and Mr. Lewis looked all around the room again. "And you are so happy in having all your children around you. Home is a blessed place—blessed even though homely. Mine wasn't like this; but it was a happy home for all that."

"Where are your children now?"

"Scattered all around among relations—poor things! Since my wife's sickness, it's taken all I had saved, and all I could earn, to get her doctored. Oh, if they should cure her now, I shall be so happy!"

"We will hope for the best," said Mr. Brownlee.

"I always do that, but it's been hoping against hope for the last eight or nine months. The darkest hour, they tell us, is just before daybreak. So I comfort myself with thinking the morning is very near."

Mr. and Mrs. Brownlee were touched with the earnestness and simple pathos of their visitor, a poor man from the country, who had brought his wife to one of the city hospitals to be cured, if possible, of a disease that for a time threatened her life. Mr. Brownlee had met him by accident, and from kindness of heart invited him to his house. Mr. Lewis had taken advantage of this invitation to drop in two or three times a week and enjoy the home comforts, and the books and periodicals he found in Mr. Brownlee's pleasant sitting-room. He was not always an entirely welcome guest; and yet, he was so simple-minded, so interested with the children, and manifested so much enjoyment in the books and magazines he found upon the centre table, that neither Mr. Brownlee nor his wife could feel anything but kindness towards their unsophisticated intruder.

On the present occasion, Mr. Lewis, after warming himself by the fire, talking for a time in his own peculiar way, and amusing himself with the children, took up a book, and was soon buried in its pages. Time went gliding by on swift wings, and Mr. Lewis took no note of his flight. Nine o'clock came, and the last child was put to bed, but he went on turning the pages of the book in which he had become interested, wholly unconscious that the long evening had waned so far. Half-past nine found him still buried in its pages.

Mr. Brownlee, who had, for a time, felt pleasure in the poor man's enjoyment of the comforts around him, now began to wish him away.

"I like to be hospitable," he said to himself, "but this is carrying the joke a little too far."

Ten o'clock was rung out at last by the handsome French clock on the mantelpiece, but Mr. Lewis did not heed the warning.

"This is a very interesting book," he said, about five minutes afterwards, looking at Mr. Brownlee, his mild face beaming with true enjoyment. "How pleasant it is here," he added, and then his eyes went back to the page from which he had lifted them.

Mr. Brownlee's heart softened towards the poor man, and yet he could not overcome a feeling of annoyance at his prolonged stay. He looked at his wife, and his wife looked at him—then they glanced mutually and meaningly at Mr. Lewis. Mrs. Brownlee yawned, and Mr. Brownlee yawned, rather loudly, in concert. But their guest was wholly oblivious. The fascination of the page was complete. Next Mr. Brownlee got up, and commenced pacing the floor; he was too fidgety to sit still. He looked at the clock, the minute hand of which was now almost at thirty, looked at Mr. Lewis, looked at his wife, knit his brows, and then walked on more rapidly than before. At last impatience spoke out.

"Mr. Lewis," said he, "do you know how late it is?" Now, Mr. Brownlee tried to say this with some gentleness; but his real feelings came more fully into his voice than he was aware. It was plain, from the shadow that came instantly over the face of Mr. Lewis, as he closed the book and let it fall upon the table, that he felt rebuked. His eyes glanced from the countenance of Mr. Brownlee to the clock on the mantel.

"Half past ten!" he said, in surprise. "I didn't dream of its being so late. Time passes much quicker here, I think, than it does in some other places. Good evening, sir! Good evening, ma'am! I shall remember your kindness as long as I live. I should not have staid so late. But a book and this pleasant room made me forget myself. At the cheap tavern where I am staying, there is no place to sit down in but the bar; and I don't like drinking, smoking, and swearing. I walk the streets half of the evening, sometimes, but to-night it was too stormy. Good evening, sir. Good evening, ma'am."

And Mr. Lewis turned away, and went forth into the blinding storm, to walk nearly half a mile before gaining his dreary lodging place.

"Poor man!" There was pity in the voice of Mrs. Brownlee.

"And yet," said Mr. Brownlee, speaking in answer to the words of Mr. Lewis, rather than to those of his wife, "I gave him grudgingly of my home-comforts; and suffered a weak, selfish annoyance, while he was drinking in pleasure at every source! What a storm it is!" Mr. Brownlee glanced towards the window, against which had come the snow-laden blast with a heavier rush. "And I have sent this poor man forth to meet its wintry chill, with a pressure on his feelings. A little more patience, a little more consideration, a little more unselfish pleasure in sharing my good gifts with him, would have made his spirit lighter, and mine also. Kindness, humanity, regard for others, ever bear a double blessing; the want of them as surely lays upon hearts a double burden. I was never more conscious of this than I am to-night. I will try not to forget the lesson. The lighting of another's candle at ours should never dim its radiance, as it has dimmed mine to-night."

MARRIAGE.—I look upon a man's attachment to a woman who deserves it, as the greatest possible safeguard to him in his dealings with the world; it keeps him from all those small vices which unfettered youth thinks little of, but which certainly, though slowly, undermine the foundations of better things, till in the end the whole fabric of right and wrong gives way under the assaults of temptation.

THE COST OF A MODERN BELLE.—The following description of a brilliant star in the galaxy of fashion, may be read with interest in the present monetary crisis. "I saw her dancing in the ball. Around her snowy brow were set five hundred pounds; such would have been the answer of any jeweller to the question, 'What are those diamonds?' With the gentle undulation of her bosom there rose and fell exactly thirty pounds ten shillings. The sum were the guise of a brooch of gold and enamel. Her fairy form was invested in ten guineas, represented by a slip of lilac satin; and this was overlaid by thirty guineas more in two skirts of white lace. Tastefully down each side of the latter were six half-crowns, which so many bows of purple ribbon had come to. The lower margin of the thirty guinea skirts were edged with eleven additional guineas, the value of some eight yards of silver fringe a quarter of a yard in depth. Her taper waist, taking zone and clasp together, I calculated to be confined by thirty pounds sterling. Her delicately rounded arms, the glove of spotless kid being added to the gold bracelet which encircled the little wrist may be said to have been adorned with twenty-two pounds five and sixpence, and, putting the silk and satin at the lowest figure, I should say she wore fourteen and sixpence on her feet. Thus altogether was this thing of light, this creature of loveliness, arrayed from top to toe, exclusively of little sundries, in six hundred and forty eight pounds eleven shillings."

M. D. HILL, ESQ., Q.C., RECORDER OF BIRMINGHAM.

MATTHEW DAVENPORT HILL, the eldest child of Thomas Wright and Sarah Hill, was born on the 6th of August, 1792, at Birmingham. The family removed about three years after this event to Kidderminster (where the third son, Rowland, the author of "Penny Postage," was born), and four years later to Wolverhampton. In 1802 they returned to Birmingham, where Mr. Thomas Wright Hill succeeded by purchase to a boarding and day school for boys. In 1804 the subject of this memoir, now the eldest of five children, began to teach in his father's school, and continued to do so, besides giving lessons in other schools and in private families, until 1816; he then left Birmingham to study in London for the bar. He was called to the bar in the Michaelmas Term of 1819. His first case, which was argued in the same term, was a memorable one, viz., King v. Borrow, arising out of what was popularly called the Manchester Massacre.

In the following Summer Assizes at Warwick, he conducted the defence of Major Cartwright, who was tried with several other distinguished members of the Reform party for seditious conspiracy at Birmingham. Mr. Hill owed the honour of selection as one of the counsel retained on this occasion to his previous acquaintance with the major, whose warm and intimate friendship he enjoyed until the death of the latter in 1824.

Meanwhile the school at Birmingham had gradually increased in extent and reputation until it had outgrown the house it then occupied. Mr. Rowland Hill, who, with his younger brothers Arthur and Frederic, was now engaged in the management of the school, supplied the plans for a new erection at the neighbouring village of Edgbaston; and though he had had no instruction in the profession of an architect, the house proved to be admirably adapted to the end for which it was built. It became celebrated under the name of Hazelwood School.

In 1822 Mr. M. D. Hill published a work entitled "Public Education," in which he set forth the system pursued there. The book attracted much attention. An article upon it appeared in the "Edinburgh Review;" and through these and other channels the school became widely known. Pupils from foreign countries and distant colonies were sent to receive their education upon the enlightened principles pursued there, and which have been still further developed under the direction of Mr. Arthur Hill, at Bruce Castle, Tottenham, whither the school was removed thirty years ago. To "Public Education" Mr. M. D. Hill owed the friendship of Jeremy Bentham, who, after reading the book, sought the acquaintance of the author.

Mr. Hill was one of the original members of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, founded in 1826, and took an active part in its proceedings, suggesting many of its most successful publications.

In 1831 Mr. Hill was applied to by a gentleman, who, in great distress, begged him to use his influence with his friend Lord Brougham, who was then Chancellor, to endeavour to save the life of a man under sentence of death for forgery. It appeared that the convict had forged a bill upon this gentleman, who had been induced to prosecute only upon the assurance that the man's life would be spared. A verdict of guilty, however, was returned, and the culprit was condemned to die, notwithstanding the assurances the prosecutor had received to the contrary. Mr. Hill communicated with the Chancellor on the subject, and found that the question of the fulfilment of the sentence was already under consideration. Eventually, he was informed that the royal mercy would be extended to this individual; and no subsequent forger has suffered death.

Having taken an active share in the labours of the liberal party to obtain parliamentary reform, he was solicited by the people of Hull to represent them in the first reformed parliament. He accepted their invitation, and after a contest, in which he refused both to canvass and to be chaired, he was returned at the head of the poll for a town which until then had been noted for its corrupt electioneering practices. Mr. William Hutt, also a liberal (now M.P. for Gateshead), was his colleague. But although this attempt to restore a purity of election unknown in Hull since the time of Andrew Marvel, was successful, it could not fail to excite the bitterest hostility against Mr. Hill in those voters who had been accustomed to regard an election as a harvest of bribery and a season of riotous indulgence.

A party of them, from among the lowest of the population, seized upon him while on his way to the hustings, and succeeded, for a moment, in dragging him from his friends, with the intention of throwing him into one of the docks. Had they accomplished their object, death would have been almost inevitable. Fortunately, his partisans were able to rescue him; and, after a severe struggle, in which he received serious personal injury, he was carried to the house of his friend, the late Richard Cassan, Esq., of Hull, where he was most hospitably and kindly nursed, until his health and strength were restored.

At the public meetings which Mr. Hill attended as candidate, he caused seats to be reserved for the female portion of his constituency, an act of justice which is very unusual in electioneering annals. The ladies of Hull testified their appreciation of it, and of his character as a member, by presenting him, after his retiring from parliament, with a beautiful piece of plate.

Soon after entering the House of Commons, he took up the question of municipal reform, and presented the first petition to parliament on that subject. His labours, however, in this cause may have had an effect in depriving him afterwards of his seat, for at the next election, by the votes of the "freemen" of Hull, as distinguished from those of ordinary voters under the Reform Act, another candidate was elected in his stead. During the short period (not more than two years) that Mr. Hill was a member of the House of Commons he strongly supported the bill for allowing persons charged with felony to employ counsel in their defence, and other amendments of the criminal law. He, moreover, took an active part in obtaining the bill for the establishment of the now flourishing colony of South Australia. He advocated slave emancipation, the repeal of the stamp duty on newspapers, and of the tax on almanacks. In 1833 he moved for a committee of the House of Commons to examine into the claims of the Baron de Bode upon the British Government, which had been pending since the year 1814. Property in France belonging to the baron had been confiscated during the first French revolution, and as a British subject he had claimed indemnification for his losses, from a fund amounting to seven millions sterling which had been paid by the French to the English government for the liquidation of such claims. His application was refused on grounds which he alleged to be unjust, an opinion shared by some of the most eminent lawyers in this country. Mr. Hill failed to carry his motion in 1833, but succeeded when he again brought it forward the following year. The committee sat, Mr. Hill acting as chairman, but a dissolution of parliament prevented it from coming to a decision on the merits of the case. Mr. Hill, aided by Mr. Sergeant Manning, pleaded the cause of the baron as his gratuitous legal advocate, first in 1838 in the Court of Queen's Bench, when he moved for a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to compel the Lords of the Treasury to indemnify his client. In giving judgment Mr. Justice Coleridge, after an elaborate review of the case, decided against him.

This decision, however, did not prevent the Baron de Bode from further prosecuting his claim. His counsel subsequently argued the case in many of the English law courts. Favourable verdicts have frequently been obtained, though they unfortunately were liable to be reversed by a higher tribunal than that in which they were gained. Upon his retiring from the bar in 1851, Mr. Hill necessarily relinquished his professional connection with a cause which he had advocated for nearly twenty years, but he continued to give it all the aid in his power whenever it was brought before parliament. In 1852, upon a motion of Lord Lyndhurst, a select committee of the House of Lords was appointed "to inquire into the allegations of the Baron de Bode's petition, and to report to the House." The committee consisted of sixteen peers, among whom were Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Brougham, and Lord Truro. Their report was unanimous, and terminated in strongly recommending the case to the favourable consideration of their lordships.

The dissolution of parliament and change of ministry which followed the session of 1852, diverted attention from this report. In August, 1853, Lord Lyndhurst moved "that the house earnestly recommends the case of the Baron de Bode to the favourable consideration of her Majesty's government." Lord Truro supported the motion; Lord Brougham, who had come prepared to speak in its support, was compelled by sudden indisposition to leave the house during the debate. Several other peers who were favourable to the baron also departed, not anticipating a division. A division, however, took place, when the contents were six, non-contents sixteen. The latter precisely equalling in number the members of the committee of the House of Lords who had reported unanimously in the baron's favour.

In June, 1854, Mr. M. Chambers, in the House of

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

M. D. HILL, ESQ., Q.C., RECORDER OF BIRMINGHAM.

Commons, moved, "that the national good faith requires that the just claims of Baron de Bode, established after protracted investigation, should be satisfied." After a long debate the house divided, when the motion was lost by a small majority. No further effort has been made by the Baron de Bode; but by those to whom the honour of England is dear his claims cannot be regarded as finally dismissed.

Mr. Hill lost his seat for Hull in 1835, and has not since re-entered parliament, having declined the invitations of other constituencies to come forward as their candidate.

He had in 1834 received a silk gown, with a Patent of Precedence.

In December, 1838, there arrived at Liverpool, on their way from America to Van Diemen's Land, under sentence of transportation, twelve Canadians, who had been arrested for political offences during the then recent rebellion in their native colony. It was believed that the conviction of several could not be sustained in law; and by writ of habeas corpus they were conveyed to London. They possessed, however, no friends to enable them to bring their case before an English tribunal; but happily for them it was taken up by the eminent solicitors, Messrs. Ashurst and Gainsford. Mr. Hill led the cause with the aid of Mr. Roebuck and other members of the bar; it is hardly necessary to say that these gentlemen received no fees. The hearings took place in 1839. The court decided against the prisoners; but Lord Chancellor Cottenham having doubts respecting some of the cases, six prisoners were discharged. The others were sent to their destination, in Van Diemen's Land.

In 1839, when Birmingham was erected into a borough, Mr. Hill was appointed the first recorder of this his native town, and held his opening sessions in July of that year. In the course of his address to the grand jury, he adverted to most of those principles of criminal jurisprudence which in later charges he has more fully developed. These addresses have usually found a place in the leading journals at the time of their delivery, and have not unfrequently been the subject of prolonged and earnest discussion by the press.

The ticket of leave system has afforded a topic for three charges by the recorder of Birmingham. The principle upon which it is founded (namely, that of granting to the prisoner a gradual return to liberty, by which tentative process his fitness for freedom may be ascertained before he is set at large) Mr. Hill regards as sound, and, indeed, as one of those upon which all prison discipline should be based. But the present administration of the ticket of leave system in England and Scotland, whereby licenses are granted, not as a reward for good conduct, or with a view to test the convict's fitness for liberty, but simply because a certain portion of his sentence has expired, the recorder strongly disapproves. In Ireland, under the able management of the present board of directors of convict prisons, the former course is pursued, and is attended with the most satisfactory results. Mr. Hill visited the Irish convict prisons in August, 1857, and at the meeting of the Association for the Promotion of Science, held at Birmingham in October last, in his address to the "Punishment and Reformation Section," over which he presided, he stated the results obtained, together with the gratifying impression which a thorough examination of those establishments produced on his mind.

But it is, perhaps, the improved mode of dealing with young offenders with which Mr. Hill's name is more identified in the public mind than any other branch of law reform. It has for many years occupied his deep and constant attention. Shortly after entering on the office of recorder he adopted a course with regard to the juvenile prisoners brought before him, which had for a long time been pursued by the magistrates of Warwickshire, and of the success of which sixteen years' attendance at the sessions for that county had enabled him to judge. The plan alluded to is that of returning to their masters and employers—when willing to receive them—those young delinquents who appear not to be hardened in crime, and whom such lenient treatment is likely to reform. Upwards of four hundred youths have been thus dealt with, and the subsequent good conduct of a large proportion of them has proved the soundness of the principle upon which the recorder has acted.

In December, 1851, Mr. Hill presided at a conference (suggested by Miss Mary Carpenter, a zealous labourer in the reformatory cause) on the subject of preventive and reformatory schools, which met at Birmingham; and two years later he took a scarcely less active part at a similar meeting held in the same town. To the first of these conferences (out of which the second may be said to have arisen) is attributed, in great measure, the rapid development throughout the country of that feeling in favour of consigning young criminals to school rather than to prison, which has caused reformatories to spring up in almost every county, and carried Mr.

THE TOMB OF RUNJEET SINGH, AT LAHORE.

Adderley's Juvenile Offenders Act of 1854 through parliament. This statute was explained, and its probable operation indicated, by Mr. Hill, in his address to the grand jury at the sessions following its enactment.

At a somewhat later date, Mr. Hill, acting upon the advice of many friends, began to prepare his numerous charges for publication in a collected form, adding to them much original matter, and passages from various authors illustrating his views, together with many of the newspaper articles which had advocated or controverted his opinions. This book appeared in May, 1857, under the title of "Suggestions for the Repression of Crime." It may be considered as forming a supplement to the excellent work on crime published some years since by the author's brother, Mr. Frederic Hill, formerly one of her Majesty's inspectors of prisons, and now assistant-secretary to the Post-office.

In 1843 Mr. Hill, in conjunction with Lord Brougham and several other friends of law reform, took part in founding the society for the amendment of the law. To this society are owing many of the improvements in our jurisprudence effected since that date; and as it still exists in vigorous action, further benefits may be anticipated from its labours.

In 1851 Mr. Hill was appointed to a commissionership in the Bristol Court of Bankruptcy, which office he still holds.

WEALTH is but a confused lump, till bounty shape and put it into form; but a dead, useless piece of earth, till charity animate and quicken, and by sending it abroad, make it current, and by distributing it to several hands, give it heat and motion.

THE TOMB OF RUNJEET SINGH.

THE Sikhs or Seekhs are of comparatively modern origin. They started into existence as a distinct people about the middle of the fifteenth century. A Hindoo teacher, Nanak by name, was the founder of their race. He, assuming the office of a religious reformer, endeavoured to break down the unsocial restrictions which had for so many ages kept the Hindoo population divided into distinct classes, and was so far successful as to collect a numerous body of disciples, who speedily assumed a substantial form, and became a distinct element in the population of Northern India.

The word Sikh means disciple, and the followers of Nanak have retained that title to the present day.

But the distinct nationality of the Sikhs is referable to a much later period than that of their religious founder. Until the close of the last century they remained in a turbulent feudal condition. About that time a chieftain named Runjeet Singh acquired great influence over them. In 1799 he gained possession of Lahore. He lost no opportunity of turning his arms against the surrounding districts. These he rapidly brought under his control. Although up to that period the Sikhs were undoubtedly the dominant race in those parts, yet the actual boundaries of their dominions were very indistinctly defined. In many provinces Mohammedan governors retained a species of independence. All, however, fell before the arms of Runjeet Singh, who incorporated Mooltan into his kingdom in 1818.

From that date the Punjab was distinctly recognised as a sovereign and independent state. It was placed on a footing of equality with the ancient powers of Hindostan. Runjeet was firmly seated on his throne, and enjoyed a long and prosperous reign. The government of Runjeet Singh, although a despotism, was far less absolute than most of the native governments in the East. It was vigorous without being either cruel or unnecessarily severe. He maintained an army of about 25,000 regular infantry, 5,000 regular artillery and cavalry, and 50,000 irregular horsemen. He strengthened himself by an alliance with the British, which gave him an opportunity of studying our military discipline, and introducing it into his own army. Moreover, he caused the Sikhs to learn the British artillery practice, in which the pupils became so expert as to give their teachers on a subsequent occasion a memorable proof of their proficiency.

Runjeet Singh died in 1839, and his title and rich territories—without the power to retain the one or wisdom to rule the other—descended to his son and successor. The country became a prey to anarchy. This son was assassinated, and rival chiefs immediately contended for the Punjab. At length, adjusting all minor differences, they united in an invasion of the British dominions. They displayed great bravery, excellent discipline, and skilful generalship, but were defeated in a series of engagements, ending with the battle of Sohraon. This took place on the 10th of February, 1846. The Sikhs lost 10,000 men; the British 2,338 in killed and wounded. The war terminated with the signing of the treaty of Lahore. The Sikhs, however, appear to have entered into this treaty more to gain time than with any other object, for in 1848 they again attacked the British. They were finally defeated at the battle of Goojerat, February 21st, 1849. The formal annexation of the Punjab to the British dominions was made on the 29th of March in the same year.

Sheer Singh, one of the sons of Runjeet Singh, erected to the memory of his renowned father the splendid mausoleum, a representation of which is given in the accompanying engraving. The construction of this monument, which consists almost entirely of clear white marble, occupied seven or eight years. Among the gilded decorations large pictures are painted, representing the principal personages of the reign of Runjeet Singh, and bearing some resemblance to those which are seen in the sculptures of ancient Egypt. The interior, divided by a large corridor into two equal parts, consists of eight apartments covered with gilded and painted figures, analogous to those which are seen outside. The ceilings are exceedingly brilliant, being divided into a number of small compartments, each decorated with some graceful design produced in the richest colouring. In the centre of each apartment is a white marble tomb inlaid with precious stones. These eight sarcophagi contain the ashes of the king, three of his wives, and four of his "faithful" attendants, who voluntarily sacrificed themselves at his funeral obsequies.

This splendid monument is erected within the inclosure of the great mosque of Lahore. The large building which is seen at the end of the fortification, is the stronghold of the citadel, the residence of the native prince, a pensioner of the East India Company.

HOPE EVERMORE; OR, SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER V.

Though troubles assail, and dangers affright,
Though friends should all fail, and foes all unite,
Yet one thing secures us whatever betide—
The Scripture assures us, "the Lord will provide."

The birds without barn or storehouse are fed:
From them let us learn to trust for our bread—
His saints what is fitting shall ne'er be denied,
So long as 'tis written, "the Lord will provide."

When life sinks apace, and death is in view,
This word of His grace shall comfort us through;
No doubting or fearing with Christ on our side,
The promise is cheering, "the Lord will provide."

REV. JOHN NEWTON.

THE scene was so new, so startling, and so intensely interesting to the spoilt beauty, the pampered daughter of fashion, that for a few moments she could not reason; she could only feel.

The school-room was large, lofty, and well ventilated. The roof was not ceiled, but intersected by iron beams, on one of which a large black cat sat wrapped in her warm fur, well-fed and portly, looking down, in every sense, on those ragged sons and daughters of men, blinking and winking with her large yellow eyes; and such was the moral power of virtue and order over this little vagrant's home, that not one ragged child turned its eyes from its teacher or its Testament to watch puss, and meditate a "shy" at her.

Young men at college, and misses at finishing schools, are not so well disciplined: less than the presence of that noble black cat diverts their minds and distracts their attention. The whitewashed walls were hung with cards, on which, in large black letters, were printed texts from Scripture, arithmetical tables, progressive reading lessons, maps, coloured pictures of animals, wild and tame.

Ada's attention was arrested as it had never been before—(but perhaps that was because "the heart in waking woke the mind")—by such texts as these:—

"REMEMBER THY CREATOR IN THE DAYS OF THY YOUTH."

"SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES."

"THE LORD THY GOD IS A JEALOUS GOD."

"THOU SHALT NOT STEAL."

"HONOUR THY FATHER AND THY MOTHER."

"BE NOT WEARY OF WELL DOING."

"DO NOT FOLLOW A MULTITUDE TO DO EVIL," and many more in a similar spirit, full of practical piety, and so printed that all who run can read.

Brought for the first time in her vain, aimless life into close contact with the most abject poverty and incontestable destitution,—breathing for the first time an atmosphere which, in spite of all precautions and preventions, had a warm effluvia, as inseparable from the haunts of poverty as freshness and fragrance from the palace-homes of the rich, Ada closed her eyes for a moment as she sank into a chair offered her by a teacher, and felt sick and faint, but far more from inward emotions than from anything from without. When she looked round again she gazed steadily on the gaslight, falling clearly, searchingly on hundreds of faces, hollow with famine, wasted with fatigue, pallid with sickness or sorrow, pinched with care; some brutalised by habitual or hereditary vice; some humanised by the new influences around them; some old men and women, and even little children, hardened by vain prison discipline, and some melting, softened by the wisdom of mercy. There she saw hardened old faces growing almost young again with the new lights, the new hopes, the regeneration. The old, the wicked old felon, whom galls and the cat-o'-nine-tails had only confirmed in sin, born again, and becoming as a little child, not merely in spirit, but in the child-like trust stealing into the old, crafty eyes; while on the once darkly-shadowed, stony face gleamed something of the sunshine which, tradition says, for ever irradiated the features of him who had seen his Lord—even the dead son of that widow of Nain whom Jesus called back to life). There, too, were little children, with old faces, "hereditary criminals,"—infants who had been taught to steal, trained to steal; some even who had taken high honours in the schools of theft, and from the pockets of an image, dressed like a gentleman or lady, suspended from the roof and hung with bells, had succeeded in abstracting a purse containing sixpences, without a tinkle being heard—graduates in horror they, masters of arts, and ready for practice.

Even into the very "dens of thieves," where these boys were taught their vile, perilous trade as pickpockets, had the brave city missionaries penetrated—and God had given them the victory—unharmful as Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego of old in the fiery furnace, because Jesus was with them, too, there; and safe as Daniel in the den of lions. They had dragged the little victims, whom it had taken such time and trouble to perfect as pickpockets; and they who had been taught that it was a great achievement to steal, and only a crime to be detected, learnt in the different ragged schools to which they were welcomed, to keep the commandments that say, "Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's goods;" and were taught, too, "to do things honestly in the sight of all men." They were losing by degrees the watchful, cunning, frightened look they had acquired during those dark mornings of their lives, when, if they returned empty-handed, having stolen nothing, they were beaten and starved—yet, if detected stealing, were sure to be imprisoned; often their tender skins and young flesh torn by the "cat," or their little minds (superstitious because ignorant), and their poor, young hearts doomed perhaps to the slow torture of solitary confinement.

There Ada saw children who had never been young, who had never pulled a wild flower,—whose eyes had never brightened at a toy,—whose life had known no morning sun,—whose young ears had been used to oaths, curses, vile slang, obscene words, foul jests, hideous blasphemy; whom bodily pain had ceased to affect—they were so used to it;—whose wages of sin had been a few sops of the liquid fire their vile parents poured down their own throats to deaden the gnawings of hunger, the sense of cold—to drown the present, the future, and the past.

Yes, Ada, who had seen life hitherto through a golden mist and a rosy veil, was behind the gay drop-scene now. She saw hundreds of the once "dangerous," the once "perishing" classes, whom an angel, in the shape of the wolf of hunger, the vulture of remorse, or even the demon of despair, had driven to knock at one of those doors, ready to fly open at their trembling touch, and had brought to those courts where destitution is a sufficient introduction, and the rags of wretchedness are the presentation-suits.

Ellen St. Ange had begged Ada to array herself as quietly as possible; but Ada had nothing that was not rich and elegant.

She was dressy and extravagant, even for the class to which she belonged. The only daughter of a baronet with ten thousand a year, and celebrated for her beauty, style, fashion, and luxurious taste in dress, Ada Pemberton had found it easy to spend on herself her ample allowance; nay, she was often in debt, for competition in dress carries the belles of the fashionable world to the verge of dishonesty.

It struck Ada, all at once, as the light fell on bare feet, sore and travel-stained, thin, tattered gowns, torn jackets buttoned over lean, shirtless bodies; and then lighted on the rich, glossy folds of her silk dress, with its velvet-tartan robes, à la militaire, on the exquisite texture of her Cashmere shawl, the costly laces of the sleeves that floated about her fair round arms—the bracelets of solid gold that encircled her wrists—her ermine boa and muff—and, above all, the rings that sparkled on her idle, dainty fingers,—yes, it struck Ada, that she, who sat there, so remarkable in such a scene for "the wearing of gold and putting on of apparel," and at whom all the girls were gazing with admiring envy, and the boys with wonder and curiosity—was not in the sight of God worth more than the ragged urchin at her side; and might, with the cost of one of those rings whose useless blaze seemed now to reproach her, have clothed those ragged ones!

Ellen St. Ange was very simply dressed, and Mrs. Golightly's attire we have already described. Ada found herself the only person present convicted of self-worship, and of lavishing on her own vain person what would have saved so many shorn lambs from the cold winds.

CHAPTER VI.

You have now seen the heart cultivated, the mind informed, and the hands trained to industry and skill. Where? In the ragged school! Who are they thus cared for? Can it be believed that these children are, or rather were, street Arabs, street vermin?—Prize Essay on Juvenile Delinquency, by MICHAEL HULL, Esq.

Yes, Ada Pemberton felt as if she had been suddenly brought into court and confronted with that great plaintiff, THE POOR: she herself representing that guilty defendant, THE RICH.

A little stir of pleasurable emotion, and a hum and buzz of grateful love (suppressed as soon as uttered by the ragged children around), greeted Ellen St. Ange, as she passed through the classes of those little ones to offend one of whom is so dread a trespass, entailing so frightful a penalty. Loving, earnest eyes, set in pale, wan faces, that should have been so chubby and so rosy, gazed wistfully after her, as she escorted Ada to the upper end of the room.

There a gentlemen, in whose countenance benevolence and firmness were blended, and in whose eyes a smile seemed to contend with a tear (a tear for the past sorrows, and a smile for the coming hopes of his ragged protégées), received her courteously and offered her a seat.

He was honorary master of the whole school and its adjoining refuge.

He was a man engaged in business of his own in the day, but in the evening he was, like his Lord, "about his Father's business," and obeying the last injunction of that Sen: feeding his sheep—feeding his lambs. No hireling he—but, unpaid below, he will be paid above.

Mrs. Golightly—who never hid her candlestick under a bushel, or her talent in a napkin—had taken her seat, rather pompously, as the voluntary teacher of a class.

She was a good creature, but a little vain of being so good, and she gave her instructions to the dusty, way-trodden flowers before her, rather in too loud and lofty a tone, considering that she was teaching those half-dressed, half-starved girls, "that we are all unprofitable servants, that there is none that doeth good, no not one." She looked as if she thought herself a very profitable servant indeed, and as if she were doing a great deal of good.

Not so did Ellen St. Ange sit down to teach her little fold of loving, trusting lambs. She spoke in a soft, gentle, winning voice. She told them of infant Samuel, who had said "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth thee;" of little Timothy who loved the Scriptures; and of their Redeemer, who was once a little child like them, and born in a manger.

Ellen turned to one who had no father or mother, and whom a city missionary had found rolled up like a dog, asleep in the damp cellar of a half-built house. She said, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man had not where to lay his head." So you, Tommy Trotter, are better off than the Saviour was; for you have a refuge, a roof.

"Yes, teacher," said the boy, proudly, "and such a warm rug; I does lie snug, now; don't I, just, that's all, teacher? And I don't lie down famish and sick-like from hunger. I has a good blow out of nice, sweet bread, and water so clear, gin can't beat it, teacher."

But the class at which Ellen generally presided was one of girls—little girls—and Ada, with a love of the beautiful and picturesque, which was inherent in her nature, and had been cultivated by education, watched, with lively interest, the faces and forms, and artless movements of two little girls, who were distinguished from those around them by their beauty, their intelligence, and the bright cleanliness of their faces, hands, hair, and their little washed-out, darned, patched, gingham frocks.

As a general rule, the faces and forms of the ragged were not prepossessing. Poverty is no beautifier, and those who live like beasts, get to look very like them too.

Many of these poor little ones were born of parents more sensual and filthy than the swine; more crafty than the fox; more cruel than the tiger; for the lion and the tiger will provide food for their young, but the drunkard will rob and starve his own children. Yes, experience shows that men given up to drink are far more animal than the so-called "animal world;" brutalised far below the brute that perisheth; because, with the reason given them for better things, they had sought out many inventions, and all of them abominations in the sight of God and man.

No wonder that these children, born in the vile lodging-houses, where all ages and both sexes herd like pigs, and where no decencies of life ever dwelt, should bear, even on their outward forms, tokens and marks to show whence they came. The high cheekbones, the protruding jaws, as Mr. Hill observes, distinguish the "English Kaffirs," as he calls them; and not these alone; in the worst specimens of this worst class the head is generally small in its intellectual and moral developments, but very large in the animal and sensual portion; and if we add to the characteristics the matted, dust-coloured hair, the high shoulders, large joints, shrunken limbs, and splay, discoloured feet, we have the type of the English Kaffir, or City Arab, in his most revolting form. Many of these wretched families have no more respect for marriage than the lower world. Men and women live together like the brutes that perish. In others the wife soon dies; and a step-mother adds her cruelty to that of Fate and a drunken father. Talk of savages, forsooth; need we seek them in dreary pampas or prairies, forests or backwoods? No, they are here, under the bright glare of the gaslights; they are in fierce hordes about our very doors.

Pass through the dens of Saffron-hill by night or day, you will hear noises far worse than the war-whoop; because the war-whoop is the cry of fierce revenge or wild anger, but the English Kaffir's cry includes in its fierce rage blasphemy and filthy passion. Here, too, you will see English children naked, or clothed in rags as fantastic, and more frail than those of their brethren of the Antipodes.

Here, too, an idol is set up, and worshipped with savage gestures and wild yells. That idol is Strong Drink. At the shrine of this idol human blood is often shed. Generally the victim is the wife of his bosom—the mother of his children; hideous curses and fierce imprecations accompany the sacrifice; and the altar is either his own hearth-stone or the doorstep of some gin-palace. What of the "human face divine" can we expect in the offspring of drunkards?

But as every variety of misery has its representatives in the ragged schools, Ada soon discerned many who were not the revolting offspring of habitual vice, just dragged from those dens of thieves, the low lodging-houses, "the gaffs," and small sweet-meat shops of dark lanes and blind alleys.

There were fair children there, perhaps born of young, lovely mothers, who in innocent youth had felt first the love that conquers shame, and then the shame that conquers love (even maternal love), and who, beguiled by their own hearts and some dazzling, winning, specious coxcomb, far above them in rank perhaps, have given birth to beings whom the dread of this world's scorn and the shame that—as we have said—conquers love have compelled them to forsake, to expose, or to trust to Providence—they themselves, perhaps, hiding their burning brows in the cold bosom of some stream, warmer than the hearts that had betrayed them—

"Anywhere, anywhere,
Out of the world."

Who shall say that in those little ragged outcasts of society, sitting beneath that lamp, the testament in the small hand, and holy truth stealing into the little heart, there may not be

"Maids in whose blue eyes are set,
Some spark of the Plantagenet;"

children whose fathers (at least) may have been allied to those

"Born to tread the crimson carpet,
And to breathe the perfumed airs?"

Yes, the offspring of man's passion, and woman's frailty, has not the brutal expression of the child of low and hardened vice.

And again, the offspring of honest, luckless, humble poverty has its type among those little ones. Many were there whom a mother's industry had saved from want and rags; poor creatures, who, doomed to tug over the wash-tub from morning till night, might have supported their family in comfort, but for the great bane of the poor—the evil spirit that swallows up all the wife's earnings—Drink.

In some cases, alas!—and those how trebly sad—might be found those orphans of living parents, the children of a drunken father, and a mother who after long protesting against the vice had succumbed herself to its temptations. Of all the miserable homes from which those little ragged ones came, and in which were often enacted dramas that would freeze the blood, the most dreadful and ghastly were caused by drink; there were few cases of destitution, starvation, and habitual vice, which did not arise from drunkenness in one or both parents.

CHAPTER VII.

Did we not, Hermia, grow together,
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,
But yet a union in partition,
Two loving berries moulded on one stem?
MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.
And Hope enchanted smiled,
And waved her golden hair.
COLLINS'S ODE TO THE PASSIONS.

THE two beautiful little girls, on whom Ada gazed with an interest which she had never felt in the miniature belles of a juvenile ball, had nothing about them indicative of the more degraded classes to which we have alluded. They were striking contrasts and sweet specimens of angel and gipsy beauty.

The one whom Ellen St. Ange addressed as Hope—Hope Evermore was her name—was a little fair creature, with thick, wavy masses of golden hair, floating round an angel face, with large, upturned, dark blue eyes, full of light, but somewhat pensive and demure for so young a child. She was very fair, with a soft blush that came and went, little red parted lips showing the small even rows of pearl peculiar to infancy.

Though delicate as a little fairy, she was a well-grown girl of seven, with a broad, white chest, and light, agile form, small dimpled hands, and a pretty habit of raising her little, rosy forefinger to keep wilder spirits in order.

She was, in fact, a perfect little monitress to the bright brunette Merry—commonly called Merry Blossom—who was always by Hope Evermore's side.

Merry Blossom was a nut-brown girl of ten, with thick, black hair, glossy and curling, but rather coarse and wiry, and which was always wild and rebellious, in spite of Hope's and her mother's efforts to keep it sleek and in order. Merry had dark brows, beneath which laughed sunny, mischievous eyes of deepest hazel, a cheek like a ruddy apple, a mouth large, and of the red of the berries of the mountain ash, and with teeth, even and very white, proportioned to that mouth, and in singular but characteristic contrast to the soft, small, rosebud lips of little Hope—so delicately tinged and curved. There was another marked difference in these little faces: Merry's black hair grew very low and tufty on a square but not lofty forehead; little Hope's golden braids parted above a high, broad, full, and very white brow. Hope's blue orbs were full of faith and love; in Merry's hazel eyes were mischief, fun, fury, and passion. Yet she was affectionate, and passionately fond of Hope.

There was something irresistibly arch and winning in Merry's smile. In disposition she was quick, volatile, passionate, ready to quarrel, more ready to make up; but often was she checked in her wildest flights and freaks, and moved in her most obstinate moods, by a gentle word of remonstrance from little Hope, or the uplifting of that angel child's tiny, rosy index.

Merry was essentially in the character of her mind and person a daughter of the people—a child of the million. Beauty she had—real and great beauty; but, both in form and colour, it was the very opposite of the poetical, aristocratic type of little Hope's loveliness.

Hope was all delicate ovals, but there was something square and strong-built about Merry. Her arms were well-turned, but already muscular; her hands well-shaped, but large and useful; her shoulders broad—a wise provision, for the shoulders of the poor have much to bear; and already she had a calf to her leg (a very handsome leg, too) that promised Merry would not lag behind in the race of life.

"Our Merry don't want for a good strong understanding of her own," her brother Gregory—"Larky Grigg"—would say, with his hands to his head the while, to avert the "clout" which he knew would be Merry's way of acknowledging the compliment.

As for Larky Grigg himself, there never was such a spirit of fun, frolic, and mischief.

He was a genius, too—self-taught; and, as he said, not merely the cock, but the Cocker of the ragged school.

If he had not been so idle, and so fond of fun, he would have been a wonder. As it was, whenever he gave his attention to anything for five minutes in the way of calculation, the "calculating boy" was a dolt to him. He had a strong mechanical turn, too,—mended all the locks and hinges, and took to pieces, repaired, and put together again, all the clocks, in the neighbourhood.

Larky, too, had displayed his great mechanical genius in the manufacture of a gun and cannon, which were the wonder and the terror of all the women and girls, and the pride and delight of all the boys and many of the men, particularly Lame Luke, his great ally, who had helped not a little.

Every penny Larky could get went in the secret purchase of gunpowder. Several explosions had occurred on Lame Luke's stall, which would never have been revealed to Apple Blossom, but that Larky's long black eyelashes, and thick eyebrows, and clustering locks had been burnt off (soon to grow again, thicker and blacker than ever), and several blisters had appeared on his broad forehead and peach-like cheeks.

Apple Blossom lived in a blind alley, where she kept two little rooms so tidy, and presided in them with such a sunny face—such a motherly woman-heart, and neat, ready hand—that they were a more pleasant home than many fine houses; but "better the dinner of herbs where love is, than the stalled ox, and hatred therewith."

They need not have lived in two little rooms in a blind alley, and Apple Blossom need not have kept a fruit-stall, but for the bane of her own honest, virtuous life, and of her husband's, Bob Blossom,—in other words, his love of drink.

Larky Grigg's wild freaks sometimes clouded Apple Blossom's open, sunny brow; but Bob's evil habit bowed her head with shame, and bruised her spirit, and cut her to the heart; and then it kept them all so poor and bare, and so low down in the world.

Poor Apple Blossom! she deserved as good a husband as Bob Blossom would have been, had there been nothing fermented or distilled in the world; or had he been man enough not to touch what always made a brute of him.

CHAPTER VIII.

Brightest and best of the sons of the morning,
Dawn on our darkness and lend us thine aid.
Star of the east, the horizon adorning,
Guide where our infant Redeemer is laid.

ADA was intensely interested in watching the different classes, the countenances and manners of the "ragged." Mr. St. Stephen, the superintendent, answered all her questions (many of which betrayed great ignorance of life as it is) with that rare mixture of mirth and pathos, which is the best and truest kind of humour.

At this moment a general, and evidently pleasurable, excitement passed like electricity through those files of ragged, wasted, dust-coloured men, women, and children. Ada inquired the cause.

"Mr. Goodman is just come in," said Mr. St. Stephen. "There he is."

Ada's eyes fell on a man of middle age, dressed as the working-classes dress when they are what they call "cleaned up a bit." He looked, as they generally do, much more picturesque in his workaday suit; but his reverence for the ragged school made him always put on his Sunday best to come and teach in it.

He was a man about fifty, with a head on which chinchilla hair, getting a little thin at the temples, could not conceal the large organs of benevolence and veneration.

In his case character and conduct bore out phrenology. He loved his God "with all his heart, with all his mind, with all his soul, and with all his strength," and he loved his neighbour as himself. The strong light of the centre lamp fell on a very high, broad, intelligent forehead, which projected so much, that the large dark hazel eyes, surmounted by thick black eyebrows, looked deep-set, and gleamed like diamonds in a cavern.

There was feeling, and even refinement in the expression of the mouth, whose kindly smile revealed very white and very even teeth.

Jem Goodman wore a blue coat with brass buttons, a black satin waistcoat, and a very white shirt; but his muscular throat was evidently unused to the stiff, black cravat essential to his idea of "full dress," and every now and then he fidgeted with his forefinger about his neck, until he generally got the ends under his ear, or like a pigtail, at the back of his head.

His hands, in spite of soap and water, bore evidence of his grimy though honourable toil. No ablutions would quite wash out and was still his daily occupation.

"The marks of that which once had been,"

"There is great intelligence in Mr. Goodman's face," said Ada, "and great kindness too."

"You are right there, madam," said Mr. St. Stephen. "Mr. Goodman ('Jem Goodman,' as he is called) is a remarkable character, a true Christian in every sense of the word. The soundest sense, and the largest, warmest heart man ever possessed, make Jem, though only a sweep (a master sweep), one of those honest men who are indeed the noblest works of God."

"He is very well off, is he not?" said Ada; "at least so Miss St. Ange told me."

"He is well-to-do," said Mr. St. Stephen, "and yet all he has is the fruit of his own hard earnings. But he would be a wealthy man, were it not for his untiring generosity. If any one is in trouble, Jem is sure to be applied to."

"If the son of a poor widow gets into a scrape, mother and son go naturally to Jem to get him out of it. Jem gives advice. Jem, in extreme cases, even calls in the aid of counsel."

"Often has he saved the few goods of some poor seamstress whose needle, plied night and day, has not been able to keep off a distress for rent. In one family, he finds the old granny in tea, or the grandfather—aged, rheumatic, once a good labourer, but no longer deemed worthy of his hire—the bit of 'baccy,' which article is his all of earthly comfort. Young lasses tell him when the day is fixed, and a new gown or a good wedding dinner is sure to be the result."

"He's godfather to dozens of the little ones about; and if in his neighbourhood you ask an urchin his name, it's more likely to be Jem, or Jem Goodman, than any other; and then it's all done so quietly, so unostentatiously. I'm obliged to leave you now: let me introduce Jem Goodman, miss; he'll supply my place."

"I shall be delighted to know him," said Ada, warmly.

St. Stephen beckoned to Jem, who came at once.

Chemical Experiments.

To make a fluid sufficiently luminous to read by, and at the same time not dangerous.—Half fill a small phial with olive or almond oil, and immerse a piece of phosphorus about the size of a pea. Allow the phial to stand in a warm place for about twelve hours, and a portion of the phosphorus will dissolve, generating an oily fluid which is exceedingly luminous though not dangerous. It only shines when the cork is removed and the bottle agitated. The light evolved is sufficient to read by, or to see the hours on the dial of a clock or a watch.

Sympathetic ink.—1. Write with a solution of sulphate of iron, and the writing when dry will be quite invisible. Dip the written paper when dry into infusion of galls, or even into tea, and the writing will come out black.

2. Dip the same sort of written paper into solution of yellow prussiate of potash, and the writing will come out blue.

3. Dip a portion of the same sort of paper into solution of red prussiate of potash, and the letters will come out red.

To obtain charcoal from lump sugar without burning the sugar.—Dissolve a few lumps of sugar in the least possible quantity of water, so that a thick syrup may result. Pour oil of vitrol upon the syrup and stir all up by means of a piece of glass. The mixture will become tumid, turn black, and generate an enormous amount of charcoal. Charcoal exists in things where an ordinary observer would little expect to find it. In spirit of wine, for example, and several colourless invisible gases. Chemists can readily demonstrate the existence of such charcoal, and make it come forth; but the methods of doing so would involve apparatus, and would be altogether too difficult for a non-scientific operator.

To melt platinum in the flame of a candle.—Platinum is the most infusible of all metals: the very strongest heat of a smith's forge is insufficient to melt it. Nevertheless, if a piece of platinum-foil be wrapped up in contact with a piece of tin-foil, and the whole held in a candle flame, both melt just as easily as wax would have done.

To imitate a volcano.—1. Mingle together iron filings and flowers of sulphur, in equal proportions by measure, forming the whole into a pasty consistence with water. Bury the mixture a few feet under ground in a warm place, and there let it remain. After the lapse of a few hours the mixture will ignite and scatter the earth all around, after the manner of a volcano, forming a veritable crater.

2. Procure a sheet of tin-foil, and lay it flat upon paper. Next take about an ounce of nitrate of copper, which break into gross powder, and moisten it with water. Spread the mixture rapidly over the sheet of tin-foil, crumple the latter up tightly, and envelop it in one or two sheets of paper. This all done, the sooner you let the mass drop out of your hands the better, for it will grow hot, take fire, and dart out sparks in every direction.

To produce hartshorn out of two odourless bodies.—Take some quicklime, and sprinkling it with water, allow it to fall to powder. Rub together equal measures of the powdered lime, and sal ammoniac in a mortar. A strong odour of hartshorn will be evolved; indeed a mixture of powdered lime and sal ammoniac is an excellent material to charge smelling bottles with.

To ignite charcoal without the application of fire.—Powder a piece of charcoal minutely, and make it dry and hot. Placing it now in a teacup, and pouring upon it some of the very strongest aquafortis (nitric acid), the charcoal will take fire.

To extract jelly out of bones.—Bones are composed of gelatine, or the matter of jelly, combined with a white earth. The latter can be dissolved easily by soaking the bone in a mixture of one part by measure of spirit of salt, and two parts by measure of water. The operation may require some days to take effect with a large bone, and it may be requisite to renew the acid solvent twice or three times. The exact contour of the bone will be preserved. In this way gelatine is now obtained pretty extensively, and employed in many technical operations.

To get alumina, or pure clay, out of alum.—To a solution of alum add a solution of washing soda, or hartshorn, when a white powder, which is alumina, or pure clay, will fall.

To change the colour of dark hair to light, and to bleach a negro.—Dark hair, if soaked in strong chlorine water, or solution of chloride of lime, has much or the whole of its colour destroyed. I have also seen a piece of negro's skin bleached in a similar manner. Whether the operation would succeed on the living animal I know not: perhaps it might be found rather painful.

To remove a gold ring which has become too tight for the finger on which it is worn.—Apply quicksilver to the ring, and use moderate friction with the finger. The gold breaks at once, because of combination between it and the quicksilver. The latter may be drawn off by the application of sufficient heat, leaving the gold pure, though the ring will necessarily be destroyed.

HOW TO GET A HOUSE OF YOUR OWN.

THE other evening I came home with a couple of sovereigns in my pocket—money that I had earned by out-of-hours work. The fact is, that I'm a clerk in a merchant's counting-house at a salary of a hundred and twenty pounds per annum, and a pretty wife and baby to support out of it.

I suppose this income will sound amazingly small to those whose income is three or four hundred a year, but nevertheless we contrive to live very comfortably upon it. We live on one floor of an unpretending little house, for which we pay £30 per annum, and Kitty—my wife, you'll understand—does all her own work, so that we lay up a neat little sum every year. I've got a balance of forty or fifty pounds at the savings bank, the hoard of several years, and it's astonishing how rich I feel! Why, Rothschild himself isn't an object of envy to me!

Well, I came home with my two sovereigns, and showed them triumphantly to Kitty, who of course was delighted with my industry and thrift.

"Now, my love," said I, "just add this to our account at the bank, and with the interest at the end of the year—"

Forthwith I commenced casting interest and calculating in my brain. Kitty was silent, and rocked the cradle musingly with her foot.

"I've been thinking, Harry," she said, after a moment's pause, "that since you've got this extra money, we might afford to buy a new rug. This is getting dreadfully shabby, my dear—you must see."

I looked dolefully at the rug: it was worn and shabby enough—that was a fact.

"I can get a beautiful new velvet pattern for twenty shillings," resumed my wife.

"Velvet—twenty shillings!" groaned I.

"Well, then, a common tufted rug like this would only cost twelve," said my cautious better half, who, seeing she couldn't carry her first ambitious point, wisely withdrew her guns.

"That's more sensible," said I. "Well, we'll see about it."

"And there's another thing I want," continued my wife, putting her hand coaxingly on my shoulder, "and it's not at all extravagant, either."

"What is it?" I asked, softening rapidly.

"I saw such a lovely silk dress pattern in Canal-street this morning, and I can get it for four-and-twenty shillings—only four-and-twenty shillings, Harry! It's the cheapest thing I ever saw."

"But haven't you got a very pretty green silk dress?"

"That old thing! Why, Harry, I've worn it ever since we've been married."

"Is it soiled, or ragged?"

"No, of course; but who wants to wear the same green dress for ever? Everybody knows it is the only silk I have."

"Well, what then?"

"That's just a man's question," pouted Kitty. "And I suppose you have not observed how old-fashioned my bonnet is getting!"

"Why, I thought it looked very neat and tasteful since you put on that black velvet winter trimming."

"Of course—you men have no taste in such matters."

We were silent for a moment; I'm afraid we both felt a little cross and out of humour with one another. In fact, on my journey home, I had entertained serious thoughts of exchanging my old silver watch for a more modern time-piece of gold, and had mentally appropriated the two sovereigns to furthering that purpose. Savings-bank reflections had come later.

As we sat before our fire, each wrapped in thought, our neighbour, Mr. Wilmot, knocked at the door. He was employed in the same counting-house as myself, and his wife was an old family friend.

"I want you to congratulate me," he said, taking a seat. "I have purchased that little cottage out on the Bloomingdale-road, to-day."

"What! that beautiful little cottage with the piazzas and lawn, and fruit garden behind?" exclaimed Kitty, almost enviously.

"Is it possible?" I cried. A little cottage home of my own, just like that I had often admired on the Bloomingdale-road, had always been the one crowning ambition of my life—a distant, and almost hopeless point, but no less earnestly desired.

"Why, Wilmot," said I, "how did this happen? You've only been in business eight or ten years longer than I, at a salary but a trifle larger than mine, yet I could as soon buy up the Mint as purchase a cottage like that."

"Well," said my neighbour, "we have all been working to this end for years. My wife has darned, patched, mended, and saved—we have lived on plain fare, and done with the cheapest things. But the magic charm of the whole affair was that we laid aside every penny that was not needed by actual positive want. Yes, I have seen my wife lay by penny pieces one by one."

"Well, you are a lucky fellow," said I, with a sigh.

"Times are hard, you know, just now; the owner was not what you call an economical man, and he was glad to sell, even at a moderate price. So you see that even 'hard times' have helped me!"

When our neighbour was gone, Kitty and I looked meaningly at one another.

"Harry," said she, "the rug isn't so bad, after all, and my green silk will do for a year longer, with care."

"And a silver watch is quite as good for all practical purposes as a gold repeater," said I. "We will set aside all imaginary wants!"

"The two sovereigns must go to the bank," said Kitty, "and I'll economise the coppers, just as Mrs. Wilmot did. Oh, how happy she will be among the roses in that cottage garden next spring!"

Our merry teakettle sung us a cheerful little song over the glowing fire that night, and the burden was "Economy and a home of your own, amid the roses and the country air!"

AN ERROR OF THE PRESS.—A country newspaper, recording the running down of a cow on the railway, said it was "cut into calves!" An astonished naturalist waited on the editor for what the auctioneers call "further information," and received it in the following form:—"Erratum—for calves read halves."

JUST GROUND FOR COMPLAINT.—"The Press," exclaims an American paper, with some bitterness and a great deal of truth, "when at public feasts the dishes are licked clean, the bread crumbled, the nuts are dug out, the glasses are empty, overturned, or broken; the last declaimer of stump-stereotype has finished, the company has two-thirds gone and one-third tired, 'The Press!' fellow-citizens, is then toasted, with a ghastly smile and an asthmatic cheer, in which the public men who are left do not join, though the public men are indebted, nineteen parts out of twenty, to that press for their reputations and fortunes—to the body of educated reporters, for their good taste and discernment in mending so freely their vulgar rhetoric and contemptible grammar."

FORTIFICATIONS OF TREBIZOND.

TREBIZOND.—II.

THE walls of Trebizond are pierced by six gates, one of which, opening on the road to Erzeroum, is surmounted by a Greek inscription. The suburbs of the town are believed to have formed at one time part of the ancient city, and this opinion is confirmed by the site of numerous churches and other edifices in a style of architecture anterior to the Mussulman domination. The modern city, principally the upper part, presents, as we noticed before, a very agreeable aspect: the white houses with their red tops peeping out from a forest of green foliage. The houses are ranged in straight streets, which in some parts have a pavement, but are chiefly destitute of everything approaching either comfort or convenience. Luxury is a commodity which, according to oriental custom, belongs exclusively to the interior. The lower part of the city, which descends towards the sea, closely resembles a European seaport.

The "lions" of Trebizond are chiefly religious. They number eighteen large mosques, ten little Greek chapels, and a Catholic church. There are seven or eight markets—those picturesque khans of the East—and five public baths for the daily ablutions of the faithful. A beautiful aqueduct, raised on arches, crosses the valley which separates the city from its suburbs, and bestows equally on both its cool refreshing waters. The Genoese, during their traffic with Trebizond, erected a building which still exists. This massive edifice is called by the people Bezestein, and is said to have been originally designed for a powder magazine. It is a large square building, pierced on each side by two windows.

The most remarkable structure in Trebizond is the church of Saint Sophia. It is of small dimensions, built of hewn stone, in the form of a cross, and divided into a nave and two aisles, lighted by a cupola supported by four marble pillars. The principal entrance is adorned with four white marble Corinthian columns; the Roman eagle is conspicuous over the gate; below it are numbers of small reliefs, and a beautiful cornice runs round the exterior of the edifice.

If from this point we descend the declivity toward the sea shore, we arrive at a peninsula of small extent, on which are situated the ruins of an old palace, called Eski-Serai, constructed probably for the same purpose as the kiosks on the Bosphorus, an agreeable place of retirement for some prince of Trebizond.

There are many interesting spots in and about the city. Perhaps one of the most picturesque is that which our artist has sketched in the ravine dividing the old city from the new. The full herbage on the mountain, the stately trees, the ruins of ancient buildings, the distinct glimpses of tower and minaret, the oriental costume, the goats at pasture,—all make up an interesting picture, engaging the attention and waking up old memories deep and tender.

The Matron.

NO. XII.

THE treatment of children is an all-important subject. When once I have entered on it, I shall not be disposed to turn to other matters until it is thoroughly considered. I will therefore finish off the topic of my last number (the getting up of the family wash) with a few brief directions about folding, mangling, and ironing.

In the first place, never mangle things that have buttons on them, because the mangle crushes these buttons; but sheets, towels, pillowcases with strings, and table linen, are all the better for being mangled. To facilitate folding, you should have a clean board covered with a linen cloth; and, in the first place, separate things that are to be ironed from things that are to be mangled.

Those that are to be ironed—for instance, shirts, nightgowns, petticoats, &c., &c.—should (with the right side upwards) be folded smoothly and then damped.

For the wash of a moderately-sized family, a quarter of a pound of starch is generally sufficient for the things to be stiffened. Make your starch in the following manner: Dissolve it in cold water, then pour boiling water on it, stirring it well all the time; after this, boil it once or twice. A quarter of a pound will make a washhand-basin full. A lump of sugar melted in the starch prevents its sticking to the iron; and a wax candle stirred in it is an improvement.

Before you begin ironing, always have some rags at hand on which to test the heat of the iron. If you do not take this precaution, you may be sure you will soil or singe the clothes. Iron-stands and iron-holders should form part of the cottage or kitchen furniture. A saucer should never be made to do duty for the one, nor a folded cloth for the other.

For the ironing of dresses, a board about four feet in length, and thirteen inches in width may be used with advantage. On the Continent, where ironing is carried to great perfection, this kind of board is in very general use; an ironing-blanket should be tied on it. The board should be passed through the skirt, and either end of the board should be supported on a firm table. Mind you have a clean cloth on the floor, lest the upper part of the dress should be soiled. In ironing the dress you turn the skirt round the board.

Shirt-ironing is nice delicate work; and ladies' fine linen is best done with slender fingers.

To say the truth, I think ironing deserves a place among the fine arts; and if I had my way, young ladies should be expert in it. I do not say it improves the appearance of the hands, but it need not disfigure them if proper precautions are taken. As to that snowy whiteness, or swan's down softness, which proves that the owners of the hands do nothing at all, we are convinced it does not recommend any girl to a prudent, desirable husband. And now, begging my readers to recollect that the things (after ironing) should never be put away till they have been aired on the horse before the fire, I turn to the management of children.

Begin at the beginning, is the rule I shall follow in my advice on this subject. Of course, my remarks will not, in the first instance, be addressed to the mother; but any inexperienced nurse, whom unexpected circumstances may have induced to undertake the office, will gladly listen to a few useful hints.

Never be in a hurry to dress a new-born infant. On its entrance into this world of woe, let it be carefully wrapped up in the finest, softest flannel that can be procured. Let the nose and mouth be just sufficiently exposed to allow of its breathing freely. Allow it to remain quiet for an hour. Then wash it, quickly and tenderly, in tepid water, without the addition of brandy, gin, or spirit of any kind. Dry it with the softest old linen you have been able to get. Dress it as rapidly as possible, and place it in a warm bed. But recollect this little infant is a human being like yourself, and its lungs require air, or it will cease to breathe; so mind that, in excess of care, you do not cover up its face too closely.

It is a mother's imperative duty to suckle her own child, unless the medical attendant declares it dangerous for her to do so. When this is the case, and where circumstances render it necessary to "bring up the child by hand," as the saying is, the nature of the food must depend on the age of the infant. At first milk and water, sweetened, may be found sufficient; the following are the right proportions: To one table-spoonful of fresh cow's milk, put two of hot water; and then make it moderately sweet with a little loaf sugar. Do not fall into the error of feeding the child constantly. An infant's stomach requires rest as well as that of a grown person.

It is difficult to give any certain rules as to the number of times a child should be fed during the day and night. Some infants are much "heartier" than others, and require more food; but you must not suppose that every time a child cries it requires food. It may cry from a mere effort of nature to strengthen the lungs; or from something uncomfortable in its clothing—a tight string, or a pricking pin. This leads to the discussion of the importance of the best kind of clothes for infants. An infant's dress is all the better the simpler it is. It is important to have such clothes as can be quickly and easily changed. With regard to pins, no good nurse will allow a baby to have a single pin about it. Every part of an infant's dress should be secured with tape. At about four months old socks may be worn; but in the earlier months they are more productive of inconvenience than advantage.

The food must vary as the child gets stronger. Some recommend mutton broth and beef-tea for infants; but I give the preference to farinaceous food with milk. Rusk, boiled to a pap, sweetened with a little sugar, make good, nourishing food; but one of the finest babies I ever beheld, was supported chiefly on sago and milk made in the following manner: A teacupful of moderately thick sago jelly (which is merely sago boiled in water) to a teacupful of fresh cow's milk sweetened with loaf-sugar. And here I beg your attention to a very important matter, viz., the method of feeding children. There is no cup, spoon, or pap-boat to which they take half so kindly as to the regular feeding-bottles, sold ready for use in all respects at the shops of respectable apothecaries. Even mothers who suckle their infants will do well to accustom the baby to take some of its food from one of these bottles, as the use of it will greatly facilitate the task of weaning. But now we must return to general directions.

Both for the sake of the mother and child, the rooms should be well ventilated; but do not misunderstand me, damp air or keen east wind would do an infant or an invalid more harm even than a closer air.

In following rules we must always use judgment, and consider the influence of surrounding circumstances. In warm weather the windows of the room may safely be opened, in order to ventilate the room; but, in a season like the present, it is better to procure a fresh current of air by opening the door for a few minutes. By means of the chimney a thorough current will be procured; and, on this very account, the mother and the infant should previously be well covered up, in order to counteract any evil that might arise from the slight change of temperature this ventilating will occasion.

Active and constant attention to cleanliness is as necessary to maintain the purity of the air as ventilation itself. Let all slops and foul clothes, of every description, be quickly removed. You will be anxious to do this when I tell you that the growth and health of the infant under your care depends, in a great measure, on the purity of the air it breathes; and the rapid recovery of the mother much depends on the same cause; but we shall treat her case separately. The child is now the subject of our remarks. In tending the child you will become almost as fond of it as if it were your own; and were it to die under your superintendence, your grief would be very great.

To avoid such a sad catastrophe bear in mind that an infant's life hangs on a very slender thread. So delicate is the nervous organisation of an infant, that a powerful scent held to the nose may destroy life. Pray recollect this, and let it teach you caution. There is an instance of a baby being killed by smelling a bunch of violets.

But imprudent exposure to cold is, after all, the most frequent cause of that sad sight—infancy nipped in its bud. If, during the first fortnight, exposure to cold air is not carefully avoided, diarrhoea, difficulty of breathing, cough, catarrh, &c., &c., are the sure consequences, and we all know how soon such consequences may prove fatal.

PROPER USE OF THE WORLD.—God hath not taken all that pains in forming, and framing, and furnishing, and adorning this world, that they who were made by Him to live in it should despise it; it will be enough if they do not love it so immoderately, as to prefer it before Him who made it.

Inventions and Science.

IMPROVEMENTS IN STEAM BOILERS.—These proposed improvements consist:—1st. In constructing boilers with a double casing of plates having a water space between them. 2nd. In constructing a framing called the boiler-frame, formed of a series of tubes filled with water, the ends of which terminate in two hollow discs or boxes of a form made to fit the outer boiler, a space being left at the end next the fire-box for the admission of the flame, which plays around the exterior of the tubes, and passes from thence through an opening in the outer boiler into the flue. 3rd. In constructing a similar frame called the furnace-frame, with hollow tubes filled with water, which he places in the fire-box below the fire. 4th. In introducing in the furnace-frame a series of air tubes passing through the water space, for the admission of air to the back of the furnace, which air is made to pass from the ash-pit in a heated state, and produces combustion. 5th. In introducing a jet of waste steam from the cylinder into the fire-box, in which are placed pieces of scrap iron, which, becoming heated, abstract the oxygen from the steam, and leave the hydrogen to be consumed in the furnace. 6th. It relates to a safety-valve; and the advantages presented are a direct weight acting in opposition to the pressure of steam, and the same, being placed within the receiver or boiler, cannot be tampered with.

ARTIFICIAL MANUFACTURE OF COAL.—At the last meeting of the Academy of Sciences, Paris, M. de Sénarmont gave an account of recent experiments on the artificial manufacture of coal, made by M. Barhouillet, at St. Etienne. M. Cagniard de Latour had previously submitted woody matters, in closed vessels, to the action of great heat, with the view of obtaining coal, but the only result was bitumen. M. Barhouillet has repeated these experiments, but with two important modifications. Firstly, he interposes a stratum of woody matter between layers of clay; secondly, the vessel is not completely closed but so arranged that the disengaged gas remains a certain time in contact with the mixture of ligneous matter and clay. The temperature to which the mixture was submitted did not generally exceed 392 deg. Fahr. The products resembled coal in every respect, and their appearance varied, according to the nature of the wood used and also with the temperature. Leaves interposed between the strata, left their impression on the coal; these are a little broken on account of the leaves being fresh and soft. Dry leaves would doubtless have given impressions resembling those of nature.

DECAY OF IRON RAILINGS.—Every one must have observed the destructive combination of lead and iron from railings being fixed in stone with the former metal, and the oxygen of the atmosphere keeping up the galvanic action between the two metals. This waste might be prevented by substituting zinc for lead, in which case the galvanic influence would be inverted: the whole of its action would fall on the zinc, and the iron would be preserved; and as zinc is oxidated with difficulty, it would, at the same time, be scarcely acted on; the one remaining uninjured, and the other nearly so. Paint formed of the oxide of zinc, for the same reason, preserves iron exposed to the atmosphere infinitely better than the ordinary paint, which is composed of oxide of lead.

AIR.—It has been found that in the first year of the existence of a good plan of draining, although no water was observed to run, owing to great drought, that extraordinary crops of roots were obtained, and the result has been attributed to letting in the air to the soil by means of the draining pipes. A novel and interesting experiment is now in progress on the Tawstock estate, the property of Sir Bouchier P. Wrey, in North Devon. The field on which the experiment is being conducted by Mr. Cowan, the worthy baronet's agent, is a small one near the village; the soil a loam of good quality, on an absorbent subsoil, and therefore dry in all weathers. The operation referred to consists in making incisions in the soil, and cleaning them out 3 feet deep, 12 inches wide at the top, and tapering down to the diameter of a 2-inch drain pipe in the bottom, 18 feet apart from cutting to cutting, and each cutting running the full breadth of the field; 2-inch drain pipes are laid in along the bottom, fitting tightly, and the earth is then filled in, exactly as if for drainage. But the object here is not to take off water, but to admit of air, the atmospheric air, to the body of the soil.

CONTRIVANCE FOR THE DETECTION OF BURGLARY.—This invention can be readily affixed to any house or set of offices. It is also adapted to gardens and pleasure-grounds, iron safes to contain valuable property, wine-cellars, plate-closets, jewelry-rooms, &c. Its appearance is similar to a clock-face, or the dial of an electric telegraph; and it is so contrived that no door, window, or gate to which it is applied can possibly be opened without an immediate alarm being given by the ringing of a bell; at the same time a match is struck which lights a candle, thus enabling the inmates, by the face of the indicator, to know what particular apartment has been entered, and also indicate the progress of the unlawful visitor through the premises. A general alarm may be given by it to the inmates by the watchman, or person in whose room the dial is placed (unknown to the deprecator), thus enabling them to prepare for his capture. The apparatus forms an ornament to the room, requires but little space, and after fitting is very inexpensive.

HOW TO MAKE A QUARTERN LOAF OUT OF A DEAL BOARD.

To make wood-flour in perfection, according to Professor Autenrieth, the wood, after having been thoroughly stripped of its bark, is to be sawed transversely into disks about an inch in diameter. The sawdust is to be preserved, and the disks are to be beaten into fibres in a pounding mill. The fibres and sawdust, mixed together, are next to be deprived of everything harsh and bitter, which is soluble in water by boiling them, when fuel is abundant, or by subjecting them for a longer time to the action of cold water, which is easily done by inclosing them in a sling sack, which they only half-till, and beating the sack with a stick, or treading it with the feet in a rivulet. The whole is then to be completely dried, either in the sun or by fire, and repeatedly ground in a flour mill. The ground wood is next baked into small flat cakes with water, rendered slightly mucilaginous by the addition of some decoction of linseed, mallow stalks and leaves, lime-tree bark, or any other such substance. Professor Autenrieth prefers marsh-mallow roots, of which one ounce renders eighteen quarts of water sufficiently mucilaginous, and these serve to form four pounds and a half of wood flour into cakes. These cakes are baked till they are brown on the surface. After this, they are broken to pieces and again ground, until the flour will pass through a fine bolting cloth; and upon the fineness of the flour does its fitness to make bread depend. The flour of a hard wood, such as beech, requires the process of baking and grinding to be repeated. Wood flour does not ferment so readily as wheat flour, but the professor found fifteen pounds of birch-wood flour with three pounds of sour wheaten bread, and two pounds of wheat flour, mixed up with eight measures of new milk, yielded thirty-six pounds of very good bread. The learned professor tried the nutritious properties of wood flour in the first instance upon a young dog. Afterwards he fed two pigs upon it, and then, taking courage from the success of the experiment, he attacked it himself. His family party, he says, ate it in the form of gruel or soup, dumplings and pancakes, all made with as little of any other ingredient as possible, and found them palatable and wholesome. Are we, then, instead of looking upon a human being stretched upon a bare plank as the picture of extreme want and wretchedness, to regard him as reposing in the lap of abundance, and consider, henceforth, the common phrase "bed and board" as compounded of synonymous terms?

SLOW AND RAPID COMPOSITION.

SPEED in composition is a questionable advantage. Poetic history records two names which may represent the rapid and the thoughtful pen—Lopez de Vega and Milton. We see one pouring out verses more rapidly than a secretary could write them; the other building up, in the watches of the dark, a few majestic lines. One leaving his treasures to be easily compressed into a single volume—the other to be spread abundantly over forty-six quartos. One gaining fifteen pounds—the other a hundred thousand ducats. One sitting at the door of his house, when the sun shone, in a coarse coat of gray cloth, and visited only by a few learned men from foreign countries—the other followed by crowds wherever he appeared, while even the children shouted after him with delight. It is only since the earth has fallen on both that the fame and the honour of the Spaniard and the Englishman have been changed. He who nearly finished a comedy before breakfast, now lies motionless in his small niche of monumental biography; and he who, long choosing, began late, is walking up and down, in his singing robes, and with laurel round his head, in the cities of many lands; having his home and his welcome in every devout heart, and upon every learned tongue of the Christian world.

Small Change.

"Have you finished both those bottles of port without assistance, Mr. Gulpitup?" inquired an indignant spouse. "No, my dear, I had the assistance of a bottle of Madeira," was the reply.

GARRICK said of Sir John Hill, the physician and author, "The worst I wish the doctor is, that he may be compelled to take his own physic and read his own verses." "You must reverse the punishment," said a wag; "any man who takes the doctor's physic, won't live to read his rhymes."

PAT DOOLAN, at Inkermann, bowed his head to a cannon-ball, which whizzed past, six inches above his bearskin. "Faith," says Pat, "one never loses anything by politeness."

AMONG the pictures by various artists, in London exhibitions, we have "A Country Ball," by Dance; "Poultry Feeding," by Capon; "Moor Game," by Heath; "A Laughing Girl," by Smirke; "Pigs," by Bacon; "Portrait of Myself," by Mee; "View of the Sea-coast," by Sir W. Beechey; and "A Knife-grinder," by Hone.

EIGHT people once dined on the top of the spire of Salisbury Cathedral. "They must have been very sharp set," observed a punster.

A FEW definitions for the next new dictionary. Age—The only secret a woman keeps. Abuse—Unwelcome truths. Abridgment—Compression of anything into a small space, like the abridgment of the statutes into 50 volumes folio. Absurdity—Anything advanced by our opponents which we don't understand, or with which we don't agree. Accommodation—Obliging a friend to serve yourself; also the "crowding and straw" supplied by the General Omnibus Company.

SUBLINE DESCRIPTION OF AN ESCAPE FROM A MAD BULL.—The bull roared like the rolling thunder, and I ran like the nimble lightning; and springing over the fence with the swiftness of a star falling from the firmament, I tore my trowsers asunder with a crash as loud as if the globe had been shivered by a comet.

WHY is a pretty young lady like a locomotive engine?—Don't give it up—there are lots of reasons. She sends off the sparks, transports the mails (males), has a train following her, and passes over the plain.

WHY is an oyster a very strange animal?

Because he's got a beard, without a chin, And is taken out of bed, to be tucked in.

"SAMBO, you blacka tief, Sambo, why you betray dat secret I told you de oder day?" "I betray de secret? I scorn de 'putation. I found I couldn't keep um, so I told um to somebody that could!"

NOTICE!—The man who tried to whistle a bar of soap, has attempted to sing a stave of a molasses cask.

"PATRICK, you fool, what makes you steal after that rabbit, when your gun's not loaded?" "Hush, my darlint, the rabbit don't know that."

"PRAY, friend, are you the master of this house?" asked a traveller at an inn. "Yes, sir," answers Boniface; "my wife has been dead these three weeks."

"WILL you have the kindness, sir, to take my great coat to town with you, in your carriage?" "Certainly, my young friend; but how will you get it again?" "Oh, very easily—I shall remain in it."

Do you want to know if a foreigner can pronounce English? Give him the following two lines to read, and see what he makes of them—

Though the tough cough and hiccough plough me through,
O'er life's dark lough my way I still pursue.

"How cruel to the little fishes, for people to angle for them!" exclaimed a lady to Charles Lamb, as they looked out of his window, upon the new river. "Not so cruel to the fish as to the worms," answered Elia, "for I have noticed two hundred and fifty worms are used as bait for every fish taken."

THE son of a fond father, when going to war, promised to bring home the head of one of the enemy. His parent replied, "I should be glad to see you come home without a head, provided you come safe."

At a shop-window in Drury-lane there appears the following notice:—"Wanted two apprentices, who will be treated as one of the family." May their appetites be small!

A BRUTE OF A MAN.—"Henry, love, I wish you would throw away that book, and talk with me—I feel so dull." (A long silence and no reply.) "Oh, Henry, my foot is asleep!" "Is it? Well, don't talk, dear, you might wake it."

MOLIERE relied entirely upon the temperance of his diet for the re-establishment of his health. "What use do you make of your physician?" said the king to him one day. "We chat together, sire," said the poet. "He gives me his prescriptions; I never follow them; and so I get well."

FIDDLER DICK, EXON, T. W. S., and T. SIMPSON.—B to K B 8 in Problem No. 13 was, obviously enough, a misprint; B to K 8 was meant.

Our Editorial Table.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—New Series.—All the back numbers of the new series of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, from the commencement of J. F. Smith's tale, "Smiles and Tears," can still be had at the original price of one penny per number.

T. HASLIP.—The black shining ink you require may be made thus: To one pint of good writing ink, add half an ounce of calcined copperas (copperas burned in a flat shovel until it is white or yellow), and add also gum-arabic in sufficient quantity to make it shine; not too much, or the figures or letters will crack. The specimen you have sent has too much gum in it.

Y. Y. In your choice of nutmegs fix on the largest and heaviest.

DELTA.—The expulsion of air from the lungs, the vibrations made in that air by the glottis, together with the modification of the mouth, tongue, and lips, produce the human voice.

AN ANXIOUS GIRL.—The most unmistakable indication of love is a proposal of marriage, and we advise "An Anxious Girl" to trust to no other indication.

PATTY PACE.—This little poem is lively, and contains some good advice, but we have not at present room for it in our columns.

RUSTINS.—Under the circumstances you mention, you would be justified in offering your arm to the lady.

EDITH SAVILLE.—A good receipt for whitening the hands is the following. Wash them in hot water. Dry them well. Then rub over them a little honey and put on wash-leather gloves. Do all this just before retiring to rest. Wear the gloves all night, unless you find them uncomfortable. "Edith's" brother must adopt the following costume for his wedding day. A blue dress coat with brass buttons, a white satin waistcoat, black trousers, dress boots, white kid gloves, and a white cravat.

AMOR.—"Amor" asks us how he is to gain the affections of a lady, and then wishes to know if there is anything to pay! There is nothing to pay for our advice; but there is love to pay for the love he seeks to gain. We presume "Amor" has some particular lady in view. Let him bear in mind that love excites love. By constant kindness and delicate and respectful attentions let "Amor" make the young lady aware of the state of his heart. Englishmen neglect the ladies too much, and therefore we constantly see the nicest and prettiest girls becoming the brides of foreigners who have taken trouble to please them.

AGAMEMNON is advised to offer his MS. to a London publisher of educational works, who will be able to tell him how to proceed, even if he should not himself become a purchaser. ACHILLES is thanked for his sonnets; which are not, however, quite up to our mark.

TWO SISTERS.—To destroy weeds on gravel paths, strew a little salt thinly and evenly over them. If the copper teakettle is kept in thorough repair, and perfectly clean, you need not fear to drink water boiled in it; but be very particular as to the condition in which your kettle is kept. We have never heard of waterproof paper for damp walls.

INVALID.—All flannel is liable to shrink in washing, but the inferior kinds of flannel shrink much more than the more expensive qualities. It is very bad policy, in our opinion, to buy cheap flannel, which may be warranted to wear (out).

OTHELLO.—The skull of any animal, freed from the flesh and hair, may be preserved by being simply washed in brine and water, and then thoroughly dried.

J. E. M.—The manuscript, "The Haunch of Venison," was duly received, and will be forwarded in any way the author points out. If we had been favoured with his address, it would have been acknowledged long ago.

ALBIONIAN.—Ye is a contraction of the; yt. of that. We are obliged by the warm encomiums you pronounce on our new series.

ROXANA.—As we do not keep a register of the criminals executed in England, we cannot undertake to answer "Roxana's" question about the murderers Cooke and Jobling.

ELLA.—"Ella" is seventeen years of age. She is engaged to be married to a gentleman, who is very anxious she should fix the day. On account of her youth, "Ella" fears to take upon herself the duties of married life, but she does not like to vex her lover by asking him to wait. In her perplexity, "Ella" applies to us. This is our answer:—If your suitor is also in his teens, wait a few years by all means; but if he is considerably your senior, and is also a man of sense and discretion, we advise you to consent to an immediate union.

POLLY.—Two reasons are given for the nine of diamonds being called the curse of Scotland: one, that a Scotch member of parliament, part of whose family arms was the nine of diamonds, voted for the introduction of the malt-tax into Scotland; the other, that the Duke of Cumberland wrote on the back of the nine of diamonds the cruel order to give no quarter to the Scots who fought on the side of Charles Edward Stuart at the battle of Culloden.

CLAUDE BLANCHE.—Etiquette in no way sanctions the familiarity of which you speak.

ST. GEORGE.—Under your circumstances, you had better be engaged to the young lady than keep her father and herself in suspense.

A LEARNER.—You will find an excellent series of lessons, both in French and German, in "The Ladies' Treasury," a beautiful Magazine published by Ward and Lock, price 6d.

B. S. M.—Write to the clerk of the Drapers' Company. The other question we cannot answer.

DON'T MOVE.—We advise you to keep to your own motto. From our knowledge of the Continent we think you are less likely to make money there than at home. Photographers are increasing frightfully. Any young man who takes to this business should have some other trade to fall back on when his sitters fail.

IDA MAY.—It is difficult to advise you, because you do not tell us what your actual circumstances are. If you have no income or business, and are partial to the suitor you mention, marry him by all means. At least you give yourself and your little girl a good chance of a comfortable home. If you are independent as relates to the world, and indifferent as relates to the gentleman, we advise you, both for your own sake and your child's, to leave well alone, and to remain single. We recommend your sister not to think of beaux just yet, but we doubt her following our advice. Your letter and your hand do you credit.

OMEGA.—We know nothing about matrimonial offices. We consider that ladies and gentlemen in search of partners for life, can select them much better for themselves than with the aid of interlopers.

ADA BELL.—There is a time for everything. If you are always reading, it is no wonder you have a headache. Exercise is necessary for health, and by neglecting to take exercise you will ultimately frustrate your laudable wish to improve, for illness inevitably suspends study.

FANNY.—For removing freckles, wash your face every morning with buttermilk.

K. H. G. L. R.—The dress you describe is suitable for a public or private ball. The finger for the engagement ring is the third one of the right hand. Without generally approving of marriages between first cousins, we believe such unions may sometimes turn out very happily.

W. A. J. (who might, by-the-by, have written his letter on a half-sheet of paper, instead of a three-cornered fragment) must write much more neatly and correctly before he can hope for admission into a bank.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.—"Wick" is an old Saxon word, signifying "town."

ALICE.—We are not acquainted with any such work.

HUGH LATSON.—The last Chinese war was concluded in 1842. By the treaty of Nanking, five ports were thrown open to the British, and the Chinese paid a large sum for the expenses of the war. We shall, no doubt, soon have the Chinese trade freed from the ridiculous restrictions placed upon it by the celestial citizens.

WILLIAM S.—The art of making glass is very ancient; but the old glass was dark, and hardly semi-transparent. In the reign of the emperor Nero, at Rome, an enormous price was given for two small cups of transparent glass. The art of staining glass for church windows was invented about the tenth century.

F. G. B. wishes to know "who were right, the Cavaliers or the Roundheads, in the time of Oliver Cromwell?" We think both parties were right, at least those among them who chose the side of the king and of the parliament respectively from honest conviction. On the one side we have the great examples of Pym, Hollis, and Hampden; on the other, the noble devotion of the gallant Montrose and the loyal, high-spirited Ormond. It is not likely that such men were entirely wrong, either as Roundheads or Royalists, though they may have had the faults of their time.

ENQUIRER.—The story which tells us how Cleopatra melted a pearl in wine or vinegar, and drank it off to the health of Antony, is not very well authenticated, and was probably only a rumour to which the known extravagance of the Egyptian queen gave rise.

ETHELREDA.—Supposing Noah to be a good, sensible man, we advise you to marry him, and thus get rid of Albert. A receipt for whitening the hands is given in the answer to "Edith Saville."

A CONSTANT READER.—You can easily know if you have an ear for music by discovering whether or not you have the power of recognising airs, and of humming or singing them so that others can recognise them. Some people are quite deficient in ear, and perceive no difference between a polka and a waltz.

TURPIN.—We pity you sincerely. Nine months is a long time to wait after having made a declaration of love. As you have frequently seen the young lady, it cannot be illness that keeps her silent. We suspect she intends accepting you if she can get no one else. Were we in your place, we should prove to her that we cannot be neglected with impunity. We consider that the young lady's conduct sets you at liberty, supposing you wish to pay your addresses in another quarter.

ARTIZAN.—Never allow your tools to lie about, and you will not lose them. It is ungenerous to doubt the honesty of your fellow-workmen, without stronger reasons than those you have adduced in your letter.

KARL.—The Morgenblatt is a German paper, published daily. The word translated means morning paper or sheet. It contains articles on general subjects, German chit-chat, and such political matter as the censorship of the press allows to appear. We should scarcely advise you to procure it, if your only object is to improve yourself in German reading. You would find it very expensive.

MATURE.—You are evidently nervous, and thus you become embarrassed and flushed when you appear most at your ease. Speak deliberately and carefully, without hurry or excitement, and you will soon find the symptoms vanish.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Don't know.

ANXIOUS.—Instances of ingratitude should not dismay you. Shakespeare tells us how "Time hath a wallet at his back,

In which he puts aims for Oblivion,
A huge-fed monster of ingratitude,
Whose scraps are good deeds past."

But, "Anxious," you must not be discouraged. Do good for its own sake. A good deed will not lose its worth because the recipients may be unworthy.

A PERPLEXED ONE.—We cannot avert the danger to which you allude. All you can do is to render the man happy who falls to your lot; for, if you have missed the right gentleman in marrying him, he has very likely missed the right lady in marrying you.

JUVENIA.—The meaning of the word recalcitrant is, to kick back, of recalcitrant, kicking back. The fire brigade is for the use of the public generally.

DON DIEGO DI CHRISTOVAL.—If you are married by license, it is not necessary for you to state your exact age, but you will have to answer whether you are or are not a minor. In answer to your second question, we have only to say that etiquette makes it necessary to put on mourning for a grandmother. Your third question can receive a satisfactory reply by addressing a line to Messrs. Petter and Galpin. You can get any or all of the back numbers of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, both old and new series.

H. S.—You state your case remarkably well. It is clear that you wish to do right, but we can assure you there is great danger of your doing wrong. We can readily forgive the irritation felt by Mrs. S. when she saw her husband—a professional man—cleaning the boots of a young lady who was on a visit to her. We dare say you are only conscious of a sincere regard for this young lady, but remember—

"Right and wrong so much resemble,
That what we take for virtue's thrill
Is often the first downward tremble
Of the soul's balance unto ill."

No casual acquaintance can procure you any advantage that will compensate for the loss of domestic peace. Mrs. S. acknowledges the justice of your statement. This shows she is not blinded by jealousy. Your wife has behaved generously to you. We advise you to be equally magnanimous, and to tell Mrs. S. that you will willingly relinquish the acquaintance of Miss C. if this acquaintance gives her uneasiness.

RACHEL.—We consider seventeen and a half too early an age for an engagement, unless the suitor is independent of the young girl has a fortune of her own.

F. E. B.—The widow of a peer, though only ennobled by her late husband, retains her title on marrying a commoner.

ANXIOUS INQUIRER.—A receipt for curling hair has been given. Common glue and pitch are the most adhesive substances with which we are acquainted.

LUCY.—We are very sorry for poor "Lucy," but there is nothing in the new marriage law that would make it safe for her to marry again while, in all probability, her first husband is still living.

COAHSLAND.—Thomas Moore was, and Alexandre Dumas is, a member of the Roman Catholic Church. The Irish poet was afflicted with aberration of intellect for a considerable time before his death.

ROSE FANE.—Nearly all the Parisian booksellers publish the Letters of Madame de Sevigné, and of all the French classics. "Rose Fane" could procure them from the publishers, through the medium of any foreign bookseller in London.

HERE I AM.—We presume "Here I am" was seated comfortably at home when he wrote to us. Probably he had just finished the perusal of our paper. Let him continue to cultivate a taste for quiet home pleasures. They will conduce to his health, and consequently to the strength of his voice, about which he seems so anxious.

EFFIE GRAY, ANNIE MARIA.—We thank these ladies for their verses. "Effie Gray's" effusions indicate a pious turn of mind and have some poetical merit. "Annie Maria's" "Broken Vow" is rather pleasing, very sentimental, but the lines are unequal. As yet, the writings of both ladies are too crude for publication.

LILY DALE.—"Lily Dale" may send a valentine to a gentleman if she likes, but as she owns to being young and giddy, we advise her to lose no more time in trifling.

ROSALINA, WILLIAM Y., CAMBRIAN, FREDERICK J. H., MARIA LOUISA.—Cupid is very busy just now. We are inundated with letters from lovers. We shall give them our best attention; for the affairs of the heart are far too important to be neglected. "Rosalina" has two lovers, a soldier and a sailor. She asks us which she should accept. If they have still their fortunes to make, our answer to "Rosalina" is, accept neither. "William Y" is in love with Jessie. He believes his love returned, and yet he lacks courage to speak out. For shame, William; if you don't pluck up a spirit, and make your declaration, some worthier, bolder knight will win your Jessie. "Cambrian" consults us about the best way to make a declaration. As our correspondent writes well, we recommend him to confess his love in a well worded letter. As to a present to the fair lady, a ring is far more significant than a photograph. "Frederick J. H." is desperately in love with a young lady who has a good deal of money; but her parents disapprove of his addresses. "Frederick J. H." has meditated an elopement. Pause, "Frederick." Clandestine marriages almost always turn out ill, and fortune-hunters who contract them are generally disappointed of the money they expected. "Maria Louisa" has just received an excellent offer of marriage, but she will not accept it without our approbation. Her suitor has dark hair. She has some foolish prejudice against dark hair. We advise you, "Maria Louisa," to overcome this prejudice, and to marry expeditiously. Delays are dangerous. As to your husband's dark locks, time will lighten them sooner, perhaps, than you wish.

EMMA JANE.—Avoid scented oils. Let the ends of your hair be occasionally snipped. Brush your hair for several minutes in the morning. Merely comb it in the evening. Wash your head with soft water and honey soap, once every week.

J. PARRY. a constant reader, is answered in the advice given to "Emma Jane."

DIOPHES.—The teacup should always be placed on the right-hand side.

A YOUNG WIFE.—One of the best pieces of advice we can give you, is to keep a strict account of all your expenditure. See that your bills are receipted when paid. File all your receipts and keep them for two or three years. All house-keeping bills should be paid every week, because the correctness of the bills can thus be better ascertained. Have the courage and determination to look over each bill yourself. Thus you will detect, and be enabled to check any inaccuracy or extravagance.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Suspicion ever haunts the guilty mind.

SHAKESPEARE.

It was a cold night when Andrew Silex and his brother returned from the market at Tiverton to the Home Farm; both felt chilled and hungry, and saw with considerable satisfaction the blazing fire on the hearth, and the table spread with a plentiful supper which the housekeeper had provided.

"Well!" exclaimed Mike, after disembarassing himself of his greatcoat, and the thick worsted scarf twisted in numerous folds around his neck, "this looks comfortable. Quite as well we did not sup before leaving. I thought you would never have settled about those infernal sheep," he added; "but you sold them at last, and for an excellent price."

"Must attend to Sir Norman's interests," quietly observed his amiable twin; "it's a point of conscience with me: he trusts me with everything connected with the selling and purchasing of stock, and that makes me more particular."

"No doubt," muttered his brother, drily, "he has an excellent steward, and you as excellent a place."

This observation was accompanied by one of the speaker's very knowing winks, and a thrusting of the tongue into the cheek, familiarities which, under present circumstances, the upright, conscientious Mr. Silex did not feel himself called upon to resent.

"They fetched an awful long price," added the convict, alluding to the sheep.

"Pretty well."

"And all paid for on the nail?"

"I rarely give credit."

"I wonder you worn't afraid," continued his brother, musingly, "to return along the dark, lonely cross-roads, with so much money about you. It would have been dangerous in some parts I have been in."

"No doubt," muttered the steward; "but we have no highwaymen in this part of the country: besides, I am known to travel well armed. Then you were with me, and that was a protection. Thieves seldom venture to attack two resolute men like ourselves."

"Of course not," replied Mike. "Two is a protection: still it might a' happened."

"It might," and the steward at the same time mentally asked himself whether the protection alluded to had not, in reality, been a danger; for his brother's distinctions of meum and tuum were not over nice.

"When you have done settling about robbers and such nonsense," exclaimed Margaret, sharply, "perhaps you will sit down and get your suppers! I have waited long enough for you; more fool for my pains, seeing neither of you appear to have any appetite."

ANDREW SILEX GAINS SOME USEFUL INFORMATION ABOUT MIKE.

Mr. Silex silently drew his chair towards the table. However impatient of observation upon his habits, manners, and actions from others, it was observed that he always received those of the speaker in good part: he did not care to offend her.

"Haven't I an appetite!" said Mike, following his brother's example: "you shall see. Well, I declare! mushrooms! If there is anything I am fond on, it's them."

The woman, without indulging in any observation, proceeded to help them. The steward noticed that, in doing so, she carefully selected the ones she assisted his brother to from the right side of the dish.

It was a great risk they ran, seeing that the poisonous and wholesome esculents were placed together; but Andrew had every confidence in her tact.

"Capital!" exclaimed Mike, eating heartily.

"They are rather nice," said his brother, partaking of them very sparingly.

"You don't appear to enjoy them," observed the former, addressing the housekeeper; "perhaps they ain't a favourite dish of yours?"

"On the contrary," answered the woman, "I am exceedingly fond of them."

"Then allow me to assist you."

Without waiting for a reply the ex-convict seized hold of the spoon, stirred the contents of the dish well together, and, despite the assurances of the housekeeper and his brother, that they had sufficient on their plates, helped them each plentifully to wholesome and poisonous ones alike. It was an embarrassing position for his intended murderers, since not to eat would excite suspicion. Mr. Silex felt horror-struck, and cast an anxious glance towards his confederate, whose features never once changed. She was a person whose presence of mind seldom deserted her.

"Dear me!" she exclaimed, in the tone of a person who suddenly recollects something, "how stupid of me. I left the liquor standing on the table in the kitchen, and those lazy, greedy servants—"

The steward gave a dissatisfied umph.

"Never mind," said Mike, whose appetite, ravenous as it had been, was partially appeased; "I'll fetch it for you; don't stir, get your supper."

So saying he disappeared.

The instant they were alone, the woman darted to the sideboard, took from one of the recesses a flask of Florence oil, and emptied the contents into two tumblers, dividing the quantity it contained as nearly as she could guess into equal parts.

"Drink," she said, presenting one of the glasses to Andrew Silex; then without waiting for a reply, she drained the contents of the other.

"I shall be poisoned," whispered the steward.

"No."

"I tell you I shall."

"Drink as I have done, and you may eat with impunity," answered the housekeeper. "My father, who was one of the first herbalists in this part of the country, has told me so a hundred times. I have known him save the lives of a dozen persons, at least, who had been poisoned with mushrooms, with no other remedy. You will be quit for the fright and an hour or two's sickness."

Her confederate made a very wry face; for he felt no inclination for the draught, which he drained, however, to the last drop, then handed back the glass to her.

Just as she had replaced them both upon the sideboard, the ex-convict, returning from the kitchen with the liquor, stared.

"Dear me!" he exclaimed, "how pale you look."

This was addressed to his brother, whose countenance presented a ghastly appearance.

"He is faint," replied the woman: "he fasts too long. I have told him so a hundred times; but it is of no use. He would rather risk his health than spend a shilling."

"I must do my duty to my employer," observed Andrew, meekly.

"Well," said his brother, "you neither on ye look particularly bright. Suppose we try a toothful round. It'll do you good," he added, addressing himself more particularly to his twin.

The offer was accepted. All three partook of a glass of brandy, which had one good effect,—it repressed the nausea which the oil had created, and brought the colour once more to the cheeks of Andrew.

"There, I told yer so!" observed the convict.

"It certainly has done me good!" exclaimed the housekeeper, who acknowledged that she too had felt a little faint from waiting for her supper so long. "I declare my appetite has quite returned. A few more of the mushrooms, if you please?"

Mike helped her plentifully.

"Come, Mr. Silex," added the woman, "I'll assist you."

Without paying the slightest regard to the angry look which the steward gave her, the speaker proceeded to assist him in a similar manner; and then began to eat heartily, in order to encourage him. It was ludicrous to observe the contortions of the old man's features as he followed her example, uncertain whether or not the remedy, on which his confederate so confidently relied, might prove effectual.

"Well," murmured his brother, with a sigh of repletion, "I think I have had enough."

The steward pushed his plate from him; he thought so too; but the housekeeper, with a confidence which nothing could abate, quietly finished the contents of hers.

Although Andrew Silex proposed retiring at once to rest, under pretext that he had to rise early in the morning to attend to certain operations which were being carried on upon the farm, his brother was not to be persuaded. "He could never rest," he declared, "without his nightcap." Not a woollen or cotton one, as our readers in their simplicity might suppose—nothing of the kind; Mike's nightcap consisted neither more nor less than of sundry glasses of gin-and-water.

"Habit is second nature," he philosophically observed, as he mixed the first.

The steward remained upon thorns whilst Mike sat smoking and indulging in his potations. Never had the moments flung so lazily. At last, the usual number of libations having been swallowed, the ex-convict knocked the ashes from his pipe, and admitted that it really was time to go to bed.

Before separating, he shook hands with Andrew and the housekeeper, and, taking his candle from the table, withdrew.

For some minutes the confederates in crime sat regarding each other in silence: the man was the first to speak.

"A pretty scheme!" he observed.

The woman regarded him with an air of pity.

"I was a fool to listen to it," he continued. "It might have been done a dozen other ways, and quite as securely. Who knows but our own lives may pay the penalty of the attempt?"

"From the hands of justice?" demanded Margaret, disdainfully.

"No fear of that," observed her master; "but from having partaken of the accursed dish ourselves."

"You saw me eat of them?"

"I did," answered the steward, who appeared anything but satisfied with the assurance the question was intended to convey.

"And do you think that I am tired of life?"

"I don't exactly know whether you are or not; sometimes I imagine it to be a matter of indifference to you."

"It is not so yet."

There was a marked emphasis on the word "yet."

"What mean you?"

"That the time may come when death will be a welcome release," replied the housekeeper. "It would be so now could I but feel assured the dreams which haunt my pillow would not haunt me also in the grave. Do you never dream?" she added, fixing her dark eyes searchingly upon him.

"Never."

"You are fortunate."

"Or if I do, I forget them," added the old man, with affected indifference.

"It's a lie, Andrew Silex!" exclaimed the woman, sharply. "You do dream; and, what is more, mutter strange words, and groan in your sleep. You forget that your room is next to mine, that a thin partition alone divides them. I often wake up in the dead hours of the night, the cold damp upon my forehead, and trembling in every limb. Then it is I hear you, and know that our punishment, like our crime, is mutual. No, no," she continued, still more wildly, "heaven is too just to permit either of us to escape."

"Nothing of the kind, I tell you," answered her companion, angrily. "If you hear me groan, it is with the pains and cramps of age."

The housekeeper uttered a low, chuckling laugh.

"I feel half inclined," observed the speaker, who began to feel certain premonitory symptoms of an exceedingly unpleasant nature, "to send for Dr. Phrasé."

"It would be useless."

"Why so?"

"Because there is no danger. The remedy we have both taken is an infallible one. Sickness may, nay, will follow it, and pains rack our bodies, but I repeat, our lives are safe."

With this assurance they separated, each retiring to their respective apartments.

Mike had slept rather more than an hour, when a succession of violent spasms, which the great quantity of liquor he had taken for a while suppressed, woke him up. For the first few moments he could not recollect where he was, but imagined himself in his old cottage in the Belvedere-road, and began calling for Jack. The increasing intensity of his agony soon, however, brought him to perfect consciousness.

"Curse those mushrooms!" he muttered; "eat too many of them. I wish I had some brandy in the room. What a fool I was not to bring the bottle up stairs with me!"

He turned first on one side and then on the other, in the vain hope of stilling the pain or falling to sleep again, but sleep and ease both seemed to fly from him. His breath began to grow thick and heavy, and drops of perspiration, wrung from him by the pains he endured, stood thickly on his brow.

Suddenly he started from the bed, and impatiently struck a light.

"I must call them up," he groaned.

Before doing so, the ruffian contemplated his features in the glass. His countenance appeared wan; his eyes bloodshot, with a dark circle beneath them, as if he had received a violent blow; but what alarmed him most was a livid greenish hue upon his lips, and the almost irrepressible inclination he experienced to protrude his tongue from his mouth.

"Pisened!" he groaned, "pisened! and Andrew has done it—the cold-blooded, unnatural villain!—my own twin-brother, too! But I won't die alone."

Terror and anger gave him strength to partially dress himself. Catching up the light, he staggered rather than walked from the room, with the intention of reaching that of his unnatural relative. All his thoughts were of not dying unavenged.

As he approached the chamber-door, he saw a ray of light streaming through the crevices and key-hole.

"Watching, no doubt," he muttered.

A deep groan fell upon his ear.

"What is that?" he asked himself.

It was repeated, accompanied by a low, gurgling noise.

With one kick he burst open the door and entered the chamber. The sight that met his gaze was anything but the one he expected.

Andrew Silex lay extended on his bed, writhing in agonies similar to the ones his brother was enduring, and vomiting violently; his sufferings apparently exceeded those of Mike, whose sense of feeling had been in some measure deadened by the quantities of liquor he had taken, although his state was far more dangerous.

"What is it?" he demanded.

"Poisoned," groaned the guilty, terrified wretch; "those cursed mushrooms."

"That's it!" exclaimed the convict, at the same springing towards the bell and ringing it violently. "Your precious housekeeper has done for us both."

The farm servants who slept in the house were speedily alarmed and came running, half-dressed, into the room. Their master could only pronounce the words "Doctor Phrasé."

"Tell him we are pisened," roared Mike.

"The fool," thought the housekeeper, whose chamber was the adjoining one, and who consequently overheard every word that transpired: "both our sufferings will be useless."

Despite the agonies which she too endured, her courage had never deserted her, for she had the most perfect confidence in the antidote she had taken.

One of the men ran to the stable and saddled a horse to ride off for the village Æsculapius; another brought a bottle of brandy from the sideboard below, the ex-convict clutched it eagerly and drank nearly half its contents.

Meantime the steward continued to writhe with pain. "Hadh't 'ee better give measter some?" demanded the man.

"Is there any more in the house?" selfishly inquired the affectionate twin, whom the draught had considerably relieved by stilling for a moment the effects of the poison.

"Plenty below."

"Then bring him some. I shan't part with mine."

The man left the room to do so; and Mike, whose suspicions were now transferred from his brother to the housekeeper, quitted it also. Instead of finding her, as he expected, asleep and well, he discovered her, to his surprise, apparently in a still worse condition than her master—her body twisted with spasms; and yet, strange to say, such was her determination and self-control, that not a single cry had hitherto escaped from her livid lips.

"Accident, I suppose, arter all," thought the convict; and this consideration induced him to call to the servants for more brandy for her. As a matter of course, he never once thought of offering her any from the bottle in his hand: that he considered his own.

"Self-preservation is the first law of nature," had long been one of Mike's mottoes.

Long before the arrival of Doctor Phrase—whom the servant had informed of the cause of illness of the inmates of the Home Farm—the spasms which had awakened the intended victim from his sleep, had returned with redoubled force; and so great was their intensity, that he had fallen upon the floor in Andrew's room, writhing, cursing, groaning, and in this state had been reconveyed to his bed.

Although fond of displaying his learning, even to the most ignorant of his patients, Phrase could act energetically when necessity required it; and he did so in the present instance. Knowing the cause of illness, he had come provided with the proper remedies; and as Mike's case appeared to be the most pressing, he attended to him first, to the great disgust of the steward, who kept impatiently calling for him to come to his assistance.

"Mecaster be a dyin'," exclaimed the man who had ridden over for him. "Doctor, thee ought to look to us first, house-keeper next, and stranger last."

"Nothing of the kind," said the man of science; "they have both vomited and are comparatively safe."

With the assistance of two of the farm-men—for every person in the house was up—the speaker forced open the jaws of Mike, and succeeded in pouring a very powerful emetic down his throat: with the utmost difficulty it was swallowed.

"Now, then, show me to your master's room," said the doctor to one of the domestics; "I have done all in the power of science for his brother."

"Thee hast drenched us rarely," observed one of the countrymen, with a grin.

"Give him warm water every five minutes."

"Ees, I will."

"And call me the instant he vomits."

"The instant he what?" demanded the rustic, not comprehending the word.

"Is sick."

"All right, doctor."

Neither the housekeeper nor the steward required so violent a remedy as their intended victim; but Doctor Phrase was not the man to let escape the slightest opportunity of magnifying his talent and reputation. He pronounced both their cases to be desperate; and although, thanks to the woman's precautions, the process was scarcely necessary, insisted upon their swallowing a potion similar to the one he had administered to Mike.

By the following morning the most dangerous symptoms had disappeared; but all three of his patients continued exceedingly weak.

Never, in the whole course of his existence, had Mr. Sillex felt so deeply mortified; for the first time, his nerve and self-reliance had given way: he had fallen into his own snare. Had he remained firm, the deed might have been accomplished; above all, he dreaded the biting, sarcastic reproaches of the partner of his crime; and then the expense—the cost of burying his brother Mike would have been nothing in comparison to it.

"Narrow escape—very narrow escape," observed the doctor, as he sat by his bedside. "But at last, thanks to my presence of mind, I think I may promise you that you will be quit for the fright."

"You say nothing of the pain," growled the steward.

"Pain, my dear sir, is one of the symptoms we men of science distress ourselves the least about."

"Evidently."

"In the diagnoses of disease—"

"Curse the diagnoses!" muttered Andrew, impatiently. "I have endured a martyrdom, and all through—"

He paused: the word had nearly escaped him.

"The mushrooms, you would say," observed his medical attendant, finishing the sentence for him. "It only shows how exceedingly cautious persons ought to be in eating of them. Nothing more deceptive. Some are edible; others, as you know, are rank poisons."

Andrew Sillex did know it.

"I have serious ideas of publishing a work on fungi."

"On what?"

"By fungi we mean the mushroom tribe," replied the physician, "or, as the ancients designated them, 'the children of the earth,' to indicate the obscurity of their origin; poetical name, very! The moderns have been at a loss in what rank to place them; some referring them to the animal, some to the vegetable, others to the mineral kingdom. Wilcox and Minchhausen have not scrupled to include these bodies among animal productions. The former asserts that fungi consist of innumerable cavities, each inhabited by a polype."

"Pah!" muttered the sick man, impatiently, "nonsense."

"You are right, sir, quite right," continued the man of science; "the opinion is absurd—but not more so than the idea of those who place the fungi in the mineral kingdom because they are sometimes found growing on porous stones, thence called lapides fungarii, which must be covered, however, with a little earth, and be watered with tepid water to promote their growth."

"Trajus, king of Bankin, and even Columba attribute them to the superfluous humidity of rotten wood; even the learned Malphizi could not satisfy himself as to the existence of seeds which some botanists pretend to have discovered. As for Micheli—"

"Hang Micheli!" interrupted the steward; "what is the use of your stunning my ears with hard words, which neither of us understand?"

"Pardon my inveterate habit of indulging in the nomenclature of science," replied Dr. Phrase, rather mortified; "it is a weakness; but we are all the slaves of habit. In the work I propose to write, I should give infallible directions by which the edible and poisonous species may be distinguished, and accompany them by remarkable instances of cures; amongst which yours and your worthy brother's would be cited. Perhaps," he added, blandly, "you would like to subscribe to the publication, which will be given to the world by subscription."

Andrew Sillex rather unhandsomely remarked that he did not feel disposed to subscribe to anything. He had no use for books, he never had—not he.

During the several days that Mike kept his bed, he had ample time to turn over in his mind the whole affair. He was naturally of a suspicious nature, and, although he had seen his brother and his housekeeper apparently in a condition equally bad as his own had been, the idea would return to him that it was not altogether the effect of accident, and he determined, if possible, to confirm or dissipate his doubts upon the subject.

For this purpose he proposed to question Dr. Phrase on his next visit.

"Well, doctor," he said, "I wor mortal bad, for certain, but I suppose it be all over now?"

"Quite passed, my dear sir, quite—thanks to my presence of mind and, with all humility, professional skill; a most remarkable case: never saw three persons so near the point of death in all my life."

"Three persons," repeated the ex-convict, deliberately, at the same time fixing his searching gray eyes upon his countenance. "I think you said three?"

"Of course I did: yourself, your brother, and his housekeeper," replied the gentleman, with a bland smile.

"And all equally bad?"

"All."

"Then how is it that Andrew is up afore me?"

"Difference of constitution, my dear sir. Yours, not that I wish to alarm you, is infinitely the more delicate of the two."

"Well, I'm rayther delicate," observed his patient, complacently; "especially of a mornin's. I don't know how it is, but I can't eat of a mornin's. Can you account for it, doctor?"

The medical man hinted to him that his failing appetite might possibly be attributed to his drinking too much over-night. A habit which accounted also for his feeling the effect of the poisonous fungi so much longer and more severely than his brother did, whose valuable life, the speaker complacently added, he had been the happy means of preserving.

"Well, I suppose it is valuable," remarked Mike, whose ideas of value were of the pounds, shillings, and pence character. "How much do you suppose he is worth now? Of course it's between ourselves."

Dr. Phrase was a man far too prudent to hazard an opinion. All he knew was that the steward was reported to be rich, immensely rich; his late master had left him a considerable sum, which every year must have augmented, "for, as you are doubtless aware," he added, "he spends scarcely anything."

His brother was aware of it.

"Unless," added the speaker, "upon his family."

"That ain't much," growled the ex-convict.

"But has he no children?"

"None. I am his only relation; we are brothers—twins, and used to be reckoned uncommon like each other."

The physician mentally acknowledged that the likeness was painfully striking.

"Then, there is no doubt," continued the ruffian, "but the pisening was done by accident?"

"Of course. Who could have an interest in taking your life and that of your estimable relative?" demanded his astonished hearer.

"Them as expected to inherit his fortin," whispered his patient; "his housekeeper, for instance."

"But she suffered as much as either of you," objected the doctor; "believe me, my dear sir, that your suspicions are unfounded."

"Well, I s'pose they are," answered Mike, reluctantly, for he would have liked to have made something out of the affair.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Suspicion is crime's shadow, and It's fitting punishment.—OLD PLAY.

ALTHOUGH Mike had no good or valid reason to believe that the danger he had run of being poisoned had occurred otherwise than by accident, still he could not rid himself of a vague suspicion that design had something to do with it. He knew that his presence at the farm must be a perpetual annoyance, not only to his brother, but to the housekeeper, and, after due deliberation, he resolved once more to return to London.

"Who knows," he argued, "but another accident may happen, and not end so pleasantly as the first one did?" This was not the only painful impression on his mind. He had not forgotten the parting warning of his nephew Jack, whom he could not think of without certain misgivings. The boy might live to return to England, and, if he did, his uncle knew him quite well enough to feel assured that no consideration would induce the lad to forbear bringing him to justice, and, worse than all, that it was in his power to do so.

"How could I have been such an idiot?" he frequently demanded of himself whenever this unpleasant thought obtruded upon his mind, "as to talk on such matters with Fiddler Dick? I ought to have known that Jack slept like a fox—eyes and ears both open."

Then he would wonder whether his old pal would obtain a ticket of leave or not; and if Bet had succeeded in finding Lillian, whom he felt a desire once more to obtain possession of, especially as he had discovered the meaning of his brother when he declared that the child would one day be worth her weight in gold to him.

He had come to the conclusion that she should prove worth as much to him.

To speak the truth, his position at the farm was a most uncomfortable one. Never had he felt so lonely. The servants were all strictly forbidden to associate with him, and the inhabitants of St. Faith's—angry at the trick he had played in passing himself off as a stranger, and pumping them on the subject of the steward and their landlord—avoided him whenever he made his appearance in the place.

The precaution was a very natural one. They had no inclination to compromise themselves by expressing their opinions any further.

At meals Mike eyed everything most suspiciously; invariably declined being assisted to any but the simplest food; not even to that, till he had first seen his brother and the housekeeper partake of it. Frequently he revenged himself for this privation by throwing out hints of how necessary it was to be cautious, for fear of accidents.

Bitterly did Andrew curse himself for the failure of his scheme. And yet chance had more to do with it than his own weakness. To be sure, he might have contrived some excuse for sending the servants from the farm, but neither he nor his confederate had thought of that.

The ex-convict had packed up his things, and made all necessary inquiries respecting the departure of the coach for Tiverton, before he announced his intention of quitting the place to Andrew, who heard it with surprise not unmingled with satisfaction.

"Yes," said his relative, "I had better go. Mushroom time will soon be here again; and there's no knowing what might happen, you and your precious housekeeper bein' so particularly fond on 'em."

"No fear of that," observed the steward, wincing at the allusion. "Not one shall ever appear on my table again."

"And very right too," exclaimed the former; "especially if the same party gathers 'em."

"How could she make such a dreadful mistake!" said Andrew Sillex, wonderingly. "I shall never forget it, were I to live to be a hundred years old."

"Nor I," muttered Mike, emphatically.

"I have never been the same man since," added his brother. "I am sorry you have made up your mind to leave me. The place was dull enough before you came to it, but it will be a thousand times worse when you are gone."

"Can't help it; but somehow I have taken it into my head that I shouldn't have my health here—" and health is everything. We may still continue friends."

"Certainly," exclaimed the steward. "You will take something before you go?"

"Not a bite or a sup," ejaculated his brother, hastily.

Andrew noticed the tone, and still more the look that accompanied the words; and his conscience whispered him that he had better not press the offer any further.

"Good-by," he said, offering him his hand, "since you will go."

"It will be time enough to say good-by when we have settled," replied the ex-convict, coolly.

"Settled what?"

"You know."

"How should I?—do speak out!"

"You want me to speak out," replied Mike; "well, I will. Look yer, Andrew, although I says nothink about the pisening affair, I has my suspicions; but let them rest: you know that to oblige you I consented to part with my nephew Jack."

"What then?"

"The boy was of great use to me."

"As a thief!" exclaimed Andrew Silex, impatiently.

"That's nothink to do with it—he was of use to me. I've known the boy bring in as much as five counter a week; and who had a better right to it than myself? I brought him up from a pup,—clothed, fed, and educated him."

"Educated!"

"In my way," continued the ruffian, calmly, for he was resolved not to lose his advantage by getting out of temper. "As I said before, I consented to part with him to oblige you, and I naturally looks for compensation."

"Not a penny, not a farthing!" exclaimed the old man, passionately. "I'll not be robbed of my hard-earned savings; not that they are much, for I am poor."

"Very poor," said Mike, with a knowing wink.

"Is this your gratitude for my putting five hundred pounds in your way?"

"How much did it put in yours?"

"Not a penny."

The wink was repeated.

"Not a farthing," continued the speaker; "and I will not submit to your extortion. Fool! idiot that I was! ever to think or care about you."

"You forget that we are twins, Andrew," mildly observed his amiable brother; "and twins should never quarrel. I don't quarrel."

"But you do worse."

"How so?"

"You threaten."

"No—I don't threaten," replied his affectionate relative, mildly; "it's you who threaten me."

"I!" ejaculated Andrew, astonished at the impudence of the assertion.

"You," repeated his brother. "Don't yer threaten to deny me my rights? to force me to go the nearest magistrate—Mr. Thornton, I think, is the gentleman's name, and a very worthy gentleman, by all accounts, I hear he is—and tell him all I know about Lady Boothroyd and Lillian?"

"You dare not do that—you know that you murdered her," retorted his hearer.

"The stificate, Andrew—you forget the stificate," answered Mike, composedly. "I won't such a fool; for once I acted on your plan—prudently. I can defy you there."

"No one will believe you," observed the steward.

"You are a returned convict."

"That won't disgrace me, I reckon," observed the former.

"And have lived on Jack's robberies for years."

"You must find Jack to prove that," said his brother. "But why make all this bother," he added, "when you know as well as I do that you must come to book at last? I'll be reasonable with you."

"Reasonable!"

"I only ask a hundred a year; you can well afford it."

"Can I?" muttered his relative, pale with rage, for the coolness of the speaker annoyed him, if possible, more even than the thought of parting with his money.

"You had better think of it," continued the speaker. "Of course, if things had been agreeable here, and I had found the place likely to agree with my health, I should never have asked it; and good reason for why—I shouldn't have required it. As it is, I can't do with less. You can charge it in your accounts. A hundred a year, more or less, won't signify to her ladyship; but it makes a vast difference to me."

There was an obvious truth in the reflection which struck Mr. Andrew, whose faculties were, generally speaking, exceedingly obtuse where parting with his own money was in question. Lady Boothroyd, he well knew, avaricious though she might be, would rather sacrifice a much larger sum than the affair should be exposed.

"I'll think of it," said the steward.

"That's right; I'll give you five minutes," said Mike, pulling out his watch, and regarding the time.

"I must have longer."

"How much longer?"

"As many days," replied Andrew Silex.

"And do you think," demanded his brother, "after the particular and affectionate nature of our conversation, that I am such a fool as to wait for your answer here? No, no."

"I'll bring it to you," said Andrew.

"Where?"

"To your house in London," replied the avaricious wretch. "I must see Lady Boothroyd. It was an evil hour in which I trusted you. If I can procure the money for you, I will, but not from my own means. I would rot in a prison, starve, before I consented to be so plundered."

"Starve!" repeated Mike, in an ironical tone.

"Did you ever try it?"

"No."

"I have then, and can tell you it ain't by no means pleasant; but I don't intend to starve again, and it's most unnatural of you to wish me. As to your seeing Lady Boothroyd, there's no objection to that. It's all the same to me," added the speaker, in a philosophical tone, "where the money comes from, provided I gets it."

"You're a great villain."

"We are twins, Andrew," was the reply.

It was finally arranged between the two speakers, who were so well worthy to encounter each other, that the steward should visit Mike in London, at the expiration of a week—matters, he urged, could scarcely be arranged in a shorter time—and give him a definite answer; but not at the cottage in the Belvedere-road. The convict informed him that he had ceased to tenant it, having found it so dull and lonely since the departure of Jack and the death of Lillian. They were to meet at "The Keys," in the Mint.

"Remorse," observed the steward.

"Rubbish," replied his brother: "you don't believe in nothink of the kind."

And with this expression of opinion they separated; the last speaker to return to town at once, for he declined passing another night at the Home Farm.

As the coach—one of the few remaining ones upon the road—conveyed him from St. Faith's to Tiverton, where he was to take the train, Mike mentally congratulated himself upon his success, which, independent of the pecuniary advantages which it promised him, was doubly gratifying to him as a triumph over his brother, whom he had always envied.

"I was right," he thought, as the vehicle drove rapidly through the village; "the girl is likely to prove worth her weight in gold to me as well as to Andrew. I wonder," he added, musingly, "how much he would make of her if he knew all that I could tell him? Tell him!" he repeated: "no, no,—catch me at that—not such a flat as that! He'd promise me halves, and do me, as he did before, out of my share: but I've nicked him this time at any rate!"

Here the amiable speaker, chuckling with delight, threw himself back in the coach, and fell into a profound reverie—from a reverie into sleep, in which he dreamt of his nephew Jack.

Could Mike have seen the fiend-like look, the glance of concentrated hate which Andrew Silex sent after him, he would not have felt quite so assured, perhaps, of his victory over his wealthy brother. The fact was, that the steward was never so really dangerous as when driven into a corner, and to all appearance defeated. On such occasions he gathered all his energies for the task, and rushed to the encounter with a spirit and system of tactics peculiarly his own.

"A hundred a year!" he muttered to himself; "moderate! exceedingly moderate! I wonder he did not ask two. He might have done so just as well when about it. He thinks to terrify me—terrify me," he repeated, with a low chuckle, "who have slept for the last twenty years with the hand of justice suspended over me, and the hangman's rope waiting, as it were, to encircle my neck! Let me see—let me see."

The speaker had two means of proceeding to baffle what he considered the unprincipled attempt of his brother to wrest from him a portion of his dearly earned gold; the first was by discovering what Jack meant by the threat he held out of hanging him if ever he returned to England. He had not forgot either that or the allusion to Fiddler Dick.

"I must see that man," he said.

The next, to proceed at once to Lady Boothroyd, impart the danger and difficulty of their mutual position to her, and see if through her brother-in-law's influence—the noble earl had long filled the office of Secretary of State for the Home Department—some means might not be contrived of getting Mike out of the way.

Legally of course.

Andrew Silex was for doing everything in a legal, or at any rate in a secure manner. Like his brother, he had an objection to great risks; the affair of the mushrooms being an exception to his system of tactics.

Many persons would have considered a week an inconceivably short space of time to have accomplished all this; but Andrew was a man of genius. Whenever his mind was made up, there were no after considerations or hesitations about him. His decisions might be hastily formed or not, but he adhered to them, and he was consistent—no inconsiderable advantage when a battle is to be lost or won.

He started for London by the next coach; and, on his arrival at the metropolis, directed his way to one of his old haunts. It was years since he had frequented it—a house of call for thieves and pick-pockets, in the neighbourhood of Houndsditch. Here, by indirect inquiries, and the disbursement of a few shillings, judiciously spent in treating the inmates, he succeeded at last in discovering the whereabouts of Fiddler Dick, who, as our readers are aware, had been sentenced to four years' penal servitude, for picking pockets at Southampton.

"In gaol," he mentally repeated: "good; it will answer my purpose better. Your gaol-bird will chatter from mere weariness." Speaking aloud, he asked what had become of Dick's wife.

"Oh, she is with Dexter, his partner," replied his informant.

"No, she ain't," exclaimed a female who was standing near. "Dexter wouldn't have anything to do with her, though they both sold Dick to the police."

"Shocking!" observed the steward; "split on a pal!"

"Well, it was rayther un'ansome," replied the man; "but then, Dick had an awful hasty temper: it was only a word and blow—frequently the blow came fast; and Bet, you know—of course you know Bet?"

"Yes, yes! pray proceed."

"Well, Bet is an uncommon fine 'oman, and wouldn't stand it no longer. The consarn was originally hers."

"What concern?"

"Why the dancing children."

This was fresh information to Mr. Silex. "Fiddler Dick kept dancing children, did he? Umph!" It was remarkable; and he began to entertain a shrewd suspicion that he might eventually obtain some clue to the fate of Lillian,—for he felt anything but convinced of her death.

On his quitting the house, the man whose brains he had been pumping looked after Mr. Andrew Silex for several minutes in silence.

"I don't think he is one of the regulars," he muttered, half aloud.

"Who are you speaking of?" demanded the landlord, a bear-eyed old man, whose white hair ought to have inspired respect, but whose rascally expression of countenance, joined to the evident signs of intemperance traceable in every feature, only excited disgust. "Who isn't one of the regulars?"

"The cove that's just left."

"But he has been."

"Do you know him?"

"I should think I do," replied the landlord.

"Bless you, I know every one in, or who ever has been in the profession. He is getting old, too, but I can name the time when his hair was as black as yours, and his arms as strong. For the matter of that, I wouldn't swear that they are not so now."

"What's his name?"

"You had better let him alone," muttered the landlord.

"Only his name," repeated the man, offering him a glass of liquor.

There was no resisting the attraction. The host of the house tossed it off, and whispered it in the ear of the speaker.

"Bless me!" exclaimed the fellow; "Mike's twin brother. I've heard him speak of him a thousand times."

Catching up his hat, the speaker quitted the house and walked hastily till he overtook the respectable Mr. Andrew Sillex, whom he touched familiarly upon the shoulder. The steward turned round and regarded him resolutely.

"What would you with me?" he demanded.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said the man, "but you have been asking me a great many questions about Fiddler Dick."

"What then? I paid for the information you gave me."

"Answery, sir," replied the former. "I ain't a denying it. But if I knew what you wanted him for—really for—p'raps I could answer your purpose as well."

"I think not."

"Shall I guess it?" demanded the man, with a knowing smile.

"If you please."

"Well, then, you want to learn something about your brother, who was transported at the same 'sized with Dick. I remember the time well, for my misfortune happened to me in the same year."

"Your misfortune!"

"Yes," replied the thief, unblushingly. "I was transported too, but only for fifteen years; Mike got his for life."

This was what had so puzzled his affectionate twin-brother. He had always understood such to be the case, but never ascertained the fact correctly. Mike had invariably denied it to him.

"For life!" he deliberately repeated. "Are you sure of it?"

"Certain."

"How comes it he is back, then?"

"Ticket of leave."

"And not a free pardon?" exclaimed the steward, eagerly.

"Only a ticket of leave," repeated the man.

"Which may be recalled," thought Andrew, with a chuckle, "and which shall be recalled, if Lady Boothroyd has any influence with her noble brother-in-law." So delighted did he feel with the information he had thus unexpectedly acquired, that he thrust a sovereign into the palm of the ex-transport, and renewed his walk.

At the expiration of the week, Mike, punctual as any man would be who expected to get a hundred a year by his punctuality, presented himself at The Keys in the Mint. The house, we are happy to say, no longer exists, for a greater den of crime never polluted the metropolis of any country. It had accommodation for all sorts of characters—men with gold in their pockets and ragged rascals with only a few coppers.

In expectation of his brother's arrival, Mike had asked for a private room; business could not well be talked over in a public one. The ruffian was making himself comfortable over his second glass of gin-and-water when Andrew Sillex made his appearance. There was a quiet, half-satisfied smile upon his countenance, which rather alarmed the susceptible feelings of his twin, who had much rather have seen it dark and gloomy.

"You are come at last," he said. "I have been waiting for you."

"I have been as punctual as possible," replied the steward, blandly. "But business like ours is not arranged in a moment."

"That's true."

"A great deal to think about."

"And have you thought of it?" demanded the ex-convict, emphatically; for there was something in the very placid manner of the speaker that annoyed him. Once or twice he thought of Lillian, but speedily dismissed the idea. There could be no danger, he considered, in that quarter. The certificate made all right.

"Of course I have thought of it, Mike," was the reply.

"And seen her ladyship?"

"And seen her ladyship," repeated his relative, with an ill-concealed chuckle.

"And what does she say? I ain't to be trifled with."

"She has no intention to trifle with you," said his brother, seriously. "And the proof is that she has sent two persons to arrange the annuity with you."

"Lawyers, I suppose?" muttered Mike.

"Not exactly lawyers, but in the law."

Andrew Sillex gave a signal, and two well-dressed men made their appearance. Before the ex-convict could reckon them up, one of them adroitly slipped a pair of handcuffs over his wrists.

"What is this for?" demanded the ruffian.

"Returned convict," replied the officer.

"But I have a ticket of leave."

"It's cancelled."

"Yes, Mike," said the steward; "you made a bad use of your liberty, and to prevent a repetition of crime, the Secretary of State has given orders that you should serve out the rest of your time."

"The rest of my time!" repeated his brother.

"Why it is for life."

"I know it is," answered the affectionate twin, "and I trust that you may be spared many years to repent the disgrace you have brought upon your name and family."

"For life!" repeated the astonished prisoner; "think of that."

"I have thought of it," said the steward, meekly. "And I bless providence that it has enabled me to provide you with the means of atoning your past crimes."

"Hypocrite!" said Mike, "cold-blooded, rascally hypocrite."

Andrew Sillex raised his eyes, as if mentally wondering at the extent of human depravity.

"He is worse than I am," continued the speaker, addressing himself to the officers. "Why, it is little more than a year since he brought me a child—to murder."

"And did you murder it?" inquired his brother, carelessly.

The persecutor of poor Lillian regarded him with looks of deadly hate and impotent rage, which only provoked a smile from his amiable twin.

"It is your turn now," observed the convict, bitterly; "but the luck may change."

"Scarcely, Mike, scarcely," replied the steward; "the game is now nearly played out."

"Jack may return."

This last suggestion gave his respectable uncle a slight feeling of uneasiness, but he quickly dismissed it, as an improbable contingency.

In less than a week Mike was removed to the hulks at Woolwich. His resolution of not running any great risk had failed to save him: a very small one, to a man of broken character, proved sufficient.

The first person he recognised was his former pal, Fiddler Dick. They shook hands in mournful silence, which the mountebank was the first to break.

"How long?" he inquired.

"Life," groaned the convict. "And you?"

"Four years more."

As the speaker said this his eyes flashed fearfully, accompanied by the drawing down of the corners of his mouth.

Doubtless he thought of Bet.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

MUTUAL IMPROVEMENT.

The institution of Mutual Improvement Associations affords opportunities for acquiring and imparting knowledge which can scarcely be too highly valued, or too strongly recommended to the young.

A mutual instruction association is a help one another society, and the principle on which it is thus founded is sound and good.

Important as it is to help ourselves, to rely on our own exertions, it is equally important that we should avail ourselves of every means conducive to our moral and intellectual progress. Association—the free interchange of thought and feeling—is most likely to aid us in this pursuit. Therefore it should not be neglected. Besides this, it is as incumbent on us to help others as it is to help ourselves. No moral character is complete with the element of beneficence left out of its composition. To get knowledge and to give knowledge have corresponding claims on our ability. On this account, therefore, mutual instruction societies appeal for our help.

There is much more accomplished by such institutions than people are sometimes willing to admit. They are captious, cynical, or censorious about the young men who meet once or twice a week to discuss some topic, or read a valuable work, or deliver an original essay or lecture. But these young men, though their circumstances in life may be humble, their attainments small, their numbers few, are engaged in a right good work. They are improving one another. Diamonds are only to be polished with diamond dust. Intellect is only to be sharpened by intellect. Though these young men attain to no celebrity, their minds are enlarged by their meetings, and society reaps the benefit.

Let us suppose a young man, who cares nothing for reading or any description of intellectual exertion, is induced to attend one of the meetings of a mutual improvement society. He finds a number of men about his own age discussing the merits of some author, or the advantage of some social or political scheme, or the characteristics of some historical personage. He cannot choose but hear. Novelty has a wonderful attraction. The visitor hears things uttered he never heard of before. He finds his companions freely and intelligently discussing questions of which he knows nothing. A desire to become acquainted with these things is excited within him. He feels his inferiority. That is the sort of thing few people like to feel. Ambition is aroused, and, as long as ambition is honestly directed, it is highly laudable. When he comes away, he thinks over what he has heard. His mental machinery is in motion. The first step towards knowledge is to think. When a man once begins to think, who can predicate the result. Though at first, perhaps, he thinks very erroneously, the habit of thought in time corrects itself. As the desire for knowledge increases, his interest in less noble pursuits decreases proportionately. He loses his sympathy for his old associations. To supply the thirst for knowledge costs some money. The money which found its way to the tavern or the cigar divan is expended in books. And such an instance as we have thus supposed is by no means apocryphal. Many such cases have occurred. We feel sure the experience of many of our readers must tell them so. They who never felt any interest in private study had emulation excited within them at a mutual instruction class; and the result is, that society has another thinking, intelligent, active member,—a man instead of a clod.

One of the peculiar advantages of mutual instruction societies is that we learn the value of union. It is patent to the commonest understanding that much every way is gained by union—that union is strength, and that in the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom. But nowhere is this idea more forcibly impressed on the mind than in the mutual instruction society.

We are told that there are no two blades of grass precisely alike; and it is equally true that there are no two minds precisely similar. And this is a decided advantage. In considering any topic, social, religious, political, historical, we look at it under a somewhat different aspect, and our information about it is in some degree different from that of others. If we are all agreed as to the main principle—all satisfied as to the truth of an assertion—our mode of arriving at this certainty is extremely various, and the thoughts which are thrown out—seed-thoughts broadcast—produce a goodly crop.

In this light a mutual instruction society is a sort of intellectual picnic party, to which everybody brings something, and all are welcome to partake; and where the sweetmeats of pleasantry and the condiments of wit are no less welcome than the substantial viands or the solid bread of plain facts. Argument is wanted, and if it is spiced by humour or made savoury by wit, so much the better; while courtesy in the serving out is indispensable to comfort.

The subjects admissible at a mutual instruction society, as well as the regulations for its management, vary, of course, according to the taste of the members. As to the subjects, in some societies all political topics are shut out, as well as all religious controversies. This may be judicious in some particular cases; but, as religion and politics are in themselves so absorbing in interest, it is to be questioned whether so jealous a guardianship is not too restrictive. But this is a matter for the members of the society themselves to decide. It may be useful, however, to indicate one or two general principles as a guide for the selection of appropriate topics.

is to be borne in mind in deciding on topics for essays or discussions. It is useless to waste ability on a question of no importance,—such as, What song the Syrens sang—How did Shakespeare spell his name?—What was the name of David's mother?—subjects analogous to which we have sometimes seen in the syllabus of young men's societies. It is somewhat absurd to notice the amount of enthusiasm, the frenzied eloquence, occasionally got up on a subject which does not signify two straws to any man, woman, or child on the face of the earth. It is a waste of time and talent, and should never be allowed. Let the subjects be of real importance—either in practical life, or in throwing light on some disputed question.

GENERAL INTEREST

is another thing that has to be considered. There are many questions of real importance, totally destitute of general interest. Such topics should not be chosen. We should rather have those which, even supposing them to be of minor importance, are most calculated to interest the majority. Jeremy Bentham's maxim for good government is applicable to the regulation of a mutual instruction society, namely, the greatest happiness of the greatest number.

ADMISSIBLE SUBJECTS.

All subjects inoffensive to morality are appropriate. Of course, some are more so than others, but in our mutual instruction societies we should admit all kinds of literature, science, and art that we can get. We are all of us too prone to write up against certain topics "No admission." Let us be free. And this leads me to notice that we are sometimes apt, in our search after knowledge, to fall into the error of supposing that we must concentrate our energies on one object. Such an idea as this is very far from the truth, and ought to be discouraged. We cannot spend our lives over one leaf of the Eden tree. It is only petty minds that do so. Such a man was that pedant who had devoted his whole life to the study of a single mineral, and who owns he had not ascertained a hundredth part of its properties. These men are superficial, these men are truly frivolous. "The statesman who wrote the 'Prince' wrote also comedies and a novel, a treatise on the military art, and poetry without end. Göthe was a botanist as well as a poet and philosopher. Shakespeare seems, by the profuse allusions, 'enamelling with pyed flowers his thoughts of gold,' to have diligently learnt all that his age permitted. And Bacon, the Shakespeare of philosophy, with the same pen with which he destroyed the Aristotelianism of the schoolmen, wrote a treatise on the law, the translation of a Psalm, an essay on plantations, and a cure for the gout!"

MEANS EMPLOYED.

Here I may be allowed to offer a few remarks on the MEANS adopted by mutual instruction societies to attain the object which they have in view.

These means are usually lectures, essays, readings, and discussions.

LECTURING.

Lecturing is an old-fashioned way of getting knowledge. The tongue was as the pen of a ready writer, long before writers, ready or slow, were thought of. The philosophers of old collected their pupils and taught them by lectures—spoken addresses—the philosophy of their systems. Eye to eye, face to face, the master instructed his followers. The old sages had no Hamiltonian method, by which a disciple learned history, ethics, and language, in ten days or a fortnight. And so they lectured, kept on lecturing, and never left off lecturing. Our own Druids never committed any precept to writing, but they lectured, and had an almost inexhaustible theme in their 30,000 verses to lecture about. Lectures went out of fashion at one time, except among the élite. They were confined to the aristocracy of letters. But they have been brought into fashion again, and are now a highly popular form of instruction. And there is something in the living voice that stirs the heart like a trumpet. A speaker swaying the passions of a multitude, absorbing the attention of a crowd, is a grand sight; and there can be little doubt that the effect on the majority of hearers of a good lecture, well delivered, is more impressive than the reading of the same lecture in the closet. We are all more or less enthusiastic; enthusiasm excites the latent heat of our hearts: thus heated—like red-hot iron—we are then more easily welded and shaped.

READINGS.

A book is a marvellous production. The making visible the invisible, by certain marks, is so common—common as water and light—that we underrate it sometimes. It is more marvellous than speech. Your voice is feeble—the thoughts you desire to communicate must, in many cases, for ever remain unuttered but for writing. With alphabetic characters, you press your thoughts on paper, and send them sixteen thousand miles away—more—you may speak to sixteen generations of mankind. Ubiquity and immortality are comprised at once.

Bless the man, says Sancho Panza, who invented sleep! Bless the man, say I, who invented books. What delightful companions! Southey has sung:—

"My days among the dead are past;
Around me I behold
The lofty men of days gone by,
The mighty minds of old."

We should have all sorts of reading—old books and new books, law, history, divinity, facts, fiction, politics, anything, everything. No matter what the subject is, it is a good thing to read. The man who can read has the key of knowledge in his own hand—the alphabet is the "open sesame" to truth of all sorts.

DISCUSSIONS OR CONVERSATIONS are highly advantageous. One is very apt to be blind of an eye on moral and intellectual points—that is, we take only one view of a subject or a preacher; read his writings, and listen to his lectures only who agree with us. If the writer, or preacher, or lecturer says "Volo" when we say "Volo," and "Nolo" when we say "Nolo," we wag our heads sagaciously, and remark, "This man has a well-balanced mind." Now, in discussions, we are forced to hear another side of the question. How many people there are in the world who are ignorant of the objections which are to be urged against their favourite theories, and who are therefore surprised that any one should be of a doubtful mind! To talk, as some do, of the age of faith being gone, is utterly a mistake. How many of us go on quoting and repeating fallacies and never doubting them because we have been told they were true! There is so much spurious coinage about—coinage which looks very like lawful money—that it becomes everybody to put it to the test. Now, in discussion you must do it. You must make sure that the piece of intellectual coinage you proffer is really good: for it won't be accepted in faith—it will be tried. If it be spurious it will bend and double up, and you yourself stand in a very invidious position.

WRITING.

Writing original essays, and submitting them to the ordeal of criticism, is another important feature of a mutual instruction society.

One great advantage of writing is certainly this—that, in most cases, our ideas are more clearly developed than when they are unwritten. I think it a wonderful advantage to a man to put his thoughts into shape—to write them down—to look at them in words—written words, and to see whether or not they are as sound and good as when they were but notions unincorporated. I think it excellent to write down one's ideas about a book—to give expression to the feelings and sentiments which the book has aroused; and not to be content with a dreamy notion that the book is a good one or a bad one, as the case may be. I would advise everybody to practise literature; not to become authors in the technical sense of the word, and figure in printers' ink upon rag paper, in prose or poetry, as the case may be—but to study English composition so carefully that they may be capable of expressing their ideas in a correct and intelligible manner; for the fact is that the grossest blunders are committed by the most respectable people, and that those who have received education at academies of unimpeachable reputation, and who move in good society, in too many cases seem fitter to pen sheep than to pen paragraphs.

In forming a mutual instruction society we endeavour to get more and to give more than we could by any other means. First—

TO GET MORE.

The desire to know is strong within us. A certain Greek writer tells us of some man who, in order to save his bees a troublesome journey to Hymettus, cut their wings and placed before them the finest flowers he could select. The poor bees made no honey. Now, in resolving to get more we seek no facile Hamiltonian methods; we resolve to seek our own flowers, to collect their sweetness, and to manufacture honey for ourselves; for, depend upon it, the man who only seeks to gain the easy, ready way of obtaining a smattering will never be worth anything in the end. To be great and to be useful, a man must work—wrestle with hard thoughts and bring into captivity mighty ideas. In resolving to get more we make up our minds to do battle with shallow, headstrong theorists; not, as some one says, to dread the ill-omened flight of philosophy and fancy athwart the good old way, not turning back in dismay at the sight of three magpies. In resolving to get more, we determine to break the chain of credulity, diffidence, cowardice, imitation, systematic education, reverence of literary authorities and established opinions—we resolve to break out of the Castle of Indolence.

TO GIVE MORE.

In resolving to get more we have a purpose in view—to give more. The desire to know and the desire to communicate are the true gemini that bless the world.

"Truth," says Neander, "is designed for all men; and he who serves truth works for all men. What is true and good is no man's own, no man's exclusive gift or privilege; it comes from the Father of Lights, the Giver of every good gift, who lends it to us for the use of all."

"Philosophy, baptised
In the pure waters of eternal love,
Has eyes indeed, and viewing all she sees
As meant to indicate a God to man,
Gives Him the praise, and forfeits not her own."

We meet to get knowledge, to think, and to feel; we are diversified in the method, but the same in the purpose. From the world of science, with its great and wonderful revelations—from history, with its strange and marvellous details—from poetry, with its floating and delicious music—from philosophy, soothing the reason while it damps the ambition—and from the Book of God, through which, as through a window, we can look up and discern our celestial home.

A noble object is that of the Mutual Instruction Society. A grand theme is that which it suggests; a theme which finds its mottoes in these two moral axioms: KNOWLEDGE IS POWER—UNION IS STRENGTH.

GLENMOIL.

BY GLENTAMMON.

GLENMOIL (pronounced Glenmay) is a beautiful little spot near Peel, in the Isle of Man. There is a legend respecting it, which is something like the following: "When sin first came on earth the fairies were compelled to return to fairy-land, and a curse was pronounced against those who again visited earth. Now it happened one of the fairies had fallen in love with a young woman during his sojourn in Glenmoil, which, by the way, was their favourite haunt; so that he braved the curse and came back. The young lady died; the curse fell upon him, doomed to wander here alone and for ever; he lost his own form, and took up a most hideous one, his only solace being to scatter flowers on his lady-love's grave, and sing songs in the beloved glen of the fairies." The following is supposed to be one of them. Another legend is, that "when the fairies left the glen, they blessed it, and if lovers plight their troth there, the vow can never be broken."

How dearly we love thee, thou lonely Glenmoil!

With thy carpet of verdure and beautiful flowers;
Where at midnight our legions delighted to stray
And weave their bright spells in thy mystical bowers.
By the brook-side we met, when the beams of the sun
From the glad-colour'd west were fast fleeing away,
And the pale stars look'd down as they rose one by one,
Smiling sweetly, but sadly, on lonely Glenmoil.

Then the night pass'd in revel, and on the green sward
In the gay dance we gather'd a beauteous throng;
Or we heard the proud strains of our own fairy bard,
And with golden harps trill'd to the air of his song.
But the time has gone by, and no more shall we tread
In the haunts which are lit by the moon's silver ray;
Yet how fondly we think of the hours that are fled,
And we hallow the memory of lonely Glenmoil.

For the charm we breathed o'er it for ever shall dwell
Like the glory that hangs round the mouldering pile;
And the waterfall murmurs shall constantly tell
Of the wonders we worked in our loved ocean isle.
They are gone like a dream, but remembrance will cling
In pleasure and pain to the things pass'd away,
And Time cannot ravage with ruthless wing
That bright heaven upon earth, our lost, lonely Glenmoil!

A MOUNTAIN ADVENTURE.

WHILE stopping in Florence, at the "Casa del Bello," my companion and guide was James L. Grover, an American painter of some note, whom I had known well in the land of his nativity. It was Sunday evening, and on the following day I was to start for Bologna. Grover and myself sat upon one of the balconies of our chamber, engaged in conversation over our cigars, and after we had talked awhile of the various things we had seen during the day, he asked me if he had ever told me of his adventure upon the Apennines. I told him I had never heard it.

"Then I must tell it to you," he said, throwing away his cigar, and taking a sip of wine.

I lighted a fresh cigar, and he related to me as follows:—

"Four years ago this summer my brother and two sisters visited me here in Florence. They spent two weeks with me, and then started for Venice, by the way of Bologna, where they had friends whom they were anxious to see. I should have gone with them had I not been engaged upon a work which I had promised to have done within a given time; but, as it was, we made the thing work very well, for my brother expected two thousand dollars by the hands of a friend who was shortly expected from Rome, and it was arranged that I should take the money when it came, and bring it with me to Venice when I got ready to meet them there. My brother left the necessary document for the obtaining of the money, and in due time set out.

"On the very next day I was taken ill, and was confined to my bed a week, but I got out and finished my work just as the friend arrived from Rome with the money. He delivered it into my hands upon the production of my brother's written instructions, and I set the next Monday as the day on which I would start. I was really not fit to undertake such a journey, but I could not miss seeing my sisters once more before they returned home. I could have sent the money easy enough; but I had promised myself too much pleasure with my dear relatives in Venice to miss it now.

"Monday morning came, and I could not arise from my bed without assistance. A sort of neuralgic affection had seized all my nerves, and I was forced to stay in doors, and resort to hot baths and medicine. But on the following morning I felt able to start, and I did so. Upon reaching Pistoja I learned that there was no diligence to leave before the next day. I could not stand this. I was already behind my time, and, if the thing could be accomplished, I must go on. There was a diligence under the shed, but no one to drive it. 'But can't we hire some one?' I asked. 'If signor will pay,' was the laconic reply. Of course I would pay; and though the sum charged was a pretty round one, yet I did not hesitate. The lumbering vehicle was dragged out; four miserable looking horses were attached, and then a yoke of stout oxen hitched on ahead of them. Two rough-looking fellows were provided, one as a vetturino (postillion), and the other to drive the oxen. Thus provided, I took my seat, and the diligence started.

"We were to cross the Apennines by the Pass of La Collina, and had just begun to ascend the rugged mountain path when I heard a loud hallooing behind, and in a moment the diligence stopped.

"What's the matter?" I asked poking my head out through the opening by my side.

"Two men want to ride," returned the vetturino.

"But I have hired the diligence, and am in a hurry; so drive on. If they wish to ride they must wait until to-morrow."

"But the drivers were not to be governed thus.

"It won't make a bit of difference," they said. "We'll go just as fast; and besides, they'll pay us something."

"By this time the cause of all the trouble made its appearance in the shape of two dark-visaged, black-bearded, powerful men, who looked ugly enough for the incarnation of Murder. I recognised one of them as a fellow whom I had seen hanging about the hotel at Florence, and the other I was confident I had caught a glimpse of just as the diligence left the yard at Pistoja.

"I was upon the point of speaking when the thought occurred to me that I had better keep my knowledge of the Italian language to myself. I might find out the character of the fellows thus. I knew very well that further remonstrance would be useless, for the drivers were stupidly hoggish, and the new applicants were clearly not men to be argued with. The door was opened, and the fellows entered. I occupied the back seat, and they took the seat at the other end, fixing themselves so as to face me. They looked at me out of wicked eyes, and as they threw back their short cloaks I saw that they were well armed.

"Hope we don't trouble you?" said one of them, in coarse Italian, as the diligence started on.

"I gazed inquiringly into his face, but made no reply."

"He repeated the remark.

"No comprehend, signor," I said, shaking my head.

"Ah—English," he suggested, with a shrug of his shoulders.

"No—Irish," I told him.

"Ugh!" he grunted, with another shrug of the broad, massive shoulders, and an awful scowl of the face.

"We had now begun to ascend the mountain in good earnest, and our pace was slow and lumbering. The fellow who drove the oxen made noise enough for an army, while the blows upon both oxen and horses fell hard and thick, but without accomplishing anything. Had I been alone I might have enjoyed the magnificent scenery which unfolded itself below us as we crept up the Collina; but as it was I could not think of anything save the two men who had forced themselves upon me. Pretty soon one of them spoke, and though I appeared not to notice them, yet I could see that they were watching me closely.

"Death and destruction!" he uttered, in his own tongue, "we shall be over the precipice if that drunken driver is not careful!"

"I read the fellow's purpose in a moment, and not a movement betrayed my understanding of what he had said. My eyes were half closed, and to all appearance I was unconscious even of their presence.

"He's right. He don't understand us," said one of them.

"All safe," returned the other.

"After this they conversed together quite freely, and I was not long in having my worst fears realised. But not a change could they detect in my countenance. I kept my knowledge as secret as the very grave, and all my feeling was within me. After awhile they became satisfied that I knew nothing of their language, and they became more bold in their speech, and talked their plan all over; and from them I learned the following highly interesting particulars:—

"The one whom I had seen in Florence had by some means learned that I was to carry quite a large sum of money with me across the mountains, and he had come on to Pistoja, where his confederate was, to await my arrival, intending to rob me there, if possible. But when they found that I was to go alone in the diligence, they had a better plan. They would rob me on the mountain. The two drivers were friends of theirs, and were to be paid liberally for allowing themselves to be overcome. The villains talked about cutting my throat, shooting me through the head, or plunging a knife to my heart, and then throwing me over the precipice, as coolly as though they had been planning the death of a fowl for dinner! The place where they were to murder me was about a mile distant, where the road wound round a high crag, with an almost perpendicular wall of rock upon one hand, and a deep chasm on the other.

"This was an interesting position, sure enough. I was weak—weak at best—but doubly weak now with my illness—and the only weapon I had was a single pistol. Either of the brigands could have thrown me over his head with ease, and as for fighting with them, that was out of the question. What could I do? Both the drivers were in league with them. If I leaped from the diligence, I should die on the spot where I landed. If I shot one of the bandits, the other would annihilate me in a moment. I had the gold in a small travelling-bag under my feet, and as the heavy carriage jolted over the stones, the yellow pieces jingled sharply, and I could see the eyes of the villains sparkle like stars.

At length the high, craggy peak was in sight, and I could see where the road wound abruptly around it. Thus far I had been torturing my brains to invent some way of escape, but without effect. I was as thoroughly hedged in as though bound by iron chains. And in a few minutes more all would be over! Still I felt for my pistol, and had it ready.

"Presently the diligence stopped at the foot of an abrupt rise, and the fellow who drove the oxen came and told the bandits they must get out and walk up. They stepped out at once, and in a moment more I heard a slight scuffle. I looked out just in time to see both the drivers lashed together by the arms, back to back. They must have been placed ready for the operation, for the thing had been done with incredible quickness. I drew my pistol and awaited the result. My heart was in my mouth, but the intense excitement rendered me strong for the while.

"In a few seconds one of the villains came and poked the muzzle of a huge pistol into my face.

"Gold! gold!" he said. "Give me gold, or die."

"It was but the work of a second to knock his weapon down with my left hand, while with my right I brought up my own pistol and fired. The ball entered between his eyes, and he reeled back and fell. Then I leaped after him, for I saw his companion coming up upon the other side. I hoped to gain the dead man's pistol, but ere I could do so, the heavy hand of the living bandit was upon my shoulder, and his pistol aimed at my head. With the energy which the presence of death can alone beget, I knocked his weapon down and grappled with him. He hurled me to the ground as though I had been a child; but before he could follow up his advantage, the postillion cried out—

"Hold, Marco! A vettura is coming!"

"The robber turned, and in a moment more a heavy vettura, with four horses attached, came round the corner, full upon us. I started to my feet, and saw my brother looking from the open window.

"Help! Robbers!" I shouted, with all my might.

"The bandit had taken aim at the vetturino of the new team, but he was too late. My brother had comprehended the whole truth in a moment, and with a sure aim, and a quick one, too, he shot the villain through the heart.

"We secured my two drivers, and then matters were quickly explained. I told my brother all that had happened, and he then told me that he had heard of my illness, and was coming back to see me. One of my sisters had been ill at Bologna, so that they had not yet gone to Venice, but were waiting until I should be able to join them. You can imagine how deep our gratitude was, and how fervently we blessed

God for this fortunate interposition. My joy seemed to lift me up from the pain I had suffered, and I felt better than I had before felt for weeks.

And now what should we do next? Should we let the two rascally drivers go, and turn about for Bologna?

"No," said my brother. "Our sisters won't expect us for three days, so we'll carry these villains back and give them up, and to-morrow we'll go over in my vettura."

"We tumbled the two dead bodies into the diligence, and then bound the two drivers hand and foot, and tumbled them in after. The oxen were cast adrift, and my brother's vetturino mounted and started the heavy team back, while we assumed the control of the vettura ourselves.

"The drive down the mountain was quickly performed, and the city of Pistoja was reached without mishap. The two dead men were recognised as old offenders at once, and my testimony very quickly settled the business for the drivers. On the next night we were in Bologna, where my sisters received me with open arms, and two days afterwards we were all in Venice.

"So much for my trip across the Apennines. And let me say to you—if you have ever an occasion to hire a special diligence, with strange drivers, to ride over the mountains of Italy, be sure that you are well armed, and have a trusty friend with you if possible."

A DROP OF WATER.

It is a little thing, 'tis true,
But o'er the aching, burning brow,
It falls with healing power;
One cooling drop may life impart,
And bring pulsation to the heart,
Where all was still before.

One drop may soothe and ease a pain,
And bring back joy and life again,
And tranquillise the mind;
That little drop we deemed so small,
Of little worth, if prized at all,
Will live in memory's shrine.

'Tis thus one kind and soothing word,
Soon as its lute-like sound is heard,
Will soothe the careworn breast;
One well-timed word, when whispered low,
In friendly voice, may banish woe,
And lull each care to rest.

One teardrop shed on sorrow's shrine,
Will dwell within the thinking mind,
For days, for months, for years;
No gem could e'er be shined so dear
As that bright drop, that nearly tear,
That flowed to soften fears.

And oh, if all could know the power
Of little things in sorrow's hour,
There might be less of grief;
One word may wound or break a heart,
Or add a pang to sorrow's smart,
One word may bring relief.

WOMEN FOR THE TIMES.

THE woman who affects learning, and the woman who is learned, are two very different persons. She who by her womanly graces refines society, enlarges the heart, commands admiration, and is more attractive than the dancing saloon or the tavern, is the woman for the times. She who has the mind to grasp any subject, and the common sense to know her true position, is the woman for the times. She who has no foolish badinage for addle-pated young men, and will not lend herself to fill up their hours of idleness, or submit herself to their uncultivated tastes, or descend in any way to the level of their degraded minds, but preferring single blessedness and mental liberty to the so-called honour of their miserable alliance—she, old maid though she may be, is one of the women for the times.

The true woman, she who has the advancement of her own sex at heart, will neither taunt man, nor endeavour to imitate him. His sphere is not her sphere, his aspirations not her aspirations. There is room enough in the world for both. Their interests need not clash, their careers need not intersect. Vanity, love of notoriety and display, are not the feelings which should animate the woman for the times. Humble and earnest-hearted are the heroes and heroines of the mightiest achievements. There is a certain order of greatness which, it seems to us, would most beautifully befit a woman. We mean that type which is the highest in the scale of intellectual grandeur, and unites innocence and purity of thought with the highest mental and moral power.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

In the roystering days of the "merry" monarch the first Earl of Shaftesbury was created. Since that period successors to the title have figured more or less favourably before the public; but of all those who have worn the coronet there is not one who has lived and laboured in a sphere at all resembling that which the present Earl has made especially his own.

The name of Lord Shaftesbury is the watchword among as brave an army as ever took the field; and that name will ever be associated with one of the most glorious achievements of the nineteenth century.

With a warm heart and a cool head, a strong will and a willing hand, Lord Shaftesbury has given a wonderful impetus to the Ragged School Movement, which within the last few years has made such rapid progress among us. He has done this, not only by allowing his name to be catalogued with its patrons, and even to appear as its president, but by throwing himself fully into the work, and labouring assiduously and constantly for its success.

The ragged school was the great want of the age. Ignorance and destitution were sowing a plentiful crop, which sooner or later mankind must reap. In our back settlements of London, our brick wildernesses east, north, and south, thousands of untaught children, prematurely old—men of fourteen, women of twelve—were to be found in plenty. Ragged, unwashed, wolfish vagabonds, whose trade was plunder and amusements vice, were growing up by thousands. They were our London Ishmaelites—their hand against every man and every man's hand against them.

Society felt the evil, and felt, also, that it must protect itself. These blighted creatures, these offscourings of the world, must be looked after. The policeman must keep a sharp eye on them; hunt them as wild beasts, from court to alley, from alley to court. They must be shut up in gaols. The lash, the solitary cell, the hulks and penal settlement in prospect, must awe them into virtue. What could people be expected to do with these vagrant children but "put them down," keep them down, trample them down? These children of the dangerous classes were useless; that was the idea: they were the surplus population; and the sooner it was removed the better.

But, happily, there were some clear-sighted men amongst us, who saw the value of these children, and who, as political economists, as well as philanthropists and Christians, dared to assert that it was a duty society owed to itself, to attend to the welfare of these outcast children. They illustrated what should and could be done by opening schools for the ignorant, and, where they had the means, homes for the homeless; and the result has been in thousands of those, on whom society could only be brought to look with horror, becoming honest, virtuous, and useful members of the community.

The Earl of Shaftesbury, and a noble army of right-hearted men and women, have, in the ragged school movement, become the recognised medium of communication between the great mass of society and its hitherto unapproachable classes. The latter felt themselves no longer cut off from intercourse with their fellow-creatures. The schools have had the influence which their promoters anticipated. At home in England we have gained much, our colonies have also been considerable gainers, and the result for good is seen all over the world.

As foremost man of the ragged school movement, Earl Shaftesbury has become a celebrity. He has laboured in other departments of public usefulness, but the ragged school is that with which his name is most intimately associated.

Earl Shaftesbury was born in 1801, and matriculated at Oxford. In 1826 he was elected member for Woodstock, and, as Lord Ashley, took his seat in the House of Commons. During the administration of the Duke of Wellington, he became a commissioner of the Board of Control. In 1830 he was returned to parliament for the borough of Dorchester, and in the following year for the county of Dorset. In 1834-5 he accepted office under Sir Robert Peel, and was invited to take office again when that distinguished statesman became premier in 1841. On this occasion, however, he declined, on finding that the views of the premier would not permit him to support the Ten Hours Bill. In 1846 he resigned his seat, his constituents expressing dissatisfaction at his support of the repeal of the corn laws; but in a few months he was returned to parliament for Bath, after a severe election contest with Roebuck. In 1851 he succeeded to the peerage.

The philanthropic exertions and evangelical principles of the noble lord have rendered him exceedingly influential in all the religious and social questions of the day. His liberality of sentiment enables him to work agreeably with dissenters as well as churchmen; his sympathies being fully enlisted in the grand effort of doing good, irrespective of religious creed or party politics, to the bodies and souls of the poor and perishing.

THE VOLCANO OF ANTUCO, CHILI

RECOLLECTIONS OF CHILI

THE VOLCANO OF ANTUCO.

CHILI, in South America, consists of a narrow strip of country between the Andes and the ocean. Its total area is estimated at 129,700 square miles; but the amount of population is extremely uncertain.

Previous to the invasion of the Spaniards, Chili belonged to the Incas of Peru. But the hope of realising the splendid dream which had allured so many from the coasts of Spain very soon induced a descent on Chili. It was seized by that redoubtable captain, Almagro, under commission from the great Pizarro; and in 1540, with the exception of Valdivia, was annexed to Spain.

After its conquest by the Spaniards, Chili was divided into 360 portions, which were bestowed on the hungry invaders. The Chilean revolution separated Chili from Spain in 1810, and permanently secured its independence, from which date it has rapidly risen in importance and prosperity.

There is much to interest the traveller, both in the physical geography of the country as well as in the manners and customs of the people.

The country gradually increases in elevation from the coast to the great Cordillera of the Andes. This gradual rise is not formed by a series of table lands, but is a broad expansion of the Andes, which stretches forth from the central ridge to the sea, continuously but irregularly diminishing as it approaches the sea. These mountain branches are of considerable height,—being seldom less than a thousand feet above the valleys which intersect them. There is consequently but very little level country; some of these valleys, however, present broad expansions of surface: such, for instance, as the valley of Aconcagua.

The average elevation of the Andes is 13,000 feet above the sea level. Many of the Cordillera peaks rise considerably higher. Most of these loftier peaks are volcanic. The principal one is that of Aconcagua, which is above 23,000 feet in height.

No other portion of the globe is so subject to volcanic action as the countries embosomed by the Andes.

Earthquakes are frequent, and volcanoes numerous, there being no less than nineteen known to be in a state of activity within the Chilean range.

The volcano of Antuco, or Antujo, is situated in the province of the Concepcion, and is washed on one side by the picturesque lake of Luja. This volcano is in a constant state of activity; every few minutes it emits clouds of smoke, more or less dense, accompanied by explosions, the sound of which may be heard at the distance of twelve leagues. About the year 1812 it threw up several streams of lava, a careful examination of which fully bore out the statements of its formidable character at an earlier period. A portion of the mountain, covered with ashes, and almost entirely destitute of vegetation, serves as a refuge for the tribes of wild Indians; the western side, on the contrary, bathed by the waters of the lake, is magnificently clothed with vegetation. The scene presented is one of the most picturesque that can well be imagined. The splendid verdure, in all its variety of tints, contrasting with the craggy heights and basaltic pinnacles of the mountain, conveys an idea of natural grandeur which is in beautiful harmony with the whole of the surrounding prospect.

The conical form of the volcano, and the steepness of its ascent, have rendered it for a long time inaccessible. Every effort to gain its summit was attended by complete failure, until the learned naturalist Pœppig, in 1829, accomplished the ascent. Some years later Claude Gay climbed its craggy heights, accompanied by three servants, one of whom was a Frenchman, and the other two native Chileans. The crater into which the adventurous travellers descended presented the appearance of a gigantic saucer; but it was impossible to form any estimate as to its depth. Huge mountains of snow stretched around them on every side, and perfect stillness prevailed. The explorers drew nearer and nearer to those parts which bore indications of recent eruptions, when suddenly the whole mass trembled, and, with a report resembling that of a park of artillery, a thick black cloud rose into the air, and the man of science, as well as his attendants, precipitately fled. They had remained long enough, however, to ascertain more about the actual state of Antuco than had hitherto been known; and were in all probability the only human beings who had ever been within close neighbourhood during an eruption.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER IX.

Pause, reader, pause, and deign to look
On one without a name;
Ne'er entered in the ample book
Of Fortune and of Fame
Wedded to peace, he hated strife,
Meek virtues filled his breast;
His coat of arms an honest life,
A spotless heart his crest!

Quartered with this was Innocence,
And thus his motto ran.
A conscience void of all offence,
Before both God and man.
At the great day of wrath, though Pride
Now scorn his pedigree,
Millions shall wish they'd been allied
To that great family.

"JEM GOODMAN, miss," said Mr. St. Stephen. "Goodman by name, and Goodman by nature," he added, smiling kindly, as he laid a hand on "Jem's" broad, "working man's" back. "The poet says, miss, that 'Honest men are the gentlemen of nature.'

If so, Jem's a gentleman indeed. At any rate, I'm proud to call him friend. I think it an honour to press his hand."

Ada rose from her seat—it was a compliment she seldom paid to any man; but she was beginning to feel a reverence for virtue which rank and wealth had never awakened in her.

"Pray be seated, miss," said Jem, blushing, positively blushing, to see so grand a lady bowing before him. "Jem Goodman the sweep;" "and do not take me at Mr. St. Stephen's valuation. He thinks too much of me by half, miss. He doesn't know my shortcomings as I know them. It is not long we have to live in this world, and I want to do what little I can—and all is but little—for that Master who did so much for me."

"You take a great interest in these schools, of course?" said Ada.

"Yes, miss, I do," said Jem Goodman, his eyes sparkling, and his whole face kindling with enthusiasm; "I do, and I have done so from the first. It is my belief that the opening of ragged schools is the first step towards that righteousness which is one day to 'cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.'"

"In 1844 the London Ragged School Union was formed, miss. It was as great a discovery for the souls of the poor, aye, greater, than vaccination for their bodies, and it was as much maligned and opposed; but the Lord was with us, and who could prevail against us? Look at the ragged schools now. The children that used to be perishing in their rags, hunger, filth, and blasphemy, and every vile variety of vice, in the streets, are now gathered into the fold of the true Shepherd, as Micajah Hill says, miss, in his noble essay. William Allen, years ago, and Robert Bell and Joseph Lancaster did much; but the campaign against vice in rags, the crusade against monster evils in little hearts and diminutive bodies, commenced, in the year 1844, with the London Ragged School Union."

"Oh, tell me more about these schools," said Ada.

"Those so coldly named by political economists 'the perishing classes,' owing to these blessed schools, miss," said Jem, "shall not perish; they shall, by and through them, be saved in this world, and better, far better still, in the next. Look around you, miss. But for this ragged school and others like it, all those children—who, by the grace of God on the efforts of man, shall henceforth know nothing but Jesus Christ and Him crucified—would be lurking in thievish corners, grovelling in styres of filth and sensuality, caring, not for honest callings on earth, nor mansions not made with hands, hereafter, but for crime, vice, sin, folly, the basest and most perilous occupations, leading to the prison, the penitentiary, the hulks, Norfolk Island, and the gallows! These little earnest students searching the Scriptures here, are, or rather were, of those whom you have doubtless read of as 'vermin, City Arabs, English Kaffirs, the dangerous, the perishing classes.' They are only dangerous when no man cares for their souls. Now they are no longer perishing; the ragged schools have saved them, and it is well for the nation they have done so. 'Woe unto you, if one of these little ones perish!'"

"I can well understand," said Ada, "how much good it must do to these children, and to society, to have them not merely kept out of the streets, and out of mischief, but taught the precepts of religion, and trained to practise them."

"Oh, miss! you do not see, nor can any one else, half the good that springs from these schools. The children learn to read their bibles here, they go to their poor wretched homes, and they read their bibles there. The little Christian child is often the means appointed to save the soul of its father or mother. A text lisped by an infant, a verse of a hymn warbled by a child, has let in the first ray of gospel truth into the benighted soul, and the flood of glory has followed it! I am a poor man, miss—a working man. It is only natural that I should feel for the poor, the labouring classes. But not I alone. Who are my co-workers? The great and good of all ages. There is a nobleman whose name rises at once from the heart to the trembling lip of all who love the Lord and His lambs. And I may say that no working man has more sympathy with the working classes than that Peer of the realm. Nay, he is himself a working man, a hard-working man. Close by this very spot he himself, in the dead of the night, armed with a dark lantern, and aided by city missionaries, penetrated the foul, damp recesses of some ruined arches, and dragged thence a knot of wretched half-naked boys, huddled together for warmth—human vermin indeed then; but soon after he had placed them here they became Christian lads, and have all done well."

"I know to whom you allude," said Ada; "and even the vain and the worldly venerate that name."

"Its weight has helped to make ragged schools what they are," said Jem. "Here we are able to raise the fallen, the crushed, the benighted, and restore them to the privileges and dignity of their nature. More than one prodigal son has, through this very school, been restored to his father. Many a trembling, doubting wanderer has been led back to the path of duty; and is it not a blessed privilege to be able, in any way, to promote the moral welfare of our fellow-men? Oh, miss, you, and others like you, should cast in of your abundance: I, like the widow of old, can only contribute my mite."

"When you know me better, Mr. Goodman," said Ada, "I hope you will advise me how to contribute towards this great work. If you will, though we have only met for the first time to-night, I shall feel you are my friend, and shall be very proud of having been introduced to you."

"Fellow labourers in the Lord's vineyard," replied Jem, "do not require to be formally introduced, like fine folks at a ball, young lady. I see you are a recruit."

"A very raw one," said Ada, bowing and blushing, no trace left of the hauteur with which, a few hours back, she would have taught a working man to respect in her Sir Augustus Pemberton's daughter.

"And is it not from raw recruits we make our heroes," asked the stranger, with a strong provincial accent, "manfully to fight under Christ's banner? Miss, you only want faith, hope, and charity, and the greatest of these is charity. However, we all need drilling. I'm an old soldier of the Cross, miss, and my experience is at your service. I'm a sweep, miss—a master sweep; but, like St. Paul, I work at my trade. Some ladies would be ashamed to find themselves sitting and conversing with a sweep; and when I'm working for myself, I know my place, miss; but, when I'm working for the Lord, the lords and ladies of this world are only my fellow-servants. Indeed, it is well for them if we work side by side in the same vineyard. As Jem Goodman, the sweep, miss, I bow before you; as fellow Christian and co-worker, a lord has shaken me by the hand, aye, and a lady too. Yes, miss, I was born and bred a sweep: 'twas my trade from the first, and 'twill be to the last; and, though I've made a little money, I want it all, miss—all I've got and all I can earn—to help to feed these sheep—these lambs. The great apostle of the Gentiles, miss, worked with his hands at his own trade (he was a tentmaker), to be a burthen to none; and I cannot consent to be a camberer of the ground. I have two great objects in life, miss—the ragged schools and the temperance movement, with my little 'Working man's reading-room' for these Jem Goodman will live and die a sweep. I'm cleaned up a bit now, miss, but you might chance to see me some morning going my rounds, and then you'd see me black enough."

"As black without, as you are white within, great and good man," said Ada. "You have indeed kept the whiteness of your soul. I know you have visited the widow and orphan in their affliction, and kept yourself unspotted from the world."

"Ah! miss," said Jem, "I feel that at best I'm an unprofitable servant. I never do half the good I plan, and I'm too fond, perhaps, of hearing of my good deeds; but my shortcomings and backslidings make a long, black list, I fear; and I'm too prone to keep, that out of sight and out of mind."

Ada looked up, and tears were in her eyes. Measuring herself and Jem Goodman, in one rapid moment, by the only true standard—the Christian standard—how superior was this sweep to herself!

She thought of the wealth she had so idly squandered; the hours, days, weeks, months, years she had wasted in the vain pursuit of pleasures that did not please, and vanities that had left her heart so desolate! She thought of her aimless existence, her satiety, her disgust, the morbid dejection, the dreary ennui, the growing disease of her mind, which, confided in a moment of reckless despair to her early friend, Ellen St. Ange, had induced that wise and loving one to lead her to this spot; and then she contrasted with her own idleness, and selfishness, and vanity, this man—this Christian—this Jem Goodman. An angel of light he seemed to her, although a sweep, working at his trade. She remembered that though he had achieved independence, he still worked on, toiled on, in order to give all he could spare from his simple wants to the great Christian works on which his heart was set.

Jem Goodman was perfectly at his ease in the company of one hitherto so fine a lady as Miss Pemberton. He was a man of great insight into character and of singularly just and upright mind: but common sense was the substratum of his character. Therefore his love for his Saviour did not lead him to fanaticism, nor did his sympathy with the Poor turn him into a socialist or a leveller.

He did not blame Ada as severely as she feared he would for her rich and elegant attire.

He always rendered unto "Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's."

He saw at a glance what she was, and whence she came, and he made many allowances for surrounding influences, and the snares that Vanity spreads for Beauty.

He knew, too, that there must be grades in society, and that if the rich did not spend, the poor could not earn.

Jem knew something of political economy. He was aware that the value of those costly articles of dress was not derived so much from the raw material of which they were composed, as from the labour bestowed upon their fabrication.

What Jem did object to was the absorbing of the labour of the poor, and giving them in return—not food, not fuel, not clothing, but a poisonous and destructive compound, bright to the eye, seductive to the palate, paralysing to the heart, maddening to the brain, destroying the soul.

And this is the case with all intoxicating liquors.

Jem never saw beauty and fashion arrayed in silks, velvets, and satins, without remembering that those costly fabrics came from the weaver's loom; and in a rich array of gorgeous dresses he beheld comfort for the poor man's home. The bright hearth, the pot boiling, the children clothed, fed, taught. Even the jewels which vanity so pompously displayed, conveyed to his mind the one great fact—work, remunerative labour!

Those gems, before they can be dug for, or dived for, polished, set, sold, and sent home, how many must be employed and paid!

Jem Goodman knew—for he read human nature at a glance—that henceforth the beautiful wearer of those rich trappings, would be more intent on clothing the naked than on adorning herself. But he did not condemn her for the Past, as she feared he would; he saw there was good in her nature, and he resolved to help her to bring it into action.

"Now, tell me, Mr. Goodman," said Ada, more respectfully than she was in the habit of addressing men of rank and title, "tell me, who are those very pretty little girls, so closely united and so strongly contrasted? and who is that bright, bold, intellectual looking, handsome boy, so full of fun and mischief, and who seems to care more for the raised forefinger of that little fairy (the golden-haired tiny monstress) than for the teacher's threats or the master's reprimands? Those little girls cannot be sisters."

"No, miss," said Jem Goodman, "you are right there. The little fair girl, with golden hair and blue eyes, is only foster-sister to that wild, black-browed, nut-brown little wench, and to the boy you have so well described."

"And who is the little fairy?—begin with her, please, Mr. Goodman," said Ada.

Jem Goodman paused for a moment. He seemed as if, for some reason or other, the question embarrassed him. He was called away at this moment, but promised to return and comply with Ada's request.

CHAPTER X.

It is drunkenness that mainly fills our gaols; it is drunkenness which sends vagrants into our streets, and calls for the establishment of our ragged schools; it is drunkenness that produces the sluttish mother and brutal father, and drives forth so many sons and daughters to eat the bread of sin and sorrow.—F. BISHOP.

"THAT little girl's name is Hope Evermore," said Jem Goodman, on his return. "She was born in Queen Charlotte's Lying-in Hospital, where her mother died."

"And her father?" said Ada; "has she no father? I feel a singular interest in Hope Evermore, Mr. Goodman."

"She excites universal interest," replied Jem Goodman. "I do not know whether her father lives or not, but he forsook her mother. He must have been a bad man to do that. Now, a bad man is almost sure to be a bad father; and a bad father is much worse than none, as many of these little ones here to-night could show you, written in stripes upon their half-starved bodies, or in bruises upon their wasted limbs, by brutes who, both in the case of their wives and their children, mark their own property in black and blue."

Ada shuddered. "Oh, Mr. Goodman!" she said, "are there many such husbands, such fathers?"

"Too many, miss," replied Jem Goodman. "But I scarcely ever knew a sober man, a temperance man, who was a wife or child beater. It's drink that does it. They do it first only when they're in liquor; but drink so brutalises a man, and makes him so quarrelsome and mad-like the next day, that they are ready to kill their wives and children. And some there are, more hardened still, who, in order to get drink, send their little ones out to beg or steal, that they may spend what they bring in at the public-house. And if the poor little victims return empty-handed at night, the disappointed ruffian beats them cruelly."

Ada grew pale, as she listened to facts so terrible and so new to her. After a pause she said, "Who takes care of this sweet orphan child, Hope Evermore?"

Jem Goodman replied, "A poor young woman was confined, miss, at the same time and in the same ward with Hope's mother. Her name is Betty Blossom; she keeps an apple-stall at the corner of Frankfort-street. She is a fine, fresh, fair, rosy young creature, with a smile like sunshine, a carol like a bird, and a heart all love and pity. A Lancashire girl she was, miss. Lancashire, you know, is famous for its lace." "

"I know," said Ada, "that for their charms they are called 'Lancashire witches.'"

"Just so, miss. And there wasn't a comelier, rosier, or better grown girl than Betty, when she bewitched Bob Blossom. They were both country-bred, and came to London, thinking, as such people think, that the streets of London are paved with gold."

"And how did they get on?"

"As might have been expected, miss. They soon spent what little they had. Betty set up an apple-stall, and Bob goes on errands, beats carpets, mends chair bottoms, and takes his turn at the stall, when Betty wants to see to the children or the meals, and tidy the place up a bit, or stand at the wash-tub."

"What a good hard-working creature," said Ada.

"She's a treasure, miss! That's what she is!" replied Jem Goodman. "The model of a poor man's wife! so good, so patient, so cheerful, so industrious and cleanly, it does one good to see her. She's never tired, never cross—up early and late—Bob always finds a cheerful hearth, nicely swept, with a bright fire, and something hot for his dinner that she knows he likes. She is a most attentive wife to him. Well, miss, as I told you, she keeps an apple-stall—and partly out of compliment to her beauty and her surname, and partly in regard to her calling, the boys have nicknamed her Apple Blossom—and she is known by no other name."

"And what a pretty name, too," said Ada. "How much poetry there often is where one would least expect it."

"Yes, miss," said Jem Goodman, "and noble thought and fine sentiment, of which poetry is only the translation."

"I hope Apple Blossom has a good husband," said Ada, warmly.

"She would have, miss," replied Jem, "but for what changes man into a beast—what causes almost all the misery, beggary, wife-beating, and wife-murder."

"Drink?" faltered Ada.

"Yes, drink," earnestly whispered Jem Goodman.

"Bob Blossom isn't a confirmed drunkard either, miss; he's not a sot exactly; but a very little gets into his head, and soon has the mastery of him; and when he has got that little, he has got drunken companions enough to entice him on to more; and, though he is a quiet, tender-hearted, hardworking man, when he's sober, and doats on his 'pretty Apple Blossom,' as he calls her—proud he is of her too, yes, as proud as proud can be—yet 'when the evil spirit gets possession of a man,' the other 'seven' soon follow; and then there isn't a more contrary, obstinate, quarrelsome fellow far or near. Often and often—though Apple Blossom scorns a lie, and the telling of one almost chokes her—she has put upon a chance blow, or a fall, or some other accident (her wife-heart makes her hide his faults) a black eye, or a bruise, or a hurt, which I know has been given by him who swore at God's altar to love and to cherish her."

"Poor Apple Blossom!" said Ada: "can nothing be done for her? You, Mr. Goodman, who devote yourself and all you have to the great cause of temperance, can you devise nothing?"

"I do not despair, miss," said Jem Goodman; "but there is but one safeguard for such men as Bob Blossom, and that is entire abstinence. I do not say this because I abstain myself. I took the temperance pledge to induce others to do so—for drink never had any temptation for me;—but the experience of a life mainly devoted to the subject convinces me that the pledge is the only safeguard for men who, like Bob Blossom, cannot resist a little, though that little with them always leads to more."

"And can you not get him to join your society?" asked Ada, eagerly.

"I have not yet succeeded, miss. But I never despair. I have hopes yet. I have been for years at it. I hope to prevail yet. I'll do it yet, I hope."

"Amen!" said Ada. "And now tell me a little more about those sweet children—that is, if there is time?"

"Oh, there is plenty of time, miss; the classes go on till nine, then they sing a hymn, and are dismissed with a blessing."

"Whither?" asked Ada.

"Those who have homes, go to them, miss," said Jem Goodman; "those who have none, stay here."

"Here!"

"Yes, miss. There is a refuge attached to the school, a blessed refuge for the houseless—but you shall see that by-and-by."

"Tell me, then, now," said Ada, "how Apple Blossom came to have the charge of that sweet child?"

"I said Hope's mother died in childbirth, miss—but not till she had got Apple Blossom, who was, as I told you, confined in the same ward, and to whom she had taken a great fancy, to promise that if she (poor lady) died, her humble friend Apple Blossom would take charge of her baby, should it survive. Now Apple Blossom, like so many poor, hardworking, devoted women of her class, had not taken proper care of herself, considering her situation (which is a delicate one for all women, high and low). She had been up early and late, out in all weathers, slaving, scrubbing, planning, scheming, forecasting, washing, ironing, and mending, that Bob Blossom and the children, Merry and Larky Grigg there, shouldn't miss her when she was taken ill and obliged to go off to the hospital. 'Twas all to save Bob expense, and to give no trouble at home and to no one, she went in there. I got her the admission, and a noble charity it is. Well, poor soul, she was at the wash-tub, late at night, when her time came, and she got a hurt wringing out Bob's trowsers, the result of which was, her babe was born dead."

"And she took little Hope?" said Ada, eagerly.

"It seemed like a Providence, miss," said Jem Goodman.

"There in one bed was the poor dead lady—she was called 'the lady,' she looked so ladylike, and had seen better days, miss. Well, there she was, with the living child; and in the other the dead babe and the living mother. It was so natural to put the hungering babe to the overflowing fountain, that the good matron granted Apple Blossom's request; and thus the poor lady's dying prayer was granted too. Sweet babe! and sweet Apple Blossom! the wants of both were supplied, miss, when the little velvet lips of baby Hope fastened on the full, warm, kind bosom of Apple Blossom—begging pardon, miss, for making so free."

CHAPTER XI.

Sweet bud of beauty! how wilt thou
Endure the bitter tempest's strife?
Shall thy blue eyes be dimmed?—thy brow
Indented with the cares of life?—DELTA.

She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness.

Her children arise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her.

PROVERBS xxxi. 27, 28.

"AND when she left the hospital, did she take the child—little Hope—home with her?" asked Ada of Jem Goodman.

"Yes, miss; she had to get leave, and she got it."

"And did not Bob Blossom object to the expense?"

"Not he, miss. The poor are so kind to each other!—it is a beautiful trait in their nature. I could make you cry, miss, with the proofs I could give you of their generosity and unselfish devotion to each other. Bob (luckily he was out of work, and therefore sober) took to little Hope as if she had been his own. He had looked for a babe, and was as proud and fond of Hope as if she'd been the very one he had looked for."

"How kind and generous of him," said Ada. "In a higher class I doubt whether a father would have welcomed or even tolerated the little substituted baby."

"I dare say not, miss. And Bob had to turn nurse; and Hope was very ailing for a long time, and cost a deal in doctors and doctors' stuff, besides keeping Bob awake, and often up at night, after a hard day's work. That is very trying to a man; but nothing makes Bob unkind but drink. Sober, he has got a woman's heart; but drunk, he is the worst brute going. As I said, being sober, he behaved kindly to his wife and little Hope. Poor Apple Blossom couldn't do much for it but suckle it. She wanted waiting on herself, miss. She said—as those poor, dear creatures always do sooner or later—for making too free before her time. But at last she got about again. Often and often I saw her, and always little Hope with her; and that child has been an angel of comfort to that good foster-mother. But here comes Apple Blossom. She attends the mothers' class. There's the mother's class in the gallery, miss. Poor Apple Blossom! she buried her last baby yesterday; but I see she has got a neighbour's nursing already."

Ada looked in the direction Jem Goodman indicated, and there she saw that same kind applewoman who had taken charge of the baby and the little girl, and whom Ellen had told her she would see again that night.

But Apple Blossom looked pale and agitated. She trembled violently, and her eyes were red and swollen with weeping.

A poor attempt at mourning for her own buried infant appeared in a faded, washed black ribbon, brown with time, crossed over her straw bonnet, and a rag of black crape round a throat, firm, white, and round as a marble pillar. But in spite of her grief she had the baby at her bosom, and the little toddler by the hand.

Oh, the kindness, the true kindness of the very poor!

Apple Blossom would not send the children to perish at the station-house. It was too late for the union, and the casual wards were such dark dens of filth and misery! She knew she could not take charge of and support these orphans; but she could shelter them for one night at least, until she could consult Jem Goodman, her oracle, and get them through him into the infant nursery, where at stated hours she could visit the babe and suckle it.

She had been "troubling" in her mind how she should dispose of that bountiful supply sent for the little one whom hunger and thirst could reach no more. And here were soft lips ready—and Apple Blossom was a little consoled, as a low coo of intense delight met her ear; for Esther Darrell's baby had never fared so sumptuously before. It's own poor, half-starved mother was not such a nurse as plump, rosy Apple Blossom!

"Something has happened to grieve her," said Jem Goodman. "It is not about her buried little one she's fretting. She promised me she wouldn't cry over that. I showed her it was a mercy. It had water on the brain, and had it lived, it would have been an idiot. No, it is not that. I hope Bob hasn't got drunk and ill-used her. And she has got 'Tipping Ben's' little daughter with her. Esther, Ben's wife, always brings little Ness here herself. I can't understand this."

Ada then told Jem Goodman what she had witnessed. He grew pale as he listened.

"Oh, miss," said he, "that man, Ben Darrell (Tipping Ben, he's called), is one whom I have been long persuading to take the pledge. He had almost given in. I had all but prevailed," he added, tears starting to his eyes as he clasped his hands. "Oh! why did I give way? He bargained and begged so for another week. I said to him—'Ben (Tipping Ben, as you're called to your shame)'—he laughed, for he always liked the name—'don't put it off. Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation!' I had him by the hand, but he struggled and got loose. And now he's struck poor Esther, struck her down in the street! He never struck her down before—at least, she told poor Apple Blossom that he never did. Oh! that I had run after him, and clutched him back, like a brand from the burning. Oh! that I had clung to him, knelt to him. It is only Cain who says, 'Am I my brother's keeper?' We are all each other's keepers. And if evil befall Esther and Ben Darrell, Jem Goodman is to blame!" He dashed away his tears, and saying—"Excuse me, miss, I must go and speak to Apple Blossom," he left Ada, and went up into "the mothers' gallery."

CHAPTER XII.

I hope no one who is present here to-day will leave the room without giving himself to the work—for, depend upon it, a greater work cannot be undertaken than to carry out the sublime injunction of our Redeemer, "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven;" and I would rather be laughed at with scorn for having failed in such an attempt as this, than be praised for my wisdom, judgment, and knowledge, to have stood still amidst so much sin, misery, and suffering.—THE EARL OF SHAFESBURY, at the opening of the Coram-street ragged school.

JEM GOODMAN found Apple Blossom spelling out texts, sternly taught by Mrs. Golightly. Perhaps that lady was right, and Apple Blossom would never read her Testament fluently—but in her case it mattered little: its precepts were engraved on her heart, and illustrated by her honest, humble, Christian life.

"I hope he will return, and tell me how Esther Darrell is," thought Ada; "and it may be a lesson to Bob Blossom."

Already she knows these people, cares for them, and sympathises with them! She has plenty to do: something to feel for, to care for, now!

Left to herself, Ada rose. Ellen was presiding over a class of older girls, and Ada approached a form, from which the voluntary teacher—a delicate young governess, who had been up since six—had just left, having become faint from over-exertion of her gentle voice. There Hope Evermore and Merry Blossom sat close together, hand in hand, very lovingly: Hope, in the absence of the teacher, making Merry read the parable of the sower, for Hope was a much better scholar than Merry.

Ada, sitting down beside them, said to Hope—

"Can you read your Testament, little girl?"

"Not very well yet, teacher," answered the child.

Teacher! every child in the ragged school thought, naturally enough, that every lady present was there for active good, not idle curiosity; there to teach, not to trifle. Teacher! the word was a reproach to Ada's heart and conscience. It sent a flush to her cheek, and a pang of remorse to her heart.

The Queen confers dignity by a word; a title by a syllable; she can make a man a knight by calling him "Sir;" and little Hope Evermore has done the same; she has called Ada "teacher;" and by calling her "teacher" has enrolled her one. Ada, as she heard the word, resolved well to deserve the title. And yet, as she looked on the contented, earnest faces, the thought would cross her mind and suggest to her softening heart the question, "Can I do anything that can avail them and my own soul? What am I that I should become a teacher of these little ones? Can I not learn much of them? I may impart book learning and teach them the 'letter,' but I feel it is of them I must learn the spirit of the law. No matter; he that doeth the will shall know of the doctrine; and I will do thy will, O Father."

"And who," said Ada, at length, "is that naughty girl the lady is reproving for shuffling her feet, and biting her nails?"

"Potato-heels, teacher," replied Merry, archly, answering instead of Hope.

"No, teacher," said little Hope, raising her forefinger to reprove what she thought ill-natured in Merry, "her real name is Meg Grimes."

"And why do you call her Potato-heels?" asked Ada of Merry.

"Look at her feet, teacher, and you'll see," said Merry, heedless of Hope's raised finger and reproving shake of the little head.

Ada turned to gaze at the great, long, shapeless legs, and large, splay feet of the girl in question. The legs were cased in old worsted stockings of a brownish-black, "a world too wide," tied under the knee, the one by a bit of old rag, the other by a shred of list. The old, worn shoes were down at heel, and Ada smiled to see how exactly Merry had described the unsightly bulges, rough and red, that protruded through the holes in the old stockings, when she called the girl "Potato-heels."

"Some calls her Carrotty Meg, teacher," laughed Merry.

"Her only real name, teacher, is Meg Grimes," persisted little Hope.

"Well, then, I will call her Meg Grimes, my dear little kind girl," said Ada. "How old is she?"

"She don't know her age," said little Hope.

"No, but I does, and so does Larky," said Merry.

"She's turned fifteen, though she aint no taller than I, and can't read, nor sew, nor nothink."

"Is she a good girl?" asked Ada of Hope.

Hope looked down and did not speak.

"She robbed my brother, Larky Grigg, of two-pence to go to the gaff,* but he caught her out, and didn't he pitch into her, that's all," said Merry.

"He let her off some, though, cos she was a gal," said Hope. "Larky Grigg don't like thrashing gals; he never do, none but Meg. He won't her any more, teacher; she don't mean to steal any more—leastways, not from Larky Grigg; and she've promised me not to aggravate him by giving him none of her sauce."

"I say, teacher," continued Merry, "though Hope takes her part, she've pinched Hope cruel to make her give up the collar and cuffs Hope had crocheed for mammy's birthday. Meg wor going to the ball."

"The ball!" said Ada, whose ideas of balls were made up of bright lights and dull people, gay dresses and stupid partners, fresh flowers and faded complexions, good music and bad dancing, fast men and slow talk. "What ball can they go to?"

"A penny ball, teacher," said Merry; "a bad place mammy says it is, and I ain't never to go. It's wrote up 'Dancing Rooms—admission one penny,' and mother says Meg had better pay a penny to stay away. But there, she'd sold a sight of locoficers one wet night, and she wor going with Stunning Steenie, but she likes Larky Grigg best, only he can't abide her red head and redder heels."

"And how did she get the collar and cuffs?" asked Ada, much interested.

Vainly Hope nudged Merry, shook her head, and tugged her frock—it was a good story, and a sort of jest. Merry would not be restrained.

"Why, teacher, Hope's such a dab at crochet, she've made a shillin' in a day onst, and often four-pence; and these for mammy's birth-day wor bootiful fine. And our matron washed 'em and got them up lovely, and trimmed them with new red ribbon. Hope wor so pleased. Well, teacher, they wor done up in a nice white paper, and as we went home, from school, up comes Meg, harm in harm with Stunning Steenie—them two a-going to that bad place, the gaff, and arter to the penny ball. 'Lend me them ere, Hopy,' says Meg; 'they're just what I want for the ball,' and as Hope wouldn't on no account, she pinched her so Hope dropped the paper. Look there, teacher!" and she held up the little, round, white arm of Hope Evermore. "There's vicious pinches for ye!"

And yet Hope takes her part. Well, Meg got the collar and cuffs, and wore them at the gaff and at the penny ball. But she hadn't much pleasure, for Larky Grigg, who went unknown to mother, dared Stunning Steenie to dance with her in 'em. Steenie's afraid of Larky Grigg, and so poor Potato-heels got no partner, and sat down in a corner crying, Larky and Stunning Steenie both taking sights at her. Oh, she's a reglar bad un, she is! but Larky Grigg and Stunning Steenie made her give up the collar and cuffs that very night; and Hope forgave her."

"They were not much hurt, and our kind matron did 'em up again," said Hope; "besides, Meg never was teach'd no better; she've no nice home, like our'n, and no kind, good mammy, like we. If she had, she wouldn't be so much after the penny balls, and gaffs, and boys, Merry; and she's a most left off kicking and pinching me. But when she would be honest, and mend, her dad and mammy won't let her—they licks her cruel if she don't take home a shillin', and nothing but a few locoficers to make it by. They all lives in a cellar, and no bed—only a few shavins; and often Meg don't get a bit to eat, and yet if she gets a few pence she's all for treating Stunning Steenie and Larky Grigg to roast 'taters and butter, and to the ball.† She ain't mean, poor Meg, and she's very free, and Stunning Steenie uses her very bad. She's often without a meal all day—"

"Except what Hope saves her from her own dinner, teacher," said Merry.

"Oh! Merry gives her some of hers too," said Hope.

"Only to please you, Hope," said Merry.

"And to please Jesus," said little Hope, with child-like simplicity, curtseying as she pronounced the Saviour's name. "Merry knows he taught us to love one another." And she leant her little cheek lovingly on Merry's broad brown shoulder.

Ada looked at the child, who raised her blue eyes, moist with tears, and radiant with light from within; and she thought that Hope's face was as the face of a saint, and her golden hair looked almost like a halo.

"I wish Larky Grigg would leave off teasing Stunning Steenie and mind his lessons," said Hope. "He'll never get into the brigade if he go on so wild."

"Which is Stunning Steenie?" asked Ada; "and why is he called so?"

"Cos of his waistcoat," said Merry, determined to answer. "Look, teacher—he's standing up."

Ada looked, and beheld a great lubberly boy, with a cunning eye, animal expression, yet good-humoured grin. A groom's waistcoat of yellow and black stripes, with a crest button, and which had evidently belonged to some tall, stout man, covered the boy from the nape of the neck to the calves of his legs.

"That waistcoat wor his dad's, teacher," said Merry. "But it wor in the pop-shop. Steenie laid by money to get it out; and when he'd got enough and took it out, he comed here in it so proud, a-saying, 'Ain't it stunning!' So, teacher, ever since we've called him 'Stunning Steenie.'"

"And do you call him so?" asked Ada, of little Hope.

"Yes, teacher, he likes the name, just as Grigg likes

† It is painful, inexpressibly painful, to learn that the dancing-rooms are the places where matches are made up. There the boys go to look out for "mates." Sometimes a match is struck up the first night of meeting, and the parties live together forthwith. Unions take place when the lad is fourteen. Nearly all the costermongers form such alliances, when both parties are under twenty.

to be called Larky Grigg; but Meg don't like to be called 'Potato-heels' or 'Carrotty Meg.' But, oh, Larky Grigg's getting anger, he won't get into the brigade."

"What brigade?"

"The shoe-black brigade. None but good boys gets in, and they earns a sight of money; and Larky would have been one—the matron said so, she heard it from the master—if it wasn't for his wild pranks and Stunning Steenie. Though Larky Grigg's such a scholar, and Steenie ain't out of one syllable, yet he can twist Larky Grigg round his little finger, as mammy says."

"Oh, teacher," said Merry, "Stunning Steenie ain't quite so vicious since he've been here, but he was desper't bad. He's been in prison a sight of times, and privately whipped cruel, and wuss and wuss every time, he says so hisself."

"Oh my, Merry," said Hope, "look at Larky Grigg, he'll be punished, that he will. He've tied Stunning Steenie and Priggin' Peter together by their matted hair. Their heads is bent down now, but whea they looks up, won't he catch it?"

Larky Grigg looked round in triumph at his achievement; but catching the glance of agony in Hope's eyes, and seeing her little hands clasped, he adroitly with his clasp-knife severed the dusty, matted locks he had twisted so cleverly. And Hope breathed freely. "And now," she said, "he's cutting figgers on the bench. They'll take away his knife, that they will; and if they do how's he to finish his clock?" And tears filled her eyes.

"His clock?" said Ada.

"Yes, teacher. Oh, he's so clever: he's almost made a wooden clock, all his self. And as for counting, no one can't puzzle Larky Grigg, and he can puzzle daddy. Oh, I'm so glad there's the bell, and he haven't been found out. He'll get off this time, that he will."

CHAPTER XIII.

Hush! 'tis a holy hour, the quiet room
Seems like a temple; and yon soft lamp sheds
A faint and starry radiance through the gloom,
The deep stillness, down on infant heads,
With all their clustering locks untouched by care;
And bow'd, as flowers are bowed by night, in prayer.
MRS. HEMANS.

THE bell was rung to summon all to join in a hymn.

Ada had been present at all the grandest oratorios, all the musical festivals. Her senses had been wrought to ecstasy when Jenny Lind's superb voice burst forth, and cathedral arches re-echoed the words—

"I know that my Redeemer liveth!"

but her heart was not touched, nor her spirit softened and aroused, as when the pale lips and haggard throats of "the ragged" uttered that hymn of gratitude and praise.

Ada's rich and cultivated soprano, Ellen St. Ange's flute-like contralto, and Mrs. Golightly's harsh falsetto, joined in that strain with the shrill trebles of the little ones, and the deep bass of many a labourer, once earning a decent livelihood by the loom or plough, and who, but for drink and its consequences, would have been still "worthy of his hire."

The hymn they sung was the following:—

"Lord, dismiss us with thy blessing,
Bid us now depart in peace;
Still on heavenly manna feeding,
Let our faith and love increase.
"Fill each breast with consolation,
Up to thee our hearts we raise;
When we reach yon blissful station,
Then we'll give thee nobler praise."

THAT WILL DO.

"THAT will do" is a phrase of modern invention. The ancients knew of no such expression, or the Egyptians would never have raised the pyramids, nor the Greeks and Romans displayed that love of the beautiful, which led them to impart a poetic grace even to the meanest utensils for household use, as the remains at Pompeii fully testify.

"That will do" is the excuse of mediocrity, unable to soar to better things.

"That will do," applied to household matters, is equally bad, and more annoying to friends, than when applied to dress. You may expect ill-cooked dinners in any house where the heads adopt this maxim.

"That will do" is the enemy to all excellence, and would sap the conscience of the most virtuous man alive, if he hearkened to its dictates. Moralists and others must bear in mind that nothing will "do" but the very best in point of virtue, or they will certainly find out at the last that it will not do.

* Speaking of the costermongers' children, Mr. M. Hill says: "Their favourite resort is to the penny gaffs or theatres, and the twopenny hops. Their influence on the growth of juvenile depravity cannot for a moment be doubted. On a Monday night as many as six performances will take place. The audience is composed of children. So precocious are the little things, that the girl of nine will, from constant attendance at such places, have learned to understand the filthiest sayings, and laugh at them as loudly as the grown-up lads round her."

EASTER HOLIDAYS.

EASTER.

EASTER DAY is a festival observed throughout Christendom. It was instituted in honour of the resurrection of our Saviour from the dead. As it occurs at the period known as the Passover amongst the Jews, the associations connected with the festival lead us back to that memorable night when the destroying angel passed over the land of Egypt, and, with the exception of those Hebrews' doors the lintels of which had been marked with blood, there was not a house where there was not one dead.

On this account the French call this festival Pâques, from the Greek pascha, which is also derived from the Hebrew pesech, and which means "passover." That such a name is much more appropriate to the festival than our Saxon term, Easter, there can be no question. Our pagan forefathers made rejoicings at the same time of the year in honour of the goddess Easter, the Astarte of oriental nations. When the Saxons were converted to Christianity, they changed their heathen festival into a Christian feast, but they did not change the name; and so, as we call our week days by the titles of Saxon deities, we have incorporated this Saxon nomenclature into the ecclesiastical calendar.

The celebration of Easter is attended with a variety of customs peculiar to the different nations of Europe. Easter has its superstitions also; and, as at Christmas time we were taught by old tradition that the ox knelt down in adoration, and that all water blushed and for a moment became wine, so at Easter it is said the sun dances in honour of the resurrection! The obvious folly of so ridiculous a statement does not require comment.

A very ancient custom observed at Easter in some parts of England and throughout Northern Europe, is that of Easter eggs. The practice of sending presents of eggs from the children of one family to those of another, is very old, very pleasant, and very harmless. There are various modes adopted to prepare the eggs, one of which is the following:—

The eggs being immersed in hot water for a few moments, the end of a common tallow-candle is made use of to inscribe the names of individuals, dates of particular events, &c. The warmth of the egg renders this a very easy process. Thus inscribed, the egg is placed in a pan of hot water saturated with cochineal or dyewood; the part over which the tallow has been passed is impervious to the operation of the dye, and, consequently, when the egg is removed from the pan, there appears no discoloration of the egg where the inscription has been traced, but the egg presents a white inscription on a coloured ground. The colour, of course, depends upon the taste of the person who prepares the egg; but it is best to make use of much variety of colour.

We live in days of progress. Things which our ancestors thought not unworthy of gray-headed men we leave to our children, and they enjoy them thoroughly:

and in their enjoyment we are sure to participate. Children are delighted, for instance, with these coloured eggs. What a happy group is that which our artist has so graphically sketched; how thoroughly they are enjoying themselves with these piquant treasures, and how heartily they are joining in the sport. Easter eggs, like Christmas trees, are just the things for children.

In Russia, Easter is kept up with amazing solemnity, and is rung in with merry peals from all the churches.* The streets of St. Petersburg are crowded with people waiting for the signal, and, as the clock strikes twelve, people—old and young, rich and poor—fall into one another's arms, crying, "The Lord is risen! The Lord is risen indeed!"

Apart from the religious services of the festival, there is little to be commended in other old Easter customs. The heaving, or lifting, as it was called, was once exceedingly famous. The practice differed a little in different places. In some places the person to be elevated was laid flat, in others, placed in a sitting posture, in others, accommodated with a chair; but, in all cases, the ceremony was incomplete without three distinct elevations.

Eating tansy pudding is another old custom. The tansy was said to symbolise the bitter herbs used by the Jews at the Paschal feast, but ate with gammon of bacon in order to show a contempt and abhorrence for that ancient people.

Playing at bill—a particular sort of ball, specially consecrated to Easter—is another of the bygone customs in which our ancestors delighted, and in which bishops and lords thought it nothing derogatory or unseemly to engage. In alluding to this custom Brand cites the following lines:

"At stool ball, Lucia, let us play,
For sugar, cakes, or wine;
Or for a tansy let us play,
The loss be mine or thine.
If thou, my dear, a winner be
At trundling of the ball,
The wager thou shalt have, and me
And my misfortunes all."

Theatrical representations or mysteries were formerly got up by the Catholic clergy, and played with success to immense crowds. But that fashion went out when book printing was introduced.

In London the old custom of the Spital Sermon is still kept up. The lord mayor and corporation, and boys of the Blue-coat School, proceed to Christ Church, Newgate-street, or St. Bride's, Fleet-street, to hear a sermon by one of the bishops. There is a dinner afterwards, and sometimes a ball on Easter Monday.

And Easter being holiday time, and Greenwich a pleasant place, within an easy distance, Cockaigne was wont to make its way thither to take a look at all the wonders of the fair, make the perilous ascent, and still more perilous descent, of the hill, and ride wonderful steeple-chases and trotting matches with horse and donkey on Blackheath.

Greenwich offers its attractions still, without the drawback of the fair, and the boats and trains afford cheap and expeditious travelling; so there is every facility for getting—what Londoners really need—a glimpse of green and a breath of air.

Chemical Experiments.

A SAFE FULMINATING POWDER.

WHEN young people take first to the study of chemistry, it is compounds which explode and which burn with fine colours that more especially interest them. Anxious to please my young friends, I shall now describe the manufacture of a fulminating powder that explodes far more violently than gunpowder would do; and which is, nevertheless, perfectly safe, which is more than one can say of gunpowder. Take three parts of nitre (saltpetre), two parts of pure carbonate of potash (ask for it by the name of purified pearlsh), and one part of sulphur. If you have a marble or wedgewood mortar, warm it, and mix in it all the ingredients intimately together, then, finally, when mixed, preserve them in a well-corked or stoppered bottle. If you do not possess a mortar, get the druggist of whom you purchase the materials to mix them for you. Remember well, however, that the materials cannot be retained in paper: the carbonate of potash has so strong an attraction for moisture that it draws it out of even the driest air, and after the lapse of a certain time, varying with season and the weather, dissolves into a fluid as clear as water, and to which ancient chemists gave the name of oil of tartar per deliquium.

The triple material mixed as described is our fulminating powder; it will not explode if fire be applied, in which respect it differs from gunpowder. It is caused to explode in the following manner: Take an iron spoon or ladle, or, in place of either of these, any piece of sheet iron will do. Lay upon the iron about a teaspoonful of the powder, and heat the iron spoon, plate, or ladle over the fire. The powder thus treated soon melts and turns brown; it next bubbles up and evolves a little gas; lastly, it explodes with a dull heavy sound, almost like a cannon. You will perceive that the great safety of the powder in question consists in the fact that it cannot explode until it has been fused.

HOW TO MAKE SALTPETRE.

I shall now explain to you how saltpetre may be made, by two methods. The first being direct, the second indirect.

Direct method.—Procure some aquafortis—half an ounce will do: you must keep it in a stoppered bottle, inasmuch as it would rapidly burn a cork. Take some carbonate of potash (one of the substances used in the preceding experiment), dissolve it in about twice its own weight of water,—though you need not be very particular about the exact quantity,—and add the solution of carbonate of potash to the aquafortis as long as there is any boiling or effervescence. The carbonate of potash will have been changed by this treatment to nitrate of potash, otherwise called nitre or saltpetre, as may be readily proved by dipping a piece of blotting paper into the solution, drying the paper, and touching it with a live coal, or the flame of a candle, when it will burn like touchpaper.

Such, then, is the manner of making nitre or saltpetre artificially, by the direct process; but the method described would be far too costly for practice. All the saltpetre employed in England, and the greatest quantity of that employed by other nations, is collected from the surface of the earth in various parts of the world, more especially India.

It is possible, however, to make saltpetre artificially by an indirect process, less costly than the one already described; and in certain countries the manufacture of this substance, in this way, is protected by government as a matter of great state importance. This is the case in Sweden, for example, where every farmer is obliged to pay a nitre tax in kind. The Swedish government will not compound for it by a money payment; the notion being that the time may come when Sweden might no longer be able to obtain her saltpetre from abroad. This actually was the case with France, during a certain period of the great revolutionary wars. The French commercial fleet having been destroyed, and her commerce with other nations restricted, the French government could no longer obtain that which, even more than money, may be called the sinews of modern war—saltpetre. Fearful lest the wars could not go on, Napoleon (then first consul) sent to his chemists for aid. "We will make our own nitre within six days, sire," was the reply of Berthollet; and the chemist kept his word. The indirect method of preparing nitre, as discovered by the French chemists, was as follows:—They mixed together the mortar of old walls, the floors of stables and of dovecots—any rubbish, in short, which contained either lime or ammonia. This rubbish-mixture being exposed for some time to the air, generates nitrate of lime and ammonia, to which carbonate of potash being added in due proportions, nitrate of potash (the material under consideration) was produced. It is quite worth the operator's while to remember that, if a solution be capable of making touchpaper, it is either a nitrate, an iodate, a bromate, or a chlorate.

EXPERIMENTS WITH NITRE.

Placing a few pieces of nitre in an iron spoon, and making the spoon red hot, or even white hot, you will find the nitre melt, but remain quite incombustible. If, however, when the nitre is thus fused, a fragment of charcoal or of sulphur be dropped into it, then rapid combustion takes place. You will perceive, therefore, that nitre is not a combustible, though it be a supporter of combustion; and you will perhaps begin to perceive the reason of the fact that certain things—gunpowder, for example—are capable of burning violently, although in a closed tube (as a gun) and quite deprived of all contact with atmospheric air.

TO MAKE GUNPOWDER.

Gunpowder, I presume all my readers to be aware, is a compound of sulphur, saltpetre, and charcoal, in proportions which slightly vary in different countries, and in the same country according to the purpose for which the gunpowder is required. If you weigh out, however, twenty-five parts of saltpetre, five of charcoal, and three of sulphur, you will have the proper ingredients for making fine sporting gunpowder, although, however pure the materials employed by a chemical manipulator on the small scale may be, the resulting gunpowder will be none of the best. Firstly, the material can never be pounded so finely as on the large scale; secondly, the operator on the small scale cannot manage very well to get his material in the condition of grains, without which no effective gunpowder can be generated.

He may, however, proceed thus:—Having weighed out all the materials, powder the charcoal carefully, then wet it with water and rub it in a mortar until no more grittiness is perceptible; next mix it with the nitre and sulphur, add water enough to make the whole into a paste, which is to be rubbed in a mortar until the incorporation is as complete as on the small scale it admits of being made. This having been done, the paste is to be removed from the mortar and squeezed, by any means at the operator's disposal, into a hard cake. In practice this hard cake is forced through a parchment sieve, the apertures of which form the grains, which being finely polished by rubbing together in a barrel, the manufacture is complete.

How to analyse gunpowder.—I shall now show you, by means of a very pretty experiment, how gunpowder may be analysed; and the operation will give you a very good idea of the manner in which other chemical analyses are conducted.

Firstly.—Soak the gunpowder in distilled water, by which means the nitre used—only the nitre—will be dissolved out. By filtering through white blotting paper, the nitre will pass through, leaving the charcoal and the sulphur upon the filter.

Next soak the solid part which remains upon the blotting paper with solution of potash (ask for it at the chemist's by the name of liquor potassæ); this used, the sulphur will be dissolved out, leaving nothing but the charcoal behind, when of course the gunpowder will have been analysed.

The nitre may be obtained by placing the solution containing it in a cup or saucer in an oven, or on a warm hob until all the water evaporates away, and the nitre alone in a solid condition remains. The sulphur may be obtained by adding spirit of salt to the potash solution, when a white powder is deposited, which is neither more nor less than sulphur.

The Matron.

NO. XIII.

IN my last chapter I spoke of infantine diseases brought on by carelessness, but I do not mean to say that children would always be well if always well cared-for. In spite of the greatest attention, these fragile beings are frequently ailing.

Few children attain the age of six months without having suffered more or less from either colic, diarrhoea, convulsions, or croup. I proceed, therefore, to give a few simple but efficacious remedies for these dangerous diseases, and they should be administered without delay in all cases where medical aid cannot immediately be procured.

The colic in infants is one of the first evils with which the nurse has to contend; we must, however, except a tendency to vomiting, from which children suffer soon after birth. Half a teaspoonful of castor-oil, sweetened with a little moist sugar, will be found efficacious in removing this unpleasant symptom, but the colic must be differently treated. The symptoms of colic are fits of crying, and drawing up of the feet towards the bowels, which are generally hard to the touch. Within the first or second month you may give the infant two teaspoonfuls of the following mixture every fourth hour:—Eight grains of magnesia, twelve grains of fine powdered rhubarb, one drachm of tincture of rhubarb, and two drachms of syrup of poppies; all mixed together with an ounce and a half of plain mint water. Put all this into a bottle, and mind you shake it before you pour out the medicine.

Diarrhoea may be safely treated in the following manner, provided you only give the medicine I am about to prescribe just after the bowels have acted, otherwise the chalk—an ingredient in the prescription—might check the disease too suddenly. Take of gum-arabic and prepared chalk a drachm of each; of gelsema two drachms; of syrup of white poppies three drachms, and mix them all together with four ounces of water. A dessert spoonful is a dose. If this complaint of the bowels should be accompanied by convulsions, a warm bath may produce salutary results, and, while it is being prepared, woollen cloths, dipped in warm water and wrung dry (providing they retain their warmth), may be applied to the extremities, and will greatly relieve the little patient. The most frequent cause of convulsions in an infant is the growth of the teeth. I am not speaking of cutting the teeth—that is a later process. At about the third month fever, pain, diarrhoea, and even convulsions may be occasioned by the enlargement of the teeth in their sockets, but when they pass the jaw the pain will subside. During all the stages of dentition the bowels must be kept moderately open, and mild aperients must be resorted to if necessary. The following medicine—to prevent costiveness—may be safely given to a child of three or four months old:—Take two ounces of syrup of roses, an ounce of manna, and an ounce of fresh drawn oil of sweet almonds; mix them together, and give a teaspoonful as a dose, which repeat, if the first does not prove sufficiently powerful. Between the sixth and ninth month the teeth begin to press against the gums, and fever, pain, and convulsions may again be apprehended. It is then also necessary to use mild aperient medicine if the child's system is confined, but the judicious use of the lancet, by a medical man, is the best means of preventing convulsions.

Mothers must not suppose that the lancing of the gums is a painful operation. It is one from which children derive the greatest relief.

The following medicine may be found to relax the tension of the gums, and to diminish the fever that often accompanies teething. Dissolve one grain of tartar emetic in two ounces of distilled water. Give a teaspoonful in order to produce sickness. Repeat the dose if the first is not efficient.

With regard to the croup, I am certain there is no affectionate mother who would not immediately send for a medical man as soon as the indications of this malady were apparent, and she would be in the right. The croup is one of the most frightful diseases to which children are liable. In a few hours it may prove fatal. Whether it attack an infant, or a child of three, four, or five years, the plan of treatment is much the same, but the older the child, the more painful must be the remedies. However, it is important to make no mistake as to the nature of the disease with which the child is attacked. Cough and hoarseness may have nothing to do with the croup. In the hoarseness that indicates croup there is a shrillness and a ringing sound, and this shrillness is remarkable in the coughing and breathing. In short, air forced through a tube resembles the noise made by a child attacked with the croup. This disease is an inflammation in the membrane which lines the windpipe. It causes difficulty of breathing, stricture, cough, a flushed countenance, and a quick pulse.

An efficient emetic should be given immediately, as it is highly important that vomiting should be brought on. A blister should also be applied to the throat. For an infant of three or four months the emetic given should be mild. At one or two years of age it may be increased in strength, and at three or four a still larger dose may be given. But whatever you may do, in the first instance procure medical advice as soon as possible. In some cases the complaint is so dangerous that recourse is had to the boldest measures to arrest its fatal progress, and croup in its mildest form is still very dangerous. Imprudent exposure to cold and to damp and evening air, is often the cause of the attack.

To turn to a rather less serious subject, I must observe that some parents bring on illness in their children by improperly feeding them.

Old sayings, founded on folly, pass from mother to daughter, and perpetuate disease. The ignorance of some nursing mothers would be laughable, if it were not attended with such serious consequences. A little anecdote will illustrate my assertion.

A lady on visiting a poor woman was surprised to see her hold a pewter pot to the mouth of a child of four months old.

"My good friend," said she, "surely you are not giving beer to your baby?"

"Why not, ma'am?" answered the cottager; "what's good for the mother is good for the child. Mother a sup o' beer, baby a sup o' beer; mother a bit o' bacon, baby a bit o' bacon."

"Indeed," said the lady, "you will injure your child by following this system. Your stomach is in a very different state to that of an infant. I do not think beer good for you; but it is destruction to your baby."

"Lack a day!" said the mother. "I ought to know what's good for babies—I've had half a dozen of 'em."

"And where are they?" said the visitor.

"They're all gone to a better place."

"Do you mean that they are dead?" said the lady.

"Sure enough," replied the good dame.

"And in all probability beer and bacon occasioned their death," observed the lady. "What do you consider they died of?"

"La, ma'am! they died of nothing in particular. What they went off in was the inflammation; but, if you really think the beer and bacon will bring it on, I'll give no more to this bantling; for I love her with all my heart."

"If that is the case," said the visitor, "feed her on sopped bread, on milk and sago,—on anything rather than on beer and bacon."

The cottager followed this advice, and saved one child from "the inflammation."

Small Change.

WHEN Foote was once at Bath, he was asked what fare he usually found at Mr. Delacour's table. "Sir," replied the satirist, "we have always a piece of beef, a saddle of mutton, a couple of chickens, and Captain Matthews."

AN Irishman being asked what were the posthumous works of some person, replied, "The works he writes after he is dead."

LINES BY AN ECONOMICAL EPICURE.

Five guineas for a haunch, O shame!

Oh, what expensive cheer!

Yet, here is nothing new to blame,

Ven'son is always—Deer.

"I AM absolutely afraid," said an extravagant nobleman, "that I shall die a beggar." "At the rate you go on," replied his lawyer, "I am afraid you will live one."

"MIGHT your name be Smith?" said a lout with a rap at the door loud enough to disturb the occupants of a churchyard. "Yes, it might," answered the disgusted occupant, "but it ain't by a long chalk."

"As you do not belong to my parish," said a clergyman to a begging sailor, with a wooden leg, "you cannot expect that I should relieve you." "Sir," said the sailor, with a noble air, "I lost my leg fighting for all parishes."

THE mayor of an English city once put forth an advertisement previous to the races:—"that no gentleman will be allowed to ride on the course except the horses that are to run."

RECIPE FOR LOVE-LORN SWAINS AND MAIDENS.

Two or three dears and two or three sweets,

Two or three balls and two or three treats;

Two or three serenades giv'n as a lure,

Two or three oaths how much they endure;

Two or three messages sent in one day,

Two or three times led out from the play,

Two or three soft speeches made by the way;

Two or three tickets for two or three times,

Two or three love letters writ all in rhymes;

Two or three months keeping strict to these rules;

Can never fail of making a couple fools.

"JACK, hast thou any money in the stocks?"

"Why, no, Roger, I never had a farthing in the stocks, but I have had my legs in them often enough."

DR. JOHNSON was extremely inattentive at a concert, while a performer was running up the divisions and sub-divisions of notes upon his violin. His friend, to induce him to take greater notice of what was going on, told him how extremely difficult it was. "Difficult, do you call it, sir?" replied the doctor; "I wish it were impossible."

THE tax on receipt stamps was introduced during the premiership of the notoriously improvident Fox. The following lines were written on the occasion:—

"I would," says Fox, "a tax devise,

That shall not fall on me."

"Then tax receipts," Lord North replies,

"For those you never see."

BURKE once mentioned to Fox that he had written a tragedy. "Did you let Garrick see it?" inquired his friend. "No," replied Burke; "I had the folly to write it, but the wit to keep it to myself."

"PRAY, Jack, why did you marry such a little wife?" "Why," said he, "I thought you would have known, that of all evils we should choose the least."

WHY did Lord Byron never wear a wig?—I fancy because his course hair (Corsair) was so much admired (sensation).

JACK his own merit sees: this gives him pride,

For he sees more than all the world beside.

"DID your fall hurt you?" said one hod-carrier to another, who had fallen from the top of a two-storey house. "Not in the least, honey; 'twas the stoppin' so quick that hurt me."

It is not only hard to distinguish between too little and too much, but between the good and evil intentions of the different reformers. One man calls out "fire!" that he may save the house; another, that he may run away with the furniture.

R. R.—Send the challenge; no doubt several chess clubs will respond to it.

GEORGE VAUGHAN AND J. GILBERT.—See answer to "Wm Higgs" in our previous number, touching Problem No. 15.

ST. AUGUSTINE.—You overlook the fact that the Rook would be undefended if, in Problem No. 6, it were to take the P. DOUGLAS.—Problem No. 8 is a very ingenious piece of chess strategy. The only mode of mating is by commencing with R to Kt 5.

OLD PHILO.—We shall feel obliged by your favouring us with diagrams of the positions to which you refer. In casting with the Q R, the King must be placed on Q B sq, and the Rook on Q sq.

R. ELLIS FISHER.—In Problem No. 15 you seem to overlook Black's defence of P to B 8 (Knights the Pawn).

DOUGLAS.—Had you taken with the B at your 23rd move, Black would probably have replied with Q to Kt 7, with a strong counter attack.

Solutions of Problems by Mona, Nos. 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19, and Enigmas Nos. 6, 7, 8, and 9; F. G. Ralinger, Nos. 18, 19, and 20; Vite, Nos. 19 and 20; H. T. No. 13; G. | WHITE. | BLACK. |
| 32. R takes Kt | 32. Kt to Q Kt 2 |
| 33. Q to Q B 7 | 33. B takes R |
| 34. P to R 7, with a winning position. | 34. Q takes Q |

The Problems sent shall be reported upon next week.

D. D.—The Problem is an easy mate in three moves, commencing with R to Kt 7, and mating on Q 8.

B. X. W. will be happy to play a game of Chess by correspondence with any subscriber to the FAMILY PAPER who will be willing to play the King's Bishop opening.

Our Editorial Table.

THOMAS BUTTERFIELD.—Under the circumstances you mention it is more polite to take off your hat than merely to touch it.

W. H.—If your parents are living, we advise you not to take the step to which you allude without consulting them. The circumstance of the young lady's living in the same house we consider quite immaterial, and as to her refusal to walk out with you in the evening, we think it showed a praiseworthy sense of propriety. You say you are eleven years older than the lady you love. You are more likely to make a good husband on this very account.

ADELA.—All depends on whether you receive these presents with the consent of your lawful guardians. Never accept any private mark of regard from a gentleman who is not engaged to you. All that relates to St. Valentine is explained in "Cassell's Illustrated Almanack for 1853."

LILLAS.—To clean your head thoroughly and to avoid the evil you mention, wash it twice a week with soft water and curd soap, but dry your hair thoroughly or you will take cold.

DEVONTIAN.—You speak like a man of honour and good feeling, and we would gladly set your heart at rest; but in your circumstances you can take no decisive step. You must watch the course of events. Contrive to see the young person occasionally. She is sure to reveal her feelings. In her peculiar situation she must prove her preference before you can make a proposal.

BETSEY.—Some cooks consider that a ham is better baked than boiled.

AMY WILSON.—Your taste must be perverted, since it induces you to prefer the man who (during your dangerous illness) showed himself indifferent to you, to one who is attached to you, and who can offer you a good position in society.

B. S.—There are highly respectable families residing in Green-street, Grosvenor-square. In a Court Guide (which you can probably consult at some stationer's in your own town) you can find the names of all the private residents.

APOLLO.—If the bereaved mother, of whom you speak, finds any consolation in your society, we advise you to continue your visits.

ONE IN NEED OF ADVICE.—Great evils require strong remedies. Your unfortunate attachment has evidently taken hold of every thought of your mind and every feeling of your heart. You are much to blame for allowing any passion to exercise such an ascendancy over you. The recovery of inward peace and freedom must be your chief object. Under Providence the best means you can adopt is to procure complete change of scene and occupation. Through this change you will inevitably acquire a new train of reflections; and escape the dominion of one ever-recurring thought. Besides, your efforts to procure a situation, and your preparations to enter upon its duties, will rouse you from the stupor of grief. Exertion, when the spirit is wounded, is very irksome, but you will find it bring its own reward, and very likely you will (amid new influences and associations) soon feel sufficiently fancy-free to listen favourably to proposals from some other admirer.

GEORGE.—So stupendous a structure was the great wall of China, that if all the bricks, stones, and masonry of Great Britain were gathered together, they would not furnish materials enough for a work such as the wall of China, and all the buildings in London put together would not suffice to have formed the towers and turrets which adorned it.

M. G.—It is more economical to purchase varnish than to make it yourself.

ADA MONMOUTH.—We think that by keeping the present, and by giving the gentleman so much of your company, you lead him to infer that he would be accepted should he make you an offer of marriage.

W. BURR.—Butchers are not exempt from serving on juries, but surgeons, physicians, and apothecaries are exempt. This is not on account of the barbarity but the constant exercise of their professions. It seems, however, that formerly butchers were exempt; as the learned Sir H. Spilman says, "In our law, those that were exercised in slaughter of beasts were not received to be triers of the life of a man."

DIANA BUSHELL.—We think you have been too violent. In lovers' quarrels we recommend explanations, not angry up-braidings. When you beg an explanation in a kind, gentle manner, perhaps you will receive one.

CALEB.—It was in 1772 that a revolution took place in Sweden. After this revolution Gustavus III. made himself almost absolute.

FANNY.—In Sir Walter Scott's poem of the "Lady of the Lake," Douglas, the father of the heroine, is an imaginary person—a supposed uncle of the Earl of Angus.

ISABEL, MAGGIE, AND ROSE.—The spinning wheel was formerly used by females of all classes. Minerva, the goddess of Wisdom, is represented as proud of her excellence as a spinster. Queens and princesses used to pass their time in spinning; but in our days more efficient and productive machines have quite superseded the favourite old wheel, and we are far from advising young ladies to lose their time in spinning. As to your second question, whether anything can compensate for beauty, we answer you in Thomson's words, who says there is "Something than beauty dearer

Should we gaze, or on the mind,
Or mind illumined face."

But our young correspondents must recollect that the mind must be cultivated before it can thus illumine the face. In our vocabulary of the language of flowers, the rose means "Love," or "I love you."

MARY JANE M.—The fashionable world abounds in such men as you describe. You have placed your affections on a very unworthy object; and as you value your peace and the future happiness of your life, you must conquer your foolish partiality for one whom we do not hesitate to pronounce heartless and coarse-minded. We form our conclusions from your own statements. If he repays love with indifference, and indifference with love, and if he prefers bold women to modest ones, may we ask, what kind of a husband he would probably make? But unless you have a good fortune he is not likely to propose to you at all. Love of money and love of pleasure are, probably, his ruling passions. In previous numbers of the new series of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER you will find advice given to young ladies whose trials are similar to your own. You may derive comfort and strength by following the advice contained in previous answers to correspondents.

C. B. A. (Enniskillen), WINTONIX, AND MANY OTHERS.—Our correspondents have, of course, heard of the Lernaean Hydra, the monster of antiquity with a number of heads, that grew all the faster the more you cut them off. We often think that government situations ought to be arranged on the "Hydra" principle, for the more places are given away, the faster do applicants appear. Why should such a number of Englishmen be looking out for employment from the government? Let them look to private enterprise, and self-dependent exertion, and they will find these pay better in the end.

A SUBSCRIBER FROM THE FIRST.—You cannot do better than procure all the numbers of the "Ladies' Treasury," published by Ward and Lock, Fleet-street. The first number was issued last April. In that periodical you will find a very simple and agreeable method of acquiring French.

MYRTLE.—The only redress we can give you hope of procuring, would be through suing your faithless lover for a breach of promise of marriage. But we do not conceal from you that the verdict may be unfavourable, and then you would have endured exposure and incurred expense in vain.

BANGORIAN.—If you do not know which of the ladies you prefer, we advise you to propose to neither, for it is evident you are indifferent to both. Probably they are equally indifferent to you.

H. B.—The weakness you speak of shows that your health is out of order. Do not over fatigue yourself; take nourishing food and avoid late hours.

NELLY BLY.—By the peculiar custom of the county of Kent, a custom called Gavelkind, a female having land in her own right, can "alien"—that is, dispose of—it at fifteen years of age. This she could not do in any other county.

W. J. CULMER.—For chapped hands mix half an ounce of spermaceti, half an ounce of white wax, and a wineglassful of sweet oil in a jar. Place it on a hot hob. When all the ingredients are melted together, stir them well, and remove the jar and its contents to a cool place. When cold, the wax, spermaceti, and oil will form an excellent ointment, which rub every night on the chapped hands.

MARY JANE.—Before you can take any further steps, you must be quite convinced that your letter has reached its destination. Where feeling is concerned, we should avoid precipitation, lest repentance come too late.

R. S.—To preserve suit for some weeks, melt it in a slow oven and strain it through a coarse sieve into a jar. Keep it till required for use.

A CONSTANT READER.—State your wishes and qualifications in as few words as possible (in order to lessen expense), and advertise them in an influential newspaper.

DELHI.—We advise "Delhi" not to send the presents back until she has courageously sought an explanation by letter or word of mouth. "Delhi's" suitors may be labouring under some delusion. Always endeavour to come to an understanding.

MINNIE.—On meeting a friend, there is no necessity to introduce her to the friend walking with you. The general rules respecting introductions are these—Introduce gentlemen to ladies, and inferiors to superiors.

LOUISA.—Do not attempt to apologise. But watch for an opportunity to write a very clever, correctly worded letter to the person whose good opinion you fear you have forfeited by inattention to style.

CHARLES BUCKLEY.—Your meeting a young lady at an evening party does not constitute an acquaintanceship, although it may lead to one. On seeing the said young lady in the street, your bowing to her before she recognised you was a breach of etiquette.

MILLY ST. JOHN.—Do not be pressing. Ask for the contribution at the gentleman's leisure.

EDWIN.—Henry Russell has a song in which he introduces "a maniac," or rather a poor wretch driven mad by the cruelty of others. The words of this song are so powerfully written that they deserve the name of a poem.

MAGGIE.—You apply to us to answer a question that time, and time only, can decide. However, you shall have our opinion; as to our advice, you have hitherto acted with so much judgment and discretion that you seem hardly to require advice. We highly approve of your immediately informing your parents of the gentleman's attentions, and you may be quite sure that if these attentions are serious, the gentleman will contrive to procure an introduction to you and your family. On the other hand, he may only be actuated by a passing fancy, and you do well in keeping a watch over your own heart.

MARGARET.—The Prince Frederick William of Prussia is not even presumptive heir to the throne. His father succeeds the present monarch, as presumptive heir, and the Prince Frederick only comes to the throne as his father's heir apparent. Camphor injures the teeth, but powdered charcoal is a good dentifrice.

CHARLIE.—Beware of correcting the inaccuracies of language to which you allude. From your account your tutor has many good qualities. In favour of these overlook a few ungrammatical expressions. We have known a match nearly broken off by an angry discussion about the pronunciation of a word. Let others have their jokes; but for yourself be satisfied if you secure a good, kind husband.

SPES, BUCCALAURUS, A HUMBLE SUBSCRIBER.—These three gentlemen are in different degrees of difficulty. "Spes" evidently wishes to make a declaration (in the way of a valentine), and yet not to implicate himself. As he is so deeply in love, we advise him to brave every danger and boldly try his chance. Faint heart never won fair lady. "Buccalaureus" wishes us to assist him in giving advice to a young lady (he evidently admires), and who has received an anonymous love-letter from a gentleman. He wishes to know what she is to do. Let her do nothing; not take the least notice of the letter; she should also carefully avoid the advances of any stranger who may attempt to accost her under spurious pretences. We feel for "A Humble Subscriber." To be indignant with one we love, occasions us much pain, but if the young lady really has a bad, irritable temper, it is better for him to find it out before than after marriage.

FIDDLER DICK.—If your feet are becoming mis-shapen, it is probably on account of your wearing tight boots. Of this evil practice, corns and bunions are the result.

A YOUNG ENGINEER.—"Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast," is a quotation from Congreve's "Mourning Bride."

FLORA WILTON.—We doubt the gentleman's meaning anything serious by sending you a lock of his hair, and we do not approve of your sending any of yours in return. You committed no breach of etiquette in taking wine with two gentlemen.

A CAMBRIAN.—Red is the natural colour of coral, but there is a white variety.

LOVING MABEL.—We are not disposed to assist "Loving Mabel" in cultivating the acquaintance of military men, and therefore we decline helping her to find out the residences of officers.

N. B.—The Editorial Table is not intended for arranging appointments or inserting advertisements.

SOPHIA.—Very serious disputes have been occasioned by a lady's dancing with one gentleman when engaged to another.

EMMIE.—Never despair. The belle of the season sometimes remains single, while a retired maiden like yourself meets with an eligible suitor. At seventeen you can afford to wait.

VALENTINE J.—A journeyman painter's wages would be about thirty shillings per week. If you have a comfortable home you will not improve your condition by marrying a journeyman painter.

JOHN REA.—We recommend you to make the young lady a present of a pleasing, instructive book. Such a gift could not be misconstrued.

DOMINIE CAMPSON'S letter is pro-di-gi-ous-ly complicated. We can't make out his meaning, but think he had better write to the inspector.

K. M. N. (Inverness).—We are not disposed to inform you where the very destructive drink about which you inquire is to be obtained.

ONE WHO HAS SEEN BETTER TIMES wants to be off to Greenland to fish for seals, and applies to us for information in carrying out his desirable scheme. We think he will have seen much "better times" than he can meet with on the coast of Greenland—and if he intends to follow a seaman's career, we should certainly advise him not to choose a whale-ship in his first voyage.

AN INQUIRER.—The usual way of entering upon an architect's profession is to article yourself to a firm for a certain time. A premium is always required; and in eminent firms, the terms on which pupils are admitted are very high.

B.—There is "strong room for improvement," as Hood said of Newgate prison.

ELIZABETH SMITH.—Heifer beef is most suitable for small families. If you want the best, choose that which has a fine smooth grain, with the lean of a bright red and the fat white, or nearly so.

JONATHAN HENRY.—The celebrated bass singer's name is pronounced as though it were composed of two syllables, for instance, For-mes. Herr, which stands for Mr., has the same sound as our word hair.

OLIVER M.—For the recovery of your voice we can only recommend attention to your general health, moderate daily exercise, and care to avoid exposure to the night air. For mere hoarseness the following is an excellent receipt. Half an ounce of powdered spermaceti, half an ounce of powdered gum-arabic, three drachms of elixir of pargoric, and a tea-spoonful of clarified honey. Mix these ingredients into an electuary, and swallow a little of it slowly when the hoarseness is troublesome.

HUGH LATSON THE SECOND.—Tell the truth to both. When you have done wrong, the best thing is to acknowledge your error, how painful soever the confession may be.

RENA, JOHN SERIOUS, ZARA, MYRTLE.—The correspondents whose names we have just mentioned, are all in trouble. The two first because they cannot get rid of their lovers, the two last because they cannot get any. "Rena's" life is made miserable by the persecuting attentions of a man who is disagreeable to her, but who will not take a denial. Let "Rena" show him our opinion on this subject, viz. "that the man who cannot take a rejection, never deserves an acceptance." "John Serious" has written us a long letter, but a few words would have sufficed. As he never promised marriage, he is at liberty to retreat as soon as the lady's coldness and neglect render her unworthy of those attentions which are generally the precursors of an offer. "Zara" and "Myrtle" have perhaps procured suitors by this time. If not, we advise them to take the unmerited neglect of the gentlemen as philosophically—as possible, and by the acquirement of knowledge, or earnest prosecution of business, to secure to themselves blessings of a more durable nature than man's inconstant love.

M. GAUNTLETT.—Give up the study of music, and learn something else instead. Your admissions, "that you find it difficult to distinguish one tune from another, and that you have no notion how to play them with the right accent," are quite enough to prove you have no musical talent. Don't waste valuable time; for without some natural talent for music, you will never become proficient.

EDITH.—We recommend you to endeavour to procure a situation as under-nursery-maid. You are likely to hear of such a place by inquiring constantly at respectable shops. The other situation you mention requires interest.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Ye distant spires, ye antique towers,
That crown the watery glade,
Where grateful science still adores
Her Henry's holy shade;
And ye that from the stately brow
Of Windsor's heights the expanse below
Of grove, of lawn, of mead, survey—
Whose turf, whose shade, whose flowers among Wanders the hoary Thames along
His silver winding way.

GRAY'S Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College.

WHEN Wellington, years after his crowning victory which gave peace to harassed Europe, visited Eton

College, he is said to have exclaimed, "It is here that Waterloo was won."

There was some truth, and considering the plain, matter-of-fact mind of the man who uttered it, no little poetry in the assertion; for it cannot be denied that the training, both mental and physical, carried out at our public schools assists largely in developing the intelligence, perseverance, inherent energy, and indomitable courage peculiar to the Saxon race.

England owes more to cricket and rowing than the majority of her sons suspect; for manly sports not only steel the muscles but solidify the brain. The statesman in his cabinet, the lawyer in his chamber, and the man of science in his laboratory, or in that widest of all observatories the boundless field of nature, are in a great measure indebted for their powers of long-enduring mental toil to the healthful exercise of his youth.

We love the self-reliant spirit, disregard of danger, and unmistakable pluck of our schoolboys. We regard even their sauciness, wild escapades, riotous frolic, and untamable love of fun with only so much gravity as enables us to hide a smile, for we feel that these things, if not quite as they ought to be, are pretty nearly so, and have not the heart to quarrel with them for the difference.

Youth is the spring-time of the future, and ought to be unrestrained in all that is not positively vicious. Twist the sapling, and the tree grows gnarled.

There is but one thing in our public schools to which we seriously object, and that is the monstrous system of fagging—of leaving the weak to the mercy of the strong—of recognising brutality as a right. Its advocates—and they are both learned and great ones—urge that it encourages emulation amongst the boys, stimulates them to hard reading in order to rise to a superior form, and so escape the humiliation.

To this we reply that, if the system of fagging does produce emulation, it can only be the emulation of the gladiator; nay, worse, for in the arena the combatants are equally armed: but what equality we would ask, can exist where the advantages of age and strength are on the side of the oppressor, and the victim is bound to submission?

The nineteenth century is considered an age of improvement. In science, art, and the diffusion of education it undoubtedly is so; but poor common sense, in one respect at least, remains stationary as ever. Fagging is still permitted both at Eton and Harrow.

Do not be alarmed, gentle readers. We have no intention of indulging in the reminiscences of our own boyish days. We will not carry you back so far as that; but merely request you to revert to the period of our narrative when William Thornton parted from his little sweetheart, Alice, in Meldown Park, the morning after the abduction of Lillian.

He had decided on making friends with her cousin, Viscount Illston, in order to facilitate the chance of their meeting at the Holm, the seat of her uncle, the Earl of Carlington.

Like most only sons, his little lordship had been indulged till he had become intensely selfish, which, added to a feeble constitution and timid nature, rendered him ill-suited to make his way in a public school, where pluck is more respected than birth, and pretension treated with unsparing ridicule.

Most boys have a keen perception of character, especially in those of their own age; and, even when unfavourable, the judgment they form is generally a correct one; no wonder, therefore, that the viscount was anything but popular at Eton, where he had not been sent more than two months before the countess insisted on her husband's removing him. The angry mother could not comprehend the necessity of her son—the heir of an illustrious name, and heaven knows how many thousands a year—submitting to be fagged and treated with equality by coarse plebeian lads, children of nobodies, parvenus, destined to work their way up the ladder of life, merely because they happened to know a little more Latin and Greek, and stood in a higher form.

Her ladyship pronounced it both shocking and revolutionary, and, if not absolutely immoral, at least, highly improper.

To her surprise and vexation, the earl only laughed at her request. He had been educated there, so had his father and grandfather. Fagging might not be pleasant; in fact, he had rather an indistinct impression to the contrary, but the greatest men in England had submitted to it. Eton had made him both a statesman and a minister; doubtless, it would do the same for his son.

This was uttered in perfect good faith, for mediocrity is seldom overburdened with modesty, and the noble speaker entertained too high a sense of his own personal merits to suspect for a moment that the unconstitutional influence he exercised in the lower house, where his vast landed possessions enabled him to return three members, had anything to do with his elevation.

William Thornton was a great favourite at Eton—not for his cleverness, for there were several who excelled him in that respect, but because he possessed one of those frank and generous spirits which, whilst they awaken kind sympathies and boyish friendships, afford rich promise of the future man. In a word, he was popular in the school, exactly in the same ratio that the young viscount was disliked.

Some natures are incapable of feeling gratitude, and Illston's was one of them. William assisted him with his exercises, fought his battles for him—only, be it understood, when his protégé was put upon, or in the right—and yet his lordship hated him most cordially; hated him for his superiority, the mortifying sense of dependence, but above all for his not having succeeded in procuring his election into the crew of the Mermaid, the great object of his ambition. Not even his protector's popularity could accomplish that.

The boys declared they would not have him, and there was an end of it.

Many of William's friends wondered at his motives. One hinted at "tuft-hunting," but although the accusation was so indignantly scouted that he never ventured to renew it, the change was not approved, and the youth had occasionally to encounter cold looks and unkind words; but he endured them both, for the chance of once more meeting his little playfellow Alice.

Of course it was not love that influenced him. Maiden aunts and bachelor uncles who—we never could understand the reason why—are regarded as learned authorities in such matters, would pronounce the supposition both ridiculous and preposterous.

Logically speaking, we doubt they would be in the right; for the blossom is not the fruit, but merely its sweet precursor.

The heart and flower have both their mysteries, which neither philosophers nor naturalists may read; their profoundest speculations only puzzle us.

As learned and ignorant arrive eventually at the same conclusion, "that such things are because they are," would it not be as well to start from it at first?

The first of May was the birthday of the Earl of Carlington; and, consequently, a great festival at the Holm. The tenantry presented an address, which the steward read, and the children of the village school sung an ode to commemorate the anniversary, to which his lordship and his aristocratic guests listened, seated in solemn state on the dais of the great hall.

Such had been the custom for centuries in the family, and the present head was a great stickler for old traditions: precedent was his guide not only in public but private life.

It was upon the occasion we have just alluded to, that his son was permitted to invite half-a-dozen of his schoolfellows to see the stately magnificence of his paternal home, and join in the festivities. As a matter of course, every one expected that William Thornton would be the first whom he selected, and probably the youth anticipated it himself.

It is an old proverb, but a very true one, that you have only to succeed in serving any one ninety-nine times, and fail in the hundredth, to make an enemy for life. Illston had never forgiven William's non-success in getting him elected into the Mermaid. It rankled in his mind, and he displayed its littleness by asking all the crew, with the exception of the one who had tried to secure his election, fought his battles, and every way befriended him.

Schoolboys generally possess an indignant sense of injustice. The non-invited pronounced the conduct of the viscount shabby, the invited secretly thought it so; and one of them, Alfred Wharton, William's great chum, positively refused to accept it; for which piece of quixotism, as Dawlish, the head boy of the school pronounced it, he called him a fool.

There were two lads of the name of Wharton at Eton: the one we have just alluded to, and a younger, Fred, the orphans of a distinguished officer who had died in India, and remarkable for their strong affection for each other.

Alfred, the elder, although richly endowed by nature, both in person and understanding, did not think himself in any way superior to his younger brother, a delicate, thoughtful youth of fourteen, exceedingly reserved and shy. On the contrary, he invariably asserted that Fred possessed talents far superior to his own, which only required time to develop; and he watched over and defended him in all his schoolboy quarrels with a love as untiring as it was beautiful.

If ever the voice of Alfred was heard in anger, in nine instances out of ten the hearers might be sure that some one had offended his brother, for never was a lad more patient on his own account.

At last it became understood in the school that to quarrel with Fred was to provoke an encounter with Alfred; and, as both were generally liked, a quarrel or a battle rarely occurred.

"I am sorry, very sorry," observed William Thornton, as he strolled with his friend towards the Bells of Ouseley, "that you have refused the invitation to the Holm on my account."

"I did so because I felt disgusted with the shabbiness of Illston," was the reply. "Such a friend as you had been to him! It was not your fault they would not have him in the Mermaid. You tried hard enough to get him in."

"Harder than I shall ever do again," said the former; "for his conduct, to say the least of it, is ungrateful."

"You do not care about being invited to the Holm," exclaimed Alfred; "I am certain of that, although Walters insinuated that you had been tuft-hunting."

"He was right," quietly observed William.

His companion appeared surprised.

"I did wish, most earnestly, to be invited to the Holm; but not for the reason Walters imagined," added the speaker.

"That I am sure you did not."

"It was in the hope of meeting a—a friend, a dear little playfellow—Illston's cousin, whom I have known from childhood."

"I never heard you mention him before," observed his friend, archly.

"Did I say him?" exclaimed William.

Alfred smiled.

"You have bowled me out," exclaimed the speaker: "the playfellow of whom I spoke is a girl,—the only child of Sir Norman and Lady Boothbroyd—beautiful as a fairy—not that I have ever seen one—frank, truthful, and loving as yourself. Somehow," he added, "our fathers never could agree; they seldom meet but to quarrel; the baronet is proud of his name and descent,—thinks more of the purity of his blazon, than any qualities of heart or mind. Mine too is proud in his way, and with better reason, for he has been the architect of his own fortune, and need not blush for the use he has made of it."

"And the little playfellow's name is—?"

"Alice," answered the youth, colouring slightly.

"And a very pretty name too," said his companion, repeating it several times; "I am half in love with it myself."

"One motive for my wishing to see her," said William, "is to return a chain and locket."

"Which she gave you?"

"No: which I found in Meldown Park. Had you not refused the invitation to the Holm, I should have asked you to have been the bearer of it."

"As I have declined to be of the party, Illston may regret his injustice, and ask you," observed Alfred.

"I wish he may—to have the pleasure of refusing him!" exclaimed the youth, impetuously. "No—not even for the gratification of seeing Alice could I now accept his tardy kindness. I never really liked him, and feel it a relief to be quit of my self-imposed task."

That same evening Alfred Wharton informed his friend that he had yielded to the viscount's pressing request, and consented to accompany him to the Holm. "I need not tell you," he added, "that it was on your account: you have only to make a packet of the chain and locket—I will be the bearer."

It is needless to say the arrangement was eagerly accepted by William Thornton, who promised to watch over Fred during his brother's absence.

Alice and her parents had been nearly a week on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Carlington, when her cousin and his schoolfellows arrived. She had never yet seen Illston, and the impatience she expressed did not escape the observation of her aunt and mother. They smiled, nodded, and looked wondrous wise on the occasion. Had they known how slight a share her cousin had in the restlessness the fair child betrayed, they would not have been so sanguine in their auguries.

Alfred Wharton alone read the expression of disappointment on her features as his lordship introduced his companions. He longed for an opportunity of speaking to her and delivering the packet, but neither in the drawing nor dining-room could he contrive one; so resolved to wait till the following day, when, after the fête on the lawn for the tenants and villagers, there was to be a ball in the great hall for the more aristocratic visitors.

It is astonishing at how early an age boys educated at Eton arrive at that "nil admirari" kind of feeling which no two words in any other language can half so well express. Not one of his schoolfellows, with the exception of Dawlish, condescended to gratify the vanity of Illston—who expected to see them awestruck—by showing the slightest sign of surprise or admiration at the splendour of the Holm, the train of liveried menials, the costly service of plate, or the illustrious names of his father's guests.

Lads not yet out of their teens challenged peeresses to wine, joined in conversation with statesmen, and appeared as perfectly at home as if they had been accustomed to the society of peeresses and statesmen all their lives.

Some persons may assign this precocious but not ungraceful confidence to the manliness of their sports or the neighbourhood of the court. For our own part, we attribute it to a very different cause—their white cravats. Every Eton boy wears a white cravat; and strangers, when they encounter one in the neighbourhood of Windsor, may be sure that the wearer is either an Etonian or a waiter.

The Earl, who had lost nothing of the esprit de corps of his school days, for once laid aside his solemn dignity, and complimented the youths on the result of their last rowing-match against Westminster. He even recollected the name of the victorious boat—the Mermaid.

In an instant Alice was all attention. She remembered it too.

Illston observed that "every one of his companions belonged to the crew."

"Are they all here?" asked his lordship.

"The stroke oarsman is absent," observed Dawlish.

"You should have invited him," said the peer, addressing his son; "but perhaps he is not one of your friends?"

The Etonians exchanged glances, and the viscount both looked and felt annoyed.

"Oh yes, he is!" exclaimed Alfred Wharton, delighted at the opportunity of displaying his friendship, and exposing the meanness of his lordship, "for he invariably stands up for Illston. There is not a braver or a better fellow in the college than William Thornton."

"The son of a manufacturer, I believe," said Sir

Norman, in a tone of affected contempt. "I think my nephew acted very properly in not inviting him."

"Very properly," repeated his wife, again descending to her role of echo. "A rude, coarse, presuming, ill-mannered boy. I know him."

The eyes of Alice filled with tears at this ungenerous remark, but respect for her parents kept her silent.

"We cannot be speaking of the same person, Lady Boothroyd," observed Alfred Wharton, in a tone so exquisitely yet coldly polite that it was impossible to take offence at it. "The William Thornton I mean is one of Nature's gentlemen—kind, courteous, modest, and unassuming; his manners irreproachable. Every one who knows him loves him. As for his father being in trade," he added, "it may be a misfortune in the opinion of some, but certainly not a reproach."

The ill-principled woman smarted under the spirited rebuke, which cut all the deeper from the polished language in which it was conveyed. Vainly she endeavoured to silence the speaker by elevating her eyebrows and assuming a disdainful air—true friendship is not so easily put out of countenance.

"A very odd boy," she whispered to her sister the countess.

Alice thought him anything but "odd." In her childish judgment she had never listened to any one more truthful and straightforward. She longed to thank him—talk to him of William—of the Mermaid—hear the particulars of the last race, and again regretted that she was not a boy, that papa might send her to Eton.

During the rest of the evening Alfred could not find one single opportunity of executing the commission his friend had intrusted him with.

"To-morrow," he thought, "in the bustle of the ball-room, I shall be more fortunate."

The May day dawned bright and gloriously, as a painter could have desired or nature's poet imagined it; and the sun had scarcely kissed the regal towers of Windsor, which were visible from the Holm, before the friend of William was startled from his slumbers by music upon the lawn beneath his window.

Whilst dressing, he listened to the quaint words and still quaint air which the children of the parish schools sung in honour of the day:—

Come, gentle May, from thy woodland bowers,
Come smiling through April's sunlit showers;
Young Summer, thy bridegroom's impatient to meet thee;
Winter, thy guardian, has fled to the north:
Balm-breathing zephyrs now herald thee forth,
And maidens assemble with sweet songs to greet thee.

Come like a bride, clothed in virgin white;
The gems on thy brow the dewdrops of light;
A tear on thy pale cheek, a sweet smile on thy mouth.
Thy cold tears young Summer shall quickly dry;
Mirth and content sparkle bright in thine eye,
For his kisses are warm with the breath of the south.

By the time the singers had concluded, Alfred Wharton had descended to the lawn. Never had the face of nature appeared more beautiful. The delicate flowers, invited and encouraged by the sun's first kiss, coyly peeping from beneath the sheltering leaves of their parent stem,—the elasticity of the air, laden with the breath of opening spring,—the song-birds' matin strains waking a hundred harmonies instinct with music,—all lent enchantment to the scene, and plunged him in one of those delicious reveries—soft waking dreams, the very poetry of life and youth, to which in after years we oft return, but never can succeed in analysing.

A musical, child-like laugh recalled him to himself. Alice and her governess, Mademoiselle Jaulain, were crossing the grounds for their morning walk. The little gipsy had recognised the friend of William, and given him a hint of her presence.

Alfred was by her side in an instant. It was the very occasion he wished for. At first they spoke of the flowers, the loveliness of the morning, of anything except of him who was uppermost in the minds of both of them. Alice first introduced his name by asking if William had steered the Mermaid in the last race.

"He pulled the stroke-oar," answered the youth, highly amused at the question, and the air of gravity with which it was put. "But how came you to know the name of our boat?"

"I have heard her described so often that I could make a drawing of her," replied the little maiden, with childish glee.

"And what colours would you paint her?"

"Green picked with white."

"You have an excellent memory," whispered Alfred; "is it equally retentive for your friends?"

"I never forget those I love," exclaimed Alice, with a smile.

"Neither do those you love forget you," said her companion; "poor William feels terribly disappointed in not meeting you at the Holm. It was very shabby of Ilston not to invite him, considering how he has stood up for him."

The fair child shook her head angrily.

"I hope he will not fight his battles for him any more, or write his exercises," she observed; "I would not. But you had better leave me now," she added, "or poor mademoiselle may get scolded."

"For allowing you to converse with me?"

"Yes," answered Alice, artlessly. "Mamma won't like you for speaking so well of William; good-bye. I shall see you at the ball, and will dance with you," she added, "if you ask me."

As a matter of course, the young gentleman did ask her; and, before separating, contrived to place in her hand, unseen by the governess, the little packet his friend had intrusted him with.

Never had the youthful heiress of Sir Norman Boothroyd felt so impatient for the termination of her walk. The song of the birds had lost its melody, and the flowers, of which she was so fond, could only obtain a passing glance. She wondered what William could have sent her, and whether he had written. It was not till her return to the Holm that Alice was enabled to gratify her child-like curiosity.

"What a lovely chain!" she exclaimed, as she drew forth the slender thread of gold and turquoise heart which William Thornton had found on the morning of his last visit to Meldown Park, and sent to her under the impression that it was hers.

There was a note, too, carefully written, in which the writer expressed his half-boyish, half-manly regret at not being able to see her; begged that she would not forget him; and concluded by adding that he had sent the chain and locket, which he had not had an opportunity of conveying to her before.

The young lady naturally considered it a gift: the finder, for fear of his letter falling into her ladyship's hands, forbore to make any allusion to the manner in which he had become possessed of it.

To wear the chain was out of the question; it might have led to inquiries. The heiress, therefore, after having placed it round her neck and sufficiently admired it, reluctantly removed it to be consigned to the safe keeping of an ivory box, in which she guarded her little treasures; one of the most valued of which was a feather from the wing of a favourite dove, that had died upon her bosom, and which she never regarded without a tear.

William Thornton had felt himself perfectly justified in writing to Alice, under the idea that he was restoring a trinket she had lost; but, young as she was, Alice was too good a girl to reply to him without first obtaining the permission of her parents, and that she knew to be impossible.

In the course of the morning the Earl of Carlington, after receiving the congratulations of his family and friends, listened to the address of his numerous tenants, containing the usual stereotyped phrases of "liberal landlord," "friend to agricultural improvement," "influence in the councils of the country," &c. &c. &c.

At the ball in the evening, just as Lady Boothroyd observed to her daughter that it was time she should retire, Alice presented Alfred Wharton, who had danced with her several times, with two flowers from her bouquet—a camelia and a half-opened rosebud; the first he kept for himself, and on his return to Eton the following morning gave the latter to his friend.

Doubtless he had interpreted the donor's intentions rightly.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Was ever such a brother?

Turn over all the stories of the world,
And search through all the memories of mankind,
And find me such a friend. It has outdone all—
Outstripped them sheerly. . . . To die for me,
In all the blossoms of his youth and beauty!

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

ILLSTON'S stroke of policy in inviting the members of the Mermaid's crew who had not voted for him to the exclusion of the only one who had, like most acts of selfishness, produced anything but the result he had anticipated. His schoolfellows considered his conduct mean, and all but Dawlish treated him with greater coolness than ever. The friendship of the latter, who, although so young, could keenly calculate his interests, in some measure made up to him for the loss of William's protection; but he had to pay a heavy price for it, for Dawlish was the tyrant of the school, capricious in his favours, and—as most tyrants are—ungenerous, and exacting.

The splendour he had witnessed at the Holm had excited his envy as well as admiration; but, despite his consciousness that the viscount might one day be useful to him, he could not always resist the pleasure of fagging a lord.

A few days after their return to Eton, his new friend, in fulfilment of a promise he had made, proposed the election of Ilston as one of the crew. Alfred Wharton opposed it vehemently, and all but William Thornton sided with him.

The latter declined to vote.

From that day, Dawlish, who had hitherto carried everything with a high hand, became the enemy of Alfred. He could not visit his malice upon him personally, for they were both on the same form, but he found the means to wound him on a point in which he felt far more sensitive,—his younger brother.

A few days after the party at the Holm, the Earl of Carlington and his visitors drove down to Windsor to witness a rowing-match,—Eton against Westminster. Alice and her mother were also of the party; it was one of the happiest days in the life of the fair child: she was to see the Mermaid she had heard so much of,—see it with her own eyes, and witness what it could do; and perhaps obtain an opportunity of exchanging a word with William too.

"There! there she is!" exclaimed Alice, as the boat, impelled by young and vigorous arms, darted like an arrow through the water.

"There who is?" demanded Lady Boothroyd.

"The Mermaid, mamma."

"I can't see the name," said the countess, levelling her glass towards the river.

"The white picked with green," said Alice, who, in her eagerness to watch the contest, stood upright in the carriage. "William pulls the stroke oar, Dawlish and Alfred Wharton the next ones; Murray steers. See, see, mamma, how regularly the oars dip into the water: not a splash—a spray. Beautiful, beautiful! I am sure the Mermaid must win!"

In the excitement of the race—which was closely contested, the winner being not quite half a length in advance—the speaker waved her handkerchief; and when at last the crew of the Mermaid, with a saucy cheer, threw up their oars as they passed the winning-flag, a silvery, happy laugh replied to them.

Few of our readers are so old as to have forgotten the excitement which a cricket-match, a boat-race, or a contest of any kind between the boys of the two rival schools occasioned in their youthful days. The wild joy of the victors, the eager congratulations of their comrades—every one of whom feels that he has a share in their triumph—contrasted with the half sullen, half defiant looks of the defeated, who invariably assign any reason except the right one—the superiority of their opponents—as the cause of their defeat.

That they never admit.

The party from the Holm were not the last to congratulate the crew of the victorious boat on their victory; the earl—statesman as he was—joined heartily in the excitement, which, doubtless, reminded him of his own boyish days.

"Capital rowing!" he exclaimed; "Eton has not degenerated in that—still maintains her old superiority. The Monarch was the crack boat in my time. I pulled the stroke-oar in her when she beat the Vixen. Some remarkable men belonged to her—two bishops and a chief justice."

The boys recollected a lumbering, heavy-built thing called the Monarch rotting bottom upwards in Searle's yard, where it had been lying for years, and laughed at the idea of comparing her to their own light, graceful skiff, which looked, as it danced upon the waters, or cut like an arrow through them, as though it had been launched by the hands of fairy builders.

His lordship, in the gush of his early recollections, requested to shake hands with the victors. As he was an old Etonian, and, moreover, one of her Majesty's ministers, of course he was not refused.

"Who is this young gentleman?" he demanded of his son, as the only member of the crew who had not been invited to the Holm approached the carriage, his handsome countenance flushed with health and exercise.

The viscount hesitated to name him.

"It is William Thornton," exclaimed Alice, extending her hand to him. "Mamma, mamma, will you not speak to him?"

Lady Boothroyd, however, she might feel annoyed by her daughter's frankness—which, par parenthèse, she never learnt from her—possessed too much tact not to hide her displeasure, and receive the son of her country neighbour graciously. She even carried her hypocrisy so far as to inquire after the health of his father.

"I thank you," replied the youth, without removing his eyes from the beaming countenance of his former playfellow, "he was quite well when last I had the pleasure of hearing from him. Well, Alice," he added, addressing the fair child, "did you recognise the Mermaid?"

"Knew her in an instant," was the reply; "I have not forgotten—green picked with white."

For one little instant their hands were clasped in each other. Sir Norman began to feel annoyed at the pertinacity of his daughter's regard for the son of the manufacturer.

"Really, Lady Boothroyd," he exclaimed, "you must dismiss Mademoiselle Jaulain: she is not a fit person to have the care of my daughter,—the manners of Alice are rustic to a degree,—no reserve, no dignity."

"Not the least," said her mother.

The eyes of the little offender filled with tears at being so harshly reprov'd at such a moment; but she read in the sympathising glance of William that he judged the cause, and thanked her for having incurred blame for his sake.

Not to increase the ill-humour of the baronet and his lady, he took his leave at once; a faint smile rested for an instant on the features of both the children as they bade farewell, then disappeared.

Years were destined to elapse before they met again; but the memory of that smile rested like a sunbeam in the memory of each.

The rest of the afternoon was devoted by the boys to cricket.

The game was at its height when Dawlish, who had been bowling, called, in angry tones, to Fred Wharton to send back the ball, which had fallen near him.

The boy began to look for it.

"Lazy whelp!" muttered the tyrant, impatiently.

"Look for it!" he shouted aloud, after waiting an instant.

"I cannot find it," replied Fred, who had been anxiously seeking it, for he had not the slightest wish to provoke the brutal temper of the speaker.

To this Dawlish made answer by giving him the lie.

In an instant the quiet, gentle youth ceased his search; his pale cheeks coloured at the word. Young as he was, he had the consciousness of being a gentleman, and he scornfully retorted the insult.

The game became suspended.

"Did you address yourself to me?" demanded his aggressor as he strode up to him.

"Undoubtedly."

"You are an impudent little rascal!" exclaimed Dawlish, seizing him by the arm, "and I have made up my mind to punish you. Strip!"

Fred took no notice of the command.

"Off with your jacket!"

The boy refused: and yet he knew that by doing so he should only provoke a double amount of violence. Although so many years the junior of his assailant, Fred Wharton disdained to ask for mercy, or show the slightest sign of fear; on the contrary, his eyes, generally so calm and dreamy, flashed scorn and defiance on him.

Dawlish had seized his victim by the wrist, which he turned so as to render all resistance on his part impossible. Just as he raised a cane to strike him, Alfred, whose attention had been engrossed at a distant part of the field, dashed between them.

"Has he struck you, Fred?" he demanded.

"Not yet."

"Stand aside, Alfred, or I shall mark you," said the sixth form boy, with a sneer.

"You shall kill me," replied the generous boy, "before you lay a hand upon my brother. I have watched you for some days past. You have sought this occasion—made it. Ask the entire college, and you will not find one to speak an ill word of Fred."

"It is no use to plead character to me," replied Dawlish; "you know the laws of the college as well as I do."

"Quite."

"I have a right to fag him."

"But not to torture him."

"Let him thrash me," whispered Fred in the ear of his brother; "I shan't mind it."

"Torture!" repeated the former speaker; "nothing of the kind,—a little correction will do him good. Stand aside, or I shall hit you, although you are in the sixth form."

He advanced, with the evident intention of seizing the arm of Fred a second time, but a blow from the indignant hand of the elder brother sent him reeling.

"It is a battle then?" observed Dawlish, coolly.

"Since you have provoked it."

Alfred Wharton, though tall of his age, was of an exceedingly delicate constitution, and little suited, judging from appearances, to contend with a lad like Dawlish, two years his senior, stoutly built, and possessing, in addition, a scientific knowledge of that art which royalty, in the days of George the Fourth, condescended to patronise and practise.

In other words, he was an experienced boxer.

The contrast in their persons became still more marked when they had removed their jackets for the fight.

"Not for me," exclaimed Fred, clinging to his brother—"not for me; stay, I—I will apologise to Dawlish; submit to be thrashed, if that will satisfy him."

"Nothing will satisfy him now," replied Alfred; "but you have nothing to blame yourself for, he sought the quarrel—made it."

Although we have witnessed such contests in our boyish days, and, we fear, taken a share in them, we have not the slightest intention of shocking the feelings and good taste of the majority of our readers by entering into a scientific description of the fight between Dawlish and Alfred. One was prompted by brutal passion and a domineering spirit; the other by the fine, manly feeling of fraternal love to protect his younger brother.

For some time it appeared doubtful to the spectators how the combat would end. If the punishment which Wharton received was severe, so also was that which he inflicted.

His assailant observed that every time he struck him in the chest, the gallant youth changed colour. From that moment his victory became assured. He aimed his blows at no other part; and, after a few rounds, they began to tell with fearful effect.

Fred, who stood by, pale as death, his eyes eloquent in the expression of the mental agony he suffered, could endure the sight no longer.

"He will murder him!" he exclaimed.

"Pooh! pooh! nothing of the kind," cried several of the lads, greatly excited by so unusual an event as a battle between two sixth form boys.

Alfred's second saw that his man must soon give in, and Dawlish would celebrate his victory by caning Fred before his brother's face.

"Get some brandy," he whispered to one of his friends. "That will keep him up; his opponent does not half like it."

By the termination of the next round, the messenger had returned with the fiery stimulant, which the spirited lad drank, not to sustain his courage, but his strength.

"Not a tear," he whispered, as he embraced his brother affectionately. "He shall neither fag nor thrash you whilst I live."

The heroic boy kept his word.

During the hour the battle lasted, those around him several times gave him brandy, to enable him to prolong the fight, little suspecting the fatal result destined to arise from their ill-judged conduct.

Dawlish at last became alarmed at the extreme paleness of his antagonist, and asked him if he would give in.

"And see my brother caned?" replied Alfred, fixing his bloodshot eyes upon him.

"Of course."

"Never!"

"Oh, very well; it will give me but little more trouble to finish you. Your pluck is good enough, but you haven't the stamina. I warn you, it will be the last round."

He was right: with undiminished courage the gallant fellow staggered, rather than advanced, to meet him. A few blows were struck. Alfred fell.

There was a faint cheer from the admirers and followers of Dawlish; but it was drowned by the indignant murmurs of his victim's friends.

"He is ill," exclaimed William Thornton, who had vainly attempted to prevent the fight.

"I know what will revive him," said the victor, flourishing the cane over his head, and advancing towards Fred, who was kneeling, overwhelmed with grief and terror, by the side of the dying youth.

A cry, so loud and piercing that it startled all who heard it, arrested the step of the brutal conqueror. Alfred threw his arms round the neck of his brother, as if he would still protect him.

He did so, but it was with the embrace of death.

"Not a step nearer—not a blow!" exclaimed William Thornton, worked up to an intense pitch of fury.

"No, no!" shouted the Etonians.

Dawlish affected to smile, and still advanced, when the speaker, who had turned to regard his friend, warned him back.

"You have murdered him!" he cried. "Respect the dead."

The words were, alas, too true. The gallant boy had rendered up as pure a spirit as ever offered itself a willing sacrifice at the shrine of human love.

Some of our readers, we fear, will pronounce the scene we have described overcharged, and suspect the author of drawing too strongly upon his imagination. To this we reply, that the circumstance, with the exception, of course, of the names of the parties, is most strictly true. The boy who died was the son of a nobleman distinguished for his position in the House of Peers; and if we do not name him, it is from a desire not to tear open a wound which time perchance has healed.

The papers were filled with accounts of the fight at the time it occurred, and reprobated, even more strongly than we have ventured to do, the system of fagging at our public schools. Truly, precedent is a great thing in England.

Great was the sensation caused in Eton by the death of Alfred Wharton. As a matter of course, his antagonist—for we presume it would be libellous to call him assassin—at once quitted the school, and being well connected, his family purchased him a commission in a regiment bound for India.

The gallant 01st, which the husband of Lady Bell commanded.

So intense was the grief of Fred that it was months before his guardians thought it advisable to permit his return to college. It is needless to say that he was received with the greatest sympathy and kindness; but a marked change seemed to have taken place in his character. The boy who once expressed an almost childish feeling of gratitude for any little acts of kindness, now received them with indifference; avoided all intercourse with his former companions, including even William, and passed his leisure hours in wandering by himself on the borders of the river, or in Windsor Forest.

For some time it was thought that this peculiarity would wear off, that he would resume his former habits and manners; but no—it rather seemed to grow upon him; much curiosity was excited, and his schoolfellows naturally wondered how he contrived to pass his time—what were his amusements?

William Thornton, who had made repeated attempts to renew their former habits of intimacy, resolved to watch him.

After successfully tracing him to one of the most secluded spots in the great park, he suddenly lost all further clue, and was about to give up the attempt when the report of firearms startled him.

At the same moment one of the keepers crossed the path.

"Did you fire?" inquired the youth.

"No, sir."

William turned exceedingly pale; a fearful suspicion struck him.

"But I know who did," added the man. "One of your college gentlemen; he frequently comes here to practise. At first I thought it must be a sham, and kept an eye upon him, till I found it was all right. He is in the gravel pit hard by; rather a lonely place. I often wonder how he came to find it out."

"Can you lead me to it?"

"Willingly," said the keeper. "This way."

After forcing a path for about twenty paces through the thick underwood, the speakers came upon the spot where Fred Wharton had been practising at a card fixed to the stump of a white thorn growing at the bottom of the pit. As they approached, he raised his hand and fired again.

"Not a bad shot," observed the man; "within an inch of the mark."

William slipped half-a-crown into his hand, and whispered to him to leave him.

The next minute he stood alone, contemplating his friend, who, levelling his pistol, discharged it a third time.

The bullet struck the card. The marksman shouted wildly, threw his arms in the air, and pronounced the name of Dawlish.

William Thornton involuntarily repeated it.

His schoolfellow started, and became aware of his presence.

"You have been watching me," he exclaimed, in an angry tone.

"And have I not a right to watch you?" replied the youth, advancing towards him, and placing his hand affectionately upon his shoulder.

"What right?" demanded Fred Wharton, impatiently. "You are not in the sixth form yet."

The bitterness which accompanied the last remark indicated clearly the feeling uppermost in his mind.

"But I am your friend," observed William. "Your dear brother would not have answered me so. He loved me, and understood me better."

For the first time since his return to Eton, tears gushed from the eyes of the poor desolate boy, and he sobbed convulsively.

"This is what I feared," he murmured, when he had regained something like composure. "I can endure harshness, I am steeled against that, but kind words and sympathising looks make a child of me. How you must despise me for my weakness. But you won't betray me? The friends of Dawlish would only laugh at me."

"He has not a single friend in Eton!" exclaimed his sympathising companion, indignantly. "Even Illston has given up defending him."

At the name of the little viscount, the eyes of the bereaved brother expressed profound contempt. He recollected how vociferously his lordship cheered when Alfred fell.

"What a singular amusement you have chosen," continued the speaker, anxious to change the subject of conversation between them.

"Do you think so?"

"And what address you have attained."

"I hit the mark more readily than at first," replied Fred Wharton. "My tears no longer blind me."

"When did you commence?"

"An hour after Alfred's funeral."

William Thornton took up the pistols under pretence of examining them, but in reality to conceal the surprise and painful suspicion the answer caused him. They were exquisitely finished, a pair of old Mantons' best, and had evidently seen good service.

"They are my father's," said their owner, proudly.

"I have heard that he was a gallant soldier," observed his friend, "and fell in the service of his country; the name and weapons of such a man are a sacred inheritance," he added, seriously.

"True."

"You will never disgrace either?"

"I trust not," exclaimed Fred, colouring deeply, for he read the thought of the speaker.

"It was both a foolish and unnecessary remark. Pray forgive me: but I fancied I heard you pronounce the name of Dawlish the last time you fired."

"You did," answered the youth, calmly; "but what then? Does it follow that I intend to assassinate him? Know me better. Deeply as he has wronged me, I shall never place myself upon his level by a crime; but if ever he gives me an opportunity of calling him to an account—of standing face to face with him with a weapon in my hand—he shall receive as little mercy as he showed to my poor murdered brother."

"You wonder to hear the patient, enduring boy speak thus; but suffering has made me prematurely a man."

"Duelling is not murder," he slowly added.

William Thornton thought that it was; but wisely forbore saying so. In the highly excited state of his friend's feelings, the voice of reason might not have been heard.

"Let us return to Eton," he said, drawing the arm of Fred Wharton in his. "Dawlish has embarked for India to join his regiment. Years may elapse before you meet again."

The young marksman replied only by a peculiar smile.

(To be continued.)

SIR PHILIBERT AND LADY BLANCHE.

SIR PHILIBERT, Knight Templar, stood
Before the Lady Blanche of Orne;
His brow betrayed an angry mood,
And on her face was much of scorn.

"Sir Philibert of Spotten Wood,
Go, follow where your fathers led;
Go, make your boast of valour good,
Or cast your helmet from your head."

"Go, fearing neither fire nor flood,
Or else that day will never dawn
When Philibert of Spotten Wood
Shall wed the Lady Blanche of Orne."

Once, twice, and thrice he paced the floor,
Then turned him to the lady fair,
Whose finger pointed to the door,
And said, with mock heroic air:

"I go, sweet Lady Blanche of Orne;
And when I come again to thee,
Some sign shall on my breast be worn,
And men shall speak in praise of me."

But when the knight returned, I ween
He must have fought as cowards fight;
For not a sign on him was seen,
And men but linked his name with flight.

And when the Lady Blanche a bride
Before the sacred altar stood,
The one whose place was by her side
Was not the Knight of Spotten Wood.

Sir Philibert in solitude
Was no man's praise or lady's care;
And so the saying still was good—
"None but the brave deserve the fair."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

PERHAPS, without offence, we may be allowed to say a few words on a disease to which we are all subject. It is a malady common to both sexes and to all ages, but it is easier controlled in children than adults. Not all the physicians in England, not the whole body of the College of Surgeons, not all the drugs in Apothecaries' Hall can effect a cure. They cannot minister to a "mind diseased," and therefore throwing "physic to the dogs," would be in nowise contrary to common sense in this particular.

The disease to which we refer is occasionally produced by trivial circumstances. It has often been caused by a badly cooked dinner, or a delayed breakfast, by a dishonoured bill, or a rise and fall in the money market, a hasty word, an unfulfilled promise, a denied request, a disappointment of pleasure, an idle rumour, and sometimes even a shower of rain has been known to cause the most dreadful results.

The disease is in some cases infectious. It has been known to attack a whole family, and to have been communicated from one to the other like measles or the small-pox. The head of the house has been seized by the epidemic while from home. He has returned with the virus in his system. Symptoms of the malady have rapidly developed themselves in his lady; the children and servants have been seized in precisely the same way, until every one in the household has been more or less affected, and the sign of the plague ought certainly to have been painted on the door of the dwelling, with the appropriate inscription, "Have mercy upon us."

The symptoms of the disease vary in different cases. Sometimes the patient is seized with a paroxysm, during which he (or she) utters very strong language in a highly excited manner, and rapidly passes from room to room, banging the doors and discommoding the furniture. In other cases the patient appears to be struck dumb, and suddenly to have lost all energy. A deep silence is preserved. Questions, though frequently repeated, remain unanswered. The appetite generally fails; nothing is eaten, and an utter prostration of the system is noticeable in every movement.

The symptoms, however, are almost endless in their variety, producing in some a kind of temporary insanity, in which they are ready to commit any act of violence; in others a gnawing sensation of desire to inflict suffering on those about them; in some the attacks are sudden, and are not to be accounted for by any known laws: while in others they are invariably traceable to some known origin. In any case the attack is severe while it lasts; and its peculiarities are such that it is extremely painful to wait upon the patient or to remain in his society. Happily, the malady is seldom if ever chronic, and only requires a careful regimen on the part of the sufferer to effect a complete cure.

BAD TEMPER is the disease to which we thus delicately allude; and so prevalent is it, and so destructive in its results, that we think we are right in introducing it among our "Hopes and Helps for the Young."

It is really astonishing how little our moral reflections dwell upon our tempers. How seldom do its errors impress us with any strong regret. We neither blame ourselves nor think that others should blame us on this account. We value a good reputation; and to secure fame or fortune we think no exertion too great; but as to the regulation of temper we rarely give it a thought. We do not reflect how much happiness or how much misery for those who are nearest and dearest to us lies in the control of our temper. We forget that we are all creatures of sympathy. We forget that the harshness of our words, the coldness of our manner, the bitterness of our looks, may inflict deep wounds, that will lie long ere they heal, and may never lose the scar.

It would be impossible to enumerate and classify all the failings of temper, for they are as versatile as the peculiarities of human character. We may, however, glance at bad temper in a few of its more conspicuous forms; but we can only do this in some of its broader distinctions.

THE VIOLENT.

Violence is the coarsest and most brutal form of temper. Selfish passions, unable to bear any constraint, or any contradiction, or any supposed contradiction, blaze into a devouring flame, scathing everything within reach. Violence of temper is the prime element in the tyrannical character. There are as great tyrants—in their limited sphere—ruling over the family circle as ever swayed a sceptre over an empire.

A low, barbarous, ruffian nature, obtuse and unfeeling, can fill to the brim the cup of calamity for those few over whom he exerts authority. The house he calls his castle he can for others make a prison; the liberty of which he boasts he can make to them the direst bondage; the power which should be their guardianship he can make their terror—heaping sorrows without number on his dependent and defenceless victims.

There are wives in England who turn pale at a husband's step, and hurry their trembling children out of the way when "father's coming." There are brothers and sisters with one amongst the number with whom they can never be familiar; one who goes into a passion at every trivial circumstance, and in asserting his or her own independence renders everybody else wretchedly uncomfortable. This sort of spirit, if given a theological direction, makes the bigot, the fanatic, the persecutor; this makes the martinet of the army, the fire-eater of the mess-table, and would make the most absolute of all absolute tyrants, if clothed with imperial insignia. In its passionate paroxysm it loses everything that calls for respect, and in the thoughtful excites more commiseration than fear or hate, for he who can please nobody is not so much to be pitied as he whom nobody can please, who—

"Speaks plain cannon, fire, and snaps, and bounce,
And gives the bastinado with his tongue."

THE MOROSE.

As temper of this class has its various forms, so it has likewise manifold sources. It may be found in extreme self-consequence, or in extreme self-dissatisfaction. It may be evidenced by haughty contempt or silent and cold indifference. Such a temper constrains the spirit. It leaves the soul few social attractions or generous desires. It throws gloom where it ought to throw light. It withers the smile half formed. It silences the word half spoken. It robs action of loveliness, and takes all grace from speech. It has no soul of frank and generous appreciation. It seems to live only to prove how much pain one human creature may give to others without reaping any gain or pleasure to himself.

The misery that violence inflicts it inflicts openly—this does it silently: violence often feels its wrong—this never: violence has its moments of deep compunction, but this has no time of tenderness. If a violent temper makes a tyrant, a morose temper makes a cynic; one makes the persecutor and the other the ascetic. If both, therefore, are equal in unkindness, the one is at least more coldly intolerable than the other.

THE REVENGEFUL.

Revenge is very commonly the result of a marriage between pride and vanity. Pride is better than vanity; pride can forget and forgive, but vanity very seldom does either. To the vain or the petty proud, flattery is as the very breath of their nostrils. Rough or disagreeable truth is not to be endured. Sensitive at all points, such persons are hurt when you did not know it and did not intend it. They resent as mortal stabs what was merely meant for a joke. They magnify little slights into great wrongs, and by perpetually gazing at a molehill at last bring themselves to believe it a mountain.

To give tit for tat—quid pro quo—is the only thing that can satisfy their morbid vanity. They must revenge every slight—intentional or otherwise, great or small—they catch the transgressor by the throat, and will not let him go till he has paid the uttermost farthing. These anti-social and unmerciful dispositions will make no allowance for the frailty of human nature, or the failings and provocations of their own character; they set themselves up above everything, and to punish an offence, to revenge an insult, would compass heaven and earth.

THE CAPTIOUS.

The captious and discontented are never to be satisfied. They are prompt to complain; are only at peace when they are in a quarrel, only contented when finding fault. Their heads are as full of quarrels as an egg is full of meat. They are the most obdurate opponents, because the most prejudiced; they are the least susceptible to conviction, and the last to appreciate kindness.

"All seems infected that the infected spy;
And all seems yellow to the jaundiced eye."

In all waters there are some fish that love to swim against the stream. In every community persons are to be found who delight to be in opposition to everybody else. They are angry without a cause. They glory in their obstinacy. But as stiffnecks are always diseased, and hollow trees the most unbending, so their inflexibility is a proof of their unsoundness, rather than their strength.

The captious and the discontented would travel from Dan to Beersheba, and at every step of the way cry "It is all barren." No society can please them, no character suit them, no exertion earn approval, and no condition satisfy their wants.

THE CAPRICIOUS.

A capricious temper is the worst of all, for it is the most uncertain. There is nothing on which to calculate. No theory can explain its varieties. And there is no means of refuge or of remedy. Patience may disarm the violent, and subdue the morose; humility may appease the haughty; and carefulness and attention mollify the discontented; but of the capricious you have never the slightest security either for hatred or love. It sits, as it were, on the throne of an eastern sultan, and in a moment makes a slave a prince or a prince a slave; now bestowing wealth and honour, and now ordering the bastinado or the bow-string. Gentle this hour and stern the next, zealous and indifferent, kindly and severe, indulgent and vindictive, charitable and unmerciful, they run incessantly through all modes of feeling. They are more variable than an April day, more changeable than the chameleon,—they have no settled rule for either feeling or action, and their likes and dislikes are without assignable cause or discoverable reason.

We have thus endeavoured to point out a few broad generalities. In such a subject minuteness were impossible. We can give no rules for cure, because we conceive all such rules inefficacious. Each one should ascertain his own special failing, and the remedy must be applied by himself.

EXCUSES OFFERED.

In considering a few of the excuses offered when faults of temper are admitted, we notice—

Natural constitution.—People say they are bad-tempered as they would say they are of a nervous or bilious temperament. They are betrayed when they know it not into wrong speaking or wrong actions. It is their natural constitution, and cannot be cured.

Others plead ill health, or the misfortunes of life. These, they declare, have embittered their constitution, and made them different from what they once were. Fortune and the world have been rough and boisterous in their course. Want of health has thrown gloom over their spirits, and they consequently suffer from a soured disposition.

Others plead errors in training. They were not taught better; were never furnished with right principles; were allowed to have their own way, were spoiled by evil example.

Others urge irresistible provocation. These say, Not to have exhibited passion would have been more than human; that their ebullition of feeling was just and necessary; that they acted precisely as they meant to act, and that they are the aggrieved parties.

None of these excuses hold good. That physical constitution is the root of many of our faults is not to be denied, but it is a mistake to suppose that these faults are incurable. Bodily illness or misfortune may embitter the spirit, but it is neither just nor necessary that they should do so. It is not because we are unhappy that others should be made the same. Evils of training also may be overcome, and eradicated, and when we excuse ourselves on the score that our quarrel was justified, and our passion nothing more than necessary, we are our own judges, and are therefore not likely to be unbiased.

Temper can be controlled. The man who says he cannot help being angry, or sullen, or peevish, deceives himself. We constantly avoid being so when interest or decorum require it. Those whims which strangers would not bear, we cast upon our friends. That temper can be corrected is proved by thousands of instances. It is a glorious achievement, and within the reach of all. Better is he that ruleth his spirit, than he who taketh a city.

Kindness is the greatest strength; exerts the strongest influence; does the most good, and receives the brightest reward. A kind and accommodating spirit is the genuine trait of manly character. A Spanish proverb counsels us to grow angry slowly, but wisdom of a higher source forbids us to be angry at all.

Although, as we have said, the disease of a bad temper is not chronic, although it may be cured, it is much easier to arrest its progress in youth than in maturity. Therefore we affectionately call our young readers' attention to themselves. "Know thyself." See to it that habits of temper—violent, morose, discontented, capricious, revengeful—are weeded out of that bit of garden ground, the heart, that the flowers and fruits of peace and purity may have space to grow and to flourish.

WORTH BETTER THAN WEALTH.

"I TELL you, no, Agnes! I won't have it. The fellow only wants my money. I know him—I know him. I know all these dandified jimcracks. They hang around a bag of gold as crows do around carrion. I won't have any such thing. Now you know."

"Father, you judge Walter too harshly. He is a good man—honest and industrious, and—"

"Industrious, say you? I'd like to know what he's got to show for his industry."

"He has a superior education, father."

"Education! Fiddlesticks! Can he live on his education? Can he make money of it?"

"Yes; he can live on it. He has already obtained a good situation as clerk."

"And will earn just about enough to keep him in the fine clothes he wears. I know these fellows. But there's an end on't. If you choose him rather than your poor old father, you can do so. I can live alone—I shan't live long—you can—"

"Stop—stop, father. You have no right to talk so. You know I could not leave you." And Agnes Bremen threw her arms about the old man's neck, and kissed him, and then she left the room.

"It's curious how these young fools act," the miser muttered to himself, after he had watched his child depart. "There's been twenty of the sharks after that girl—twenty of 'em hovering around her, like man-eaters after a dead body. Don't I know what they want? Can't I see? Aha! can't I, though? It's MY MONEY! But Agnes has never loved one of 'em till this Adams came along. The jackanapes! And now she wants to get married at once. Nonsense!"

The old man bowed his head as he spoke, and he saw a drop upon the back of his hand. It was a bright drop, and the rays of the setting sun were playing in it.

"She cried when she kissed me," he whispered, wiping the tear from his hard hand. "I don't see what makes her so tender-hearted. She never took it from me. But she may have taken it from—"

The old man stopped, and a cloud came over his wrinkled brow, for there was a pang in his heart. He remembered the gentle, uncomplaining being who had once been his companion—the mother of his child. He remembered how she became his wife, even when the bloom of manhood had passed from him; how she loved him, and nursed him, and cared for him, and how she taught her child to love and care for him, too. And he remembered how she had never complained, even while suffering, and how she had died, with a smile and a blessing upon her lips, though the gold of her husband brought her no comforts.

Noah Bremen bowed his frosted head more low, and in his heart he wished that he could forget all but the few fleeting joys of his wife. But he could not forget. He could not forget that it had been whispered how his wife might have lived longer, if she had had proper clothing and proper medical attention.

"But it would have cost so much! I saved money!"

Ah—the reflection would not remove the pang. The other memory was uppermost.

Noah Bremen had passed the allotted age of man, being over threescore-and-ten, and all his life had been devoted to accumulating money. He had denied himself every comfort, and his heart had been almost as hard as the gold he hoarded. But as his hair grew more white and spare, and the years came more heavily upon him, he thought more—reflected more. The sweet smile of his dead wife was doing its mission now; and the pure love of his gentle child was a continual remembrance to him that there were better hearts than his own.

At length the miser arose, and passed out from the room. He would have left the hut; but as he reached the little entry way, he heard a voice from the garret. It was his child's. He crept up the rickety stairs, and looked through a crack in the door. He saw Agnes upon her knees. Tears were rolling down her cheeks, and her hands were clasped towards heaven. And she prayed—

"Oh, God! be good to my father, and make his heart warm and peaceful! Make me to love him with all tenderness, and enable me to do well and truly the duty I pledged to my sainted mother! I promised her I would love and care for him always. Father in heaven, help me! Oh! help me!"

The old man crept down the stairs and out of doors, and for a whole hour he walked alone among the trees. He thought again of his wife—again of his child—and then—of his gold! And this was not the first time he had walked alone there. He did not himself know how great was the influence his child was exerting over him.

Agnes—pure, good, beautiful Agnes—wept long and bitterly in her little garret, and when she had become calm, and her cheeks were dry, she came down and got her supper. But she was not the smiling, happy being that had flitted about the scanty board heretofore.

A few days after this, as Noah Bremen approached his cot one morning, he heard voices from within. He peeped through a rent in the coarse paper curtain, and saw Walter Adams with his child. Her head was upon Walter's shoulder, and his arm was about her.

Walter was an orphan, and had been Agnes' school-mate, and her fervent lover through all the years of opening youth. He was an honourable, virtuous man, and loved the gentle girl because she was so good, and so gentle, and so beautiful. And she loved him, not only because he had captured her heart in bygone time, but because he was, of all her suitors, the only one whose character and habits promised joy and peace for the future.

"I cannot leave my poor old father, Walter," the old man heard his daughter say. "I must live to love and care for him. On all the earth I am the only one left to love him. It is hard! My heart may break! But the pledge of love I gave to my dying mother must be kept."

"And so the great joy-dream of my youth must be changed to this sad reality!" exclaimed Walter, sorrowfully. "I cannot ask you to leave your father, sweet Agnes, for the very truth in you which I worship would be made a lie, could you do so. But I have a prayer—an earnest, sincere prayer. I pray that God, in his mercy, may remove the curse from your father's stooping form!"

"The curse, Walter?"

"Aye—THE GOLD CURSE!" rejoined the youth, fervently. "I hope God may render him penniless."

"What! Penniless?" repeated Agnes, with a start.

"Aye, penniless! for then he would be far more wealthy than he is now. Then he would know how to appreciate the priceless blessing of his sweet Agnes' love, and then the crust might be broken, and his heart grow human again. And, more than all," Walter continued, winding his arm closely about the fair form of his companion, and speaking more deeply, "then I could prove to him my love. Then I could take you to my home—and I could take your father to my home—and we could both love him and care for him while we lived."

Noah Bremen stopped to hear no more, and as he walked away he muttered to himself—

"The rascal! He'd do great things! Me penniless!—And he praying for it!—The young villain!" When the old man gained his accustomed walk among the great sycamores, he wiped something from his eye. He acted as though a mote had been blown in there.

Two weeks passed on, and Agnes grew pale and thin. She did not sing as she used to, nor could she smile as had been her wont. Still she murmured not, nor did her kindness to her father grow less.

"O God! help me to love my father," she prayed one night. "Let not my grief make me forget my duty."

And the old man heard it. One night Noah came home from the city, and in his hand he brought a small trunk. He barred the door, and drew the tattered curtains close.

"See," he said, as he opened the trunk and piled the new bank-notes upon the table. "Look there, Agnes, and see how I have worked in my lifetime. I had no education, but I've laid up money—money—MONEY. How many men would sell me all their brains to-night for this! See—one thousand—two—three—four—five. Count them, Agnes; there's a thousand pounds in each package."

Agnes counted them over, for she thought her father wished it, and she made fifty packages.

"Why have you taken it from the bank, father?" she asked.

"To let it, my child—to let it at a round interest, Agnes. I shall double it, darling—double it—DOUBLE IT."

And while the old man's eyes sparkled with evident satisfaction, his child wore a sad, sorrowful look. And long after that she sat and looked at the working features of her father, and prayed that the Gold Fiend would set him free.

When Agnes retired she left her father up; but ere long she heard him put his little trunk away, and then go to his bed. And then she slept.

Hark! what sound is that? Agnes starts up in affright, and listens. But see! a bright light is gleaming out into the night, and thick volumes of smoke pour into the garret.

"Fire! Fire!" sounded a voice from the entry, and she hears the sharp crackling now, and feels the heat. "Agnes! My child!" And in another moment she meets her father upon the stairs. He is dressed, but she is not.

"Take all your clothing, Agnes, and you can put it on in the entry. The house is all on fire!"

In a few minutes more the father and child stood in the road, the latter with a bundle of clothing in her hand, while the former held a small trunk. They gazed upon the burning building, but neither of them spoke.

And others came running to the scene, but no one tried to stay the flames. And the effort would have been useless had it been made, for the old shell burned like tinder. But more still—no one would have made the effort, even had success been evident, for the miserable old hut had too long occupied one of the fairest spots in the village. There were no other buildings to be endangered, so they let the thing burn.

"You have your money safe," said Agnes.

"Yes. See—I took the trunk. I left the candle burning so that I could watch it. But I went to sleep, and the candle must have fallen over. But I got the trunk!" And as he spoke he held it up and gazed upon it by the light of the flaring ruins.

"That is not the trunk!" whispered Agnes, in affright.

"Nor—" But the old man spoke no further. He saw that he had taken the wrong trunk! This was only filled with old deeds and dusty receipts!

"Ruined! Lost!" groaned Noah Bremen, as he turned from the scattered embers. "I had fifty thousand pounds in that trunk! And where are they now?"

"Never mind," said Agnes, winding her arm about her father's neck, "we'll be happy without it."

"What?" uttered Noah Bremen, gazing into Walter Adam's face. "Do you mean that you will give me a home, too? That you will provide for me, and keep me?"

"Yes," returned the youth, hopefully. "I could never be happy with Agnes, much as I love her, if I thought her poor old father had no home. Come—we'll live together, and be as happy as the days are long."

"But your salary, young man?"

"Is sufficient for us, sir. I have one hundred pounds a year. We can live on that, and lay up something, too."

"Well, well—take her—love her—be good to her—make her happy—don't never—"

When the old man saw the joyous tears leap from his child's eyes he turned away and walked quickly from the house; but he was not so quick but that he heard the blessings that followed him. And when he walked alone beneath the starry heavens he wiped his eyes as though something troubled them.

Gay as a lark was gentle, beautiful Agnes when she became the wife of Walter Adams. The rose bloomed again upon her cheek, and the smiles were upon her happy face like sunshine all the day long.

"Do you pray to God to help you to love me now?" the old man asked, after she had lived with Walter some months.

"Why—what do you mean?" Agnes asked, in surprise.

"You used to pray so, for I have heard you," returned Noah.

A moment the young wife gazed into her parent's face, and then she answered, while she threw her arms about his neck,—

"Oh! I pray that you may be spared to us for long years in peace and happiness; but—love you? Oh! I could not help it if I should try. And Walter loves you, father—he loves you very much, for he has told me so many times."

There was something more than usual in the old man's eye now.

One evening, as the happy trio sat at the tea-table, Walter looked more thoughtful than was his wont.

"What is it, love?" Agnes asked.

"Oh—nothing," the husband said with a smile. "I was only thinking."

"But of what?"

"Only castle-building—that's all."

"In the air, Walter?" asked Noah.

"Yes—very high in the air," the young man returned, with a laugh.

"But tell us what it is."

"Well—I'd as soon tell you as not. Mr. Osgood is to retire from our firm in a few days. He is well advanced in life, and has made a fortune in the business, and he will live now for comfort and health alone. He has not been very well of late years."

"And is that all?"

"No. I am to be advanced to the post of head book-keeper, with a salary of two hundred pounds."

"And is that all?"

"Yes."

"But what 'castle in the air' is there about that?"

"Oh—that isn't the castle."

"Then what is the castle?" urged the old man, playfully.

"Why, simply this," said Walter, laughing, but yet almost ashamed to tell it: "this noon Mr. Osgood parted me on the shoulder, and said he—in his playful way—'Walter, I'll sell you all my interest here for fifty thousand pounds.'"

"Ha, ha, ha," laughed Noah Bremen, "and you thought he was in earnest."

"No, no!" quickly returned the young man.

"I did not think that; though I know that the other two partners would willingly have me for an associate."

"But it seems to me old Osgood holds his share in the concern at a high figure."

"Oh, no. It is a very low one. There is a clear capital of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds in the business at this moment; and then think of all the standing debts and good-will which goes for nothing."

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed the old man again.

Then Walter laughed; and then Agnes laughed; and then they finished their supper.

On the next evening Walter Adams came in and sank down upon the sofa without speaking. He was pale and agitated, and his eyes had a vacant, wandering look.

"Walter!" cried Agnes, in terror, "what has happened?"

"He's sick," muttered Noah Bremen, without looking round.

"No, no—not sick," returned the young man, starting up; "but I am the victim of some miserable trifling."

"Eh?—how so?" asked old Noah, now turning his chair.

"I'll tell you," said Walter, with a spasmodic effort. "I had some long entries to post this evening, so I remained in the counting-room after the rest had gone. I was still at work when Mr. Osgood came in and placed some papers on my desk, saying, as he did so—'Here, Walter, these are yours.' And then he went out. When I had finished my work, I opened the papers. The first was a sort of inventory of what Osgood had owned in the business, and mounted up, in square numbers, to forty-nine thousand eight hundred and seventy-five pounds. The next paper was a deed conveying the whole vast property to me, and making me a partner in the concern upon equal footing with the other two!"

"Well," said the old man, thumping his foot upon the carpet, and keeping time with his hands, "I don't see anything very bad in that."

"But I do," replied Walter. "It is cruel to trifle with me thus."

There was something in Noah's eye again, but he managed to get it out, and then he spoke thus:

"Walter Adams, when young men used to hover about my child, I believed they were only after my gold; and I knew that in most cases I was correct. I believed the same of you. I knew of nothing but the love of money that could influence human action. My heart had become hardened by it, and my soul darkened. But it was for my sweet child to pour the warmth and light into my bosom. It was for her to keep before me the image of the gentle wife whom I had loved and lost, but, alas! who occupied a place in that love second to my gold. It was for my child to open gradually, but surely, the fount of feeling which had been for a lifetime closed up. I heard her pray for me—pray that she might love me—that she might have help from God to love me; and that was after I had refused to let her be your wife. I saw her grow pale and sorrowful, and I knew I had done it—and she loved me still. And still she prayed God to help her—Help her what? Help her love her father! I was killing her, and she tried to smile upon me. One evening I heard you both conversing in the old hut. My child chose misery with duty to her father rather than break that duty in union with the man she loved. And you uttered a prayer. You prayed that I might be made penniless—Stop! Hear me through. You would then show your disinterestedness. I walked away and pondered. Could it be that I had found a man who would love an old wreck like myself, with no money. If it was so, then that would break the last layer of crust from my soul. I determined to test you. I had gained a glimmering of light—my heart had begun to grow warm—and I prayed fervently that I might not be disappointed."

"I went to the bank, and drew out fifty thousand pounds in bills. That night my miserable old hut was set on—~~or—a~~—caught fire. I shall always think it was my candle did it. But the old shell burnt down, and room was made for a better building. I came out with a wrong trunk, and the other trunk was burnt up. But the money wasn't in it. No, no. I had that safely stuffed into my bosom and deep pockets, and all buttoned up; and the next day I carried it all back to the bank, and had it put with a few thousand more which I hadn't disturbed. And so my experiment commenced; and I found the full sunshine at last. Aye, Walter, I found you the noble, true man I had prayed for. You took me into your home, and loved me when you thought me penniless, and you took my child to your bosom for just what God had made her. And now, my boy, I've been doing a bit of work in the dark. I've paid Mr. Osgood fifty thousand pounds in cash for his share in the business, and it is all yours. And let me tell you one more thing, my boy—if your two partners can raise fifty thousand pounds more to invest, just tell 'em you can put in five-and-twenty thousand more at twelve hours' notice. Tell 'em that, my boy! Tell 'em old Noah ain't quite ashore yet. Tell 'em he has found a heart—a heart, my boy! Come here, Agnes—come here, Walter. God bless you both—bless you as you have blessed me!"

Nobody pretended that they had motes in the eye now, for the occasion of the weeping was too palpable.

ALBERT SMITH.

THE great success which has attended the subject of our memoir, is a remarkable instance of the value of perseverance—not only in working—but in seeking the right work. By an energy of disposition and an originality of idea seldom found in combination, Mr. Albert Smith has succeeded in making his name familiar to the public, and he now fairly ranks among the London celebrities.

Mr. Smith was born at Chertsey, Surrey, in May, 1816; his father at the time was practising as a surgeon, and having better means than that profession usually yields in a country town, was enabled to give his son a moderately good education. On attaining a suitable age, and having received a preparatory course of instruction, he entered Merchant Taylors', to complete his studies. Here he formed a determination to follow the same liberal profession as his father, and was consequently articulated as a student in Middlesex Hospital. In this institution he obtained a thorough insight into the mysteries of a medical man's life; he underwent a complete course of study—which he afterwards continued at the Hotel Dieu, in Paris, and ultimately acquired the skill necessary to become a member of the College of Surgeons. He was admitted into this distinguished fraternity in 1838, and thenceforward carried on a respectable practice at Chertsey in conjunction with his father.

A country doctor's life is a dreary one at best. Mr. Smith soon found this out, and not feeling satisfied with the occupation or the gains of his practice, he sought other means of employing leisure time, and strengthening his resources. He was not long in selecting for himself a calling which was destined to supersede the one for which he had been educated. An innate ability led the young surgeon to prefer the pen to the lancet. Accordingly, after a little practice, Mr. Smith betook himself entirely to letters. He found the occupation both pleasant and profitable. He wrote a series of "Sketches in Paris" for the Mirror, when that publication was of some importance in the literary world. He gave, too, the experience of his hospital days in a very amusing narrative, called "The Confessions of Jasper Buddie, a Dissecting-room Porter." These and other works were written at Chertsey, while Mr. Smith was serving an apprenticeship to literary labour. His career in the republic of letters may be said to have commenced in 1841, when he entirely gave up his Chertsey medical practice, and settled in London. He commenced writing for the magazines at once; his first article, "A Rencontre with the Brigands," appearing in the March number of Beetley. His smart, readable style soon attracted notice, and before many months had passed he was a recognised member of the literary fraternity. Success in magazine writing led to more hazardous experiments. Mr. Smith tried his fortune in building a complete book, "The Wassail Bowl," a collection of tales and sketches,—and succeeded. This was followed at intervals by the "Adventures of Mr. Ledbury," the "Scattergood Family," the "Marchioness of Brinvilliers," "Christopher Tadpole," and "The Poppleton Legacy." In the meantime, Mr. A. Smith obtained an engagement as a writer for Punch, and also for the Illustrated London News. To the former periodical he was a frequent and a witty contributor; and to the latter, a dramatic critic of undoubted skill.

Mr. Albert Smith has always been of an active disposition: and although he has had numerous literary engagements on hand, he has found time to write for the stage. A melodrama, called "Blanche Heriot," was produced at the Surrey Theatre with marked success. This line of writing was maintained by a series of extravaganzas and burlesques for the Lyceum Theatre, then under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. Keeley. The success of these works led several metropolitan managers to seek the services of Mr. Albert Smith, and the result was the production of a variety of sparkling pieces, showing much skill and knowledge of stage effect. About this time a large demand arose for cheap books for railway and casual reading. The literary market was fairly swamped with shilling works and shilling editions. Mr. A. Smith, ever ready to do the right thing at the right time, profited by the prevailing taste, and issued a series of photographic sketches of London society, in the shape of shilling books. The "Natural History of the Gent" had a remarkable run of popularity; as did also "The Flirt," "Ballet Girl," "Idler upon Town," &c.

We now arrive at another phase in the adventurous life of Mr. Albert Smith. To leap out of a jog-trot system and strike into a new path is characteristic of the man. While enjoying great popularity as a humorous writer, Mr. A. Smith threw up the greater part of his engagements for the purpose of travelling to the East, with the view of publishing a book upon the journey. He remained at Constantinople about a month, and gleaned ample materials for a readable volume. This had scarcely been published, when the indefatigable author was ready with a descriptive account of the journey and a series of pictorial illustrations, arranged into a lecture for an evening's entertainment. This was called "The Overland Mail." It had an excellent run; and ere its attraction had ceased, another project was mapped out by its enterprising author. This—the lucky idea of his life—was the ascent of Mont Blanc! In the autumn of 1851 Mr. Albert Smith accomplished the feat. He brought out his lecture descriptive of the event in the month of March, 1852, and in doing so, laid the foundation of an unprecedented popularity and a splendid fortune. From that day to the present, Albert Smith's lecture has been one of the principal attractions of the metropolis. He has given it every day during the last six years, and frequently twice in a day. The lecture has now been repeated nearly two thousand times! Once in each year Mr. A. Smith takes a vacation of a month or so, and employs it in travelling to Chamounix, where he is looked upon as a magnificent patron, on account of the popularity he has given to the place. To so shrewd an observer, the journey there and the return home are sure to afford novel materials to introduce into the lecture. By these means, with the addition of amusing recitations, adapted to the circumstances of the day, Mr. A. Smith manages to keep up a wonderful freshness in his entertainment, in spite of its frequent repetition.

It has been represented before the Queen and royal family three times—once at Osborne, once at Windsor Castle, and finally at the lecturer's own home, the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly.

Since its first production, considerable alterations, additions, and improvements, as some say, have been made in the entertainment. We remember listening to it with a great deal of interest when the "monarch of mountains" was new to London; and in hearing it a few nights since we must own we felt disappointment. The lecture, in our opinion, was neither so amusing nor so instructive; the description of comic character did not make up for the absence of that description of beautiful scenery which we had listened to with so much pleasure on a former occasion. And withal the lecturer was severe with his audience, chiding them for laughing in the wrong place, which of course made them laugh all the more. But notwithstanding this, Mont Blanc is a great attraction, and a very agreeable evening may be passed in the company of its gifted exhibitor. He has made the subject entirely his own, invested it with an attractive charm, and rendered it exceedingly popular. His best book, too, is on the same subject. In the "Story of Mont Blanc" he eschews the funny school, and writes as an able, earnest, eloquent man.

SALTO DE LA LAJA, CHILI.

RECOLLECTIONS OF CHILI.

SALTO DE LA LAJA.

In his retirement at Bologna, where he passed seventy years of his life, the Abbé Molina could never forget the magnificent scenery of Chili. There he was born, and there the earliest years of his life were spent; and the impressions of the extreme beauty of that fairest region of America could never be effaced from his memory. It was a pleasant occupation for the old man to trace real or supposed resemblances between the land of his birth and the country of his adoption. He insisted upon it that a parallel existed between the two, and that as one bore the title of the Garden of Europe, the other fully merited the title of the Garden of South America. The climate of the two countries was very much the same; both were strips of land greater in length than in breadth; both were divided by a mountain-chain—the Apennines being to Italy what the Corderilla is to Chili—the source of those rivers whose waters fertilise the land and render its vegetation at once valuable and beautiful.

For a long time Molina (born 1740; deceased 1831) was the only authority as to the physical geography and natural history of Chili. Half a century, however, after the appearance of Molina's book, after fifty years' undisputed authority on Chilian questions, the volume of the worthy abbé has been thrown completely into the shade by the appearance of an entirely original and extremely valuable work by Claude

Gay. There is a remarkable difference between the productions of these two authors. The work of the Abbé Molina evidently bears the traces of the memories of his youth, rather than careful examination. The abbé wrote of Chili as it appeared to him,—enamelled with the flowers, gilded with the sunshine of childhood; Claude Gay, on the contrary, has produced a thoroughly practical book, the result of twelve years of devoted enterprise and persevering exertion. He has written of the mountains, rivers, and cascades, as they really exist, not as they shape themselves to a long cherished memory; he has ascertained, by minute examinations, what really constitutes the peculiarities of Chilian climate, soil, productions, and zoology: his work is reliable, and is, consequently, a boon to the world.

The accompanying engraving, from a sketch made by this intrepid traveller, represents a famous waterfall in Chili. The river Laja, which is said to be one of the largest affluents of the Biobio, has its source in the lake bearing the same name, situated at the foot of the volcano of Antuco. After a rapid course of ten or fifteen leagues, it crosses the plain of los Angeles, and a short distance from its junction with a stream to which it is tributary, it forms a cascade, celebrated all over the country as the Salto de la Laja. A little below this fall is a second of less extent than the first. There are several other falls, at different parts of the river; but those of the Salto are the easiest and safest, and have consequently the preference. The Salto de la Laja is in reality the grand junction of the streams which unite the Angelos to Chillan, and to Santiago, the capital of Chili.

CHAPTER XIV.

For a season called to part,
Let us now ourselves commend
To the gracious eye and heart
Of our ever-present Friend.
What we each have now been taught,
Let our memories retain;
May we, if we live, be brought Here to meet in peace again.

RAGGED SCHOOL SONG BOOK.

When the hymn was over, and the children were dismissed with a blessing, Ada looked round for Jem Goodman; but he had hurried away: Apple Blossom had explained the grief that he had noticed by telling him of the death of Esther Darrell, from her drunken husband's blow, and of that miserable man's apprehension.

Jem Goodman—whose sensitive conscience upbraided him that he had not "compelled" Ben "to come in" and sign the pledge—had rushed off to the station-house to which Tippling Ben had been conveyed by the police.

Jem had in his pocket a letter the poor wretch had written to him only two days before. And those lines, written in a lucid—alms sober—interval, were so full of good intentions, and fair promises, and love of that very wife whose blood was now on his head, and of those little ones whom he had made orphans, that Jem Goodman thought, if he could read it aloud at the inquest, it might save Ben from a verdict of wilful murder.

Then, too, Jem Goodman knew, when the demon that had tempted Ben left him alone in his anguish, what despair, and remorse, and passionate love, and vain longing for the wife he had slain, would fill his wretched mind and tortured heart,—and he wished to be at hand to whisper a name potent to save a sinner's soul, and to tell him of that blood of the Lamb shed for such as he, in which, when dipped, sins scarlet as his become white as wool.

"You wished to speak to Apple Blossom, Miss Pemberton?" said Mrs. Golightly, pompously. "She is in the mother's gallery. I have told her a lady wants to speak with her."

Apple Blossom, flushed with vain efforts to conquer the elements which had baffled her hitherto, was sitting among the "wives, with their faces full of woe," and the widows more desolate still,—for it is only rich widows whose gaiety is proverbial—her Testament on her knee, and dead Esther's babe at her breast.

"And ain't thee afraid to take them two babbies home?" asked a woman with one black eye—black from a recent blow—and the other of a pale mixture of green, blue, and brown—the result of a more remote aggression.

"Drat it, Apple Blossom, your measter must be a soft un; why, if I took home so much as a kitten without his leaf, my shoulders 'ud smart for it; and small blame to him, if any. We've six mouths of our own to feed, and 'tain't reasonable to expect a man to work hard for strange babbies. Wouldn't he wollop me, that's all!"

She was actually proud of her husband's brutality, as an evidence of spirit and wisdom.

"It's only for one night," said Apple Blossom, gently; "and a cup of cold water given in His name to these little ones, won't miss its reward. Bob's very kind-hearted: he'd stint himself, rather than let 'em want."

"Aye," said another, "it's lucky for thee, Apple Blossom, as 'tain't Saturday night. If it wor, thee'd maybe come off as bad as poor Esther Catty there; so don't go for to brag about Bob, lass. I've seen them eyes black afore now."

Apple Blossom blushed crimson, and said, "I never said Bob done it, then."

"No, thee didn't, but others did; and that if thee wasn't a fool, he'd get his six months."

"Bob get his six months!" cried Apple Blossom, very angry; "there's not a better husband going than Bob."

"Ven sober," said the woman.

"Nor a wusser," added another, "than Bob Blossom drunk. I've seed him in liquor scores of times. I tell ye, lass, it's no use deceiving; he's no Christian when he's drunk, he's a rampant heathen."

Apple Blossom sighed, and cast down her eyes full of tears; and at this moment Mrs. Golightly introduced Ada.

Ada sat down by her, talked to her kindly, praised her goodness to little Hope, and to the baby, and little Hussy Darrell.

Apple Blossom had a great share of mother wit and womanly tact. She knew from Jem Goodman that the young lady had seen Esther Darrell struck down, but had no idea the blow was a fatal one; Jem Goodman, with that delicate regard for the feelings of ladies which we so often find in the men of the working classes, had warned Apple Blossom and the other women in the mothers' gallery, not to shock the young lady by telling her of Esther's dreadful death.

He knew how terrible it would be to one so new to her work to be greeted at the onset by wife-murder, committed under her eyes. He knew she would learn it soon enough—the papers would be full of it,—but he dreaded her hearing it suddenly in her then excited state.

Many of the women, with the love of horrors common to their sex and class, longed to tell Ada. But they all revered Jem Goodman; and only ventured so far as nods and groans when Esther Darrell was mentioned; and these conveyed no idea to Ada except that they were a very croaking party.

Ada did not like to offer Apple Blossom any reward before the other women, but she was very anxious to recompense her liberally; and to learn from herself the whole of little Hope's history, and all she knew of Mrs. Evermore's. She therefore gladly accepted Apple Blossom's pretty, meek invitation to her to call and see her in her own humble home on Sunday—Apple Blossom's day of rest and home; and Ada gladly agreed.

She then, following Mrs. Golightly and Ellen St. Ange, took her leave of the ragged school.

CHAPTER XV.

So these in the lower depths of the great city who are fainting by the way must be restored with bread and meat; these who are shivering with the winter's frost must be warmed and clothed; and we must reach their deepest natures, intellectual and moral, by removing that cramp of physical position, that craving of physical need, which they most distinctly feel.—THE LOWER DEPTHS.

"You would like to see the refuge, I am sure," said Mrs. Golightly, "and Mr. St. Stephen is kind enough to allow us to do so."

Ada's heart was very full of all she had seen—but she did not decline; and they went down the narrow, muddy stairs, soiled by those stains which shall be counted marks of honour above, stains left by the worn shoes or bare feet of the destitute.

But the school-room, touching as it was to any human heart, was not so harrowing to Ada's as the first glance she timidly threw round the refuge. In the school there were so many children, ragged and wretched, it is true, but snatched from perdition, dragged or enticed out of the broad road to perdition, temporal and eternal. Wherever there are children, we think more of the future than the past. The future is a fairy-land, in which the most destitute child has an imaginary freehold; but in this refuge Ada saw only men and women, many of them middle-aged, some old; and the thought connected with them was, what must have been their past, for this to be their present? What a tragedy must the drama of each life have been, even of the poorest heaver of wood and drawer of water, to have ended thus.

And yet, poor as was this shelter, with its wooden trough, and woollen rug by way of bed, and its six ounces of bread, the only food since early morning, how gratefully was it accepted by some who had known what it was to be "houseless by night," who had brooded with water-rats under the arches of bridges, and the damp cellars of unfurnished houses, or been maddened by that perpetual "Move on" of the policeman, words that are so terrible to those that have nowhere to move to. To such, what a blessing would the certainty of shelter in the Night Refuge of Green Fields be! But, alas! though it accommodates many, it cannot accommodate a fiftieth part of those it would gladly receive, and of those to whom its cup of cold water, given in His name, its dry bread and poor pallet, are made sweet food and soft couches by the sympathy, the charity, the tenderness with which they are accorded.

Oh, ye who tread the rich carpets of velvet pile, and who, at night, surrounded by your dear ones, draw round the bright hearth, and the blazing fire, and hug yourselves and your darlings, when you hear the rain patter or the wind howl, or know that it is snowing fast or freezing bitterly, think, not merely of the inmates of the night refuge, but think of those whom it fain would shelter, but cannot, for want of funds, want of room, want of help—and when from that bright fireside you go to the warm bedroom, and the bed of down, think of those who wander away from the refuge foot-sore, heart-broken, starving, and ere you sleep, resolve to aid the funds of that refuge.

It is a cruel thing to talk as some do of the poor being pampered and fostered in idleness by such a refuge as this. Let those who, sitting by bright fires in their easy chairs, write down what they so erroneously call the pampering system, imagine themselves passing a night in this refuge.

Ada, as she passed along the rows of troughs, in each of which lay a prodigal similar to him who had eaten of the husks the swine refused, tried not to meet the hollow, glassy eyes of the refugees; and when she did, if shame sent a pale tinge to their cheeks, it dyed with crimson those of Ada. The blush was in keeping with the blood that painted it—theirs, the poor, pale fluid of want and misery—hers, the rich stream that courses through the veins of the young, wealthy, and prosperous. But all were not prodigals: some were guilty, some only unfortunate. There were amongst the refugees men who had worked hard, and worked in vain; victims of long illnesses, of wicked or careless relatives; mechanics run aground—men who felt, and truly, that it was no disgrace to halt for a night in their journey of sorrow at the refuges God had put into man's heart to establish.

Many who would have felt parish relief, even if attainable, a sort of stigma, and would have dreaded the "Bumbles" of the union, broke the bread of the refuge with gratitude untinted by shame, and felt—what no one ever felt in a workhouse—that he was kindly welcome.

In passing by the wooden troughs (which some political economists so grudge these destitute and fallen brothers and sisters of ours), Ada's rich silk dress occasionally came in contact with the bare, swollen, blistered feet of those awaiting their turn for the bath or the lavatory. Some of those feet had not the splay, misshapen form of the habitual trampler. Some seemed to Ada's shy and hurried glance of that shape and texture which bespeak gentle birth or breeding.

Those naked, weary, dusty feet must almost all of them have trodden the paths of sin, and all those of sorrow; and their owners drew them back with a pang from that chance contact with Ada's silken robe. But there was a pang in Ada's heart too: that she was clothed so sumptuously, and that, while her own attire had engrossed her thoughts and consumed her means, she had never before thought of the barefooted and ragged.

In the women's ward a new and painful surprise awaited Ada and Ellen St. Ange. They had been together as young girls at a finishing school in Hyde-park, and at that school there was a maid who had waited on them, and was a sort of favourite; Jessy Hawthorn was her name. She was a very beautiful girl of eighteen, but fond of admiration and with a passion for dress. In the next house to Madame La Mode's fashionable establishment lived a nobleman who had two wild sons—those sad beings called gay men. They were fond of watching Jessy going on errands, and working during summer in an arbour on which their back windows looked.

Jessy saw she was admired, and by tip-top gentry, as she called them. She was innocent then, but she wished to be more admired still. She began to wear forbidden ornaments on the sly,—flowers, bangles, blonde, and jewelry from the Lowther Arcade—that is to say, bits of coloured glass set in ormolu. Her mistress detected this, objected, and forbade it. Jessy, in a pet, threw up her place.

Ada and Ellen never knew what had become of her—they had never seen her from that day, when they had argued with her and implored her to give in, and give up the flowers, bangles, and brooches, until they recognised her in a poor creature, sitting erect in one of the troughs in the female ward, and twisting up her long, rich, auburn hair. Both at the same moment recognised her, and exclaimed, "Jessy Hawthorn!"

Yes, they knew her again, though seven years were between Jessy as she was at Madame La Mode's, and Jessy in the Green Fields Night Refuge; and far more than years, vice and sin had wasted and altered her.

But the large, violet eyes, and rich, auburn hair, and the singular beauty of a face, such as Westall delighted to portray, were remarkable even in sickness and rags—Ada and Ellen knew her at a glance.

Poor creature! she had not perceived the ladies, and they watched her for a few minutes unnoticed.

She was gazing on vacancy with those same sloping, violet eyes, (the same, yet, oh how different!) which they had so often admired at school, and every now and then a smile—an inane smile—parted the blue lips, which they remembered to have compared to chiselled coral.

The matron, on being questioned, said her name was Jessy Hawthorn; that she did not seem quite right in her head, and had been found by a missionary at night, in the rain, leaning over Waterloo bridge; he had brought her there, almost delirious with long fasting; that they had fed her carefully, and she seemed better; but, after dosing for a while, had talked in a rambling way about home and her mother, and some one whom she called St. Clair.

"From what I can gather," said the matron, "she has been seduced by some man of rank, who soon got tired of her, and then went rapidly down the slippery hill of vice, till disease and want drove her to meditate suicide."

"Shall I try to rouse her to a sense of her sins?" said Mrs. Golightly. "Shall I tell her what is the portion of the wicked?"

"No," said Ellen's dear friend, "you might kill her outright. Let us tell her rather of the Saviour's judgment on the woman at whom all men were ready to cast stones—'Go, and sin no more.'"

At this moment, the poor girl's eyes lighted on Ellen and Ada. With a wild scream, she drew the woollen rug of her bed over her face and head, and they could see (as she rocked herself to and fro in her agony) that she was sobbing violently.

Ellen St. Ange drew near, and said, "Jessy Hawthorn, do you remember Miss St. Ange and Miss Pemberton? If so, let us speak to you, Jessy: we come as friends; we wish to serve you—to help you."

"No—no—no, young ladies," said the poor girl, "I am not fit to speak to you now! No one can do me any good now! I would not listen to you when it would have availed so much—I cannot listen now."

"But," said Ellen, "you must listen, Jessy, for there is comfort and hope even for you. If you repent, you will be forgiven all."

"Oh,—no—no! I threw up my place, because I mightn't deck my vain body as in my folly I wished. I said I should go home to mother, but I never went nigh. I knew mother wouldn't hold with me. I soon found one who did—Colonel St. Clair offered me a home—a fine lady's home, and flowers and silks, and real jewels. I was tempted more than I could bear, and I sold myself for dress. I didn't even love him, and he soon grew tired of me, and quarrelled with me to make room for another. He was a brute to me—so were others with whom I lived. I lived with them that I might not die of hunger. At last I fell ill, and was left alone to die. I was in a poor lodging; I had pawned all my finery, and even my under-clothing to pay my rent, and I still owed a week; and the woman had abused me—shaking her fist at me, and had told me, if I didn't clear all before noon next day, she'd have me in gaol. I stole out to pawn my flannel petticoat—yes, I got enough to pay her, and I did so; and then I crept out again after fasting two days, and suddenly I thought of the river. Oh, why—why—why did they not let me die? Why am I here? Where is my mother? Do you remember those happy, sinless days? How kind you were! How kind all the ladies were! And I threw up that place! And all for a few flowers, and beads, and a tinsel brooch! Where am I? What is this board, this rug? Where is the river?" she added, starting up, tearing her hair, and beating her bosom.

"You had better leave her to me, ladies," said the matron. "She is excited. I do not like her symptoms. I shall send for our medical adviser; but leave her now. It is the past, realised to her mind by your presence, that distracts her."

"She must be bled, blistered, and restrained by a strait waistcoat," said Mrs. Golightly.

"Oh! I hope not," said Ada.

"Perhaps a sedative would answer better," said Ellen.

At that moment a loud, wild cry burst on their ears.

Ellen had left by Jessy's side a hymn-book, which she recognised. It brought back memories of past innocence, and a sense of present degradation (offspring of sin); and reason, long tottering, gave way at once. She raved of beads, bugles, flowers, St. Clair, and other noble names, that sound very grand and smooth shouted out by powdered footmen in lordly mansions, but which seemed sadly out of place there, screamed out by a maniac in that night refuge, and among those ragged ones. Then she raved of hunger, thirst, Ada, Ellen, her mother, and above all the river.

Jessy Hawthorn was raving mad. The refuge was no place for her, and she was removed to Bedlam.

CHAPTER XVI.

To dew-eyed pity bear the tear,
And hang it on her diadem.

It was with very sad hearts that Ada and Ellen, regaining the cab, drove back to Mrs. Golightly's lodgings in Jermyn-street, where Miss St. Ange's equipage had been long awaiting them.

Mrs. Golightly had availed herself of the opportunity of the discovery of Jessy's downfall to inveigh against the unfair sex, beginning with Adam, and going through a long succession of his more guilty sons.

Ada and Ellen had nothing to say: their hearts were too full for utterance (Ada's especially). As Ada deposited her at her own abode, she said—

"Come to me early, very early to-morrow, darling Ellen. I have so much to do, to say, to plan. There is no time to be lost. I have wasted too much already. I want to see Apple Blossom; to hear about Esther and 'Tippling Ben'; to consult Jem Goodman; to enrol myself a teacher at the ragged school; to visit poor, fallen Jessy."

"You have an interest in life, now, Ada," said Ellen.

"Oh, Ellen, how deep, how engrossing, how holy an interest I feel, as if I had never lived before."

"The want of a want—" said Ellen.

"Is supplied," whispered Ada, embracing her.

"Dearest, farewell. My heart is too full for words."

Ada heard from her maid that Lady Pemberton was gone to bed, ill from anxiety caused by another fit that had attacked—Sir Augustus? No: Sultana, her fat and apoplectic lap-dog—centre of all her affections—object of all her solicitude. She only laughed at the growing disease of Ada's mind, she shed tears over the obese and panting Sultana.

Sir Augustus was dining out, and Ada was at liberty to retire to her own room and be still.

She dismissed her maid, closed her door, and threw herself at the foot of the sumptuous bed so gorgeously contrasted with the troughs and rugs, which yet were such a blessing to the ragged and houseless. Ada prayed long and fervently, and tears quietly dropped the while,

"Tears so soft and meek,
They would not stain an angel's cheek."

At length she sought her pillow; and, very, very weary with all she had gone through that night, she closed her eyes, and as she did so visions of what she had seen floated before her. The hungry boys; the tempting cookshop; the ticket-porters; the ruffian drunkard, and his frail wife; the savage blow; the fall; the hungry wretch with his stolen loaf; the ragged school and all its mute appeals; Jem Goodman; Apple Blossom; Merry; Larky Grigg; Stunning Steenie; the refuge and its wolf-eyed denizens; Jessy Hawthorn and her wasted beauty; and, smiling around all, little Hope, with her blue eyes and golden hair, now raising her little, rosy forefinger in warning, now beckoning Ada with it to follow her into crowded, miserable haunts, blind alleys, and dark lanes; and, finally (Ada was dreaming now), to the foot of the Cross, where she knelt side by side with little Hope Evermore.

CHAPTER XVII.

To show us how divine a thing a woman may be made.
WORDSWORTH.

We'll do at once what is to do,
And trust ourselves alone.

IRISH PATRIOT'S SONG.

ADA woke at an early hour, for she had slept soundly through the night.

There was very unusual with her: sleeplessness—terrible attendant of the melancholy engendered by ennui, discontent, and self-reproach—had already become the habitual companion of this young girl's pillow.

Those who lie awake all night are very apt to doze away the whole morning.

This Ada had long been in the habit of doing. Often she did not rise till noon, because she dreaded the long day, with its wearisome succession of heavy hours, its "Empty fashions, modes, and forms,

Its flatteries paid to fellow worms;"

its lovers whom she could not love, admirers whom she could not admire, occupations that did not interest her, fine talkers that bored, and wits that wearied her; days of nothing to do, at least nothing in which the heart, the mind, the soul, took any part.

But on the morning after that great inward change, greater in its effects than any outward one could have been, Ada woke after several hours of sweet sleep and heavenly dreams, and looking round on the elegant costliness of her own apartments, in which all appeared strange and altered, seen by the new light kindled within, she recognised at last that all was unchanged EXCEPT HERSELF. She was a new creature; she no longer exclaimed, as the bright sun of early spring came in through the rich rose-coloured curtains that shrouded her windows, "Would God it were night!" She rejoiced in the sun, for she said to herself, "I am glad morning is come, for I have so much to do!" She did not querulously ring for her maid to bring the strong tea or coffee that only added irritation to dejection, nor did she compel her to endure the effects of that inward unrest which vented itself in scolding, fault-finding, and grumbling.

Ada felt a sort of distaste for the presence of that artificial growth of the hot-bed of fashion—her lady's maid,—with her mincing tones and inaudible steps, her sham condolence with those imaginary woes which she coarsely ridiculed for the amusement of the powdered giants of the servants' hall; who thought "It a pity Mr. Wright hadn't shown up yet, and wished their young missus a good husband, and Miss Pertinette (her maid) another; which," added Townley (my lady's own footman), "Miss Pertinette needn't go far for to seek them manly 'arts as guards the fair."

Ada—even while she indulged in the fine lady habit of grumbling, which "Pertinette," in spite of her assumed sympathy, called in the servants' hall "mizzling"—felt there was no reality in the condolence of her maid.

And now that the real woes of others filled her mind, she felt ashamed of all she had felt and expressed about her own ideal sorrows.

As she stood at the window of her dressing-room, which looked into St. James's Park—the morning sun already up, a fresh breeze fanning her cheek and waving the trees, beginning to be sprinkled with bright green buds—and as she contrasted that fair scene without, and the comfort within, the bright fire already burning, the bath already prepared, the room already nicely swept and arranged by the early under housemaid, and a fresh hot-house bouquet on the table, she thought—"How does the morning, so bright for me, dawn in the night refuge of Green Fields? On what haggard faces does this bright sun look in? How do those who so thankfully last night accepted that blessed shelter, grateful for the loaf of bread and cup of cold water given in their Saviour's name, more grateful for the unwonted words of kindness, the look of pity, the voice of sympathy; grateful for a roof to protect them from the wind and rain, and for the wooden trough and woollen rug; they, many of them, used to comfort, some to luxury—how do they feel on waking for the first time in the night refuge—the blissful unconsciousness of sleep over, the morning come—time when 'the churchyard of memory gives up its dead?' Ah! what drooping spirits, what breaking hearts are there! The day has begun, they must up and be doing. What can the destitute do? The rich should find them profitable work. I am of the rich. I must consult Mr. Goodman and see to it."

"How does this morning sun," thought Ada, "search out the damp, dark nooks where those the refuge could not receive have shivered through the night?"

"How does it dawn on Bedlam, where poor Jessy Hawthorn shrieks and groans?"

"How does it mock the misery of that drunken man who struck his wife to the earth before my eyes? those hungry boys who glared in at that cookshop? that miserable man whom it finds, perhaps, in prison for stealing a loaf?"

Hastily Ada went quite unaided through the duties of her morning toilet.

She found she could brush out and knot up "the loose train of her amber flowing hair." She could put on her own shoes and stockings. She could dress herself as neatly as when she was a pupil at Madame la Mode's, with only poor, pretty, neat-handed Jessy Hawthorn to help twenty young ladies. (Ah! poor Jessy, what a pang was there!)

Great was the mincing Pertinette's surprise (there was no pretence about that), when, coming in with her young mistress's breakfast-tray and sham sympathy, she found her dressed, cheerful, kind, gentle, and coming down to breakfast!

"Which," said Pertinette to Townley, "you might have knocked me down with a feather, the surprise so completely turned my nerves."

"Have you heard how mamma is to-day?" asked Ada.

"Tarlatan, mem, says my lady have passed a very precarious night. She would have Sultana in her own room, which the poor dear four-footed creature is a burden to herself, and to every one else, and suffers so much. A change is to be desired, mem, if my lady could but bear to have her put out of her misery. Townley, in spite of his own feelings, which is very exquisite, would do it for the sake of my lady."

"Oh! I trust that will not be required of Townley. While there's life, there's hope," said Ada.

"There's no hope of any rest or peace for Mrs. Tarlatan, or Mr. Townley, mem," said Pertinette. "And even I, as ain't used to the brute creation, or their ways, while you were out, mem, last evening, mem, I was pressed into the service. I hadn't time to trim a cap, or set a stitch for myself—out of one fit into another, out of one bath into another, was that blessed Sultana, and so dangerous, a snarling and a snapping. Mr. Townley had the courage of a mandarin, or he never could have held Sultana down. It is a pity, mem, to risk a Christian's life for a rampant heathen like that dog."

"And how is papa?" Pertinette shook her glossy head, and the pink ribbons of her small lace cap.

"Well, mem, Townley heard Monsieur Vanille, Sir Augustus's new valet, say that Sir Augustus came home from the farewell dinner to the new Governor of ——— decidedly 'cut,' mem."

"Cut"—what do you mean, Pertinette? My father cut? By whom? Remember, I allow of no jokes or impertinent remarks about either of my parents."

"I only repeated Townley's own words, mem," said Pertinette, who was very saucy in an indirect, quiet way, and who felt extremely nettled at the sudden unexplained change which seemed to cut her out from the confidence she had abused and betrayed; added to which all Pertinette's arrangements for flirtations with Townley, Pomp, and Monsieur Vanille depended on Ada's being a late riser. Early rising in a mistress, ladies'-maids unused to it resent as a personal injury and punishable offence. "But, mem," added Pertinette, "Mr. Pomp, who spoke to Sir Augustus himself, said he was only a little 'screwed.'"

"I do not want to hear the slang of the servants'-hall, Pertinette. If you cannot express yourself properly, you need not speak at all. I have not the least idea what you mean by those incomprehensible vulgarisms, which I forbid you ever to use again," said Ada, sternly.

"Well, mem," said Pertinette, reddening at the unwonted rebuke—which, though often richly deserved, Ada was generally too absent, listless, or self-engrossed to administer—"well, mem" (and here her mean nature rejoiced in the sting she felt she was about to plant in the daughter's heart), "what they really meant, mem, was that Sir Augustus came home (I'm sure, mem, I mean no offence) very much elevated, mem!"

"In other words, degraded," thought Ada, sickening at the recollection of her father's habitual intemperance.

She turned round, trembling with anger and mortification, and intending to order Pertinette out of the room; but a moment's reflection convinced her that it would be both unjust and unwise. The girl had spoken the truth, and so common was it for Sir Augustus to exceed in the matter of wine, that the servants attached very little importance to the occurrence.

"Sir Augustus, mem, could not have been quite himself, for he forced his way up into her ladyship's boudoir, where Sultana, mem, after her bath, was lying wrapped up in shawls beside my lady. And oh, mem, Sir Augustus all but sat down on the poor dear sufferer; oh, how my lady screamed, how Mrs. Tarlatan shrieked and dropped the plate in which she had been cutting up a bit of cold chicken for Sultana's supper. And oh, mem, Sir Augustus being, as I said, not quite himself, actually pulled poor, dear, delicate Sultana off the sofa by her ear, and pitched her yelping and barking to the other end of the room. Luckily she lighted on the ottoman, and no bones was broken. But oh, mem, what a scene; Sir Augustus, his wig perched over one eye, sitting in Sultana's place by the sofa, his arm thrown audaciously round my lady's waist, holding her there against her will, while Sultana was howling piteously, and he singing and other low songs, which showed he was elevated." "Poor mamma! what did she do?" asked Ada, really anxious about her mother, but her cheeks burning with a daughter's sense of a parent's shame, and tears of filial love and regret filling her beautiful eyes.

'John Thomas, where's your wife?'

"Well, miss, finding strength wouldn't do, my lady tried a 'dodge,' as Townley calls it. She asked Sir Augustus, quite polite like, if he would like a glass of punch. Sir Augustus said, quite gallant like, 'If my lady would mix it, and sweeten the cup.' So up gets my lady, Sir Augustus quite pleased, a singing and shouting,

'She's gone to the Marquis of Granby,
Getting as drunk as she can be.
She won't be home to-night.'

No sooner, mem, was my lady free than, catching up Sultana, who still lay whining on the ottoman, she retired into her bed-room with Tarlatan, and locked the door. I wasn't a-going, mem, to stay there alone, with Sir Augustus singing all sorts of Barcarolles songs"—(Pertinette meant Bacchanalian)—"so I retired, miss, sending Townley to him.

"Townley was obliged to get Monsieur Vanille, and at last Mr. Pomp, and as my lady had spoken of punch, Sir Augustus would have a bowl made.

"As strong as brandy's self, miss; leastways, the taste Townley saved for me."

"And did papa drink it? How wicked of Vanille and Pomp."

"After the first tumbler, miss, Sir Augustus fell fast asleep. Mr. Pomp said so much good liquor mustn't be wasted, and so between them they finished the bowl."

"And what became of papa?"

"Townley and Pomp carried him to bed, lighted by Monsieur Vanille, mem. Shall I go and see if breakfast is laid in the library, mem?"

"Yes. Alas!" thought Ada, "it is not only among the miserable and destitute creatures whom I saw last night, that drunkenness is so great a curse. Here is my father, a man of iron constitution, great intellect, and kindest nature—a man who might have been so great and good, and have done so much—destroyed mind, body, aye, and perhaps soul, by the habits of intemperance contracted at college. His remarkable beauty of face and form is blotched and bloated by this deadly habit. His intellect is impaired by it, his moral sense is blunted. I heard Dr. Dareall say to mamma's medical man, Finikin Snugly, that delirium tremens had set in. Oh, my poor father, what is to be done? If I could bear to speak of a father's sin to a stranger, I would take counsel of Mr. Goodman. At any rate, Ellen would advise me for the best. She, of course, knows it. Alas! who does not? It is written, yes, it is written in the purple veins that disfigure his fine nose. It is confessed by the trembling of his hand, and the stutter of his once eloquent tongue. Oh, that I could save that dear, kind father!"

BE GENTLE WITH THY WIFE.

Be gentle! for you little know

How many trials rise;

Although to thee they may be small,
To her of giant size.

Be gentle! though perchance that lip

May speak a murmuring tone,
The heart may beat with kindness yet,
And joy to be thine own.

Be gentle! weary hours of pain

'Tis woman's lot to bear;
Then yield her what support thou canst,
And all her sorrows share.

Be gentle! for the noblest hearts

At times may have some grief,
And even in a pettish word
May seek to find relief.

Be gentle! for unkindness now

May rouse an angry storm,
That all the after years of life
In vain may strive to calm.

Be gentle! none are perfect—

Thou'rt dearer far than life;
Then, husband, bear and still forbear—
Be gentle to thy wife.

Inventions and Science.

BLACK PIGMENT FROM SCHIST.—M. Mareschal has succeeded in making from schist a very solid and brilliant black; it absorbs less oil, covers better, and flows from the brush more perfectly than other black pigments. He operates on schist from which the oil has been extracted by distillation, calcination, or otherwise; the mineral is then powdered and sifted until it is brought to the state of an impalpable powder; the powder is washed and dried by heat. The blacks at present employed by painters are very inferior, by all accounts, to that from schist.

NEW LUBRICATING MATERIAL.—By a recent discovery M. Rohrig has accomplished the removal of the acid principles of fat, and thus obtained a new lubricating material of an amber colour, an aromatic odour, a taste which is not disagreeable, and a consistency approaching that of castor oil. For greasing machinery this substance is preferable to common olive oil and also to neat's foot oil; it oxidises the metals much less, and hardly colours copper, bronze, or brass; it does not run, and it is procurable at a cheap rate.

REMEDY FOR INSECTS IN HERBARIA.—Procure a wooden box capable of holding a dozen parcels of plants, as they are taken from the herbarium, leaving space for a small saucer in which is poured a little sulphuret of carbon. The box being then shut hermetically is left to itself for 24 hours, after which time the subtle vapour having penetrated to the heart of all the sheets every insect is found dead.

HORSE TAMING.—The following simple remedy, easily tried, is said to be the secret of horse taming:—"Procure some horse-caster (the wart of the fore leg of a horse) and grate it fine, some oil of Rhodium and oil of cumin, and keep the three separate in air-tight bottles. Rub a little oil of cumin upon your hand, and approach the horse in the field, on the windward side. Rub your hand gently on the horse's nose, getting a little of the oil on it. You can lead him anywhere. Give him a little castor on a piece of loaf sugar or potato. Put eight drops of oil of Rhodium into a lady's silver thimble, stopping the mouth of the thimble to prevent the oil from running out whilst you open the mouth of the horse, tip the thimble over upon his tongue, and he will follow you like a pet dog. Good grooming, feeding, and gentle treatment are then enjoined to your future slave."

OLD ENGLISH HOSPITALITY.

ENGLISH hospitality was one of the most pleasant characteristics of the "good old times." Perhaps, indeed, it was the only pleasant feature they possessed, as it constitutes their chief claim to be called the "merry days" of England.

Saxon thanes and Norman lords gave hospitable entertainments to all comers. They made nothing of grilling a Jew, burning a witch, hanging a retainer, or quietly, with steel or poison, putting a rival out of the way. Brute force was in the ascendant. The sword was the title by which estates were won, and by which they were maintained. The soldier was the highest style of man. Loyalty was shown by military service in the king's behalf. Religion was exhibited by chivalrous invasions of infidel territory. Love was attested by deeds of arms done in honour of bright eyes; and poetry sounded its lyre to the praise of him who had been most devoted to his mistress, most zealous to his God, most loyal to his king, by wielding sword and battle-axe on many a blood-stained field.

In those days, to "entertain strangers" as well as friends was a practical part of religion. The baronial hall, with its oaken walls and rafters, its broad tables, and its ample provisions were at the service of the wayfarer. The rich man sat at the top and the poor man at the bottom; rank asserted itself by remaining above the salt-cellar and allowing poverty to eat and drink below it. Thus the lordling and the vassal were brought into close connection, and some people have supposed that the connection was agreeable. If it was then, it certainly would not be now. The days of proud barons, haughty prelates, and chivalrous knights have passed away—

"The knights are dust,
Their swords are rust,
Their souls are with the saints, we trust."

And such hospitality as they offered has passed away with them, and is but little regretted.

But properly to understand any age or any custom, and fairly to estimate its character, we must, by the force of sympathetic imagination, cast ourselves into that age, acquaint ourselves with its leading activities, and endeavour to think and feel as they felt and thought who lived under its dominion. It is neither candid nor useful to measure a past age by our own.

The old baron, with his moated castle, his enslaved hinds, his armed retainers, his priest and jester, hawks and hounds, his well-stored larder, and his empty library, his gigantic person and dwarfed intellect, would cut but a sorry figure nowadays; but he was a great man in his own time. He was the most absolute of tyrants. Within bow-shot of his castle, perhaps, there was a cluster of huts, closely huddled together, where dwelt the villains regardant, or peasants belonging to the soil. On these he had his eye continually, as they ploughed the fields, tended the cattle, or drudged in domestic offices. He saw that brawny Hercules of a ploughman, and, snapping him from the plough, made him an armed retainer, turning his sickle to a sword. Or he saw a sharp-witted fool going a bird-nesting in summer weather, and, having his ear tickled by some smart saying, clapped a cap and bells on the witty witless one, and made a fool of him for life. Or it may be that he caught sight of a pretty girl, a nutting in the wood, as he was out riding, with a falcon on his fist, and, charmed by her deep black eyes and rich complexion, ripened by the kisses of the sun, took her for himself—no matter for her will—and left her old father to die of a broken heart. Or he cut off two toes from Will-o'-the-Aspen's favourite dog, lest it should be used in hunting. Or he did anything and everything that suited his own whim—but he was a hearty, hospitable man for all that.

There was rare work when his ample board was spread. The bill of fare often contained many things which we should not regard as delicacies: but what of that?—they who eat them liked them. A roast peacock, a couple of good swans, with brown gravy, a crane, a boar's head, besides all sorts of luxuries from all parts of the world; luxuries—according to John of Salisbury, who had often partaken of them, so he ought to know—"from Babylon, and from Constantinople; from Palestine, and from Alexandria; from Tripoli, Syria, and Phœnicia."

"Hogsheads of honey, kilderkins of mustard,
Muttons, and fatted beeves, and bacon swine,
Herons, and bitterns, peacocks, swans, and bustards,
Teal, mallard, pigeon, widgion, and, in fine,
Plum-puddings, pancakes, apple-pies, and custards;
And withal they drank old Gascon wine."

Old English cooks were famous in their way. Both Stowe and Holinshed are filled with records of good eating; and even old romance tells, not only of ladies fair as the dawn, and knights as true as their swords, but of feasts most wondrously sumptuous. Ben Jonson, in "The Alchemist," introduces us to Sir Epicure Mammon, who, gloating on his precious wealth, revels in a glorious dream of gastronomy. Says he to Puff—

OLD ENGLISH HOSPITALITY.

"We will be brave, Puff, now we have the medicine. My meat shall come in Indian shells, Dishes of agate, set in gold, and studded With emerald, sapphire, hyacinths, and rubies, The tongues of carp, dormice, and camels' heels, Boiled in the spirit of sol and dissolved pearl— Apicius' diet against the epilepsy: And I will eat these broths with spoon of amber, Heated with diamonds and carbuncle; My footboy shall eat pheasants, calvered salmon, Knots, godwits, lampreys; I myself will have The heads of barbel served instead of salads."

For which I'll say unto my cook, There's gold, Go forth and be a knight."

But it must not for a moment be supposed that every delicacy of the season was invariably served up in a baronial hall. Peter of Blois complains sadly in one of his letters about the treatment which he received, even at court. "A priest or a soldier," says he, "has bread placed before him which is neither kneaded nor leavened, and is made of the dregs of beer; bread like lead, full of bran, and slack-baked; wine spoilt by being either sour or mouldy—thick, greasy, rancid, tasting of pitch, and vapid. I have seen wine set before noblemen so full of dregs, that they were compelled to filter it through their teeth, with closed eyes and loathing stomachs; the fish is four days old, the poultry stinks, and the flesh is carrion."

In justice it must be admitted that such cases were rare, and that generally old English hospitality furnished excellent fare.

In the baronial hall a very mixed company assembled—

"All sorts of people there were seen together, All sorts of characters, all sorts of dresses: The fool, with fox's tail and peacock's feather; Pilgrims and penitents, and grave burghesses; The country people, with their coats of leather; Vintners and victuallers, with cans and messes; Grooms, archers, varlets, falconers, and yeomen; Damsels and waiting-maids, and waiting-women."

All the gentlefolk spoke French; some very correctly, others like the lady described by Chaucer—

"After the school of Stratford-le-Bow, For French of Paris she did not know."

But all spoke it after a fashion, because it was the fashion. The subject of conversation was sure to turn on hawking. Gerfalcons, gentils, goshawks, lanners, peregrines, and Norway hawks were familiar phrases. Therefore was the falconer a great man—great as the modern jockey,—he was a knowing fellow, too; he could say, with Sir Tristram—

"There is no hawk which martlet on perch, Whether high towering or a coasting low, But I the measure of her flight can search, And all her prey and all her diet know."

Hawking was in great favour with all sorts of people. "There was not a swaggerer, who more often dipped his nose into the pottle-pot than his fingers into his pouch; there was not a lady, who slew more men with her bright glances than the knights with their trusty swords; there was not a holy-water clerk, or a soul priest, or a lady's confessor, but loved to have a bird on the wrist and a dog under the arm."

In the days of baronial hospitality they kept early hours. There was a common adage which recommended this practice—

"To rise at five, to dine at nine, To sup at five, to bed at nine, Makes a man live to ninety-nine."

When the sport or business of the day was over, they sat down to their repast, a thoroughly substantial meal, about which the devout wish that good digestion might wait on appetite, and health or both, would be no idle compliment.

After supper there were gambols of various sorts. Mummers would sometimes make boisterous mirth, while at others the blind harper would provoke the dance or rouse up wonder by his minstrelsy. A posset at bedtime closed the feasting of the day.

Such was the common life of an old English baron, a race now extinct, and the resuscitation of which, if possible, would bring back anything but "merry days" to England.

MEMOIR OF MR. JOHN SISSON.

AN INTERESTING EXAMPLE OF THE PURSUIT OF KNOWLEDGE UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

For who shall go about To cozen fortune, and be honourable Without the stamp of merit?—SHAKESPEARE.

THE progress of self-educated individuals has always been to philosophic minds an interesting subject for contemplation. It is pleasing to observe the efforts of a man, born in the lowest grade of society, and struggling with poverty, to create for himself a position among men by overcoming all the obstacles to his mental improvement,—obstacles which would deter persons of less energy, and with little natural capacity, from ever making the attempt to succeed.

The history of the labourers in the fields of science and literature furnish numerous examples of self-taught persons; and though many of them have lived long enough to make their names "as familiar in the mouths of men as household words," yet it would be difficult to find a better illustration of innate intellectual capacity than in the life of him who forms the subject of this brief but instructive memoir.

John Sisson, the lamented subject of the following notice, was born May 24th, 1801, at the small village of Newark, near Peterborough, in Northamptonshire, and he died at Glasgow in the month of November, 1832.

His parents were poor, but very honest and industrious, his father being a farm-labourer. Of his early history we could glean but a scanty account, although the writer of this memoir visited his poor old mother for the purpose of obtaining some information. She said he was taught to read and write at a parish school. His education must have indeed been meagre and defective, for he was employed early to labour in the fields, and went into a regular service at eleven or twelve, the speciality of which we shall shortly enumerate.

But as his good old parent could not furnish any instance of precocity, she spoke of his dutiful and moral conduct with much deep feeling, while precious tears coursed down her cheeks as the vouchers of her sincerity and of the accuracy of her report.*

John Sisson, at the age mentioned above, went to live at Mr. Whitsed's, a general practitioner at that time at Peterborough, to be his groom, footman, &c. &c. And we were told by that gentleman "that the qualities he observed in his new servant interested him greatly in his favour; that he was zealous to do everything correctly, and was conspicuous for his sterling integrity. Yet he considered Sisson particularly timid, so that it was painful to witness the agitation of his manner whenever he undertook anything new to him, or had to execute some novel function; and this it would seem arose from a strong desire to do everything well. For, notwithstanding this mauvaise honte, there was an aptitude to learn." The doctor concluded by saying "that he was the best servant he had ever employed."

These particular incidents are worthy of being specially noted, as they will have a significance and interest when we refer to his subsequent career, and to the period when he visited his old master as a friend and companion.

In the house of Dr. Whitsed there resided, as his pupil in medicine, a gentleman of the name of Smith, to whom Sisson was greatly indebted for assistance at the commencement of his studies.

The praiseworthy conduct of this unpaid tutor arose from his having observed the lad's eagerness for knowledge, and for acquiring some improvement in his manners; and thus actuated by a truly benevolent spirit, he gave Sisson every assistance to aid him in his pursuit of knowledge, for which he soon manifested a great aptitude. And he quickly acquired some proficiency in the English and Latin grammars, and then he read many of the best classical authors in both languages.

It must have been an interesting picture to observe the medical student in his hours of leisure devoting himself to gratify the mental craving of the groom. And though he never contemplated any notice of this philanthropic act, yet it was evident that he did not consider such a mode of spending his time at all derogatory to his character or respectability. If that gentleman lives, and should read this paper, we assure him that in mentioning the part he had performed in maturing and developing the mind of Mr. Sisson, we are induced to do so from a sense of admiration, for it formed the first epoch of the intellectual life of this student.

The results of this disinterested "labour of love" confirm the truth of the solemn and dying words of Judge Talford, who inculcated the doctrine, that much might be done to elevate the humble and too often neglected portions of the community, if persons of cultivated minds would associate with them, and point out "the way they should go;" and thus by precept and example inculcate in their minds a desire to exercise the powers which give intelligence and moral susceptibility; and thus thousands would be saved from being the slaves of their animal propensities. Mr. Smith also gave Sisson some writing-lessons, and hence it is possible that his caligraphic power had been little exercised, even if he knew pot-hooks and strokes, when he entered the town-service, before the age of twelve. We may also remark that the different lessons he received must have been brief and at irregular periods, owing to the professional engagements of the tutor, and the multifarious duties of a country practitioner's groom and servant of all work.

In the year 1821 Dr. Whitsed removed from Peter-

* Old Mrs. Sisson was most illiterate, not being able to read or write, but her moral organisation gave her a very respectable aspect and a degree of refinement, which not only won our esteem and respect, but gave a surety that her evidence was given to the best of her knowledge. She was a widow. All her neighbours whom the writer interrogated about the Sisson family, spoke of them as worthy, honest, good people, and that the daughters were all in good situations, and most exemplary in their conduct.

borough to Wisbeach, to practise as a physician; and Mr. Walker became his successor, who received, besides the transfer of the business, the continued services of John Sisson. We had many conversations with his new master many years after these events; and he told us, in proof of his ardour for knowledge, that he had ascertained it was his custom to sit up studying until two o'clock in the morning, and at four getting up again, having arranged with a soap-boiler's man to call him. The reason he assigned for taking merely two hours' sleep interested the writer greatly: "that he might go on with his studies without infringing any part of his duties!" And Mr. Walker concluded with saying that he never had so good a servant. To use his own words: "My plate was never so well cleaned, nor my horse so well groomed, nor the garden kept so neatly, nor such exact punctuality in the delivery of the medicines I had prescribed for my patients," &c.

What can be said to this and similar facts by those who assert that education makes the working classes dissatisfied with labour? Our own experience furnishes innumerable examples in refutation of this libel; for it must be a libel to suppose that God gave to men (irrespective of rank or position) similar intellectual and moral attributes, and that in the prosperous they may and ought to be cultivated with great advantage and usefulness to the recipients, but that in the needy these attributes may be left to be untrained and torpid, although there exists that emphatic warning, "that it is not well for the soul to lack knowledge."

Mr. Sisson resided with Mr. Walker nearly three years, so that he was still in service in 1824; yet before he left this situation he had been intrusted to make up the medicines from the daily prescription-book, and was considered quite expert in the business. But it would appear that he was very unambitious, as he simply requested Mr. Walker to procure him a place as light porter in a wholesale drug-house. Soon after this conversation, one of the firm of such an establishment visited Peterborough, to whom was mentioned Sisson's wish; and Mr. Walker gave him, at the same time, a high character for his moral respectability. The gentleman felt interested, and desired an interview; and great was his surprise to find the young man so intelligent, so learned, yet so modest; and he dismissed him with a promise that he would endeavour to serve him. And when he again saw Mr. Walker, he declared it would be a pity and a shame to bury so much talent in a drug warehouse, and he concluded by offering to procure a situation for him with a surgeon, as his dispensing assistant, provided that he was furnished with a written testimonial as to his moral character, similar to the one mentioned orally.

Instead of opposing this plan, Mr. Walker gave Sisson a testimonial, of which any man might have been proud, intimating that, besides being intellectual, he had the greatest probity and honesty—

"The noblest work of God."

This "character" induced his new patron to obtain for him a situation with Mr. Brookes, a surgeon at Ross, in Herefordshire, who treated him with marked kindness. He was paid the salary of an assistant, and resided with the family.

Besides this positive change in his social position, Mr. Brookes, in order to serve him permanently, bound him to himself as an apprentice, and thus enabled him to pass the Apothecaries' Company and the College of Surgeons, and to become a general practitioner.

(To be concluded in our next.)

ELIJAH AND I.

THE house that you see underneath the great pine,
With walls that are painted and doors that are fine,
And meadows and wheat-fields about it, is mine.

On the stony side-hill of the woodland close by,
In a house that is not half so wide nor so high,
Elijah, my miller, lives, richer than I.

When I go to the town to pay tax on my land,
He sits by the chimney, his book in his hand,
And merry of heart as if money were sand.

Of the meadows about him, he owns not a rood,
No stone of the brookside, no stick of the wood;
Yet ne'er lacked Elijah for clothing or food.

'Tis good in his blue eyes the twinkle to see,
That the mill goes awry never troubles his glee;
'Tis I that must pay for the mending—not he.

He laughs while I frown, and he sings while I sigh,
The pleasant love-ditties of days that are by;
So Elijah, my miller, is richer than I.

The Matron.

NO. XIV.

I HOPE my readers are not tired of advice respecting the management of children. The subject is so important that it deserves patient and serious consideration. However, I will avoid being prolix, and after giving a few more prescriptions for the ailments of young children, I will pass on to that more interesting period when reason begins to dawn.

In my last chapter, I treated of dangerous maladies. In this I shall speak of those that become dangerous if neglected. I begin with the thrush,—an evil with which nurses and mothers are only too familiar. The symptoms of this distressing complaint are small white substances inside the mouth. These may be seen lying loose on the tongue. Immediately give a mild opening medicine, supposing the child should be constipated. The following is a good receipt for the aperient:—

Two ounces of common mint-water, and two scruples of calcined magnesia. Mix it all together, and give a dessertspoonful. If not effective, repeat the dose. But you must also take measures for cleansing the mouth. A fine powder of borax and white-sugar may, if properly administered, effect a prompt cure. You should put a very little of this powder into the child's mouth, the tongue will distribute it properly. If, in the thrush, remedies are delayed, the complaint spreads to the throat, stomach, and bowels. The case then becomes serious, and you should have recourse to medical aid.

Another complaint of infancy is sore eyes. For this, mix equal parts of lime water and elder-flower water. Warm the mixture slightly, and foment the eyelids with it. For the fomentation, use soft, old linen rag, and be very careful you do not let a drop of the mixture into the eye.

Yellow gum, or infantile jaundice, looks a much more serious complaint than it really is. Mild aperients are sufficient to remove it.

For any soreness on the skin or about the ears, it is only necessary to wash the parts carefully night and morning in tepid water, and then shake over them lightly a powder thus prepared.—Three parts of wheaten starch in flour, and one part of ceruse; mix them together.

Young children are subject to a variety of disfiguring eruptions on the head. I consider these are often efforts of nature to avert more serious evils. Excepting by the directions of the doctor, do nothing but attend to the greatest cleanliness, and keep the hair quite short. Through checking disorders of this kind by powerful applications, children have been seized with internal maladies that have terminated fatally. At the same time, do not be induced by ignorant old neighbours to encourage these unsightly eruptions, by applying cabbage-leaves or anything of a drawing nature.

Fortunately for infants, mammas and grand-mammas love them, and find out beauties in them almost as soon as they are born. Fathers are not so clear-sighted; but when intelligence dawns—when the sweet young voice can lip the name of the parent, and tottering little feet meet him half-way—then the rapture of the father equals that of the mother; then parental love is often more like a passion than an affection that benefits its object.

A child of two or three is often as troublesome as it is beautiful. It is a greater source of watchfulness and anxiety than when it was a baby. If the mother only looks another way, what mischief ensues. The child gets at a knife and cuts itself frightfully; it pulls the inkstand and spoils a new frock, or worse still, it draws too near the fire and sets itself in a blaze.

A mother's duties cannot be neglected for a moment. But the accidents we have glanced at, prudence would have prevented, by putting the knife and the inkstand out of the child's reach, and by having a high fender for the fire.

But no degree of prudence or forethought can avert the difficulty of training up a child in the way he should go.

Behold that smiling boy, so much like the picture we form to ourselves of a cherub. Yet he has inherited all the faults of our fallen nature, and how soon the tendency to evil shows itself. The subject of education is so well treated in "Hopes and Helps" that I shall only touch on it here; it is the management of the nursery and the play-hour that I am about to consider.

I do not undertake to give you any rules to make your children perfect. There will be no perfect children till there are perfect parents, and that will not be in your lifetime nor in mine either, gentle reader. But I can give you a few hints, the result of my own experience, that may assist you in your arduous task.

Never be harsh, and always avoid severe punishments. If you allow the irritating ways of children to put you into a passion of anger, you teach them (by your example) to indulge in violent temper. Be very gentle, but be very firm. You have only to determine that it shall be so, and your word becomes law for a little creature dependent on you for everything.

It is selfish weakness that lessens your control over children, that makes your little son (perhaps a rosy prattler of three years old) completely your master. Even for your child's good you will not put yourself to the pain of contradicting him. Do you think the child does not perceive your weakness? He perceives it but too soon, and his wilfulness increases in proportion to your weakness.

I have cautioned you against severe punishments, so I am not about to ask you to inflict any painful chastisement for disobedience or violent temper. In the nursery, as in the country at large, the certainty of a punishment is much more important than the severity of it.

As soon as reason dawns, obedience must be enforced if you have your child's welfare at heart. And to enforce obedience disobedience must be checked. At three years old you can make a child know that it ought to do "as it is bid." You must enforce this lesson; and if words won't do, you must try other means. All children have little indulgences that are not necessary to them.

Be firm in withholding these after an act of disobedience or very violent temper, and tell your child that he has lost the plum, the cake, or the pretty story by not doing what you told him to do. As soon as he can speak he will understand this argument; and if you are firm, and always act on this principle, you may reckon on prompt obedience.

But do not rely too confidently on yourself. The mother's heart is very soft, and the tears of a child very eloquent. Pray to the Almighty to strengthen you in the performance of your important duty, to train up your child to become a blessing to himself and others, instead of a torment—yes, we say a torment; for one unruly child can destroy the comfort of a whole family.

I recommend gentle punishments for childish faults. If persevered in they will certainly be efficacious; and let young mothers reflect on this to their comfort, that, if they have properly trained their first child, the others, led on by the gentle force of example, will give them much less trouble.

I cannot leave off without warning mothers against some injudicious punishments, inflicted by harsh, thoughtless persons: I mean depriving children of their meals, or keeping them in bed. Both of these are injurious to health, and, consequently, should not be practised; but, above all, never punish children by frightening them. Never shut them up in dark rooms, or threaten them with hobgoblins, &c.

The following anecdote shows that fright may prove fatal:—

A child had been left in the care of a maid-servant who wished to be at liberty to amuse herself. In order to keep the child quiet, the wicked girl fastened an ugly, dressed-up figure inside the curtains of the child's bed, telling the poor little thing that the figure would jump on her if she moved.

When the mother returned, and went to the bed to look at her child, it was dead.

Terror is not unfrequently fatal to human life.

Small Change.

A MOST COSTLY PLANT.—A railway plant.

AN EMPTY SOUND.—That of a railway whistle when you are just too late for a train.

A LITTLE man, no saint, said, when reproved for his lack of graces, "He could boast of two negative qualifications, viz., that he never wore a great coat, nor lay long in bed."

GRAVITY AND GRAVITATION.—A schoolmaster, who was as fond of the use of his grog as of the use of the globes, was asked the difference between gravity and gravitation. "When I've drunk five glasses of grog," replied the pedagogue, "my gravity vanishes and my gravitation begins to operate."

A RATHER thick-headed witness in the police court was asked the question whether So-and-so "stood on the defensive?" "No, sir," he innocently replied, "he stood on a bench."

THREEPENCE FOR "FASH."—At a period when hotels were fewer and less attractive in Peterhead than they are now, a native of the sunny south made a sojourn at the best one of the time. Before leaving he called for his bill—a request that somewhat puzzled the worthy landlord, who was not in the habit of giving written bills, nor by any means an adept at calligraphy. The traveller, however, was to be puzzled in return; for, on glancing at the contents of the bill when produced, he was fairly put to a stand by the following entry—"8d. for fash." "Fash!" exclaimed the indignant Cockney, "what is that? I never got any fash." "Ou na, man," said the landlord, coolly, "but ye g'ied some." "Fash" means trouble in Scotland and the counties far north.

DR. JOHNSON, when in indigent circumstances, was offered a rectory if he would enter into orders; but, sensible of the asperity of his temper, declined it, saying—"I have not the requisites for the office, and I cannot in my conscience shear the flock which I am unable to feed."

"I AM so lame from the railway crash of last week, I can hardly stand," said a limping, hobbling chap.—"Well, then, I hope you intend to sue for damages," said his friend.—"Damages! no, no; I have had damages enough by them; if I sue for anything, it will be for repairs."

PROSELYTISM is often self-love seeking to make converts to our own opinion, disguised as the love of God seeking to win votaries to the true faith.

A SENSIBLE writer puts his strength into his arguments. A silly one puts his into his epithets.

TRUTH is an inexhaustible fountain, from which nobody knows how much he draws.

COMMON revenge is a momentary triumph, the satisfaction of which dies at once, and is succeeded by remorse; whereas forgiveness, which is the noblest of all revenges, entails a perpetual pleasure. It was well said by a wise Roman emperor, that he wished to put an end to all his enemies by converting them into friends.

Two tourists observing a pretty girl in a milliner's shop, the one, an Irishman, proposed to go in and buy a watch-ribbon in order to get a nearer view of her. "Hoot, mon," says his northern friend, "nae occasion to waste siller; let us gang in and speer if she can give us twa saxpences for a shilling."

SPURZHEIM was lecturing on phrenology. "What is to be considered the organ of drunkenness?" said the professor. "The barrel organ," shouted one of the audience.

ONE of the best jingling Latin mottoes is Lord Brougham's—pro rege, lege, grege—"for king, law, and people."

Puzzles for the Ingenious.

ENIGMA.

A famous commander, the splendour of whose victories, his extraordinary liberality, and his apparent disinterestedness, seconded his ambitious views, and rendered him (in fact, though not in name) master of all Greece. He was killed in battle. The initials of the eight following places and characters supply the successive letters of the name of the person above referred to.

1. An archbishop of Canterbury who was imprisoned for three years, and was finally beheaded on Tower Hill.
2. A city of England, in which a Roman Emperor lived and died.
3. A Roman historian, distinguished alike for his talents and prodigality.
4. A promontory in the east of Europe, near which a great naval battle was fought.
5. A Roman Emperor, distinguished for his mildness and generosity, and the active part he took in the management of his own affairs.
6. A naval commander, a native of a celebrated maritime republic, he was in the service of several masters; died at the age of 92.
7. A general illustrious for his talents and virtues, gained several victories, and fell in the moment of victory.
8. A distinguished statesman, scholar, and warrior; founded a colony in America, was imprisoned twelve years, and beheaded.

Our Editorial Table.

SOPHIE.—You cannot have a nicer receipt for a tea-cake than the following:—Take a quarter of a pound of fresh butter, a quarter of a pound of sifted sugar, half a pound of flour, one egg, and a little milk.

A. R. R.—You will weaken your mind if you read nothing but novels. These works are all very well for recreation, and one of the best is Mr. J. F. Smith's tale, entitled "Smiles and Tears." It commenced with the new series of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER.

MAUMEE.—Judging from your well-written letter, you are eligible for a very good situation in a family where the children are young. Hardly anything can be procured without some little trouble and expense, and of course you will not get a situation by merely wishing for one. You had better go to a respectable governess agent in London. Your name and qualifications can be noted down in her book for the fee of five shillings, and as the season is commencing, she will probably be able to procure you a situation.

ANXIOUS.—It is well to keep on the safe side. We advise you gradually to drop the correspondence with the gentleman who is not your suitor.

NORTH.—You must, surely, handle your types too roughly. Lift them gently. Wash your hands frequently, and use a little talcum or oil when your fingers get hard.

LYDIA.—We know no better cure for the scurf in hair than the free use of a good stiff hairbrush every morning.

A. S. P.—The puzzle you have sent is not a "conundrum," but an anagram. It has already appeared in many publications.

E. H.—"E. H." is informed that he has not put his question in such a manner as to enable us to answer it with mathematical accuracy. If he takes his idea of musical intervals merely from the key-board of an organ, a pianoforte, or any instrument similarly constructed, A sharp and B flat are perfect and distinct notes of themselves, though convenience and a sufficient approximation of the sound to be conveyed, have rendered it necessary that, on keyed musical instruments, such as the organ, they should be represented by the same black note. The question as to the exact difference is one about which there are various opinions existing in the minds of the most eminent theorists of the day, and it is at present the subject of much discussion. For a detailed inquiry into this matter we recommend our correspondent to refer to Sec. VIII. of "Smith's Harmonies," a very learned work written by Dr. Smith, of Trinity College, Cambridge, and published in the year 1749. In this work the question is treated in a manner showing an amount of thought and research equalled only by the importance and difficulty of the subject.

A CONSTANT READER.—The first move should be made by the lady.

TWO YOUTHS.—You are much more likely to get a living as copying clerks than as actors.

H. J. R.—"Musidora" is one of the heroines of "Thomson's Seasons." "Dorothea" is a principal character in the celebrated tale called "Don Quixote."

ROWLAND.—The most populous people in the world are the Chinese and the Hindoos.

ANNIE E. EUSTON.—We think "Annie E. Euston" better suited to be companion to a gentleman (as his wife), than to a lady as her secretary; but if she clings to the idea of becoming a lady's companion, she must amend her orthography, which, in correctness, does not keep pace with her style.

TOM THUMB.—When you have acquired the art of keeping your arms under water, you have mastered the chief difficulty in swimming.

MONICA GRAY.—You must advertise in a Canadian newspaper, through the medium of a London agent.

TOM.—Nottingham and Leicester are famous for hosiery. J. M. C.—"J. M. C." had better send a servant with cards, and a note expressing his regret that pressure of business prevents his paying his respects in person.

H. J. R.—The pretty story of the Pleiades would exceed our limits. You will find it at length in a classical dictionary. In the meantime we can satisfy your curiosity thus far. The Pleiades were symbols of seven maidens who were to continue maidens, but Maia, on becoming the mother of Mercury, was designated as the lost Pleiad.

EDWARD.—We consider "that where there's a will there's a way." It is next to impossible but what you may find some mutual friend or acquaintance, to bring about an introduction between you and the young lady's parents.

KARA AZICK.—Religion does not prohibit social intercourse. On the contrary, piety, which recommends universal kindness and consideration, gives society its greatest charm. From the tone of your letter, we suspect you are suffering from the ennui of "nothing to do." We direct your attention to a new tale in this paper, entitled, "Hope Evermore; or, Something to Do." In this tale, the purest sources of pleasure are pointed out to the attentive reader.

SLOW BUT SURE.—We quite sympathise with you in your wish to learn something more than the joiner's trade. You have two years of your apprenticeship before you. Use them well. Read books on mechanics and engineering, and gain all the information you possibly can on these subjects. When your time is up, apply for work where you are known. If you manage properly, your character will speak for you, and insure success.

SMILES AND TEARS wonders why the Emperor and Empress of the French were not present at the marriage of the Princess Royal. Our correspondent must remember, firstly, that they are in no way related to either of the families between whom the alliance was formed; and secondly, that rulers of large empires cannot take "trips" from one country to another, as easily as private people can do. "Noblesse oblige," says the old motto—"Nobility obliges," or "Rank has its duties."

DIOCLETIAN.—We really cannot act any longer as judge, umpire, arbitrator, or referee in the matter of "different styles of handwriting."

JACK MANGLES.—The term to "koo-too" to any one, which is synonymous with cringing and fawning, comes from the word "ko-tow," the ceremony of oblation or prostration introduced into China by the Tartars.

SCHOOLBOY.—It was Commodore Anson, not Anderson, who sailed round the world in the Centurion.

INDIAN.—The travelling in the upper provinces in India is principally by palanquins, borne by coolies or bearers. It is called dahk, or postal travelling.

E. J. J. is thanked for his good opinion, and for the hearty terms in which it is expressed.

HARRIET.—A. W. will be twenty-one years of age on the 1st of November, 1858.

JOHN JONES, JUNIOR.—L. E. L. was the initial signature of Letitia E. Landon, one of the most pleasing authoresses of the present century. She married Captain Maclean, the governor of Cape Coast Castle, and died by poison—whether taken accidentally or with suicidal purpose, has not been ascertained.

AGNES TRACY.—If you are prevented from becoming a governess by the close attendance your invalid mother requires, you might, perhaps, give some private lessons, in music, drawing, or French. Ornamental embroidery work sometimes proves remunerative, if you are quick in executing and, above all, clever in designing. You must adapt your occupation in some measure to the wants of the place where you live. Try and find out if there is not a demand for any kind of work, and seek to supply it. Not knowing your circumstances, or the extent of your capabilities, we can of course only give very general advice. Your letter is well worded. You have evidently good abilities. Do your best, and "hope evermore."

EMMA inquires "what are the best accomplishments to be pursued by young ladies between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one?" We answer, those for which the young ladies show the greatest talent or predilection. It appears to us a great mistake, for instance, to insist on a proficiency in music in every young lady. Some people have no natural liking for the art of sound; and the amount of time wasted in "thumping" the piano, at fashionable schools, is lamentable. Better to excel in one accomplishment, than to have a useless smattering of three or four.

A STUDENT.—All the government offices give salaries to the clerks from the date of their entry.

SYBILLA.—In the "Ladies' Treasury," published by Ward and Lock, there is a series of articles entitled "Conduct and Carriage;" here you would find just the kind of information you require on various points of etiquette.

E. KNIGHT.—Ask your bookseller.—T. M.—Apply to the publishers.

JOHN AND THOMAS.—The author of "Monte Christo" and "Royalists and Republicans" is the elder Dumas. We do not think goloshes should be worn next the stockings; they are too impervious to be healthy.

A MINER, AND KELLY.—The French lessons in the "Ladies' Treasury," Ward and Lock, would answer your purpose.

MARY ANNIE E.—The publishers of the FAMILY PAPER will supply what you want.

JOHN.—They wouldn't have you on board a man-of-war. The naval schools and tenders supply all the boys they want, and a landsman has no chance of being shipped. Better stay ashore, and read your CASSELL'S PAPER, like a sensible fellow.

Y. W.—The article is not suited to our columns; declined with thanks.

UNION JACK.—'Tis dangerous to tamper with the eyes, but you will, we think, find relief from frequently washing them with warm milk and water, and applying a very weak solution of sulphate of zinc.

JOHN BULL.—You cannot sell the articles you speak of without first obtaining a license, nor without affixing a stamp to them varying in price according to the price of your article. Both may be obtained at the Stamp-office, Somerset House, Strand. We know nothing of the "botanical doctors" about whom you inquire.

REDMOND.—The tale by Mr. J. F. Smith, "Phases of Life; or, A Peep Behind the Scenes," commenced in No. 147, and concluded in No. 185.

T. B. C.—The notion that a large reward has ever been offered by the government for the discovery of perpetual motion, is without any foundation whatever.

W. B.—The above applies equally to the discovery of "the quadrature of a circle absolutely."

LETITIA RACHEL has been told that "if she can procure 1,000 old postage stamps, they will entitle her to a presentation to the Blue Coat School for her son." We are sorry to inform this poor widow that she has been wholly misinformed.

SILLY SAM.—We have given receipts for the treatment of chilblains before. For the sake of subscribers who have commenced with our new series, we give the following:—One ounce of camphorated spirit of wine, and half an ounce of Goulard's extract of lead; mix, and apply in the usual way three or four times a day. Or one ounce of white copperas dissolved in one pint of water. These lotions are intended for use before the chilblains are broken. When broken, use the following ointment:—Ointment of nitrate of mercury, one ounce; camphor, one dram; oil of turpentine, two drams; oil of olives, four drams. Mix well together, and apply, by gentle friction, two or three times daily.

CARUS KEARN.—You must endeavour to procure an introduction; your speaking to the lady under the circumstances you describe would be a sad breach of etiquette. Unless you are a coxcomb and allow your vanity to deceive you, there is every reason to hope that the lady feels kindly disposed towards you. This being the case, it is probable that she has discovered in you that moral worth which, with sensible women, outweighs riches. Do not lose confidence; endeavour to carve out your own fortunes, and if, in spite of all your efforts, wealth eludes your grasp, do not consider it as any humiliation to receive fortune with the hand and heart of the woman who loves you. "The mate for beauty should be a man, not a money chest."

VERBINA.—You will find the following a soothing mixture when the cough is troublesome. Take of figs, raisins, and pearl barley, two ounces of each, add half an ounce of liquorice root; boil these ingredients in a pint and a half of water, and strain off the liquor. A small teacupful is a dose.

ANXIOUS, OR VERY ANXIOUS.—State your question again; there must have been some mistake.

CHARLOTTE BRONTE.—In the word Harmonium, the h is sounded, consequently the article a must be prefixed. In speaking of a coat or any other garment, it would be highly incorrect to say it sets well. It fits well is the proper expression. The literal translation of "bête noire" is black beast, but the French use it for torment. Thus in the sentence you quote, "Work is the bête noire of my life," the meaning is, work is the torment of my life.

A LADY.—If the man had been parted from his wife twenty years instead of two, it would not render his marriage with another woman legal while his first wife was living, unless he had procured a divorce, to which her infidelity alone would entitle him.

JAMES.—It was on the 5th of May, 1808, that Bonaparte obliged the Queen of Spain to declare her son, Ferdinand VII., illegitimate; in consequence, Charles IV. resumed the regal title; but on the 10th, having all the royal family in his power, he forced Charles to abdicate, and then sent them into the interior of France; and on the 6th of June caused his brother Joseph to abdicate the throne of Naples, and to be proclaimed King of Spain. Thus, raised to the pinnacle of power, by an irresistible and indomitable will, Bonaparte played with crowned heads as a boy does with nine-pins.

A MOTHER.—You may safely give cocoa to your children. It is very digestible and of a fattening nature.

ADRIANNA.—Supposing you to be forty years old, and still single, you may with propriety take brevet rank, and assume the title of Mrs.; but to distinguish you from a married woman you must assume your Christian as well as surname. If you prefer retaining the maidenly Miss, you have every right so to do.

AN ENTHUSIAST.—Do not be in a hurry. Perhaps the gentleman's attentions, which have occasioned you so much uneasiness, have been owing to circumstances unknown to you and innocent in themselves. They may have nothing to do with a fresh attachment, and his heart may be true to you. At any rate, do not be influenced by a third party. "Whispering tongues will poison truth." Do not condemn your lover without giving him a hearing.

ROSE.—William is the second name of the Prince Frederick of Prussia. He is a member of the Lutheran church.

H. H. L.—You ask us a very delicate question, but we will endeavour to place ourselves in your situation, and to advise you for the best. We take it for granted that you are a recognised acquaintance of the lady whose affections you wish to secure. Until certain of having made some impression, you are unwilling to make an open declaration. Try the effect of poetry. Poetry is the very language of love. When discussing with her the merits of our best poets, of Moore, Scott, Byron, &c., quote some passages from them. Mind they are very sentimental, and mark their effect on her. Or recite some verses in this style:—

"Oh, doubt not nor deem that my heart, like a glass,
Can reflect other features when you are removed;
You have robbed it of all but your image, alas!
And if this be not loving, you have not been loved.
I never deceived you, and yet you condemn.
Is this the reward my fond truth has achieved?
I turn from my friends, and preferred you to them;
And if this be deceiving, you have been deceived."

Supposing you are versed in music, you can make this art an interpreter of your love. But once convinced of the lady's regarding you with interest, hesitate no longer. Declare your love with that frankness that becomes a manly character.

THOMPSON (Bath).—It is perfectly true that the hair may be turned gray in a few hours. A medical man, residing in London, had his dark hair so changed in a single night (while suffering from fear of bankruptcy), that even his friends hardly knew him. In an equally short time grief turned gray the hair of a lady, a connection of Dr. Darnell's. Learned men account for this phenomenon by the supposition that grief and fear change the nature of the secretions forming the hair.

B. PETERS.—If we allow the Chinese to be our masters in the art of tea-making, we should pour the boiling water on the leaves, and then pour the tea out immediately, so as to have the flavour or aroma.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

"O time! thou beautifier of the dead,—
Adorner of the ruin—comforter
And only healer when the heart hath bled;
Time, the corrector when our judgment errs—
The test of truth, love—sole philosopher."—BYRON.

Two years had elapsed since the attempt made by Carus Kearn upon the life of our hero. The time had been passed by the merchant in frequent visits to Jersey, or in the deepest retirement at Meldown Park, which, as our readers may recollect, he rented from Sir Norman Boothroyd. A singular change had taken place both in the character and feelings of the old man; he had lost much of his confidence in human nature; a fearful suspicion that his wife had met with foul play haunted him, and it pointed to his nephew as the guilty one. How light did the disobedience of his daughter and the conduct of her husband now appear in comparison with the atrocity of Carus, against whom the exertions of the lawyer had failed to discover the one link wanting in the chain of evidence. No sum, and his offer had been large and tempting, could induce the drug-vender to confess to whom he had sold the rare and curious poison.

Mr. Bently would at once have broken with his unworthy partner, had not one consideration restrained him.

In the first burst of his indignation at the marriage of Rachel, he had written more than one letter to him in which he distinctly asserted his conviction that George Markham had abstracted the securities. The correspondence of the bankers in India through whom they had been negotiated tended to confirm it. Consequently, the reputation of his son-in-law was at the mercy of his bitterest enemy.

More than once the unprincipled ruffian had threatened to make the proofs public, and blast the rising reputation of the man he hated. The stern menaces of his uncle alone restrained him.

"Disgrace me," he said, "and I not only disinherit you, but remove your name from the firm."

It was the last arrow in the quiver of Carus, and, with such a threat suspended over him, no wonder that he hesitated to discharge it.

Rarely did Mr. Bently now visit the City, a circumstance which both surprised and pained his faithful clerk exceedingly, for Peter Mangles could not comprehend how any man could find either amusement or occupation out of business: he never had. To him the mere thought of retiring from it was like striking a balance in the ledger of life, and writing "Finis" at the bottom of the page.

Since the day he first entered the counting-house,

RICHARD MARKHAM SETS SAIL FOR INDIA.

the old man had not toiled so hardly, or felt so great a weight of responsibility resting upon his shoulders. He could obtain neither advice, direction, nor assistance from his principal, whose invariable reply to his letters was, "Act as you think best."

Peter did act as he thought best, and never had the affairs of the house been in a more prosperous condition. The yearly balance-sheet showed enormous and still increasing profits; but Mangles, instead of being elated, felt nervous and terrified at his own success.

Although Carus Kearn participated largely in the advantages arising to the firm, he was anything but satisfied. Peter Mangles, in the absence of the principal, alone held the signature of the house. To be sure, the old man invariably asked his opinion on all important transactions, but then he as invariably followed his own; and the junior partner found himself reduced to a mere cipher in the presence of his own clerks. This was gall and wormwood to him; it stung his pride and self-consequence, and crippled him in certain speculations he had privately undertaken on his own account.

Worse than all, the dark plotter found himself unable to alter it. There was something in the manner of his uncle—the few brief words he had written in reply to his frequent letters of expostulation—that alarmed him. The shadow of the future appeared to be gathering round him dark and menacing; he would have given worlds to penetrate it, but the power was denied him. To a mind like his, the state of agitation and uncertainty in which he existed was not the least part of his punishment.

Peter Mangles was seated at his desk, buried in some exceedingly complicated accounts. Being pressed for time, he had given strict orders not to be interrupted under any pretence till a certain hour, and naturally felt surprised and annoyed when he heard the door open, and some one enter his den, as the junior clerks facetiously designated the old man's private office.

"I thought I left directions not to be disturbed," he muttered, querulously. "Three, eight, six, ought, three, eight, nine, two."

"Well, what is it?" he added.

Not receiving any reply, he raised his eyes from the column of figures before him, and recognised Mr. Bently, whom he had not seen for several months. Peter dropped the pen, hopped from his stool, and shook his employer warmly by the hand.

"Glad you are come, Richard!" he exclaimed. "My poor brain could not have stood it much longer. What do you think of Burrow's affair? Shall we take Spoozell's agency? The security is ample enough, and two and three quarters per cent. will leave a pretty fair margin. How about the Agra Bank—Puttach's bills—Palgrave's last invoice? Of course you will not give up the insurance—rascally attempt—indigo rising in the market; coffee heavy on hand, and silk worse. Those last advances were only met in time; might have had a quarter per cent. more, but thought it safest to realise."

Here the speaker paused—not for want of subject, but breath; he had not half exhausted the former yet. Just as he was about to recommence, the merchant interrupted him by observing that he knew very little about the affairs.

"What! have you not read my last letters?" demanded Peter.

"As much of them as assured me that you were well," replied his employer.

Here the old clerk gave a dissatisfied "Umph!"

"I leave everything to you," added the speaker.

"But I won't have everything left to me," answered the former, impetuously. "The responsibility is awful—more than I can bear. Something dreadful must happen from such unbusiness-like conduct. You are the head of the firm; it is your duty to attend to its interests."

"I cannot," exclaimed the merchant, in a tone so desponding that it startled Peter, and caused him to examine his features, which were pale and careworn. "Better wind up the affairs of the house at once; we are both rich enough. I am old, and—"

"Nonsense!" interrupted the clerk, impetuously. "Wind up the affairs! Why, it would be sinful—positively sinful, and take years to do it: first firm in the City. You are ill, Richard," he added. "Something has occurred to hip you. Never mind my grumbling. I am something like your old house-dog Ponto—my bark is worse than my bite. Leave everything to me as long as you please: what am I here for? As to your being old, fi-de-dee! why, you are only sixty-two. In the last census I read of three deaths over a hundred, and several past ninety."

Mr. Bently faintly smiled.

"I don't wonder at your being unwell," continued the speaker; "been too long out of business; that's it, take my word for it. I feel queer myself if I only miss a day. Follow my advice; better than all the doctors. Go upon 'Change; show yourself. Here are Martineau's bills, Thompson and Patterson's securities. You can't imagine how it will revive you."

"Not to-day, old friend," said the merchant; "not to-day. In a month or two I shall feel stronger—more myself; besides, to-morrow I return to Meldown."

"Ah! there it is," observed Peter Mangles, mournfully. "Meldown—the country! How people contrive to exist in it I can't imagine. No Exchange! no price current! no affairs! It would kill me in a week. Rely upon it that, for health and business, there is no place like London. Look at the beautiful bustle in the City, where every man seems as if he lived for a purpose—had something to do. Only watch," he continued, "the excitement upon 'Change, the fluctuations of the market, the rise and fall in the funds: you have nothing like them in the country."

It is impossible to say how long Peter Mangles might have continued in the same strain; for, like many other respectable old gentlemen, once mounted upon his hobby-horse, it was a difficult thing to tire him; but, fortunately for the patience of our readers, the appearance of the junior partner of the firm acted as a damper upon his enthusiasm and loquacity, and caused him to recollect his accounts.

Hopping back to his stool again, the old man left uncle and nephew to enjoy their conversation by themselves.

Mr. Bently coldly touched the hand extended towards him. As he did so, a close observer must have remarked even that slight courtesy cost him an effort.

"My dear sir," said the hypocrite, trying to look pleased, "I cannot express the happiness I feel at once more seeing you in London. From your long silence, and very brief letters, I feared that you were ill, and more than once have been on the point of running down to Meldown Park."

"I receive no visitors," replied the merchant, drily.

There was an awkward pause in the conversation, during which the scratching of Peter's pen, as he cast up the columns of figures before him, became painfully audible.

"Doubtless you will remain in town some time," observed Carus.

"A day only."

"I am sorry to hear it!" exclaimed the nephew, yielding to his ill humour. "For independent of the pleasure it would afford me to see you daily, your presence would render my position in the firm much more satisfactory."

"Of what do you complain?" demanded his uncle.

Mr. Mangles looked up from his desk; he too felt curious to hear what Carus Kearn had to complain of.

"I have lost your confidence," answered the young man, "and with it all influence in the affairs of the house. It is true your clerk and cashier goes through the form of consulting me, but he invariably acts upon his own judgment, instead of my advice."

"The balance sheet proves that he is right," observed Mr. Bently, drily. "As a man of business I look to results."

"And wisely, too," mentally ejaculated the clerk. "First sensible thing I have heard fall from him for many a day."

"Then he alone is intrusted with the signature of the firm," added Carus, bitterly.

"It is unnecessary that both should have it," replied the merchant; "it might create confusion. Besides, Peter has proved himself my friend, a true and faithful one, through life. He might have been my partner had he desired it. My procurator has been in his hands for years: I shall not insult him by withdrawing it."

The emphatic tone in which this declaration was made, convinced Carus Kearn that any attempt to shake the resolution of his uncle would be useless; he wisely, therefore, dropped the subject. As for Mangles, who had heard every word, a sudden weakness seemed to have attacked him in the eyes. He rubbed them several times with the cuff of his coat—perhaps he was ashamed to be seen using his handkerchief; and mentally pronounced himself a monster of ingratitude, to have grumbled at a little extra work and responsibility being cast upon his shoulders, which he now felt to be strong as those of Atlas.

"Ah, Richard!" he mentally ejaculated, "had you acted as justly to your daughter's husband as to your old clerk, things would have been very different in Lombard-street."

"Peter," said the merchant, as soon as they were once more alone together, "you stick to business too closely."

"Bless me, Mr. Bently!" exclaimed the old man, impatiently, "what else can a man of sense stick to? what would become of the City without it?"

"But we are rich enough."

"It's not the money," replied the clerk, "but the pleasure of making it. How many take delight in dogs and guns, beating through damp woods and covers, trudging over heavy fields, catching dreadful colds, and call it sport? Well, business is my sport, the game I pursue; I couldn't live without it; and, as for toil," he added, "I never knew the meaning of the word till you ceased to share it with me."

His employer, with all his wealth, secretly envied him.

"This cloud, or whatever else you may call it, Richard," continued the speaker, "will soon pass away, and we shall have you in Lombard-street again."

"Perhaps," murmured Mr. Bently.

"I say we shall! Don't look so dull; it reminds me of a bankruptcy. You shall hear no more complaints from me: only"—here the old man hesitated a little—"if anything should go wrong, remember that I have a great many affairs to attend to, and can't give the necessary consideration to all of them. The exchanges are dreadfully fluctuating, Richard."

"Are they?" answered the head of the firm, mechanically; "I have not followed them lately."

It cost Peter Mangles no slight effort to repress a groan, but he did repress it. The idea of his principal not following the variations of the money market both grieved and astonished him. How could he occupy his time?

From the City Mr. Bently drove to the house of his lawyer, to await the arrival of Richard Markham, whom he expected in London that very day. Our hero had completed his education, and had twice, by letter, reminded him of his promise of sending him out to India to obtain the proofs necessary to clear the reputation of his father.

It was this promise that weighed so heavily on the heart of his grandfather; and he resolved, if possible, to make Richard release him from it. The affection he felt for the son of his offending child, resembled in its growth the ivy planted at the foot of some gnarled oak: at first a very slender tendril, then a solitary leaf appeared, both so delicate and unobtrusive that he had scarcely noticed them; in time they gathered strength; the tendril put forth tendrils still more vigorous, until they completely encircled the trunk, reached its branches, hiding the scars and seams of age with their ever verdant foliage.

In a word, Mr. Bently lived but in his grandson, and the thought of separation was worse than death to him.

"Is he here?" he eagerly demanded of his friend Morton, as the latter extended his hand to welcome him.

The lawyer with difficulty repressed a smile. "Not yet," he answered, glancing at the time-piece: "it wants an hour, at least, to the arrival of the train."

"So much," murmured the old man, impatiently. "You received my last letter?"

"I did."

"And the project I wrote of—"

"Is feasible," answered the lawyer, "especially from your influence with the government. I perceive but one difficulty—the boy's own consent."

"He will not refuse my offer," said the merchant, in a tone which indicated less confidence than his words expressed.

"You still believe, then, in the omnipotence of wealth?" observed Mr. Morton, sarcastically.

"Experience hourly proves it," replied Mr. Bently. "There is a fascination in gold few natures can withstand: it blinds the judgment, hardens the heart, and fills the brain with intoxicating dreams; it is the idol all worship, some in crime, others in health or happiness, but all with sacrifice."

"You speak learnedly upon this point," said his legal adviser, with a smile.

"Because I have escaped its influence. Time was I looked upon it as the summum bonum of existence, and felt an insane pride in the heaps I had hoarded up. Men bowed to it, and, like an idiot, I fancied the homage paid to the possessor, not the thing possessed. I am not the first," he added, with a sigh, "whose heart has been wedded to ashes."

"And yet you wish Richard to become one of these idolmongers," observed the lawyer, reproachfully.

"I would not die—as I have lived—alone!" exclaimed his client, in a tone of deep emotion. "A hireling's hand to close my eyes, their last glance resting on cold, unsympathising features; I am not all iron, and shrink from the terror of such a deathbed. Not another word," he added; "you cannot change my purpose."

"I shall not obtrude my advice again," replied Mr. Morton; "and yet I cannot help feeling that it is a severe trial to put your grandson to."

"He will yield," answered the merchant.

"Or pass through the ordeal like gold from fire, the purer for the test. But let us change the subject."

"Willingly. Have you made the inquiries I directed respecting my nephew?"

The legal adviser of Mr. Bently opened his private desk, and drew forth a note-book, the pages of which he turned rapidly over, till he came to one closely written.

"Here it is," he said.

"And the result?"

"Listen. Carus Kearn has been in the habit, for many years past, of speculating largely on his own account; his losses have been heavy, so heavy that the fortune of his wife, or rather that portion of it which came into his hands, is dissipated."

"The fool," muttered his uncle, bitterly.

"Bills are frequently drawn upon him from India."

"Is that certain?" demanded the merchant, eagerly.

"Curry and Company presented them."

Mr. Bently made a memorandum in his pocket-book.

"And the poison—the—"

"I understand you," interrupted the lawyer, willing to spare his client the pain of alluding more particularly to so distressing a subject. "No means have been left untried. My offers have been most tempting, but failed to shake the old dealer's resolution. His fears are stronger than his avarice. He declares that he has not the slightest recollection either of the name or person of the party to whom he sold the deadly drug; but I have not given up the hope of tracing it," he added. "The man you directed me to employ has taken a lodging in the neighbourhood, and is slowly but securely working himself into his confidence. If once I catch him tripping—"

The conversation was broken off by the sound of a carriage drawing up to the door, and the next minute Mr. Bently had the satisfaction of embracing his grandson.

Mr. Morton could scarcely have recognised in the glowing features, well-knit limbs, and manly bearing of the fine young fellow before him, the pale, terror-stricken boy whom his client had brought a prisoner to his house on the memorable New Year's eve. But Richard remembered him, his kindness and sympathy, as well as the painful circumstances under which they had met, and a slight blush suffused his countenance as he extended his hand to him.

The lawyer shook it heartily as he welcomed him to London.

Our hero pronounced the name of his old school-fellow, who had quitted Jersey a year previously for Cambridge.

"He arrived last night," said his father, "for the long vacation, and is as impatient as yourself, my dear boy, to meet you. He knows all that it is necessary he should ever know," he added; "that you are the grandson of my respected client; although for the present the relationship must remain a secret to the world: he will not betray it."

He rang the bell twice, as he concluded; the signal for his son to make his appearance.

Those who have not forgotten the warmth, the charm of boyhood's friendships, can imagine the pleasure of such a meeting. "Harry!" "Richard!" were the only words that escaped from the two friends as they grasped each other by the hand, their eyes glistening with recollections which, even when the hair is gray, and the heart seared with the disappointments of the world, will sometimes startle us by their freshness. We pity, if we do not despise, the cold, harsh nature that can sneer at the feelings and impressions of youth. For our own part, we prize them for their lack of worldliness, their purity and truthfulness; like the flowers of spring, they are the first to adorn the path of life: more brilliant ones may unfold as we advance, but never with equal freshness.

"Your friend will accompany us to Meldown," said Mr. Bently, who had been conversing with Lieutenant Marsh, the gentleman to whom he had confided the task of watching over the safety of his grandson.

"I feared you might find it dull in the country with only my society," he added, with a sigh, "and have persuaded Morton to part with Harry for a week or two."

"Thank you, sir!" exclaimed our hero, gratefully. "But why lessen the pleasure you have afforded me by an unkind thought? You know I never tire of your society."

The lawyer smiled approvingly.

It was not the words—politeness or policy might have suggested them—but the tone in which they were uttered, and the look of the speaker, that carried conviction of his sincerity to the heart of his grandfather.

"I believe you, my dear boy," he said; "I believe you."

During the journey to St. Faith's, Richard was particularly careful not to wound the susceptibility of his aged relative, whose feelings he divined, by betraying any preference for the society of his friend Harry. If Mr. Bently was weak upon the point, it was the weakness of affection, and his grandson respected it.

As the carriage drew up at the hall on the arrival of the party, which included the lieutenant, a magnificent Newfoundland dog came bounding over the lawn and began caressing the merchant.

"What a noble creature," observed both the young men.

"And faithful as he is intelligent," added his owner; "for weeks, I have frequently had no other companion than Nelson."

Richard repeated the name.

The dog regarded him doubtfully.

"Go to him," said Mr. Bently.

The obedient animal placed his huge fore-paws upon the chest of our hero, looked earnestly into his face and whined; there was no need for any further introduction. From that moment they became friends.

Like most old family mansions, the house at Meldown Park was rich in quaint relics of the past. In the great hall were several suits of mail, which had done their wearers good service during the civil wars; and one more ancient than the rest, known by the name of the Crusader's armour.

There was scarcely a room without some memento of the kind. In one, it was a cabinet, which in its day had contained the papers of a statesman, or the silken robes or jewels of some court beauty, whose portrait still adorned the picture gallery, a long, oak-pannelled apartment, running the entire length of the north wing.

This was a favourite spot both with our hero and his friend Harry. Scarcely a morning passed in which the housekeeper had not to leave her more important duties to relate to them the history of one of the family worthies.

But the portrait that most attracted the attention of Richard was a modern one, by Winterhalter, painted with that exquisite truthfulness and life-like expression which characterises the productions of the great German master. It had only lately been added to the collection.

It represented a lovely girl, certainly not more than fifteen years of age, with an arch, gipsy-like expression of countenance, and a smile upon the half-open lips, sunny and bright as those which haunt the dreams of youth.

It was the likeness of Alice.

More than once Harry and Lieutenant Marsh, after having hunted the grounds for our hero in vain, had discovered him gazing dreamily on the picture; and, as may be supposed, were not sparing of the badinage usual on such occasions. Morton accused him with being in love with a painting.

"It is the fate of most men," said the lieutenant, with a smile. "Few are caught by real character; and the reason is obvious: it is so rarely that it is permitted to appear. For my part," he added, "it matters very little whether the painting is executed on canvas or upon flesh and blood. The former is less deceptive of the two."

"Cynic!" exclaimed Richard.

"I should have said philosopher," added Harry.

"And both have been equally in error," replied the soldier; "for I find too much good in human nature to merit the first appellation, and analyse it too little to lay claim to the last. Like our dreaming friend here, I am content to be pleased I know not why, and care not wherefore."

"I am pleased with the portrait," said Richard; "there is so much frankness in the expression. I wonder if it resembles her."

"I should say it does," observed the lieutenant.

"Then there never was a child less like its parents," exclaimed Morton, pointing to the portraits of Sir Norman and his lady by the same master.

"The likeness, at any rate, is a family one," resumed the former speaker, "and resembles her uncle, Alan Boothroyd, whom I knew in India, where we served in the same regiment. Poor Alan!" he added, with a sigh.

"Was he so unfortunate?" demanded the young man.

"The world doubtless thought him so," answered Lieutenant Marsh; "but dreamers like yourself, Richard, would have pronounced otherwise, for he not only carved his way to rank by his sword—having entered the Company's service as a private—but won the affections of one of the most beautiful girls in India, and carried her off from a host of competitors. Their happiness, however, was but short-lived: a malignant fever carried them off within a few days of each other."

"The brother of Sir Norman Boothroyd a private soldier!" observed our hero, with surprise.

"They were brothers in blood, but not in feelings. Whilst a bachelor, the elder brother was simply vain and ignorant, with a ridiculous sense of his own importance. It was reserved for the evil-minded woman he married to complete the corruption of his heart."

As the party quitted the portrait gallery, the two friends could not avoid wondering how the speaker came to be so well acquainted with the private history of the Boothroyds.

CHAPTER XL.

What is youth? a dancing willow,
Winds behind and rocks before;
Age? a drooping, tottering willow,
On a flat and lazy shore.
Thus fares it still in our decay,
And yet the changing mind
Mourns less for what age takes away
Than what it leaves behind.

WORDSWORTH.

SEVERAL weeks had elapsed, and neither Mr. Bently nor his grandson had once alluded to what was uppermost in the minds of each—the departure of the latter for India. Once, when our hero, in speaking of the pleasure of possessing a domain like Meldown—the happiness which such a property might enable the owner of it to diffuse around him, the old man smiled.

The hope of detaining Richard in England strengthened.

"He can scarcely refuse," thought his grandfather, "the temptation I can offer."

Like most men of the world, he was mistaken. It never entered into his calculations that there are natures only to be bribed through their feelings—minds in whose judgment gold is as dross compared with the dictates of duty or the impulse of affection.

The two relatives were walking one evening in the park, when Mr. Bently pointed to a magnificent hunter, which one of the grooms was breaking in.

"For you!" he said.

The youth remained silent. He had long suspected the desire of the speaker to be released from the promise he had made him, and the words confirmed it.

"You do not appear pleased with my gift?" observed the merchant, in a tone of disappointment. "Most young men, I imagined, were fond of horses."

"I should indeed be ungrateful," replied the youth, "were I insensible to your kindness. And if I did not thank you as I ought to have done, my silence arose from a circumstance which I fear you have forgotten."

"And that is—"

"My approaching departure for India will render your present useless."

"Richard," said the merchant, seating himself at the foot of an aged oak, whose gnarled and giant branches cast a broad shadow across their path, "it is time that we understood each other. Listen to me patiently, and weigh well every word I am about to utter; for the future, which to you contains long years of happiness and, I trust, respect and honour, to me the last gleam of sunshine I can experience this side of the grave depends on your answer."

"I am rich," resumed the old man. "Time, which has stripped me of the solace of a wife and child's affections, has heaped up in my coffers wealth sufficient to slake even the thirst of avarice, to place pleasure, the world's observance and its honours, within reach of him I name my heir."

He paused to watch the effect his words had produced, but the countenance of his hearer remained impassible. There was no flashing of the eye or quivering of the lip to indicate that he felt touched by the glittering bait thus artfully spread out before him.

"You do not value gold?" added his grandfather, in a tone of disappointment.

"Will it purchase happiness?" demanded our hero.

"The world will tell you that it does."

"Then why are not you happy, sir?"

"The question is boldly put," replied Mr. Bently, after a pause, "and I will answer it truthfully. Because I relied on wealth as the principal, instead of the accessory. When Providence—for I recognise his wonder-working hand—cast you upon my care, I was a proud, stern man—proud of the success I had achieved in the commercial world, the high standing of the firm I had founded; stern and unbending in my resolution.

"We little know our own hearts," he continued, after a pause. "He is but a fool who imagines that he has fathomed either its strength or weakness. In you the tie of affection so long broken became knit again, the more strongly, perhaps, for having once been severed. I cannot part with you, Richard; the pang would kill me."

It must have been a sterner nature than his grandson's to have heard this avowal unmoved—the tone of almost childish helplessness in which it was pronounced.

"But for awhile," replied the young man: "a year may bring me back to you again."

"Speak not of it," exclaimed the old man, mournfully.

"Your promise!"

"You must release me from it. Do not answer me till you have heard the price I am willing to pay."

At the words price and pay, Richard Markham drew himself up to his full height. The words grated harshly on his feelings.

"I have already taken steps to obtain the sanction of the Crown to your assuming my name. Should dishonour fall upon your father, it will scarcely affect you; and my fortune—all I possess—shall be settled irrevocably upon you."

"Grandfather! grandfather!" interrupted the youth, impatiently, "what a mercenary, heartless thing you must imagine me. Be more just, both to yourself and me; for years I have consented—and heaven knows the pang the resolution cost me—to abstain from all intercourse with my parents,—bartered my mother's kiss, my sister's love, not for the gold of which you are so proud, but the hope that the uncertainty of my fate might assist in effecting a father's reformation."

"It has effected it," groaned the merchant; "and but for the past, the inexorable past, gladly would I acknowledge him."

"I give no credence to the past you speak of," answered Richard: "my father has been traduced, slandered, made the victim of a foul suspicion he never had an opportunity of disproving. Were I to accept your offer, never could I look him in the face again; he would have the right to despise me."

"My line of conduct is clear," he added. "I must proceed to India. Should Providence bless my enterprise and enable me to clear my parent's name, then and then only shall I possess a claim to his forgiveness for my long and cruel silence."

"His forgiveness!" repeated Mr. Bently, impatiently.

"Respect the father, sir, in presence of the son. I have no right to judge him, or you to tamper with my duty."

"Reflect: all my wealth—"

"Could not weigh against my resolution half so heavily as your wishes, grandfather. If I can resist them, the rest is easy."

"Ingrate!" exclaimed the merchant, bitterly.

"Ingrate," repeated the young man, deeply moved. "Recall that word, sir; it could not come from your heart; it was pride that prompted it. Is it for your wealth that I have loved you? you see I can reject it. Make whom you will your heir, I have no right to murmur at the decision. When the voice of passion is no longer heard, and reason resumes her empire, then, grandfather, you will think more kindly of the boy your bounty snatched from ruin, more justly of his gratitude and affection for you, and cease to blame him because he prefers duty to gold."

"You cannot go to India without my aid," hoarsely murmured Mr. Bently.

"You forget that I am young."

"You have no clue to—"

"God that protected the boy will not desert the man," answered Richard Markham. "Let us part friends. Give me your blessing and farewell."

The merchant rose slowly from his seat beneath the oak. A variety of emotions were contending in his breast—anger, disappointment, and, let us add, kinder feelings, which, as he gazed upon the animated features of the speaker, and saw the tears he vainly attempted to repress, at last prevailed.

Throwing himself upon his neck, he wept bitterly.

"You have conquered," he exclaimed; "and perhaps I love you the better for my defeat. Grant me a few days to recover from the downfall of my hopes—I will not abuse it; a few days to the weakness of an old man's heart, and everything shall be arranged as you desire. I will not try to tempt you again," he added, "from the path you have chosen."

Mr. Bently kept his word: from that day his grandson was exposed to no further exhortations to remain,—his grandfather felt they would be useless. Amongst other arrangements for the safety of our hero, and the success of his enterprise, it was settled that he should take the name of a distant branch of the family,—Tyrrell; and that Lieutenant Marsh, who had hitherto so effectually watched over his safety in Jersey, should accompany him,—not in the character of a tutor, but simply as a friend, whose knowledge of the country and advice in any emergency might prove useful to him.

At the end of a month, one of the party at least quitted Meldown Park with a much heavier heart than he had arrived with.

We scarcely need say that it was the merchant.

The stay in town was necessarily a brief one, although it proved sufficient to enable our hero to execute a project he had long entertained of having his portrait taken. When done, he intrusted it to his friend Harry.

"For my dear mother," he said. "It is a painful task that I have confided to you, for you will have to resist her prayers, and tears which are still more eloquent; but my grandfather's secret must be kept; for, should I not live to return, the knowledge of it might steel her heart against him."

The parting between Mr. Bently and his grandson took place on the beach of Southampton, and was delayed until the last moment. Lieutenant Marsh had been some time on board.

The old man would accompany him from the hotel and see him into the boat. It was the last one. The ship Perseverance only waited its return to raise anchor and get under weigh.

"No further, dear grandfather," said our hero, alarmed at the old man's paleness.

"Do not fear me, Richard; I will not add to your distress by yielding to the weakness of age, or the feelings of my heart. I shall have time enough to indulge in them when you are gone, and I am once more alone in the world. Everything, yes, I think everything, has been arranged to insure your success in India. Do not spare my credit," he added; "you will but forestall your inheritance."

"All that affection could suggest has been done for me," replied the young man, "save one thing."

The merchant regarded him anxiously.

"You will not be angry with me, sir?"

"I trust not."

"It is my last request."

"Then I am sure I shall not feel angry," said his relative.

"You have a child," said our hero. "True, she has offended you, but she is still your child; and years of coldness and estrangement have not weakened the ties of affection in her heart. Should anything occur—should I not live to return—Forgive me, sir—promise me to forgive her!"

Mr. Bently passed his hand slowly athwart his brow, as if a sudden pain had seized him there. His grandson regarded him attentively and sighed.

"If I have presumed too far upon my influence with you," he continued, "you must blame your own kindness for it. It would have made me so happy."

"Our parting shall not be clouded by unkindness," said the old man, solemnly; "I promise you."

"Bless you, grandfather, bless you!" exclaimed Richard Markham, throwing himself upon his knees, and kissing the hand of the old man. "You have removed the last weight from my mind, and I go now with a strong heart where duty calls me. I shall return, be sure I shall return, and bring my father's vindication with me."

"Heaven grant it."

"Your blessing—once more your blessing."

The merchant pronounced it, and the words were not the less heard on high, because affection caused them to falter on his tongue.

Richard felt that the scene was becoming too painful to be much further prolonged. With a strong effort he tore himself from the embrace of his aged relative, and ran towards the boat, which had all the while been waiting for him.

"Alone!" murmured Mr. Bently, as he stood upon the beach, his hands drooping listlessly—"once more alone!"

Nelson, the great Newfoundland dog, who was seated by his side, looked up into his face, and whined piteously; then ran towards the shore, and barked loudly at the receding boat.

Our hero waved his handkerchief: the animal mistook it for a signal, and, plunging into the surf, struck out vigorously after him.

"Even the brute creation love him," thought the merchant; "no wonder that he has wound himself around my heart."

It was not till the Perseverance had raised anchor and set sail that the old man returned to his hotel alone.

For Nelson had succeeded in gaining the boat, and with his young master was on his way to India.

It was no easy task that Harry Morton had undertaken, to convey the portrait of his friend to Rachel, and yet keep the hitherto well-guarded secret of his grandfather. To call upon her without first sending up his card, or the preliminary of an introduction, was out of the question; and there was little likelihood of encountering her in society, which she seldom entered.

In this dilemma he resolved to consult his mother; and he was right in doing so, for a woman's wit will frequently jump at the solution of a difficulty, whilst man's is laboriously arriving at it.

Mrs. Morton, who, from the interest she felt in our hero, had never lost sight of his mother, fortunately recollected that her house was in the same square as the residence of one of her most intimate friends, and that she had frequently seen Mrs. Markham and her daughter walking in the inclosure.

This was sufficient for her son, who resolved to watch till he encountered her there. He had not long to wait.

Rachel and Mary were both surprised by the piercing gaze of a young man, who passed and re-passed several times before the bench on which they were seated at work.

"How rude," said the mother, in an under tone.

Her daughter made no reply: perhaps she thought it more singular than rude.

At last the stranger bowed, and, colouring deeply, demanded if he had not the honour of addressing Mrs. Markham.

The answer was coldly in the affirmative.

"I fear," said the young man, "you deem my manner strange."

Mary, whose blue eyes were sparkling with fun and mischief, gravely inquired what he thought of them himself.

"Even more severely than you can judge them," replied Harry. "And yet, if you knew the cause of my embarrassment," he added, "you would assist me instead of adding to it."

"But not knowing the cause," replied the young lady, demurely, "I wisely abstain from offering any opinion."

"I am the bearer of a message to your mother."

"To me," repeated Rachel, who began to feel that whatever the motive of the intrusion, impertinence had nothing to do with it.

"And a gift," added Harry, "which I am sure you will be happy to receive, since it came from one who must still be very dear to you."

The paleness which overspread the features of Mrs. Markham excited the alarm of Mary, and she imperatively commanded the young man to leave them.

"No—no, it is past," sighed the sorrow-stricken woman, who already divined that she was about to hear some tidings of her lost son. "Pray, proceed. I am strong now, quite strong."

"You have not forgotten—"

"I am a mother, sir!" exclaimed Rachel, in a tone of mingled agony and impatience, which showed the words were wrung from her very heart. "Do not trifle with me. Is my boy dead?"

"On the contrary, he is living and in health," replied the messenger; "worthy the affection of all who know him."

"Then why this mystery? will it never end?"

"That I am unable to explain; but trust me, as far as Richard is concerned, he deplores it deeply. At school we were friends, I might almost add brothers, but fear"—here he glanced at Mary—"that you would deem me a boaster. A brief, very brief period, I trust, will restore him to you: meanwhile, he has intrusted me with this."

He placed in the trembling hands of the agitated woman the portrait of her son.

"Richard, dear Richard!" exclaimed Mary, bursting into tears, as she gazed over her mother's shoulder at the likeness. "He is not much changed—the features are less thoughtful, but there is still the same kind expression."

Neither mother nor daughter observed, whilst they were indulging in their feelings, that the messenger was escaping. Mary was the first to perceive it, and hastened after him—no longer the timid child, but resolute in a sister's love.

"You cannot have the heart," she said, placing her hand upon his arm, "to leave us in this painful uncertainty? You have a mother?"

"A dear, kind one," replied Harry Morton, greatly moved.

"And a sister?"

"Almost as beautiful as yourself."

"Then you will not refuse my prayer; return with me, impart all that you are permitted to tell. You would not break mamma's heart and mine?"

As Richard's messenger had not the slightest desire of doing anything so cruel, he permitted himself to be led back to the seat where the fair pleader had left her mother overcome with emotions of grief and joy.

"Here he is, mamma," cried the excited girl. Those who had watched the scene from a distance must have been puzzled to account for the sudden familiarity between Mrs. Markham and her daughter with a stranger, who remained seated between them more than an hour in deep and, to all appearance, interesting conversation.

When he rose to depart, poor Harry had only two secrets left to tell—his own name and that of the benevolent old gentleman whom he described as the protector of his schoolfellow.

He had even gone so far as to promise to meet them in the square again.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

MUSIC.

AMONG those recreations which are proper as well as pleasant, the cultivation of musical ability takes high rank.

I say musical ability, for it is not everybody who possesses the necessary qualifications to enjoy true music. There are some people who find no pleasure in music. I do not believe that this is because they cannot at any time feel its charms, but because their sense of music has been allowed to remain in a condition of inactivity; and consequently they have no relish for "sweet sounds."

Properly to appreciate a painting or sculpture requires an educated eye. Rightly to value a musical composition requires an educated ear. Without there is some natural defect in the physical organisation, I believe that the ear and the eye are both capable of education, and that all, or nearly all, can appreciate music and painting if they will.

Music is the poetry of sound. It embraces harmony, concord, and melody. It moves on velvet wings, waved so gently and gracefully, that naught but onward motion is known or felt. Whatever sound produces the charm of melody in the soul, wakes up all its Æolian strings to breathing symphonies within, unheard, but felt like the spirit-notes of a rapt vision, is music. Whatever sounds, or succession of sounds, make us forget that we are dwellers of earth, and lifts us, for the time being, into a world of living harmonies, which come and go, entrance and bewilder, captivate and hold in trembling delight our minds, like the electric colour-dances of the Aurora Borealis—is real music. It is a thing to be felt, not described. It is not sound simply; for all sound is not music. It is a peculiar, indescribable running together, or blending of certain smooth sounds of different heights, like the gliding together of the different colours of the rainbow. Its presence is tested only by the charm wrought in the soul.

When the soul is in ecstasy, occasioned by a succession of sounds, we may know that musical numbers are flowing. When a soft sound starts a tear in the eye, we may know that the spirit of music is there. Oh, the rapturous charm of Music! What power it has to soften, melt, enchain, in its spirit-chords of subduing harmony! Truly there is power in music; an almost omnipotent power. It will tyrannise over the soul. It will force it to bow down and worship, it will wring adoration from it, and compel the heart to yield its treasures of love. Every emotion, from the most reverent devotion to the wildest gushes of frolicsome joy, it holds subject to its imperative will. It calls the religious devotee to worship, the patriot to his country's altar, the philanthropist to his generous work, the freeman to the temple of liberty, the friend to the altar of friendship, the lover to the side of his beloved. It elevates, empowers, and strengthens them all. The human soul is a mighty harp, and all its strings vibrate to the gush of music. Yet all souls are not the same harp, nor are all affected alike by its power. Some will listen to the most exquisite music with only an agreeable pleasure, while others are carried heavenward in a whirlwind of bewildering joy.

Different nations have different habits, customs, manners, modes of expression, and different words and languages to convey their thoughts and feelings. But music is felt alike by them all. A stirring strain will touch the well-strung souls of every nation alike. All will dance to a note of joy; all will weep at one of sadness. A lofty strain will bear all to heaven; a jarring discord lower them again to earth. The same masters have made the same music in Norway, Germany, Italy, France, England, America, and all have bowed before it like reeds before the wind. A beautiful proof is this of the kindred nature of all souls, of the existence of a mysterious link of spiritual union, that binds them all together. And the beauty of this proof is heightened when we remember that music is the voice of love, and is closely allied to the infinite. Love speaks in tones of music. Love breathes musical airs. Love delights to pour itself out in song. The worshipper chants his praises in strains of lofty music. The lover of freedom speaks his love in song. The lover of beauty sings its praises. The lover of humanity softly breathes his love-notes in strains of sweetest music. Then how beautiful is its universality! The love of which it is the voice is equally universal. All souls have love within them. It is the all-pervading soul of the universe. Its voice is music. It is breathed in the harmony of the spheres, in the anthem of universal nature.

It has been beautifully said that, "Music is the voice of God, and poetry His language." It seems to bear an affinity to Deity. An eloquent writer, in speaking of the impression made on her mind by a musical performance, says: "It expressed to me more of the infinite than I ever saw, or heard, or dreamed of, in the realms of nature, art, or imagination." And again: "Music is the soprano, the feminine principle, the heart of the universe. Because it is the voice of Love, because it is the highest type, and aggregate expression of attraction, therefore it is infinite; therefore it pervades all space, and transcends all being, like a divine influx. What the tone is to the word, what expression is to the form, what affection is to thought, what the heart is to the head, what intuition is to argument, what insight is to policy, what religion is to philosophy, what holiness is to heroism, what moral influence is to power, what woman is to man, is music to the universe. Flexible, graceful, and free, it pervades all things, and is limited by none. It is not poetry, but it is the soul of poetry; it is not mathematics, but it is the numbers, like harmonious proportions in cast iron; it is not in painting, but it shines through colours, and gives them their tone; . . . it is not in architecture, but the stones take their places in harmony with its voice, and stand in 'petrified music.'" In the words of Bettina: "Every art is the body of music, which is the soul of every art; and so is music to the soul of love, which also answers not for its workings; for it is the contact of divine with human."

The human voice is the most perfect musical instrument ever made; and well it might be, for it had the most skilful Maker. That voice should be cultivated so as to sing the tones of love to man and to God. Around the fireside, in the social circle, it should sing the voice of love, and at the altar of God it should pour forth melodious praise. Who does not know the softening power of music, especially the music of the human voice? It is like the angel whisperings of kind words in the hour of trouble. Who can be angry when the voice of love speaks in music? Who hears the harsh voice of selfishness, and brutalising passion, when music gathers up her pearly love-notes, to salute the ear with a stray song of paradise? Sing to the wicked man, sing to the disconsolate, sing to the sufferer, sing to the old, and sing to children, for music will inspire them all.

To all youth we would say, Cultivate well the powers of music in your souls, for amply will you be repaid. You who possess the gift for music, shall it be unproductive within you for want of use? Shall the gem never be burnished? Shall you never present it shining to its Giver in a song of praise and worship. It is due to Him that it should be cultivated. How early should children be taught to sing; for what is sweeter than the songs of innocent childhood, so refining, so refreshing, so suggestive of a better world? Music sweetens the cup of bitterness, softens the hand of want, lightens the burdens of life, makes the heart courageous, and the soul cheerfully devout. Into the soul of childhood and youth it pours a tide of redeeming influence. Its first and direct effect is to mentalise the musical performer; not to give him knowledge, nor more wisdom in the practical, business affairs of life, but to stir his mental being into activity, to awaken strong emotions, to move among the powers within as a common electricifier, touching here with tenderness, there with energy, now with holy aspiration, and anon with the inspiring thrill of beauty. It breathes like a miracle of inspiration through the soul, to elevate, refine, and spiritualise. No lethargy can exist in the soul that is pouring forth a tide of musical numbers. Its very recesses are all astir. Everything within becomes active; the perceptions acute, the affections warm, the moral sensibilities quick and sensitive. When we think how much the world wants awakening, we can think of no power better calculated to do it than that which dwells in the mysterious melodies of music.

But it not only gives an additional warmth, fervour, and vigour to the powers within, it gives refinement. It is opposed to the gross, the low, and the vulgar. Music never suggests vulgarity and baseness—never tends to the coarse and low; but to the shame of humanity be it said, that it has been prostituted to administer to base passions and vile feelings. And so has religion, and reason, and love. But not more are these directly opposed to the vile and coarse than is music. When musical numbers take hold of the mental man with their powerful and vigorous sway, and raise it to that point of activity and fervour scarcely ever attained by any other means, the whole tendency is to the pure, the refined, and the perfect. It is true the increased and cultivated sensibility of musical performers makes them so alive to discord, opposition, harshness, that at times they become much like that sensitive plant called "touch-me-not;" but this is rather the result of outward discord than of inward tendency to irritability. The outward world is not in harmony with their inward world. It is too gross and rough—too discordant and perplexing.

It is to be expected that the sensibility which music cultivates will influence the passionate as well as the moral nature of man; and will at times make anger more acute as well as love. It gives an increased activity to the whole being. And this would show the importance of cultivating all the mental powers in harmony with the musical talent. Much as we prize the influences of music, holy and enrapturing as we believe them to be, we would not press its claims beyond its proper limits. Harmony of mental development should be the grand object of life. The real and all-glorious influences of music are known and felt only when the whole mind is truly and properly cultivated. Then its charm is perfect; then its heaven is created. Music should be an essential part of education. It should be cultivated with numbers, with science, with literature, and poetry; for it is intimately blended with all these,—is the spiritual expression of them all. It should begin ere words are lisped by the infant tongue, and be continued through the whole educational course, yea, through life. On account of its mentalising tendency, it assists rather than retards the educational progress. It renders more active all the mental powers; so that the whole educational work is promoted by the vitalising power of the musical faculties. An education can be acquired more quickly and more effectually with, than without, the cultivation of the musical talent. The time given to that augments as rapidly as time spent in any other way the strength of the mental powers, while it relaxes, unbends, recreates and strengthens them, and thus gives more time to the real work of education. Then let all youth be wise, and educate their talents for good music.

A GREAT MULROONEY STORY.

ALL ABOUT TIM DELANY—HOW HE WINT COORTIN' WID HIS MASTHER, AND THE CONSEQUENCES.

"WANST upon a time—an', sure, that's not so long ago, afther all—there wor a grate frindship betune the familees of the Sullivans an' the O'Briens; but, by raison of their livin' a long ways apart, they niver sot eyes on acher other for many's the year, though they kep' up the ould goodwill by writin' letters back and fore, wid the shuperscupshins of 'Yer humble sarvint to command, Murtoch O'Brien ma bouchal,' or, 'May the heavins be yer bed, and glory be wid ye, Dennis Sullivan a hagar!'"

"Well, the years rowled by, an' in the manetime, the sunshine lived for iver in the house of Murtoch O'Brien, in the shape of a daughter that bate the wureld for beauty; while Dinnis Sullivan wor prouder of his son Maurice nor if he had found all the goold mines of Californy, wid all the joowels of the Aist Injees to the top of 'em. Oh, faix, but ye may be sartin that the ould min in their letters gossiped about the childher, an' that Misther O'Brien, bein' discinded from the anshint kings of Munster, belaved his daughter Norah the aquil of any princess in Eurip and Aishey, lettin' alone the Turkeys and the Roosters—Rooshins, I mane—an' the Jarmans, an' the Frinch, an' all the other haythens."

"Well, by coorse, by-an'-by, young Masther Maurice an' the butyful Miss Norah wor contracted thegither by the ould people; though, it's the thruth I'm sayin', nayther of the youngsters wor beknowin' to it at all, until wan day, when Maurice wor near grown to be a man, his fader up an' told him what he had done. 'Well an' good!' sez Maurice, for he wor a mighty purty behaved young jintleman; an', wid that, he crasses over the salt say into forrin parts, where he larned to ate frogs in France, an' to sleep undher a feather bed in Jarman, wid his ex-thremities stickin' out. By-an'-by, whin he had finished his eddicashin at the Jarman Univrarsity, by dhrillin' a hole wid a small sword through the arum of wan Count Dondher an' Blixum, an' b' bein' mortally wounded in his undher garmin' hisself, Maurice thravels back to the ould country. Oh, but Dinis Sullivan wor mighty plased to shake hands wid his darling boy agin! an' he grown so tall, an' sthrong, an' manly like.

"Maurice, avourneen!" sez his fadher, tindherly. 'seem' 'tis of age ye are, an' may be I'll not be wid ye long, sure it 'ud be plas' in me to see yees marri'd at wanst to Norah O'Brien,' sez he.

"But how will I tell whether I'll like her or no?" sez Maurice, dub'ously.

"By raison that she's a hairess and a grate beauty," sez the ould jentleman.

"Thim's good things in their way," sez Maurice; 'but may be I'll be ruinashin'd afther all, wid the crooked timper.'

"Make yerself parfairly aisey on that score, Maurice, ma bouchal," sez his fadher. 'Honey isn't swate, nor butther safter.'

"May be 'tis too saft she is," sez Maurice.

"Tare an' ounties!" sez the ould jintleman, in a grate passion. 'What 'ud yees like to have, I'd be plased to know? Isn't Murtoch O'Brien my ould fri'nd, an' wan I niver had a quarrel wid in my life, batin' the bottle he throw'd at my head at ould Trinity, an' the bullet I lodged in his side on the banks of the Liffey one morn? Sure, afther that affeckshinate raymonstrance we wor better fri'nds nor iver we wor before.'

"Well, by this an' by that, seem' the ould jintleman wor bint upon the match, Maurice consints to ride over an' coort the young lady, purvided he might take wid him his fosterer, wan Tim Delaney. Sure I know'd him well, for he wor own cousin to myself by the mudher's side, an' he it wor as tould me this sthory.

"Take him by all manes," sez the ould jintleman. 'I've not the laste objectshin. 'Tis a dacent lad he is, and a bether face or a nater figure, barrin' yer own, Maurice dear, there's not to be found in all the county. He deserves to be put forrid in the wureld. He's not atthegither an' ignoramus nather,' sez he, 'for Fadher Doran thried to bate the humanities into him for the matther of two seasons; an' though he butthers his mattymatticks wid poetical contribushins, an' peppers an' salts the larned langwidges wid aljebraickal cakulations, there's a dale of larnin' in that head of his, av he only understood the manage of it.'

"So, wid that Misher Maurice sed he wor contint, an' sendin' his thrunk on afore him by the faymale stage, he—"

"Stop! stop! Mulroony! I was not aware of any distinction between one stage and another. Will you do me the favour to enlighten me?"

"Arrah, now," said Peter, boldly, "don't I know the differ? Sure, if the coaches as carries the lethers is the male stages, it stands to raison thim as doesn't must be the faymales."

"Humph! Admirably defined! Well, go on."

"An' thin—an' thin—och, wirrasthruel! but I've lost the sthory completely and enthirely, by makin' a dickshunary of myself."

"Let me jog your memory then. Maurice sent his trunk on before—"

"That's it," said Peter, "by the faymale stage, an' set out on horseback wid hisself an' Tim, bright an' early the nixt morn, for Carrigathroid. Well, they hadn't gone more nor a few miles, afore little Micky Dunn, the stable boy, comes tearin' down the road to say that the masther had been taken suddenly wid a fit of the gout, an' that Misher Maurice must go back to attend the sale of Ned Ryan's place, as the ould jintleman wanted it to square off the corner of the upper farm."

"Oh, musha, thin, but what'll I do?" sez Maurice. 'Tis unlucky to turn back; an', besides, my thrunk is gone on afore, wid all the b'utiful clothes in it I brought from France and Jarman.'

"Faix, but that's bad!" sez Tim; 'an' I mis-thrustin' Andy Shehan, the dhriver. May be 'tis bether I'd thravel on afther him?'

"Deed an' deed I think so," sez Maurice. 'An' take this kay along wid ye, Tim,' sez Maurice 'an' sarch if the things isn't spirrited away, or smashed up entirely. An' Tim,' says he, 'there's a letther of inter-juckshin in the thrunk which I want yees to deliver at wanst, for fear the ould squireen'll be onaisey, as he expected me the day. An' Tim,' sez he, lowerin' his voice, 'I'll be plased if ye'll take it to Carrigathroid yerself, an' see if Miss Norah is half so purty an' good as fadher-sez she is.'

"Why wouldn't she be," sez Tim, 'if the masther sez so?'

"Throth an' I dun' no," sez Maurice; 'but I'd like to larn that aforehand from yer own lips, Tim, avick.'

"Faix, that's aisey enough, I does be thinkin'," sez Tim. 'You folly afther as quick as ye can. Misher Maurice; an', in the manetime,' sez he, 'I'll pay my respects to the family.'

"So, wid that, they took lave of one another, an' Tim thravelled on to the town where the young masther's thrunk wor left, a bit mile or so from O'Brien's, of Carrigathroid."

"Where's thrunk as wor left here by Andy Shehan?" sez he to the woman of the stage-house.

"Up stairs," sez she, 'all safe an' sound.'

"I'll see that," sez he. An' up stairs he goes an' opens the thrunk, an' looks over the clo'es, an' the diamond pins, an' the goold watch, an' the chains an' rings galore; an', sure enough, they wor all there nate an' nice, as Ally Bawn said when the six childher fell into the saft of the bog. Oh, murther, but now comes the strangest part of the sthory. When Tim seen the things forenent him, an' how b'utiful they wor, he begins to wonder how he'd look in thim; an' thin he looks at his coarse clothes, all plastered and besmudgered over wid the dirty wather of the road.

"How will I carry the masther's letther to the big house, an' I looking for all the wureld like a dirty boghtrotter?" sez he. 'Sure I'd be shamefaced to show myself in dacent company. 'Tis a mighty fine thing to be a jintleman,' sez he, lookin' at the thrunk agin. 'Oh, but thim's the grand coats, an' pantaloons, an' goolden things,' sez he; 'sure, I think the likes of 'em wor niver seed afore. May be,' sez he, cogitatin' the matther—'may be Misher Maurice wouldn't be onaisey if I loaned thim of him for a bit while, isphilly as it's his sarvice that I'll be on. Sure, 'tis no harm to thry if they fits me,' sez he. An', afore he know'd it, he wor dhressed in thim b'utiful garmin's, an' lookin' grander nor iver he did in his mortal life. Presently, he flings back the dure, an' discinds the stairs wid all the goold chains a danglin' about his neck, an' wid a fine goold watch fastened by a rael diamond pin to the breast of his flowery silk weskit: 'For,' sez he, 'sure they wouldn't know I had sich purty things, if I didn't show thim.'

"Oh, but it does my heart good to see sich a han'some jintleman!" sez the misthress of the house, makin' a low curchey. 'Didn't I know,' sez she, 'yer honor wor the rael quality the minnit I seen the shine of yer face at the dure. Indade, an' faix, it's the thruth I'm sayin', plase goodness.'

"Arrah, now, be done wid yer blarney," sez Tim, flourishin' a white han'kercher as wor sthronger wid sint nor a flower-garden. 'Don't conthaminate yer centhrifujals by spakin' so odoriferously,' sez he; 'but tell me, like the dacent woman ye are, where'll I sarch for a barber?'

"That's aisey," sez she, 'for shure there's wan next dure to the corner.'

"So, wid that, out goes Tim, houldin' up his pantaloons wid both hands to keep thim clane, an' presently he steps in at the barber's shop as bould as a lord."

"Barber!" sez he.

"Sir," sez a little, thin-shanked man.

"Shave me," sez Tim, settin' hisself down in the big chair, while the little man wor sthrippin' away at the razhier. 'Aisey, my good man,' sez Tim, 'an' cut the stubble clane.'

"Oh, I'll do that same," sez the barber. 'Be du husht, av ye plase.' An', afore Tim could say Larry Houlaghan, his beard wor off.

"Barber," sez Tim.

"Sir," sez the little man.

"Frizzle my head," sez Tim.

"An', widout any goster at all, the spy little man pokes a long iron thing into the fire."

"Oh, murther!" sez Tim. 'What's that?'

"Thim's the curlin'-tongs," sez the barber.

"Oh," sez the cunnin' Tim, turnin' up his nose 'thim's the ould time fashion. May be, ye niver seen the frizzlin' instrument they use in forrin parts?'

"Sorrah one have I seed, barrin' the masheen in my hand," sez the barber.

"Tworn't to be expected of yees, in this outlandish place," sez Tim.

"Hould still, if ye plase," sez the barber, takin' a grip of his hair.

"Och!" sez Tim. 'Lave me go, will yees? But 'tis pullin' all my hair off ye are!'

"Tisn't likely I'd do that, wid my exparience," sez the little man. 'Sure, many's the quality I've dhressed the heads of in my day.' An' wid that, he saizes hould of another lock of hair, an' gives it a grip and a twist.

"Tundher an' turf!" sez Tim, startin' up in a mighty big passion. 'Would ye burn my head aff afore my eyes? Tisn't a stuck pig I am that ye're singein' for bacon,' sez he.

"Musha, thin, but that's thrue, anyhow," sez the barber. An' on he wint, frizzlin' first one side and thin the other, till, by-an'-by, Tim's head wor all over corkskrews, like a haythen naygur's.

"How will I look?" sez Tim, goin' to a glass. 'Augh! millia! murther! Tisn't my own face that I see yondher?'

"Deed but it is," sez the barber.

"Oh, wirrasthruel!" sez Tim, wringin' his hands. 'What'll I do? 'Tis ruinashin'd I am, clane out an' intihirely! I'll be mistakin' myself for a sthranger!'

"Yea, thin," sez the little man, 'there's no denyin' but yees wonderfully improved in appearance.'

"Botherashin!" sez Tim; 'but how will I ray-cognise myself, I'd like to know?'

"Sure, but he had the throubled look whin he mounted his horse; but, by the time he got to Carrigathroid, his spirits came back agin an' he fasthens the baste to the swingin' bough of a three, an' steps up to the dure an' knocks as bould as Joolyus Saizer."

"Hallo! House! Whoop!"

"What's the matther, my good man?" sez a sarvant, answerin' the dbré.

"Matther?" sez Tim. 'Plinty's the matther. Here's a letther for Misher O'Brien, wid the respects of the owner.'

"Yer name, sir, if ye plase," sez the man.

"Tell him, Misher Sullivan sint it," sez Tim.

"Oh!" sez the man, making a low-bow. 'Obleege me by walkin' in; ye're expected.'

"An', wid that, he marches on afore, Tim followin' afther, an' flings open the dure of a grand room all blazin' wid light, an' sings out—

"Misher Sullivan!"

"Oh, murther!" sez Tim to himself. 'Tis changed I am by that frizzlin' barbarian!'

"Ah, my young fri'nd," sez Misher O'Brien, takin' him by the hand, 'tis plased I am to see ye the day! Let me presint ye to my daughter. Norah, mavourneen, this is Misher Maurice Sullivan.'

"Och, the beauty of the wureld!" sez Tim, quite frustrated. 'Call me Delaney, av ye plase.'

"Ah, I undherstand," sez the ould squireen, wid a smile. 'The Delaneys is yer relashins.'

"Troth, an' indade they are," sez Tim.

"Thim's good blood, I does be thinkin'," sez the squireen.

"Sorrah bether to be found anywhere," sez Tim.

"I beg yer pardn, 'tis standin' ye are the while," sez the ould jintleman. 'Will ye take a sate on the ottimn?'

"Sure, 'tisn't the grand Turkey ye mane?" sez Tim, gettin' frikened.

"Oh no," sez the ould jintleman; 'tis the fine flahool stool standin' forenent ye.'

"Ayeh!" sez Tim. 'The ould name's the bether.'

"May be so," sez the squireen, puttin' on his specktickles, an' starin' at Tim as if he wor a wild baste. An' sorry I am to tell ye that purty Miss Norah likewise hadn't no bether manners, but set starin' too at the bouchal wid her great black eyes."

"What's the matther?" sez Tim, as red as a b'iled lobster. 'Isn't it all right?'

"How will I know?" sez the squireen.

"Och! och!" sez Tim, 'why did I make a "be-hay" of myself? Blessin's on yer darlin' face!' sez he, turnin' to Miss Norah; 'an' may goodness purteet ye! an' the daisies grow up under yer purty feet! an' may all the fairies in Ireland bring good luck to ye, an' a dale of it! But oh, be plased to take pity on a poor boy as is quite dumbfounder'd at yer b'utiful countenance, and burnt into ashes by the blaze from yer eyes! An' now don't be afther collouging wid the ould man that a way, an' I kep' in the dark, like Shaun Dooley, the blind fiddler.'

"Indade, an' in throth, 'tis very mystharious," sez Miss Norah, whisperin' to the fadher. 'Tisn't the first ha'porth of manners the crayther has. Sure I am, I'll not like him, any way.'

"Lave him to me," sez the ould man. 'May be he's bether nor he seems. Get ye gone, acushla, an' order Michael to bring up a pitcher of st'amin' hot potheen; that's the rael stuff to bring out a man's charackther. Misher Sullivan,' sez he, 'as the daughter disappared—Misher Sullivan—'

"Delaney, av ye plase," sez Tim.

"I beg yer pardin, Mistor Delaney Sullivan. May I be so bould, an' m'anin' no offence, as to be axin' ye what makes ye carry all thim goold chains, an' the han'some goold watch, an' the dimont pin, in sich a strhange way?"

"Oh," sez Tim, mightily relaved, an' pokin' the ould man for fun under the fifth rib, 'tis there ye are! Sure, 'tis reasonable, sez he, 'a young jintleman should folly, the fashi'ns."

"Oh," sez the squireen, 'and thim's the fashi'ns, is they?"

"What 'ud they be good for, if they worn't?" sez Tim.

"Faix, nothin' at all, I b'lieve," sez the squireen.

"Whin did ye lave home, Mistor Sullivan?" sez he.

"Delaney, av ye please."

"Blur an' agars!" sez the ould man, 'don't I know that, Mistor Delaney Sullivan?"

"Well," sez Tim to himself, 'tis no matter. Any way, I'll be kilt an' transported, whin Masther Maurice comes. Sure, if he will parset in callin' me Sullivan, 'tisn't good manners to contradiet him."

"An' how did ye lave the family?" sez the squireen.

"Well, an' hearty," sez Tim; 'wid no sarious dishorder, barrin' the loss of a suckin' pig wid the mailes."

"A suckin' pig in the family!" sez the ould man.

"A suckin' pig, did ye say? Sure, thim's not human."

"Och! what'll I be sayin' wid the grate blister on my tongue? Sure, tworn't any pig at all, at all."

"Twas the babby wid the small-pox."

"The smallpox!" shrieks the squireen. "Oh, be aff wid ye! Don't come a near me! I'm frikened to death a'ready!"

"Millia murther!" sez Tim. 'I'll be beside myself prisintly. I don't mane the small-pox, nor the childer. Where 'ud they come from, I'd like to know? But the doctor—no, I don't mane that—the masther—no, not the masther—the weeny. Arrah, botherashin to me, I'd be obliged to ye if ye'd tell me what I mane! for, 'deed an' 'deed, the beauty of the young lady has put the comether on my sinuses entirely."

"Faix, I b'lieve so," sez the squireen. 'But here comes the potheen,' sez he; 'an' 'tis the sovre'nst thing in the wureld for a crooked tongue."

"Mostha, but it's the raal stuff, too!" sez Tim, takin' a long pull at the noggin, an' smackin' his lips.

"An' so ye left the ould folk quite well?" sez the squireen.

"Brave an' hearty," sez Tim. 'The ould man wor brakin' stones to mend the pike wid, an' the ould mother wor knittin' new heels to an ould pair of Connemara stockin's."

"I'm t'understruck!" sez Mistor O'Brien. 'To think that the blood of the Sullivans should demane themselves brakin' stones for a road an' patchin' stockin's!"

"Thim's figgers of spache," sez Tim. 'Sure, I mane shuperintindin' of thim."

"Throth, it's hard to tell what ye mane, Mistor Delaney Sullivan," sez the squireen. 'A young jintleman as is college-bred shouldn't condiscose to quare figgers the likes o' thim. An' now I'll be pleased to have a taste of yer larin'."

"Sure, it 'ud nather be dacent, nor proper, nor expadient, in one of my birth an' breedin', to show off my parts upon a jintleman of your wondherful sagashity. The natheral modesty that is the predominatin' trait in my charackther won't let me. Thim as is my aquls has acknowledged my shupariority; an' the masther hisself couldn't folly me in the langwidges, an' the humanities, an' in single an' double fluckshius, to say nothing of my extinsive ackwirements in algebrayikal mattymattocks, an' the other parts of profane histry of a similar cognashus charackther."

"Spake plainer," sez the squireen, 'for ye does be puzzlin' me wid the hard words as seems to have no sinse in 'em."

"I'd be bothered to find it if they did," sez Tim, elyly, to hisself. But he sez to the squireen, sez he, 'How will I definitively expurgate the profound m'anin' of the anshint frelosophers widout smudherin' ye wid the classicalities? Isn't it the big words as makes the larin'?" Axin' yer pardin, Mistor O'Brien, but 'tis well bekownst to a jintleman of your extraordinary mintal an' quizzical facillities that the construction of the words constitutes the differ of langwidges, of which pothooks an' hangers is the limiuts."

"Bedad, but there's some thruth in that," sez the squireen, 'barrin' the manner of expressin' it."

"Arrah, thim," sez Tim, 'I'm pleased to hear ye say so; an' if it's agreeable to ye, we'll drop the discource for the prisint. To tell ye the blessed thruth, Mistor O'Brien, 'tis dead bate wid the long thravel

I am, an', wid your permission, I'll be bould to throuble yer sarvint to fling me a clane lock o' sthraw in one corner of yer honour's kitchen for the night."

"Oh, but may be the ould squireen didn't stare at Tim wid all his eyes in raal earnest, thim—"

"Sthraw!" sez he. 'Do ye take this for a boc-coch's shealin'? Well, I must say, Mistor Delaney Sullivan, sez he, 'that, for a jintleman's son, born an' brid, 'tis monstherous quare ways ye have.' An', wid that, he rings for the futman, an' tells him to show Tim to bed. 'I'll be wantin', Mistor Sullivan, to spake the sarious word wid ye the mornin' morn, sez the ould man, dhravin' hisself up grand like; 'for, on my conscience, there's many things about ye as does be puzzlin' me extramely."

"Tis no matter," sez Tim to hisself, follyin' after the sarvint. 'Sure, I'm in for it now, anyhow. Ayeh, is thim the stairs? Musha, thim, but 'tis wide enough they are for a drove of fat cattle. Hould on a bit, will ye, or I'll be fallin' over the ballisthers. I wonder where thim crass passiges lades too beyant? Sure, I'd give all I'll be like to have in the wureld to quit the place. Och, Tim Delaney, 'tis a bad ind ye're comin' to wid settin' yerself up for a jintleman; an' begorra, if the young masther mardherers ye entirely, it sarves ye right any way, an' that's no lie."

"Will ye be pleased to inter?" says the sarvint, throwin' open the dure of a big room, where the windys wor all ornaminatid wid butyful curt'ins, an' likewise the grate bed wid goold angels at the corners of the posts, lettin' alone the fringes and the tassels, an' many other butyful things too tadious to min-tion."

"Och," sez Tim, 'is that my bid? How will I git in widout tumblin' myself on the flure? Thim steps, did ye mane? Arrah, now, have done wid yer nonsense! Sure I never heard of goin' to bid wid a step-ladder afore."

"Thim's the fashi'ns," sez the futman.

"Botheration to the fashi'ns!" sez Tim. 'What are ye laughin' at, ye ugly spalpeen? Lave the light, an' go. Oh, murther!" sez Tim, whin he was all alone by hisself. 'If I wor out of this scrape, a thousand goold guineas wouldn't timpt me to do the likes agin."

"An' wid that, he sarches the windys, manein' to make his escape, but they wor too high; an' thim he opens the dure saftly an' looks into the passiges, but they twisted all about, so he didn't thry thim for fear they would be affther takin' him for a robber; so, wid many muttherin's an' moanin's he lays hisself down on the bid wid all his clothes on, an', by-an'-by, falls into a throubled sleep."

"Well, all this time, ye may be sure young Masther Maurice wor not lettin' the grass grow under his feet. So, whin he had bought the land, he takes a fresh baste an' hurries affther Tim. By hard ridin' he got to the town late that same night; an', whin he larned that Tim wor gone up to Carrigathroid all cock-a-hoop in his own fine clo'es an' joels, he flies into a tearin' passion, and makes bould to ride over at wanst. As it happened, the squireen an' Miss Norah wor still up, for the raal genteels do kape mighty late hours; and so it worn't long afore he makes hisself bekownst to the ould jintleman an' his daughter, an' up an' tells 'em his sthory. Oh, but thim they laughed more nor iver they did in their born days afore; more by token that the squireen wor glad to have a disilushin of the mysthery, an' Miss Norah bein' aqilly pleased to find the thrue Masther Maurice wid the best quality manners, an', at the same time, so mortal han'some."

"An' now," sez Maurice, 'what'll I do wid that rogue of a Tim?"

"Lave him to me," sez the squireen, wid a knowin' wink. 'Myself being a justus-o'-pace, a good frikenin' 'll be of service to the saucy omad-haun. But we'll say no more till the morn,' sez he; 'an', in the mane time, we'll thry an' find ye a supper an' a bed."

"Well, to be sure, bright an' airly, while Tim wor tossin' an' tumblin' about in his fine flahool bid, an' dhramin' of witches, an' spooks, an' leprawauns, an' even of the ould bouchal hisself, there's comes a t'undherin' whack at his dure; an' prisintly, in walks four strappin' fellows right to his bedside."

"What's wantin'?" sez Tim, settin' boult up, wid his curly hair all untwistin' itself an' standin' on end like a porkepine's. 'Is it lookin' for me ye are?"

"Troth, but ye're a quick hand at guessin'," sez the biggest man. 'Where's yer masther, ye thafe of the wureld? Tell me that."

"Oh, murther!" sez Tim. 'It's all out!"

"Sure, he confesses it a'ready," sez another.

"Bring him along, Tony."

"Confesses what?" says Tim, wid his face as white as the bed-hangin's. 'Confesses what? Spake out, will ye?"

"The murther!" sez Tony. 'Isn't thim his clo'es ye're wearin' now?"

"Murther? Och! ochone! ochone!" sez Tim, wringin' his hands. 'That I iver lived to see this day! An' is the young masther dead? Why, thim, upon my oath an' my conscience, I never had a hand in it! Sure, 'tis well the darlin' knowed I'd lay down my life for him. Oh, jintlemen, take pity on a poor innocent boy, that's in the black throuble, an' all becase he put on the young masther's things for a bit of spoort."

"An' a purty spoort ye'll find it," sez the futman, for be sure he wor one of thim. 'But here comes Mistor O'Brien."

"Stand aside, all ef ye, an' let me look at the thraitor!" sez the squireen, burstin' into the room. 'Oh, 'tis there ye are, ye villin, wid yer mattymattox an' yer single an' double fluxshins. Saize him, men, wid a sthrong grip, an' bring him to the hall. 'Tis well myself's a magisther, an' can set upon the case at wanst."

"Oh, Mistor O'Brien," sez Tim, dhrappin' on his knees, 'tis innocent I am the day! I'll tell ye about it. You see, the young masther and I—"

"Isn't them his clo'es?" sez the squireen.

"Ayeh! but that's thrue. Let me tell ye, an' hear r'ason. The young masther an' I—"

"Kape yer sthories to yerself," sez the squireen, puttin' on a black frown. 'Why would I listen to yer diabolickle invintions whin thim things is witness agin ye? Hould him fast, boys, an' off wid him. May be I won't live to hang him, affther all."

"Help! help! murther!" sez Tim, strugglin' wid all the power that wor in him. 'I didn't do it! It's clane hands I have! I won't be murthered! Lave me go, I say! What 'ud ye hang a poor innocent for? Murther! murther!"

"All at wanst, as he wor skreekin' and kickin', who should walk in from behind the dure but Mistor Maurice an' Miss Norah."

"Whoop! whoroo!" sez Tim. 'There's the young masther now! Hands off wid ye! Don't ye see him wid Miss Norah?"

"Hould on a minnit, men," sez the squireen. 'May be 'tis a mistake, affther all. Is that young jintleman Mistor Sullivan?"

"Oh, to be sure it is," sez Tim. 'Who else 'ud it be, I'd like to know? Mistor Maurice! Maurice, achorra, spake to thim, av ye please, an' tell thim it's yerself that I see."

"Why will I do that?" sez the young jintleman, laughin'. 'Sure, 'twould be wastin' my breath, an' they knowin' it a'ready."

"Oh, murther! see that now!" sez Tim. 'An' they a frikenin' me out of my seven sinces all the while. Ayeh! Maurice avick, but I forgive ye the bad thrick ye's played me the day."

"Musha, thim, an' thank ye for nothin'," sez Maurice; 'for I does be thinkin' that 'tis yerself, Tim, as is to blame, seein' the fine clo'es on yer back."

"Yea, thim," sez the squireen, burstin' in a great laugh, 'twore hisself, sure enough, as played the bould thrick, an' bothered me all out wid his single an' his double fluxshins; but, bedad, if the thrick wor in his hands last night, sure he'll confess I trumped it dacently this mornin'."

RAPIDITY OF THOUGHT IN DREAMING.

A VERY remarkable circumstance, and an important point of analogy, is to be found in the extreme rapidity with which the mental operations are performed, or rather with which the material changes on which the ideas depend are excited in hemispherical ganglia. It would appear as if a whole series of acts, that would really occupy a long lapse of time, pass ideally through the mind in one instant. We have in dreams no true perception of the lapse of time—a strange property of mind! for if such be also its property when entered into the eternal disembodied state, time will appear to us eternity. The relations of space as well as time are also annihilated, so that almost while an eternity is compressed into a moment, infinite space is traversed more swiftly than by real thought. There are numerous illustrations of this on record. A gentleman dreamt that he had enlisted as a soldier, joined his regiment, deserted, was apprehended, carried back, tried, condemned to be shot, and at last led out for execution. After the usual preparations, a gun was fired; he awoke with the report, and found that a noise in the adjoining room had at the same moment produced the dream and awakened him. A friend of Dr. Abercrombie dreamt that he crossed the Atlantic, and spent a fortnight in America. In embarking, on his return, he fell into the sea, and awaking in the fright, found that he had not been in bed ten minutes.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT HON. SIDNEY HERBERT, M.P. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

RIGHT HON. SIDNEY HERBERT, M.P.

Among the celebrities of our day the Right Honourable Sydney Herbert takes a distinguished place. As a philanthropist and a statesman, an accomplished scholar, and a practical worker, he has attracted the attention and won the applause of a large section of the public. Those who are opposed to his policy, and, it may be, are equally indifferent to his patronage of art and literature, can scarcely fail to appreciate the beneficial results of those philanthropic schemes which he has originated or fostered. Respect for his ability, as well as gratitude for his good offices, have contributed to make him universally known and appreciated.

He is in the very prime of life, having been born about the year 1810. He is the son of the late Earl of Pembroke—by the daughter of Count Woronzoff—and presumptive heir to the earldom. He was educated at Harrow, matriculated at Oxford, and took his seat in parliament for South Wilts, at the legal age of twenty-one. After the troublous times of the Reform Bill, when the rotten system of representation, which had disfigured our constitution for many a long year, was swept away, the Right Honourable Sydney Herbert became a Peelite, and has ever since remained faithful in his adherence to the fortunes of that political party. With them he bore his share of the obloquy which was cast upon them during the corn law agitation; but, like his chief, he knew very well that it was impossible for any statesman to adopt one fixed line of policy under all circumstances, and that the only question with him when he departed from that line, should be, "Am I actuated by any interested and sinister motive? Do I consider the measure I contemplate called for by the circumstances and necessities of the country?"

It was on these principles that Sidney Herbert, who had formerly been a staunch Protectionist, acted on the question of the repeal of the Corn Laws. He was a member of the government which supported and carried through that measure; and he was nothing daunted by the outcry of inconsistency and apostasy, with which all the members of that government were assailed. Right or wrong, he expressed his honest convictions; if they clashed with former sentiments, he felt no shame in acknowledging that he thought he had been wrong, and was zealously bent on reforming his error.

From 1841 to 1845 he was secretary to the Admiralty; from 1845 to 1846 held office as Secretary at War; to this office he was reappointed in 1852, and accepted for a few weeks the Colonial Secretaryship in 1855.

To his connection with the War Department during the campaign in the Crimea is attributable that memorable act of Christian charity which induced the fairest daughters of England to go forth on a mission of mercy to their sick and wounded countrymen. In 1846 Mr. Sidney Herbert married the daughter of Major-General Ashe A'Court, C.B.; and the humane and patriotic efforts of this lady originated those exertions which, under the superintendence of Florence Nightingale, provided succour for the diseased and disabled soldiers in the East.

The hearty sympathy and co-operation of Mr. Herbert in this and in every other philanthropic scheme has been very fully exhibited. By his exertions impetus was given to that tide of emigration which was sweeping thousands from our densely-populated shores to those lands where, labour being at a premium, working men were in request. His name is most honourably associated with the Emigration Movement; and many a thriving farmer, and many a well-to-do grazier, in Australia—as well as many a wealthy "digger," have to thank Mr. Sidney Herbert for his benevolent enterprise.

As a connoisseur of art, as an accomplished scholar, as a man of refined taste, and as a munificent patron, Mr. Herbert has won golden opinions from all men. His princely seat at Wilton, Salisbury, is an evidence both of his taste and liberality; while the beautiful church recently erected in its neighbourhood has been built at his sole expense.

HEROD THE GREAT.

WHEN the Roman eagle, lord of all the birds of heaven, had spread its wings over almost every nation on the face of the earth, even the Jews had to make the humiliating confession, "We have no king but Cæsar!"

Palestine became a Roman province; the learning, the civilisation, the chivalry of the Jewish people, all bowed beneath the Roman yoke. The wealth, power, and grandeur of Jewish governors were not only sanctioned by the authority of Cæsar, but were entirely dependent on his will. A slavery more complete, though not so obvious to the senses, than either that of Egypt or of Babylon, prevailed throughout the land, while the Jews themselves were split into factions, religious and political.

Herod, a name familiar to us all on account of its connection with the gospel narrative, was elected to a position of authority in Palestine, at the early age of fifteen. He was a man of surpassing genius and undoubted courage. One of his first acts served to exhibit him in a highly favourable light to the people over whom he ruled. The borders of Syria were infested with robbers, and Herod took the whole band and put them to death. This heroic deed so extended his reputation, that he was considered by his subjects as the author of the repose which they for some time enjoyed; it also favourably recommended him to the notice of Sextus, a kinsman of Caesar, who, pleased with his youthful prowess, undertook to promote his interests at Rome.

But the popularity of Herod excited the malignant enmity of many of the Jews. They hated him on account of his success. They were jealous of his renown, especially when they found he was a favourite with the Emperor. They complained of the vastness of his revenue, and insinuated doubts of his integrity. An official examination was demanded, which ended in exasperating the young hero against Hyrcanus the high priest, before whom the investigation took place. Hyrcanus, indeed, bore no ill-will to Herod, and was not likely to listen to anything to his prejudice, after being warned by a letter from Rome that the youth was under Caesar's patronage. But Herod, hasty and petulant, could not understand the policy of dissimulation, and would have resented the insinuations which had been made against him, by levelling Jerusalem to the ground, had not his more cautious friends advised him to act more discreetly.

Herod had to learn a lesson he did not fail to practise in his after life, namely, that coolness and caution are surer counsellors even for questionable purposes than passion and resentment.

At length, when Herod was proclaimed King of Judea by the Roman senate, he had to contend for his possessions with Antigonus before he could set up his authority. Antigonus was a formidable rival. By force and by stratagem he had sought the life of Herod. He found among the Jews a large number of supporters, and, during the absence of Herod in Italy, had subjugated a considerable part of his dominions. On Herod's return, Antigonus took the field. He represented that it was neither equitable nor expedient to advance Herod to the throne, as he was but a private man, an Idumean by birth, and to be considered in no other light than that of a half Jew. He urged on the Jews that if they were dissatisfied with himself as king, there were several of the royal and sacerdotal line from whom they might select a sovereign. But, backed as he was by a powerful army and the authority of the Roman senate, nothing could withstand Herod; neither arms nor argument could drive him from the field. He advanced upon and captured Joppa; relieved the garrison of Masada; took Rehah, and marched for Jerusalem; the whole country of Galilee was soon reduced, and the army of Herod sat down before the walls of the Holy City.

One of the most difficult matters with which Herod had to contend, was the peculiar character of the country of Galilee. It afforded a refuge to his foes, which, to a less able commander, would have been impenetrable. They fled to the mountains. There, on account of the passages being so narrow and the rocks so steep, it was almost impossible to approach them. In the caverns of the rocks whole communities resided, rushing forth on predatory excursions, and making safe retreat to their fastnesses, if pursued.

On viewing these places, Herod found that it would be equally impossible to creep down to them from above, or scale them from below; and he therefore had recourse to the following contrivance:—He had a number of cases made, to be let down by iron chains from a machine at the summit of the rock; in these cases soldiers were placed, who with hooks, darts, lances, and other weapons, were to destroy the Galileans in their holes, or draw them out and throw them headlong to the bottom, as might be requisite. Considering the depth and danger of the place, it was an exceedingly hazardous experiment.

On lowering one of these cases to the mouth of the great cavern, no one daring to come out, a soldier, impatient of waiting, seized his sword and buckler, and, catching hold of the chain by which the case was suspended, slipped into a cavity of the rock. In this place he slew several of the Galileans with his darts, and, in case of their resistance, drew them out and cast them down the precipice. Those who escaped were terribly alarmed at what they had seen; and some were willing to lay down their arms and accept the terms of mercy which Herod offered. The rest, however, dissuaded them from their purpose, and the work of destruction went on.

The next day the attack was renewed. Large numbers of the Galileans fell victims to the darts of the soldiers; others were drawn out by their long hooks; and at the mouth of these caves fires were lighted, and the unhappy inmates smothered.

"In one cave," says Josephus, "was an old man, who had a wife and seven sons, who earnestly implored him to submit to the enemy. The man, however, took his station at the mouth of the cave, and, as they attempted to pass him, stabbed them one after the other, killing his wife the last. Their bodies he threw down the precipice, and followed them himself, determined rather to die than sacrifice his liberty. While he was thus destroying his family, he reproached Herod on account of the meanness of his extraction, though the prince, who stood at a distance, courted his acceptance of mercy by the most expressive signs in his power."

The vigorous measures adopted by Herod, the free pardons which he offered to those who submitted to his authority, and the severity with which he punished the obdurate, soon established his authority. Antigonus was sent in chains to Rome, where he was privately put to death, and "Herod the Great" reigned over Judea.

But, however great was the skill and prowess of Herod as a soldier, he was guilty of great extortions and cruelties in the pursuit of his ambitious projects; and in vain he tried to banish the memory of his evil acts from his mind by scenes of dissipation. At times he would fly from the sight of men; but on his return from solitude he became more brutal than ever, and in his fits of fury spared neither foes nor friends. Conspiracies were continually formed against him; and, though he exercised the most brutal revenge on all the parties concerned in them, he was continually the prey of suspicion and jealousy, which urged him at last to that crowning act of atrocity and cruelty, the Massacre of the Innocents.

In the thirty-third year of his reign our SAVIOUR was born, whom Herod, in his false interpretation of Scripture, regarded as the temporal king of the Jews; and, to defeat whose claim, he committed the murders over which Jeremiah, in the spirit of prophecy, had already lamented centuries before.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XVIII.

To each his sufferings: all are men,
Condemned alike to groan,—
The tender, for another's pain—
The unfeeling, for his own.—GRAY.

ADA breakfasted alone, sending a very substantial repast by Monsieur Vanille to her father, and by Tarlatan, her mother's maid, to Lady Pemberton. Both her parents were, or thought themselves, too ill to come down; but they were not too ill to enjoy the excellent chocolate, muffins, eggs, and Perigord pie provided by Mr. Pomp, the butler.

Ada, who for months had breakfasted in her bed on a cup of tea and a bit of toast, enjoyed the pleasant room, the roaring fire, the soft spring air and bright sunshine coming in through the fragrant plants and shrubs that filled the recesses of the window.

The morning papers were on the table, and all the best authors, ancient and modern, richly bound, lined the walls and surrounded her.

Ada's home was the perfection of elegance and costly abundance; and she thought she had never before half appreciated the blessings of that home.

But yet she did not loiter. Her mind was busy with a programme of work to be done; and she saw the sun shine with more satisfaction than she had ever done when a picnic or other pleasure party depended on the weather.

Ada seldom read the papers; but, seated at the breakfast table by herself, while sipping her tea she opened the Times.

Her eye fell at once on a paragraph headed, "Another Woman killed by a Drunken Husband."

With a fainting heart and a pale cheek she read—

"Yesterday evening, about half-past seven, a poor young woman, of the name of Esther Darrell, was killed by a brutal, drunken fellow, her husband, by a severe blow on the temple with a pewter pot. It seems that this ruffian, known among his own associates by the name of 'Tippling Ben,' had been dragged by his poor, starving wife—who had a babe at her breast and a child by the hand—from the 'Rose and Crown' public-house, in Fleet-street; and that, as she thought she was getting him home, he rushed into the 'Good Intent.' The ill-starred wife followed him; an altercation ensued; she rushed out; and the brute, pursuing her into the street, struck her savagely on the temple with a quart measure. She fell with a low moan, and was lifted into the 'Good Intent' a corpse. An inquest will be held to-day, when, probably, a verdict of wilful murder will be returned. Great excitement prevails in the neighbourhood, where the unfortunate victim was much pitied and respected."

"This, then, was the result of the savage blow I saw struck," thought Ada, when tears had gushed to her relief, and stolen down her pale cheeks. "Oh! how terrible to have seen a murder—the murder of that devoted wife! I can guess now why Mr. Goodman did not return, and why the women in the mothers' gallery groaned at the mention of Esther's name. That wretched man! he will be hanged for murder!—and yet Mr. Goodman did not speak as if this Ben Darrell were a ruffian and a brute. It was drink that drove him mad: madmen know not what they do. Can they hang him? I am not lawyer enough to decide. But Bob Blossom—will not this check him, and make him put it out of his power to stand in that wretch's place? Sweet Apple Blossom—I hope, I trust it will. How I long to see her honest face again! and bright, black-eyed Merry, and Larkie Grigg—clever, tricky urchin!—and above all, Hope—angel Hope! What comfort I anticipate from the blessed presence of that loving Christian child!"

Ada rose, and went to her own boudoir, a room furnished with everything that taste and affluence could supply—a temple for every Muse and every Grace. But oh, what hours of restless ennui had Ada spent in that enchanting retreat!

It was only two days ago she had struck that superb harp and touched that exquisite piano; and, as there was no harmony in her spirit, the sounds were discord to her ear.

There was the desk at which she had been seated, haughtily declining proposals which she felt were made, not to the woman, but to the heiress. There stood the easel, with the Alpine scene just begun—that scene which had made her wish she could climb those snowy heights and flee from the palling world of fashion,—in vain, unless she could have also fled from herself!

Ada stood opposite a full-length portrait of a noble-looking youth. He was leaning on the glossy neck of a favourite shooting pony, and several sporting dogs were bounding impatiently around him.

In his frank, noble features, dark violet eyes, and bright, fair hair, there was a strong family likeness to Ada. It was her only brother. That picture had been painted eight years before, when Walter Pemberton was eighteen—the pride and delight of his parents—the darling of Ada's heart, and alas! of another to whom he was dangerously dear; and whom he loved as men love but once in their lives. The object of this passion was Constance Claverton, a poor, very distant relation of Lady Pemberton, whom she had adopted in her infancy, and reared as her companion—half friend, half underling—to bear all those whims and humours which no lady's-maid who is an adept at her art, and knows her value, will ever tolerate.

Constance was a few months younger than Walter. They were much alone, and they loved each other—his was an ardent passion, hers a deep affection. At that time the world had not spoilt him: he wished to marry Constance, and the day he came of age he told his mother so. As it was a day of rejoicing, Sir Augustus was in his cups betimes: it was no use to tell him then.

The rage and surprise of Lady Pemberton knew no bounds—but she dissimulated—she contrived to get her brother, Sir Loftus Hieover, to invite Walter to the Moors, and when he was there she vented on Constance her rage, scorn, and disappointment. She dismissed the poor delicate girl (her own cousin too) with cruelty and ignominy.

She kept Sir Augustus sober a whole morning, that she might point out to the "poor companion" the ruin that she would entail on Walter if she did not resign him, and, as nothing availed to make her promise never to see him again, she was turned out with a few pounds in her pocket, and a recommendation to a Mrs. Martinet, who kept a school at Kensington, and wanted a teacher. Lady Pemberton, at parting, told her that if she ever wrote to Walter, and got him to see her, and cajoled him into marrying her, his father would disinherit, and she herself disown him; and so she was sent off in tears, disgrace, and poverty. And Ada, who loved her tenderly, and under her gentle influence was becoming good and happy, had never seen or heard of her since.

Ada had felt Constance's warm tears on her cheek the morning she went away. Walter's anger was great; but a foreign tour diverted his thoughts, and he was not without a hope, by the aid of his own valet, of discovering Constance's hiding-place.

"And Walter is in India," thought Ada, "and no doubt very unlike that noble, blooming youth; and Ellen is still single, in spite of so many great offers; single, I do believe, for his sake,—and poor, gentle, good Constance, where is she?"

Ada opened a chiffonier drawer, and, touching a secret spring, took from a recess which was thus disclosed a small oval miniature, and a long chain of lustrous golden hair.

The face was a sweet female face of eighteen, very fair, soft, regular features, large blue eyes, and soft, parted lips, long, floating ringlets of gold, and a seraphic expression of love, pity, and patience.

"Poor Constance!" said Ada, kissing the glass, on which a tear had fallen; "where art thou now?—perhaps among kindred angels in the courts of heaven!"

As she put up the miniature, a carriage drove to the door, a knock resounded through the house, and in a few minutes a loud tap at her door announced Ellen St. Ange.

"Welcome, beloved Ellen," said Ada, kissing the fair oval cheek of the pale yet pretty Ellen. "How good of you to come so early!"

"I knew you would be up betimes," said Ellen; "and it is so fine, I have brought my pony phaeton. Such lovely, long-tailed, glossy, black pets. You know I am a good whip,—will you come? The air is so balmy!"

"I want to see Mr. Goodman," said Ada. "Oh! Ellen, do you know, the woman Esther Darrell, whom I saw struck to the ground, was taken up dead?"

"Yes; I have just read it in the paper. Is it not terrible? and all owing to that fatal love of drink. But what is this?" said Ellen, picking up the chain of golden hair which Ada had dropped.

"Do you know whose it is, Ellen?"

"Yes, Constance Claverton's, your mother's beautiful companion, the girl Walter loved,—that fair, meek vision of the long ago!"

"I wish I knew what had become of her," said Ada.

"I fancy Walter must have found her out," said Ellen. "I know she suddenly left Mrs. Martinet's some eight years ago; and it came out after she was gone, that she used to have letters directed to the stationer's, to be left till called for; and that a very handsome young man always met the school out walking."

"Oh, I hope," said Ada, "my brother did not act basely by that good, loving girl; she was so gentle, so confiding."

"I think her own principles would have saved her from sin," said Ellen; "but he loved her too well to have resigned her easily. I know how he loved her; for you know, Ada, I was brought up to look upon him as my future husband, and I loved him as such,—I thought he loved me,—and his parents, of course, as well as my father, ardently wished for our union; but, oh, Ada, the first hour I saw him with Constance, when he came home from college, I saw he loved,—but not me. Ada, you have been unhappy, but you have never known real misery,—that 'slighted love so sair to bide.' But it was good for me. You know who says 'It is good for me to have been afflicted.' Ada, it is good for us all. As for me, if to all my other blessings had been added that greatest of all, happy love,—how selfish I might have become: born an heiress, with so indulgent a father, such kind friends, had Walter loved me, Ada, I should never have shed a tear; and tears, oh Ada, tears soften the soil of the heart and prepare it for the good seed; it is tears that water the blossoms of faith and charity, and make them ever bud anew; but for that anguish I should never have devoted my time and thoughts to a love far better than the love of man. If I am in any way worthy to guide or advise you, Ada, I owe it to that grief which, while it bruises the spirit and almost breaks the heart, is potent to save the soul. And now, come, shall we set off?—and whither?"

"I want to see Mr. Goodman, and to go to the ragged school."

"Put on your bonnet and cloak then, and we will set off."

"Wait for me a moment," said Ada. "I must first say 'good morning' to my mother, and exchange a word with poor papa."

Ada knocked at the door of her father's bed-room.

CHAPTER XIX.

An anxious stomach well
May be endured; so may the throbbing head;
But such a dim delirium—such a dream
Involves you; such a dastardly despair
Unmans your soul, as maddening Pentheus felt
When, baited round Cithaeron's cruel sides,
He saw two suns and double Thebes ascend.
You curse the sluggish past; you curse the wretch—
The felon with unnatural mixture first
Who dared to violate the virgin wine,
And wish that Heaven from mortals had withheld
The grape and all intoxicating bowls.

ARMSTRONG'S Art of Health.

A QUERULOUS "Who's there?" was uttered in a tremulous tone.

"Only Ada, dear papa," replied the young lady.

"Oh! come in, Ada; but don't be boisterous, or shake the room; or bang the door: my nerves are all to pieces to-day, Ady."

"I will be very quiet, my own dear papa. But I am going out with Ellen St. Ange, and I must give you a kiss, and ask you how you are."

Ada's heart was softened by the new influences within her. On a former occasion, had she known that her father had come home inebriated, and was, in consequence, unable to rise, an unfilial feeling of anger and disgust would have prevented her going near him; but "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump." The new light kindled within her lighted the path of duty in all its ramifications; and the glow in her young bosom re-acted, not merely on one affection, but on all.

Sir Augustus lay in a stately bed, superbly draped with crimson cabinet hangings, and surmounted by his own grand old coat of arms; but from that bed his intemperate habits and irregular hours had long since banished his fastidious, proud, and still beautiful lady.

The room was darkened, so that at first Ada, coming out of the bright spring sunshine, could scarcely see anything; but as her eyes grew accustomed to the gloom, she saw the once handsome, stately Sir Augustus looking a miserable old wreck—prematurely old, for he was not sixty.

He was propped up in the centre of the large bed by downy pillows, snowy white, that strongly contrasted the brick-dust hue of his vinous face. He had on a white tasselled night-cap, for he was a little old-fashioned, and the tassel quivered and shook with that perpetual vacillation peculiar to delirium tremens.

His face was loose and puffy and his cheeks pendulous, but his shaking hand was very thin, pale, and feverish.

There was a powerful smell of ether in the room, and he was drinking strong green tea, out of a china breakfast-cup, which Ada expected every minute would slip from his nerveless hand.

Ada sat down for a moment on his bed-side.

"You pin me down, Ady," he said, querulously.

Ada started up.

"Don't be sudden; you fidget me; you shake the bed. You're like your mother, never quiet."

"What is the matter, dear papa?"

"Oh, I'm all to pieces! I'm fit for nothing! I've sent for Dr. C—. He must patch me up for the dinner; but I'm fit for nothing. I want to go over Skinfint's accounts. I believe the fellow's cheating me, and grinding all my poor tenantry, and I can do nothing; my head's so bad I can't add up a few figures; and there's your mother, instead of helping me, cares for nothing but that bloated, asthmatic old spaniel. Skinfint has turned poor old Potter out of his farm. Successive generations of Potters have been tenants on the Pemberton estate for centuries, and now Potter must go to the union! And what can I do, in this state? I can't argue with that long-headed Skinfint. Poor Potter!—eighty odd. He used to carry me on his back."

Sir Augustus drew the sheet over his face, and, with that maudlin want of self-control which intoxication produces, sobbed bitterly.

"Your mother might do something in it if she would," he continued. "Skinfint was always afraid of your mother. She's got a very good head, and she knows all about it."

"Papa," said Ada, "you are not well enough to talk about business now; but this evening you will be better."

"Yes; I'm always better at night." (The more's the pity, she thought; as it was owing to that he was able every evening to indulge to excess.)

"Will you, papa, let me go over these affairs with you, and for you? I am no child now, papa. Next week I shall be twenty-one; and I am very good and quick at accounts."

"Well, I had promised to dine with Malmsey at the Travellers', if C— can patch me up for the nonce."

"But if you will give that up, my own darling papa, I will devote the evening to business and you. I am sure you will see that I have as good a head as dear mamma herself."

"I don't know what Sir Croesus Malmsey will say."

"Think, papa, what poor old Potter will feel if Skinfint, who is always as good, or rather as bad as his word, takes advantage of your doing nothing in it, to turn him out, and your oldest tenant goes to the union!"

Sir Augustus actually began to shed tears.

"Then you promise, papa, you won't go out this evening; and we'll set it all to rights. We'll write Skinfint a letter that will astonish him."

"Very well, Ady; you're like your mother: she could always wind me round her little finger, when she thought it worth while to take the trouble. It isn't now—I'm a poor old wreck, body and mind, a burden to myself, and to every one else. I often wish I was dead, Ady."

Ady embraced her father, and when she felt his cheek bathed with hot tears, her own mingled with them.

"Ah, you're a good girl, Ady," he said; "I'll send Townley with an excuse to Malmsey, and we'll spend the evening together. Don't gag me; there, don't smother me; and, above all, don't shake the bed. We'll give it to Skinfint, and set old Potter's heart at rest. And now send Vanille to me. I must have a warm bath and an effervescent draught."

Fondly kissing his hot brow, Ada withdrew on tiptoe.

And that wreck of a man, weeping over a lease cruelly imposed by an insolent steward on a faithful old tenant, began life with a noble intellect, a great heart, a strong frame, an iron constitution, and might have been, but for the demon of intemperance, everything that good and great men desire to be.

Ada then knocked at Lady Pemberton's door. Her ladyship was also in bed; Sultana, in a sort of basinette, panting, wheezing, whining, growling, snarling, and snapping on the bed by her side.

Lady Pemberton's fine, pale, chiselled features were surrounded by Mechlin lace and pale pink ribbons.

"How are you, dear mamma?" she said.

"Half dead," was the reply. "Your father is killing me by inches. It is a miracle that, in his last night's ebrious excitement, he did not kill the only living thing that shows any real affection for me—poor Sultana, your noble brother's pet. If I were not sure that he cannot live long at this rate, I should sue him for a separation on the score of cruelty."

Ada said nothing.

"Oh, I know you side with your father; you have no feeling for me. You make a tremendous fuss about yourself and your bad spirits, of which you ought to be ashamed; young, courted, indulged, and surrounded as you are with luxuries of all kinds; but you have no sympathy for me; and, if your father's cruelty to Sultana had caused her death, you would not have withdrawn your mind, for one moment, from your own nonsensical, morbid melancholy, to sympathise with me, though you know how I value your poor brother's favourite dog, and how fond the poor creature is of me."

"I came to tell you, dear mamma, that I feel much better: the weight is gone from my spirits, and you will not have to complain of me again."

"I never understood the malady; and, therefore, the 'cured in an instant,' I presume by one of Morrison's pills, is an enigma to me. But I am anxious to rise, as that new man, Sneak, says Sultana's best chance is going out in the morning air. I cannot trust her even with Tarlatan. Poor pet," she added, touching, with her taper fingers, the broad but quivering back of the spaniel; "talk of friends! what the poet says is very true, 'A favourite has no friends.' I believe even Tarlatan is jealous of my fondness for the poor creature, which was given to me by my own and only son—my absent, brave, beautiful boy. He said, 'Be kind to Sultana for my sake, mamma;' and I have been kind to her; and she, she never loved any living creatures but my boy and me. She's only a dog, it's true, Ada, but love begets love. Who else loves me, or cares for me? Not you."

Lady Pemberton had tears in her eyes at this climax; and, turning away from Ada, said, or rather sobbed—

"Don't let me trouble you with an isolation of the heart, which excites no sympathy in you. Send Tarlatan to me. I cannot give a thought to anything now—I am too ill and nervous. If you have anything to say, you must choose a better opportunity. Au revoir!"

"Good-by, mamma," said Ada, as, thus summarily dismissed, she hastily put on her bonnet and mantle, and hastened to rejoin her friend Ellen.

CHAPTER XX.

O ye, whose souls relentless love has tamed
To soft distress, or friends untimely fallen,
Court not the luxury of tender thought!

ARMSTRONG.

And even the name I have worshipped in vain,
Shall awake not the sigh of remembrance again:
For to bear is to conquer our fate.

THOMAS CAMPBELL.

SUDDENLY opening her boudoir door, Ada found Ellen St. Ange gazing through her tears on the beautiful, animated portrait of Walter Pemberton, her first and only love.

Ada and Ellen were going down stairs, followed by Pertinette, laden with cloaks and furs, when Townley came pompously forward, and said to Ada—

"There's a suspicious-looking party, mem, a-hasking, nay, a-hinsisting on seeing you. I've shown him into the library, mem."

"On seeing me, Townley?"

"Yes, mem."

Ada, followed by Ellen, went into the library.

There, a man whom she did not know—not a gentleman, certainly, and not a working man, either—came forward, and served her with a writ of subpoena to appear at the inquest to be held at one o'clock that day, at the "Good Intent" public-house, on the body of Esther Darrell.

"But why am I subpoenaed?" said Ada, turning very pale.

"This letter will explain, miss," said the man, an attorney's clerk. "Hi've nothing to do with it. My name's Slink. Hi honly hacts as subordinate. My principal his Mr. Dodge, of the firm of Dodge and Doombrown, — Street."

Ada opened the letter, and read as follows:—

"Madam,—I am sure you would not wish me to stand on ceremony when a fellow-creature's life is at stake. I have spent the night at the station-house with Ben Darrell, the wretched man whom you saw strike his wife with a quart pot. Poor Esther's brother—whose feelings all can pity and understand—wants to prove at the inquest that the murder was premeditated. You, madam, happen to be the only person who actually saw the blow struck; and, from what you told me, it did not seem to me that you conceived there was any malice prepense, or that the wretched man meant to kill his wife.

"It will go very hard with him in any case, as wife-beating and wife-murder must be punished and put down; but your evidence may give him a chance, and, therefore, I have had you subpoenaed. I know you are a delicate young lady, but a Christian woman's heart will carry you through. I am, madam, your faithful servant,
JAMES GOODMAN."

Ada handed the letter to Ellen.
"I will attend the inquest," said Ada to Mr. Slink, who at once withdrew. "Ellen, you will come with me."

"Of course. Your father or mother—can they attend you?"

"Oh no! as we go along I will tell you why. I shall not even name it to them."

"Well, we will call for Mrs. Golightly: we ought to have some older lady with us."

"Oh yes! that will be very desirable. But, O Ellen, what a responsibility! How can I say what I have to say so as to save this wretched being's life?"

"You can only say the truth, dearest. It is singular that you alone saw the blow struck. I saw the woman fall, and so did Mrs. Golightly; but we were looking at Apple Blossom and her stall, and it was your shriek apprised us of the fact that the man had struck her."

"I am certain he did not mean to kill her," said Ada.

"Then it is your duty, dearest, to convey, as forcibly as you can, that conviction to the jury."

"And I will do my duty," said Ada.

As they entered the elegant phaeton, Ellen driving the sleek, long-tailed ponies, and her own especial groom skipping up behind, fresh from a bet with Townley, who would win the hand of Pertinette, the sun was shining as brightly as if "Earth contained no grave;" and as if it were not looking in on the dead body of a murdered wife, on the tear-blistered face of a now sobered murderer, and on countless scenes of sorrow and deeds of blood and shame.

CHAPTER XXI.

Maidens, young maidens, come listen to me;
For I am a maiden of ripe sixty-three;
And frae a' I hae seen o' monkind and their ways
I'll still be a maid to the end o' my days.
Then shun the tyrant mon;
Yield neither heart nor hon';
A' be merry while ye can;
Shun wedlock's chains and slavery.

COURTSHIP AND WEDLOCK.

Ada and Ellen found Mrs. Golightly very busy. The strong-minded woman had a literary turn, and was, in fact, "darkly, deeply, desperately blue."

On her return from the ragged school, not being able to compose herself to sleep, she had taken up a review, in which was an article entitled "Woman; her Strength and her Weakness."

It certainly was rather a one-sided view of the great question, and it made woman's strength to consist in her weakness, and her weakness in her strength.

It adroitly disguised, under eloquent verbiage, the fact, that the writer divided women into sultanas and slaves, domestic drudges or well-dressed dolls.

There was an ill-veiled, coaxing contempt in this article which roused all the smouldering wrath of Mrs. Golightly's nature.

There was always a fire ready-laid in her breast; and this article was the torch to kindle the mass. It was blazing when Ellen's pony phaeton drove to the old spinster's door.

After a restless night—arguments, syllogisms, deductions, aphorisms, and perorations fusing and boiling over in her large, excited brain—Mrs. Golightly had sprung from her bed. She had hastily thrown on a very short-waisted flannel wrapper, yellow with time and the wash-tub, and made in the old days of enormous gigot sleeves.

In order to keep her brain as cool as possible for the great work she had in hand, Mrs. Golightly had wound a wet tablecloth round her head, her feet and legs were thrust into a pair of boots similar to those used in very cold climates, and lined with fur. They came up to the knee, and she had had them made on purpose to write in in cold weather.

These boots, a small fur tippet, and a pair of blue spectacles, or rather goggles, completed her writing costume.

As she sat at her desk, dashing along rapidly, her pen scarcely keeping pace with the boiling lava of thought that flowed from that Vesuvius—her excited brain—her maid supplied her with strong green tea and slices of bread and butter and rounds of toast.

As Mrs. Golightly was far too much absorbed and excited to heed the carriage, or the knock at the street door, one of the servants of the house (knowing she was at home) had let the ladies in, and showed them into the front parlour, where Ellen and Ada, without any idea of intruding, found themselves face to face with the inspired but singular-looking authoress.

However, Mrs. Golightly was a lady, and therefore not deficient in self-possession. She was a strong-minded woman, and therefore able to support herself in any emergency.

She was, or thought herself, a genius, and therefore above the small anxieties of mean minds. And at this inspired moment, fire flashing from her eyes, and all woman's rights and wrongs whirling in her brain, and burning in her heart, it was not likely she would care how she looked before Ada Pemberton, a girl whom she had always despised as an idler and a doll.

As for Ellen, the figure that almost convulsed Ada with suppressed laughter was by no means new to her. The total indifference to or unconsciousness of the exquisite absurdity of her own appearance, added much to the comicality of the strong-minded woman's tout ensemble.

"Sit down, sit down, my dear Ellen; sit down, Miss Pemberton; let me finish this argument, and then I'll attend to you. Yes," she added, seeing that Ellen took up the Review that had roused her wrath, and indeed "called forth the indignant spirit of the north;" "look at that base, cowardly attack upon woman, the stab in the dark, the sword wreathed in myrtle, the Judas of the press; and then you will guess what I am doing."

Ada and Ellen bent their fair young faces over the page, and in about five minutes Mrs. Golightly threw down her pen and said—

"I think that'll touch him up. He'll find it hard to parry that thrust. He's caught a Tartar!"

"I suppose you are answering this article, dear old friend?" said Ellen.

"Is your reply meant, Mrs. Golightly, for a magazine?" asked Ada.

"No," replied Mrs. Golightly; "I know of no public organ spirited enough to insert it. It shall go forth as a pamphlet; and I think it will make some noise in the world."

Ellen then unfolded her object, and Mrs. Golightly, though not very willing to spend in the cause of a man whom she justly designated "a woman slayer," a day which she had intended to devote to the championship of her own sex, was too good and kind at heart not to feel anxious that Ada should say whatever she could with truth to save a fellow-creature's life.

"I will dress as rapidly as possible, my dear," she said to Ellen, rising, and stalking majestically out of the room in her fur-lined jack-boots; and as she did so, her turban of wet cloth, and her scanty wrapper with its huge gigot sleeves, and small fur tippet, made her seem so irresistibly ludicrous, that both Ada and Ellen could not choose but laugh. Hearing this, she suddenly turned round, and said, very good humouredly, but her eyes flashing with anticipated triumph through her blue goggles, "Let those laugh who win. It is well for you, the Brilliantes and Griseldas of the sex, that there are women like Deborah Golightly to fight your battles." So saying, she closed the inner door, and in a very short time re-appeared in her full walking costume, large bonnet, tartan dress and scarf, and military boots, bag, worsted gloves, and alpaca umbrella.

Mrs. Golightly was very full of the article she had left behind her; but the gems she scattered fell unnoticed, Ada and Ellen were so entirely engrossed by the solemn, awful nature of the business they were engaged in. They thought of the murdered Esther, and the wretched husband, whose mortal span and immortality of bliss or misery might depend on Ada's faltering accents; and above all, of the cause of this dread yet common tragedy—STRONG DRINK!

INASMUCH as laughter is a faculty bestowed exclusively upon man, we seem to be guilty of a sort of ingratitude, if not impiety, in not exercising it as often as we can. We may say, with Titus, that we have "lost a day" if we have passed it without laughing. The pilgrims at Mecca consider it so essential a part of their devotion, that they call upon their prophet to preserve them from sad faces. "Thank God!" exclaimed Rabelais, with an honest pride, as his friends were weeping around his death-bed, "if I were to die ten times over, I should never make you cry half so much as I have made you laugh."

WANT OF COURAGE.

A GREAT deal of talent is lost to the world for want of a little courage. Every day sends to the grave a number of obscure men who have only remained in obscurity because their timidity has prevented their making the first effort—and who, if they could have been induced to begin, would, in all probability, have gone great lengths in the career of fame. The fact is, in order to do anything in this world that is worth doing, we must not stand shivering on the brink and think of the cold and danger, but jump in and scramble as we can. It will not do to be perpetually calculating risks and adjusting nice chances. It did very well before the flood, when a man could consult his friends upon a publication for a hundred and fifty years, and then live to see its success for six or seven centuries afterwards; but, at present, a man waits, and doubts, and hesitates, and consults his brother, and his uncle, and his particular friends, till one day he finds that he is sixty years of age—that he has lost so much time in consulting first cousins and particular friends that he has no time left to follow their advice. There is such little time for over-squeamishness at present, the opportunity so easily slips away, the very period of his life at which man chooses to venture, if ever, is so confined, that it is no bad rule to preach up the necessity, in such instances, of a little violence done to feelings, and of efforts made in defiance of strict and sober calculation.

THE SPECTRE TEXT.

"HANGED by the neck till you be dead,"
The law's judicial voice had said
To one whose hand with blood was red.

The felon staggered from the dock,
And glanced toward the court-room clock,
Whose minutes seemed his hours to mock.

Upon his wrist they clasped the gyves—
(The law holds fast to murderers' lives,
From sentence-time till doom arrives!)

He paused an instant at the street,
The sunshine once again to greet—
Life's sunshine, henceforth doubly sweet!

—Life's sunshine, valued because such!
Then, summoned by the gaoler's touch,
His feet the pavement seemed to clutch.

Though but a strippling 'mid that crowd,
Like an old man's his form was bowed,
But youth found vent—he wept aloud.

As 'mid the thronging mass he sobbed,
All pulses sympathetic throbb'd,
Forgetting now the life he robbed!

The sheriff's men, who gaolward led,
Felt as if following the dead,
And moved along with noiseless tread.

Beside the prison's frowning gate
He passed the threshold of his fate,
And parted with his human hate.

Some keeper by the stair-way saith,
"One moment pause, to give him breath,"
Then whispered, "It belongs to Death!"

As the cell door to swing began
A shudder through his body ran—
'Twas opened by the murdered man!

The spectre-victim's ghastly grin
Welcomed the convict felon in—
Ah! now, at last, he felt his sin.

No eye but his that spectre saw
The grating cell-bolts slowly draw;
Barbing the vengeance of the law!

The felon stood at Murder's throne,
He felt that Murder claimed its own!
—He ne'er again was left alone;

For constantly that spectre said,
"Hanged by the neck till you be dead,"
Until his brain seemed crowned with lead.

And constantly fresh blood was shed
Beneath his feet—upon his head—
Waking—or dreaming in his bed!

Vainly by day or night he plead;
Above the gaoler's sentry-tread
Still came the words of legal dread.

The very fare whereon he fed,
Even the water and the bread,
Sickened him with its dye of red.

To eye and ear came never peace,
Nor did the spectral vengeance cease
Till the grim scaffold gave release!

Ever for souls by crime perplexed,
Remorse will find some spectral text,
Either in this world or the next.

SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY.

THE OLD COUNTRY SQUIRE, SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY.

In the days when Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, was as paramount at court as her husband his Grace of Marlborough was victorious in the field, English manners were very different from what they are, and the life of a town gallant or a country squire had little in common with the existence of their representatives in 1858.

Where are the coffee-houses, where the wits assembled, and court gossips who retailed all the tattle of St. James's? Where are the old sedans and sturdy chairmen and ubiquitous linkmen? Where are the jolly young watermen, plying for hire and ferrying graceful groups to Ranelagh or the Folly on the Thames? Where are the drums now held which used to assemble all the wit and beauty of London, and where are the duels, fought with the small sword, which used to settle the quarrels in those good old days? Where are the ramilies or tie-wigs, and whither are the full bottoms flown? Where are the little muffs and silver garters buckled below the knee, which attracted admiration at the Rainbow coffee-house in Fleet-street? Where are the thered-heeled shoes and topknots which looked as though the town ladies were carrying a bow steeple on their heads? Where are the square-cut coats, the skirts stuffed with buckram and wire, and long flapped waistcoats reaching to the knee; the feathered hats, the swords that made the dapper sparks look like unplucked birds upon a spit—where are they all?

And what has become of the good old squires?—the boozing, fox-hunting, rattling old squires, the quiet, sedate, stately old squires; the dashing, town-aping, foppish old squires; the worthy, estimable, gentlemanly old squires? Where are they all. Surely they have no modern representatives. Far be it from us to say, or to hint in ever so remote a way, that our squirearchy has degenerated. It may be quite as good, or better, and still not be identical. Where, for instance, can you find a squire like Sir Roger de Coverley? He is the beau ideal of the country gentleman of the time of Queen Anne. The portraiture is the best of its kind, and, allowing for certain eccentricities in the character, is exceedingly close to nature.

We are indebted to Addison for an introduction to Sir Roger de Coverley. He is, no doubt, familiar to many of our readers; who, the more they know of him the better they like him, and for the sake of those who have not yet had an introduction, they will bear with our mentioning some of the distinctive features of this worthy man.

His great-grandfather was inventor of that famous country-dance which is called after him. All who know Worcestershire are very well acquainted with the parts and merits of Sir Roger. He is a gentleman that is very singular in his behaviour, but his singularities proceed from his good sense, and are opposed to the manners of the world, only as he thinks the world is in the wrong. However, this humour creates him no enemies, for he does nothing with sourness or obstinacy; and his being unrestrained by modes and forms makes him but the more ready and more capable to please and oblige all who know him. When he is in town, he lives in Soho-square. It is said he remains a bachelor because he was crossed in love by a perverse, beautiful widow of the next county to him. Before this disappointment, Sir Roger was what you call a fine gentleman, had often supped with my Lord Rochester and Sir George Etherege, fought a duel upon his first coming to town, and kicked Bully Dawson in a public coffee-house for calling him a youngster. But being ill-used by the above-mentioned widow, he was very serious for a year and a half, and although he at last got over it, because his temper was naturally jovial, he grew careless of himself, and never dressed afterwards. He continues to wear a coat and doublet of the same cut that was in fashion at the time of his repulse, which, in his merry humours, he tells us has been in and out twelve times since he first wore it. He is now in his fifty-sixth year, cheerful, gay, and hearty; keeps a good house both in town and country, is a great lover of mankind, but there is such a mirthful cast in his behaviour, that he is rather beloved than esteemed. His tenants grow rich, his servants look satisfied, all the young women profess to love him, and the young men are glad of his company; when he comes into a house on a visit, he calls the servants by their names, and talks all the way up stairs. Sir Roger is a justice of the quorum; he fills the chair at a quarter sessions with great abilities, and gained universal applause by explaining a passage in the game act. His servants are all of them sober and staid persons, who have grown old with their master. His valet-de-chambre might be taken for his brother; his butler is gray-headed; his groom is one of the gravest of men, and his coachman has the looks of a privy councillor. His chief companion is a venerable man who has lived at his house in the nature of a chaplain above thirty years. Sir Roger's own account of him is, that, being in want of a chaplain, and afraid of being insulted with Latin and Greek at his own table, he desired a particular friend of his at the university to find him out a clergyman, rather of plain sense than much learning, of a good aspect, a clear voice, a sociable temper, and, if possible, a man that understood something of backgammon. In consequence of this request, the friend looked him out the worthy man on whom the knight has bestowed the parsonage of the parish.

Sir Roger is regular in his attendance at the parish church, and is kind and considerate in his inquiries about the parishioners. All the people love him; and, as he gives a kind word to one and another, or lays his hand on the head of one of the children, everybody praises his goodness, and indeed, he deserves their praises.

His arrangement as to the sermons preached on Sundays, no doubt appear singular in our day. On the parson's first settling with him, he made him a present of all the good sermons which had been preached in England, and only begged of him that every Sunday he would pronounce one of them in the pulpit. Instead of resenting the suggestion as an intrusion on his ecclesiastical functions, the good man digested the sermons into such a series, that they followed one another naturally, and made a continued system of practical divinity. Thus the congregation were edified by Archbishop Tillotson, Bishop Saunderson, Dr. Barrow, Dr. Calamy, and other distinguished clergymen of the Church of England.

Going to church, or following the hounds in the retirement of Worcestershire, or amid the gaiety of Soho, discoursing in his picture gallery, or playing backgammon with the parson, the good old knight stands forth as a worthy specimen of the English squire. He traces the pedigree of the Coverleys for a long period, including, among other celebrities, the last man that won a prize in the tilt-yard, Whitehall; and a great great grandmother, who wrote the best receipt in England for a hasty pudding; another of his relations ruined everybody, but never said a rude thing in his life; and another in his dealings was as punctual as a tradesman and as generous as a gentleman. Of all his ancestors this seems to be the one whom Sir Roger has most closely copied in all his good qualities—qualities which would shine as brilliantly in a modern squire as in one of the days of Queen Anne.

MEMOIR OF MR JOHN SISSON.

AN INTERESTING EXAMPLE OF THE PURSUIT OF KNOWLEDGE UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

(Concluded from page 302.)

In a letter, dated July 26th, 1829, from Mr. Brookes to Dr. Whitsed, the writer says: "As I am informed you take great interest in Mr. Sisson's welfare, it may be agreeable to you to learn that his assiduity and attention to business deserve the highest encomiums. His apprenticeship expires in October, and I hope and wish he may be able to obtain means of completing his professional studies, and also his diploma. I have offered to engage with him, after these objects are accomplished, at a liberal salary, if nothing better offers; but I fear his having such slender pecuniary resources will be an obstacle he will find it difficult to surmount. I feel much interested in his welfare, and shall be most happy to promote his advancement as far as is in my power."

This letter altogether gives surety of the estimation in which he was held.*

By the interest of some of his friends he obtained, through the direct instrumentality of Lord Sandwich, a scholarship at Glasgow, of £20 per annum, and which, with his temperate and simple habits, and rigid sobriety, must nearly have sufficed for all his wants. He had besides the friendship of Professor Walker, the father of his Peterborough master, and the advantage of visiting his family and the benefit of his advice.

In this seminary of science and literature, Mr. Sisson acquired a respectable knowledge of natural history, natural philosophy, and the French, German, and Greek, besides the Latin; whilst he also sedulously cultivated anatomy, physiology, chemistry, and all other departments essential to a well-cultivated medical man. His leisure hours were spent in a moral and agreeable way, so as to improve the sentiments and manners, and to fit him for the most refined society.

Being much respected, he was appointed, when the cholera first made its appearance, to be house-surgeon to the Cholera Hospital at Glasgow; and his attention to the sick, and his labours in the cause of science were above all praise, and he earned for himself the greatest respect.

It was during the frightful ravages of this scourge that he manifested the greatest ardour for the profession he had chosen. And it is but a bare tribute to his memory to state, that there were few, even amongst the most active practitioners, who had devoted themselves to investigate this malignant epidemic, who dissected so many of those who died of the disease. And as he was a patient observer, his notes would be a valuable contribution to the pathology of this malady.

When the cholera abated, Mr. Sisson was appointed fever clerk to the Royal Infirmary, and he now seemed to be on the road to independence. But, alas! in a very few days after he had obtained the situation, his existence was terminated by a malignant fever on the 14th of November, 1832, in his thirty-first year.

We have mentioned, incidentally, his moral status, and, brief as this sketch must be, some idea will have been formed of his great perseverance and natural intelligence. He was a nice-looking person, and the writer has not a doubt that he gradually improved in appearance in the ratio of his mental improvement. Although we regret that we had not ocular proof from any personal acquaintance with Mr. Sisson, yet we had presumptive evidence for this statement, having been shown a portrait taken of him soon after he went to Mr. Brookes', and another taken at Glasgow a short time before his death. In both the organisation is good. But the change in the aspect (morally and intellectually) of his head and features, tends to prove, indubitably, that education alters, modifies, and improves the cerebral organisation.

And as the collateral corroboration of the actual superiority of Mr. Sisson's mind by systematic culture, we may mention that he visited Dr. Whitsed and his family as a friend and equal, and that his manners and deportment were so refined and agreeable as to render him a companion of a learned man whom he had previously served as a domestic servant.

Dr. Whitsed told the writer that when he had a dinner-party, Mr. Sisson's behaviour gave no indication of any disadvantage of his early training: on the contrary, he was agreeable without any symptom of embarrassment or officiousness; and though he paid proper deference to those who merited it from any intrinsic merit or palpable excellence, yet he had sufficient self-esteem to estimate his own qualifications at their just value. But withal he never manifested that offensive egotism which is too often observed in those who are literally self-taught when such have not associated with those whose minds had been better cultured, or those who, like stars, had manifested a peculiar luminosity from having concentrated their naturally powerful intellect on some special subject.

Mr. Sisson was fortunate in this particular, and he always gave his opinions with modesty, yet in such a way as to evince that he was not doubtful of their correctness. What he had observed with great attention he communicated in a clear manner, without the slightest manifestation of dogmatism.

As some further evidence of the intrinsic value of his character, we may mention that he visited his good old mother, either just before he left Mr. Brookes or after he had commenced his studies at Glasgow; and being in the neighbourhood of Peterborough, he spent a month with Mr. Walker, who assured the writer that he was so highly pleased with his medical information and refined manners, that he intrusted his practice to him for some time (we believe a fortnight), and that during this visit, so great was his suavitas in modo and his superior knowledge, that he sat and dined with the same ladies and gentlemen on whom he had formerly waited.

Had he lived a little longer, he would have taken a degree of Doctor of Medicine.

We have mentioned his appointment to the Fever Hospital. He entered this new situation (says a writer in the Edinburgh Phrenological Journal, vol. viii.), with high hopes, about the end of October, having been at the Cholera Hospital from the beginning of the preceding February. He commenced his new duties with equal ardour, and showed his new patients every attention, as he had those at the before-mentioned institution. It appears, that he was anxious to acquire a knowledge of fever. And it is therefore supposed that it was during his continual leaning over the patients, while investigating the state of their lungs with the stethoscope, that he imbibed the seeds of his disease, which, acting on a constitution previously debilitated by the Asiatic cholera and over-study, soon developed itself in an active form, and hurried this promising young man to a premature grave, after about thirteen days' illness!—thus adding another martyr to the healing art, who was deeply regretted by all who had the pleasure of knowing him.

There is not any greater proof needed of the impartiality of our common Father, than in such instances as that of Mr. Sisson. A man born in the midst of poverty, and forced in his boyhood to work for his daily bread, without any, or scarcely any, mind-culture, and without any other prospect than "to plod his weary way" on the path of existence; and yet by the force of circumstances and his own innate capacity, he was ultimately enabled to take an honourable position in a useful and highly important profession.

We may remark, incidentally, that men like Mr. Sisson possess the sort of mind which, when their powers become developed, manifest a degree of freshness and originality, commensurate to their natural intensity and vigour; so as to render them capable of adding new observations and reflections to the sum of human knowledge.

So that, although the subject of this sketch was to fortune and to fame unknown, yet there is much to learn from his history. He is a well-marked instance of the fact, that there exists, from birth, natural capacity, which is not confined to any grade, but requires genial influences to render "the gift" capable of realising much good, not only to the possessor, but also to the community in which he dwells.

It is for this reason that the biographies of self-taught men have always a certain amount of interest, and furnish some lessons which may be useful to others. In John Sisson's case we find that, during the transition state of his mind, he violated the mental laws without any knowledge of the infringement. For example, his attempt to do with two hours' sleep, which must have injured his bodily health, and rendered him too susceptible.

Every student, should, therefore, profit by this experience, and so regulate the hours of study and relaxation as to insure sound repose and its renovating influence. Just in the same manner that we learn, from our own consciousness, the absolute necessity of attending to the laws which regulate the vital and vegetative functions; in the first case, insuring perfect sanity of mind, and, in the latter, a healthy condition of the body.

It seems, therefore, an inference forced upon us by a perfectly logical process, that Mr. Sisson, from low living (as he principally fed on barley porridge) and labouring incessantly at the Cholera Hospital, by these conjoint means, lowered the standard of the nervous system, and thus rendered himself liable to suffer from contagion among the patients of the fever-house; and to these causes may be traced the reason that his useful career was finished in his thirty-first year. This is the more to be regretted as he was a man of great promise, and would, in all probability, had he lived, have become a contributor to the commonwealth of knowledge, especially in physiology and medicine.

The Matron.

NO. XV.

Young children may be the delight or the torment of a house. It is the mother's especial duty to endeavour to render them the former; but, wayward as all children naturally are, the task appears at first a very difficult one. How gladly do I endeavour to assist the mother with the results of my own experience.

In the first place, I assure you (if you are a mother) that you do wrong in constantly scolding a child. Admonitions and rules are of course necessary even in the nursery, but let them be given in moderation, and rest your hopes of success on more powerful instruments—for instance, on example, and on encouragement. Example acts on a child with a force that it cannot resist; and know this to your comfort, that all the good qualities you have cultivated in yourself may prove so many blessings to your child. Even at three and four, children are the creatures of imitation. Let your child behold you kind and gentle to all around you, and you will soon perceive he catches up your tone, manner, and expressions. Even your habit of keeping a place for everything, and of having everything in its place, influences him, and in his way he begins "putting to rights."

This tendency in young children to imitation may be turned to great good; but, on the other hand, it may be fruitful of evil if you do not keep a watchful eye over your child, and guard him from bad examples. Happily, nature and inclination lead him to cling to you, while your gentle kindness makes him feel safest and happiest when at your side. Then is the best time for you to implant moral and religious truths. Your word is his law. Your child does not question your assertions. Disbelief is an evil of later growth. A young child has faith. When you tell him that the Almighty One, who made heaven and earth, and who knows everything, and who can do everything, orders little children to obey their parents, how much weight do you give to this precept of obedience—a precept, in which so many others are comprised; and if, with all a mother's affectionate earnestness, you tell your little boy that the same Almighty Being teaches us to love each other, what a foundation of goodness is laid by these great precepts of love and obedience.

Always remind your child to say grace at meals; and do not let this grace be an unmeaning ceremony, but make him understand that he is thanking his Heavenly Father for the good things before him. And this leads me, to give you a caution which may be a very necessary one, supposing your husband does not come home till the evening. Always manage to sit down to dinner with your child or children about the middle of the day. If you are ever so poor and can only afford a light repast, have it in good order, and regularly. It is very bad for children to be kept long fasting. Recollect, that by food strength must be supplied for their growth, and, in this point of view, their dinner is even more important than your own. Let them have meat once a day, if you can afford it; if you cannot, consider what may best supply its place. Rice boiled with milk is very nourishing indeed; and, with a spoonful of treacle, it makes a dish that children are very fond of. Three or four pennyworth of bones stewed in a gallon of water, with a couple of sliced onions and a breakfast-cupful of pearl barley, make a cheap, but wholesome and savoury dinner for poor children, supposing it is kept simmering for two hours. It should be flavoured with salt and pepper, and eaten with plenty of bread. Where children take a great deal of exercise, a suet pudding may be given them for dinner, but it is not very easy of digestion. If it is to be made particularly nice, mix in raisins, and boil it thoroughly for two hours at least. Put raisins in your puddings, in preference to currants, for currants often disagree with children; and you must bear in mind that in childhood the stomach is very easily put out of order, and that a diarrhoea or inward inflammation, brought on by unwholesome trash or unripe fruit, may prove fatal to your child in a few hours; so be on your guard in this respect. New bread is also very injurious. Recollect always to have in your provision of the staff of life the day before, and see to this for the sake of economy as well as health.

* We may mention that the worthy Mr. Brookes was, some short time afterwards, unfortunately thrown from his horse, whilst on a night visit to some distant patient who had broken his leg, which suddenly terminated his useful life. In his will he had left a legacy of £100 to Mr. Sisson; and when the widow disposed of his practice, the gentleman would not sign the articles until Mr. Sisson gave a bond for £1,000 that he would not practise in the neighbourhood for five years—a document which would not have been demanded had he (Mr. Sisson) not been greatly esteemed and respected by the patients of the deceased.

But, with all the care in the world, you cannot expect to have your children always rosy and smiling. Hooping-cough, and measles, and other ills, will come, and you must be prepared for them.

It is in times of sickness that you will, more than ever, congratulate yourself on having accustomed your children to prompt obedience. Judge of the agony and self-reproach of a parent who (having always yielded to a blind fondness) cannot influence her child to swallow a medicine necessary to save his life!

Gentle reader, pity such a mother, but let all parents avoid her errors.

Act wisely, and you will soon reap the benefits of judicious training, in the love and welfare of your children; and you will enter into our poet's charming description of domestic bliss. How pleasing are Cotton's lines on a happy young family! They run thus:—

"Our babes shall richest comforts bring:
If tutored right they'll prove a spring
Whence pleasures ever rise;
We'll train their souls with studious care,
To all that's lovely, good, and fair—
We'll fit them for the skies."

Small Change.

A SPINSTER is an unprotected female, and, of course, a first-rate subject for the exercise of the courage of cowards and the wit of the witless.

WONDERFUL CURE OF HYDROPHOBIA.—After many days' dogged resistance, the Leviathan was prevailed upon, at last, to take water for the first time!

"PLEASE, sir, I don't think Mr. Dosim takes his physic reglar," said a doctor's boy to his employer. "Why so?" "Cause vy, he's getting vell so precious fast."

A GOOD constitution is like a money box—its full value is never known till it is broken.

GENIUS is sometimes arrogant; knowledge is always diffident.

A DUEL was fought in Mississippi last week by Mr. T. Knott and Mr. A. W. Shott. The result was that Knott was shot, and Shott was not.

A CONTEMPORARY thinks that "the banks of the country are in a very promising condition." We seriously apprehend that some of them will never be in any other.

A PARISHIONER inquired of his pastor the meaning of this line in Scripture—"He was clothed with curses as with a garment." "It signifies," replied the divine, "that the individual had got a bad habit of swearing."

FRIENDS are like money; it is only our wants that rouse their sleeping value.

THE H's.—There is nothing funnier in Cockney vernacular than Jeames's letter, according to that voracious historian Thackeray, when he is in doubt which to prefer of his two ladyloves, Marry Hann and Hangelina. He writes—"There they stood together, these two young women. I don't know which is the ansamest. I couldn't help comparing them; and I coudn't help comparing myself to a certing Hannimle I've read of, that found it diffiiklt to make a choice betwixt 2 Bundles of A."

WHEN does a fine lady only move and breathe with freedom? When she has broken her staylace.

JONATHAN BRIGGS, of Newport, has a memory so long, that he is obliged to tie it in a knot to carry it about with him.

"WHEN was Rome built?" inquired a "competitive" examiner. "In the night, sir!" "In the night! how do you make that out?" "Why, sir, you know Rome wasn't built in a day."

PATRICK O'BRIEN was one day strolling with a friend through a graveyard, when his eye was arrested by an epitaph which shocked his sense of propriety and veracity. It ran thus:—

"Weep not for me, my children dear;
I am not dead, but sleeping here."
"Well," said Paddy, "if I was dead, I would be honest enough to own it."

COMMERCIAL GENIUS.—Fond Parent (to his son):—"Yes, New York is the place to get on in. Look at James: he started without a penny, and has lately failed for a hundred and fifty thousand dollars! Of course, that's an extreme case. I don't expect you to do so well as that. Still, with honesty and industry, I see no reason why you should not, in a few years, fail for fifty thousand dollars."

TELL me with whom thou art found, and I will tell thee who thou art; let me know thy chosen employment, and what to expect from thee I know.

—Goethe.

The road that ambition travels is too narrow for friendship, too crooked for love, too rugged for honesty, and too dark for science.

WHAT neat thing produces all manner of untidiness?—Neat gin.

OUR sensibilities may be too weak as well as too strong. They who feel little for themselves will feel little or not at all for others. Nothing can be more different than fortitude and insensibility, the one being a noble principle, the other a mere negation; and yet they are often confounded.

RATHER EQUIVOCAL.—An Irishman, who was giving his testimony in the Boston Municipal Court lately, convulsed the bar, tickled the jury, and raised a smile on the bench by the following statement:—"Ye see, may't plaze yees, that this man got a stroke and fell down. Everybody round called out, 'Ow, he's kilt, he's kilt!' Then I steps up, and I hollied out to the crowd, 'If the man is kilt, why don't yees stand back and give him a little air?'"

A BEGGAR, in Dublin, had been a long time besieging an old gouty, testy, limping gentleman, who crustily refused his mite. "Ah, please your honour's honour," said the mendicant, "I wish your heart was as tender as your toes."

THE following articles are said to have been among the curiosities of an eminent collector:—a pair of ship's stays, a paletot belonging to the heavy swell of the Atlantic, and a log of the wood used in making logarithms.

"WHERE is Bridget?" "Indade, ma'am, she's fast asleep, lookin' at the bread bakin'."

WHY is a man who asks questions the strangest of individuals?—Because he's the querist.

THE Abbé de Pradt, who wrote a book on the condition of Europe, modestly begins his work with these words: "There is one man who has saved Europe—it is I."

A PROVINCIAL paper lately gave the following account of a duel: "The one party was wounded severely in the chest, and the other fired in the air." Query: Who wounded the sufferer?

TRUTH is always consistent with itself, and needs nothing to help it out; it is always near at hand, sits upon our lips, and is ready to drop out before we are aware; a lie is troublesome, and sets a man's inventions upon the rack, and one trick needs a great many more to make it good.

THE BABIE.

Næe shoon to hide her tiny toe,

As early blossoms sweet.

A giftie God gied us;
We maun na love the gift over weel,

Problem No. 31. By DOMINO.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

Problem No. 32. By HENRY TURTON, Esq.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

ENIGMA.

No. 12. By Mr. W. AIREY.

White.—K at Q R 6, Q at K R sq, R at K sq, Kt at K 8, Ps at Q Kt 7 and Q B 4.

Black.—K at Q B 3, Q at K R 5, Rs at K R 2 and K B 2, Bs at K Kt 7 and Q B 2, Ps at Q B 4, K B 6, and K Kt 3.

White to move, and mate in three moves.

L. S. JONES and F. G. H.—We should suggest Kt to K 2 as the best reply to your second move in Problem No. 21.

E. S.—Problem No. 23 can be solved only in the way indicated by the published solution.

A LEARNER.—The King can only relieve himself from check by taking the attacking piece, by interposing a piece or Pawn between such piece, or by moving the King out of check. The square on which the Q B stands is called the Queen's Bishop's square; the square before it, the Queen's Bishop's second square, and so on with the rest.

EBORACUM.—The question depends entirely upon your capacity for the game. You cannot do better than peruse the chess lessons which appeared in our earlier numbers.

M. A. R.—The object of the White Pawn in Problem No. 24, is to prevent a second solution commencing with Q to Q B 2.

L. E. B.—If in Problem No. 22 White play as you propose, the Black King can escape at his third move by playing to Q Kt 3.

E. GRANT.—The removal of the Black Pawn which stands on K Kt 3 in Problem No. 19 would render the position defective. We leave it to your ingenuity to discover why.

W. J. J. (Dartford).—We are obliged by the friendly tone of your communication; the Problem to which you refer did not, however, accompany your letter. You appear to overlook K to Q B B for the last move of Black in Problem No. 21. The solution which we have given is the only correct one.

GRAPES.—In Problem No. 21 Black can delay the mate by covering with his Bishop, if White play as you suggest.

A NOVICE IN CHESS.—What is to prevent the Black King from taking the Kt in Problem No. 21, if White commence with R to K 7?

N. M. C.—A re-examination of Problem No. 18 will, no doubt, convince you that Black cannot play as you propose.

Our Editorial Table.

KATHERINE.—The easiest manner of producing a pretty picture on silk, linen, or other stuffs, is by the beautiful art of diaphane. The discovery of this art is owing to the recent invention of printing in colours. You must procure transparent paper, on which the design selected is painted in glass colours. Stretch your silk or other stuff on a frame, then apply (leaving one day between each application) two coatings of diaphanous liquor. Leave it for a week to dry. After this cover it with thin size. When this is dry, the stuff will be in a fit state to receive the coat of varnish and the designs. Observe that for diaphane, the designs are purchased ready for use at an artist's colour shop or depository.

RIVINGTON.—There is some mystery in your case. You give us to understand you are steady and fond of business, and, nevertheless, you are (to use your own words) "as poor as Lazarus." Judging from your letter you are a clever young man, therefore your attentions may be favourably received by young ladies; but, with matrimonial prospects, you must bear in mind that the parents and guardians must be satisfied. To secure their consent we advise you to wait till you can give a better account of your worldly circumstances.

ROSA FLOWERS.—Blotches and rednesses in the face often proceed from indigestion. To remove this complaint, walk out every day when the weather permits, carefully avoid late suppers, and abstain from stimulants until the redness has disappeared.

WARRINGTON.—If your pecuniary circumstances are such as to authorise your proposing to the young lady, you ought to act openly, and, by letter, or in a personal interview with her father, make known your intentions. We take it for granted these are honourable; had they been otherwise, you would not have presumed to consult us respecting them.

MONTGOMERY.—You must carefully watch the course of events. Perhaps circumstances may enable you to show the lady some attention, or to protect her in some danger, or you may be enabled to make her acquaintance through some mutual friend. It would be contrary to propriety to address her without an introduction.

L. P.—With your talents you ought to be able to make an income. We think if you were to advertise in the most respectable and widely-circulated journal of your own town, you would be likely to find employment. You had better mention that your writing is very good.

ANXIOUS GEORGE.—You have everything in your favour. Banish anxiety. We suppose the young lady is residing in the same town as you are. Perhaps she attends the same lecturer, and her parents may consult the same lawyer or doctor as yourself. Professional men are the great mediums of communication between respectable families. Yours are views which you have no reason to conceal, and, considering your circumstances, they are not likely to be discouraged.

LETTY.—St. James's Palace was built on the site of a hospital for lepers. This hospital existed before the Norman conquest, and was dedicated to St. James. Henry the Eighth had it pulled down, and the present edifice erected, from the designs of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex.

ANXIETY.—You must watch your opportunity for improving the acquaintance, and, by proper attention to your appearance, be always prepared to take advantage of an opportunity. When you meet the young lady at the house of a mutual friend, show your regard by constant attention and assiduity; and if the young lady's parents are present, pay them every delicate and respectful attention. This is another mode of ingratiating yourself with her, supposing you have wisely placed your affections. But if you find that the image of the young lady tyrannises over your thoughts, and engrosses them, to the exclusion of the duties of your business or profession, instead of cultivating her society, we advise you to shun it. You are much too young to settle in life, and an absorbing passion would weaken the powers of your mind, and blight your prospects of success. On the other hand, a virtuous and manly love for an amiable young lady might prove your safeguard. But then it must be love, not passion. It must be a feeling that will strengthen you in the pursuit of virtue and eminence—a feeling similar to that which inspired the hero of that pretty little poem entitled "Love was the Spirit that Saved." Of this hero we read that—

"Toil and exertion he dreaded them not,
Urged on by love's powerful voice:
For he said, If success and renown are my lot,
The maiden I love will rejoice."

A BUCHAN LASSIE.—You will find the outlines of the life of Lola Montes in the February number of the "Ladies' Treasury," a work published by Messrs. Ward and Lock. This said "Ladies' Treasury" well deserves its name, as it is replete with amusement, information, and good advice. It appears monthly, is richly illustrated, and costs only sixpence. We are delighted that our paper in its present shape meets with your approbation, and we thank you for the high opinion you express of it.

SOPHIA.—A flush in the face is often occasioned by acidity on the stomach. To correct this, take, on going to bed, a teaspoonful of magnesia mixed up in milk. Repeat the dose once a week.

A SUBSCRIBER.—In "Niagara," the accent is on the second syllable—"Niagara."

DECLINED WITH THANKS.—"Jack Manders," "Days of Childhood," "F. J.," "Conundrums," "W. Redshanks," "Bonnie Jennie," "Pelican," "A Geological Love-letter," "M. O. H.," "How Sacred the Moments," "J. J. Beauram," "Welcome Spring," "Frances S.," "Sketches Taken in the Isle of Wight," "E. E. Hamilton," "Lines on Horseback," "Ocean Spray," "Stars," "J. B.," "To Mary," "James Brady," "Autumn."

"Robin Hood," "A Constant Subscriber," "Union Jack," "A Three Years' Subscriber," "A Sufferer," "A Poor Man," "The Arctic Crusade," "A Sufferer" (Dunbar).—We decline to furnish medical advice. Application should be made to a respectable practitioner.

BENET.—1. We decline to offer an opinion. 2. Wait till you are noticed. 3. Not yet arranged. 4. Abridging legal or other documents.

CANANG.—As you opened the letter, you must pay for it; but, for the information of the young lady who indulged in the joke, we observe that we consider it as stupid as it was vulgar.

EXCELSIOR.—You may keep paste from becoming mouldy, for any length of time, by adding to it a drop of the oil of lavender.

BILLY D.—If you suffer greatly from the evil you mention, you had better have the following receipt made up at a chemist's. Do not attempt to make it yourself. It is better to have scurf in your head, than imprudently to meddle with poisons. Receipt: two ounces of lard and two drachms of sulphuric acid, diluted. Apply this ointment to your head once a day.

ANXIOUS.—Your communication is evidently prompted by a wish to improve. This is the more praiseworthy, as the intellectual progress you have already made is considerable. You have no reason to be discouraged by what you term "the ailments" of your mind. At one-and-twenty feeling and imagination give to novels and romances a charm which they partially lose as we advance in life. You may still continue to read those that are well written, and that have a moral tendency. These works unbend the mind, and procure for us the pleasure of change of scene, without putting us to the inconvenience and expense of a journey. The improvement of your memory is another consideration. You must bring this important power of the mind under control.

B. S. J.—You will find your question answered in "Cassell's Illustrated Almanack" for the present year.

GEORGE W. S. (Clifton).—The error is a typographical one.

MARY EVE.—You had better look over the lists of situations vacant at some respectable registering offices for servants. Of course there are such offices in your native town. If you find nothing to suit, you should advertise (stating your qualifications) in a Bristol or Liverpool paper.

AGENOBA.—It is evident you must decide, and that promptly. We advise you to act with firmness, for the happiness of your life may depend on your present steps. Four years is too long for courtship, where there is no obstacle but the gentleman's cowardly indecision. If your admirer is really attached to you, the following plan will bring him to the point. Write to him, saying that, as a young single lady, you do not consider it consistent with decorum to continue to receive the visits of any gentleman who is not an accepted suitor. This may appear somewhat harsh at first; but, as your parents are not residing with you, you must act for yourself. You can derive no advantage from intimacy with a gentleman who does not propose for you himself, and who probably prevents your receiving other offers.

ADRIAN TOM.—Judging from your letter, you have been very unfairly treated. But, after all, a coquette is not to be regretted. By amiable and lively attentions to other ladies, show the false one that she has not succeeded in breaking your heart.

ESTHER.—Nankin colour is the natural tint of the cotton.

MARIAN BRUCE.—For sunburn, take a little scraped horseradish, mixed with warm milk, and rub it on your face and hands. To purify the breath, take every morning from two to five drops of concentrated solution of chloride of soda, in a wine-glassful of spring water.

IAGO.—The object of your affections may be the victim of slander; but we advise you to be very much on your guard. Write to her, informing her of everything you have heard; and, unless she can clearly exculpate herself, shun her company, as you value your welfare here and hereafter. With regard to the cleaning of your book, you must consult a book of trades; but we can furnish you with a receipt for taking stains out of steel, supposing they are occasioned by rust. Thoroughly rub sweet oil into the steel, and, two days after, rub it with unslaked lime (finely powdered), until all the rust disappears.

HEROES OF FAME.—We thank you for the lines you have forwarded us. They breathe a pure, patriotic spirit; but, as yet, the author has not studied the laws of versification sufficiently to do himself credit by appearing in print.

HENRY CHARLES TREE.—The whole of the back numbers of the old series of this Paper can at present be had upon application to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard, price three-halfpence each. The cheaper way, however, is to purchase the Volumes, of which there are four, price 5s. 6d. each in paper covers, free by post for 6s. 6d.; or 7s. 6d. in cloth boards, free by post 9s.

HARRIETTE.—Dear Harriette,—In answering your interesting and elegantly written epistle, we shall endeavour to give you such advice as you might expect from a kind father. The best thing you can do is to conquer the false pride that has prevented your owning your fault. If the gentleman to whom you are engaged has a sister, endeavour to procure her kind offices as mediator. But if no such person exists, you had better write to the gentleman himself, than allow things to go on in this very unsatisfactory state; you should frankly confess your error, for we can assure you, you did very wrong in persisting in corresponding with your sea-side acquaintance, when the gentleman you had accepted as a suitor, disapproved of your so doing.

DAISY.—As an accomplished lady's maid you should understand hair-dressing, dress-making, and getting up fine linen. You should also have a good constitution to enable you to withstand the bad effects of late hours, and a very good temper to help you to put up with the airs of vanity and peevishness which fashionable belles are likely to give themselves. You might expect £40 a year if you were experienced in your business; but as a beginner you may be satisfied with £14.

A STUDENT.—You are correctly informed. The circumstances are as follows. The Duke d'Enghien, son of the Duke of Bourbon, was kidnapped from the territory of the Elector of Baden, hurried away to France, and by order of Napoleon Bonaparte was shot at midnight, on March the 22nd, 1804, in the wood of Vincennes.

CARUS.—We are not surprised at the indifference manifested by a young lady of seventeen, for your friend of sixteen. Of course, she only looks upon him as a boy who should be amusing himself with a bat and ball, instead of losing time in making love. We approve of the advice you have given. Both you and your friend are at a very important time of life. Apply your energies to fitting yourselves to shine in some business or profession, and when you have succeeded you will find plenty of young ladies in their teens willing to listen to you.

BERTHA.—"Outlines of Botany," price 2s. 6d., is one of the best and cheapest books on the subject.

EVA MONTGOMERY.—Evidently your digestion is out of order; but, from the symptoms you describe, we advise you to attend to diet, rather than to take much medicine. If you can choose your own fare, you should dine on fowl, or thoroughly dressed mutton, rather than on beef and puddings. The latter are difficult to digest. You would also derive benefit from the use of a flesh-brush morning and evening, and from drinking freely of good spring water.

ABYLE.—You will find neither of the words you mention in an English dictionary. They belong to the French language; and you should acquire the manner of pronouncing them from a native of France, or from a good French scholar. No combination of letters can furnish you with the exact pronunciation.

OTHELLO.—To introduce yourself to the young lady would be quite at variance with the laws of etiquette; but as you may reasonably conclude you have made a favourable impression, the next thing to do is to endeavour to make yourself regularly acquainted with her, through the medium of a mutual friend. In all probability your fair valentine will second your efforts.

AMANDA FITZALEEN.—By instructing your daughters in Cassell's complete "Educational Course," you may render them much better informed than are the generality of young ladies brought up at fashionable and expensive seminaries. You had better write a few lines to the publishers, inclosing a postage-stamp for reply. State that you wish for "Cassell's Educational Course" and the "Model Copy-books," and beg to be informed of the amount of the money-order you are to send, and where you are to make it payable.

ST. MUNGO.—You inform us, St. Mungo, that you are "what is called a good-looking chap;" and you add, that you would take any woman to wife, provided she had cash. Since such are your principles, we decline assisting you to form any matrimonial engagement. In fact, we never met with a woman who (in spite of your looks) was not too good for a man so mercenary as yourself. We are not surprised at your having had many refusals.

H. I. S.—You can obtain the work mentioned through a bookseller, who will also give you information as to price, &c.

ARTHUR.—Fanny Fern is a name assumed by a highly gifted American authoress.

FIDDLER DICK, JOB.—Apply to the publishers of the work in question.

G. F. H.—You had best, if you have musical taste, join a singing class.

A SCRIBE.—About ten shillings. Very good.

ALFRED DE C * * .—In reply to your interesting communication, we can only say that if you follow the wishes of the young lady, and wait until your affairs are settled, in order to declare yourself to her parents, you should in the meantime discontinue your constant visits, otherwise you will be carrying on a clandestine courtship; and from the tone of your letter we conclude you would avoid any ungentlemanly action or double-dealing.

AJAX.—It was in 1809 that Cayenne surrendered to the British and Portuguese.

APPLIANCE.—If you are in circumstances to settle in life, the best thing you can do is to procure the permission of the young ladies' parents to visit their daughter, and endeavour to render yourself acceptable to her. Having met her at the house of a mutual friend, you are no longer a stranger to her, and a respectful, well-worded letter to her lawful guardians, could not give offence.

AN INTERESTED ONE.—You gave very judicious advice to the young lady, and she acted wisely in following it. Had she destroyed the letter instead of returning it, the writer might never have known that his impertinent addresses were treated with the contempt they deserved.

G. G.—We must know what these certain signs are before we can proceed to give you advice.

LANDSDOWN.—In the sentence which you cite—namely, "L'enclos des Chartreux qui n'était pas éloigné," &c., &c.—the word éloigné is an adjective.

LIZZIE.—Adelphi is a Greek word, and means "brothers." Madonna is Italian; it is a name given to the Virgin Mary, and is rendered in English by "Our lady."

AN ILL-USED LOVER.—No legal engagement can be formed by a minor. Besides, you left the lady, and you did not even keep up your intimacy by letter. If she accepted the addresses of another, you have no right on that account to call yourself "An ill-used Lover."

E. A. B.—The initials "R. I. P." represent the Latin sentence, Requiescat in pace—translated, "May he rest in peace."

ELIZABETH REAY.—We do not like to recommend depilatories, because we consider them all dangerous. If the hairs of which you complain disfigure your countenance, and are nevertheless few in number, you might perhaps remove them with tweezers. Cutting or shaving them might increase their growth. Better leave nature alone.

F. ALEXANDER.—We will attend to your suggestion.

FIDDLER DICK.—We have recently given a receipt for a curing fluid.

LOGAN, RECHAB, and G. ERGON.—We have before given receipts for the cure of warts. See No. 191, page 271.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARTLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XII.

In that bright land where first the sun
Set glorious on this nether world,
Where after day his course has run,
In night his radiant wings are furled;
Where passions wild and feelings deep
In madness revel through the heart;
Where every breeze o'er perfumes sweep,
And rife in their course a part.

AUTHOR'S SCRAP-BOOK.

WHAT a task would it involve to trace minutely the progress of civilisation. Cradled in Central India, in that mysterious land where constant tradition has placed the terrestrial paradise, we should find it developing itself by slow degrees, and invading century after century each part of the globe. Slowly the giant infant extended its huge limbs; one of its earliest efforts was to constitute in a remote corner of the world, China, with its hieroglyphics, artillery, and printing, a rough outline of the wonders it would one day accomplish. Next it founded in the East the great empires of Assyria, Persia, and Chaldea, with their wondrous cities Babylon, Suez, and Persepolis, the earliest capitals of the earth, which now scarcely deigns to retain their trace, but which, whilst the rest of mankind were plunged in darkness, shone in all the splendour of priestly civilisation. The next great step was the colonisation of the isles and borders of the sea, where to a population of husbandmen a race of fishermen and merchants succeeded, from whom sprung the Phœnicians, Phrygians, and Tyrians, to whose stately cities and vast commerce the sacred writings themselves bear witness.

Asia founded at last on the limits of Africa enig-matical Egypt with its people of priests, merchants, husbandmen, and sailors, a transition from sacerdotal empire to commercial republic, from Babylon to Carthage.

On Egypt repose the three successive civilisations of Asia, Africa, and Europe: it is the keystone of the arch which connects the ancient with the modern world.

Egypt created Greece, which colonised the greater part of Italy, and fell not till its mission was accomplished, its arts and sciences transported to Rome—to that city so wondrously prepared to receive and propagate them.

Vainly did despotism, alarmed at the progress of mankind, attempt to crush the capital of the intellectual world by removing the seat of empire to the shores of the Bosphorus. Byzantium became Stamboul, whilst Rome remained Rome. Civilisation replaced the sword, and all was told. Like the gushing waters of some mighty river, the stream could not be rolled back to its source.

RICHARD MARKHAM'S DRIVE ALONG THE BANKS OF THE HOUGHLY.

Many have asked why civilisation in India, so vigorous in its infancy, should have remained unchanged, and, we fear, unchangeable, in the cradle of its birth. And yet the answer must be apparent to every reflecting mind. Man, in his pride, mistook the outline for the picture, and pronounced it perfect; superstition guarded it by caste, passion by licentiousness, and tyranny by slavery—ignorant that the true watchword of humanity is "On, still on," that immovability is atrophy, and that mind and body perish alike for want of fitting nourishment.

Thus we perceive how the child, although it still remained a child, became the father of a man; weak at first, tottering as he advanced—now receding—now groping his way amid the darkness of error—till Christianity, pouring its arterial blood into his veins, invigorated his feeble system. Thus cartilage became bone, flesh changed to muscle, and nerves hardened into steel, yet still retained their sensitiveness.

On. There is no mistaking the word; for Deity itself pronounced it when it placed the first parents of mankind in a probationary state; and we doubt not but a time will come when this present age, with its wondrous discoveries—steam, gas, electricity—science that can measure the universe, describe the pathway of the stars, the comet's orbit, and read the living rock to read upon its page those secrets of an earlier world which Nature's hand has traced, will be regarded as the mere dawn of intellect and progress.

Such were the reflections, though somewhat less connected, perhaps, which floated through the brain of Richard Markham, or, rather, Richard Tyrrell, as we must henceforth call him, as the Perseverance, under the care of native pilots, advanced slowly up the Hooghly, on whose left bank stands Calcutta, the metropolis of British India.

Although the windings of the river, which is well wooded on either side, conceal the City of Palaces from the impatient traveller's sight till the ship has arrived within something less than a mile of anchorage, our hero and a young officer, with whom during the voyage he had contracted an intimacy which had gone far to ripen into friendship, had stationed themselves from the first dawn of day at the bows of the vessel, eager to catch the first glimpse of the tall spires and stately dome of the government house—landmarks which views and descriptions had already made familiar to them.

"There it is!" suddenly exclaimed Fred Wharton, pointing at the same time to the dome as it rose majestically to their gaze. "It can't be more than a mile from us."

"Above three miles," observed an old East Indian, one of their fellow-passengers, who happened to be standing near them. "It is the clearness of the atmosphere which deceives you. Between the shore and the city lies the Maidoun, the Hyde-park of Calcutta."

Having given them this piece of information, the speaker walked away. He had little sympathy either with their curiosity or expectations. He was returning to the scenes of the labour of half a life to finish his official career; the young men were only on the threshold of theirs.

"Do you not long, Tyrrell," demanded the officer, "once more to tread on land?"

"Intensely," replied Richard: "and yet I shall not part with the good ship Perseverance without a feeling of regret. During our long voyage I have brought myself to regard her almost as a living thing. In the tempest we experienced in the tropics, when I heard her timbers creak, her cordage strain like the nerves of a strong man in agony,—saw the heavily laden hull, half buried in the wrinkles on old Ocean's breast, then gallantly rise again upon the crest of some huge mountain-wave, toiling and winning her way, I felt as for a friend that suffered; and now that I am about to quit her," he added,—"part from her as from one who has rendered me good service, I can understand why sailors love their ship."

"You will soon forget the poetry of existence at sea," said his companion, with a smile, "in the hot chase of fortune."

"Fortune is not the only motive of my visit to India," replied our hero.

Here he suddenly checked himself, as he caught the eye of Lieutenant Marsh—who, during the voyage, passed as a mere acquaintance—fixed with a warning glance upon him.

"Your temperament," resumed the speaker, "is far more dreamy and imaginative than mine. I have marked you for hours pacing the deck at night, muttering strange words, as if disputing with some invisible antagonist, or gazing on the stars to interrogate them on the soldier's future career. May I not retort, and ask how far such dreaminess is compatible with the exertions necessary to rise in your profession,—to achieve rank and fame?"

"I must answer you in your own words," exclaimed his friend, not altogether pleased, perhaps, that his actions and disposition had been so closely observed. "Rank and fame are not the only motives of my visit to India."

There was a pause in the conversation. Each felt that the other had a secret locked in his own breast.

With our hero's motives the readers are already sufficiently acquainted; what Wharton's were they probably can guess.

The part of the vessel where the speakers were standing suddenly became crowded.

"By your leave, gentlemen," said the second mate, who, with a portion of the crew, began to make preparations for dropping anchor.

A dozen brawny arms were extended, tugging and straining to the accompaniment of a cheerful "Heave, ye-ho!" followed by a splash and the rapid running out of the cable, which had been coiled, like a huge serpent, on the deck. The bower anchor was dropped—the voyage at an end.

It is inconceivable in how short a space of time the ship was surrounded by boats filled with natives, some clamouring for employment, others offering baskets made of palm leaves and filled with fruits: the ficus religiosa, the pepul, another species of fig, pine-apples, melons, egg-plums, the cooling mangoe dried in the sun while yet green, and the dalim, or pomegranate, so frequently celebrated in the love poetry of the East.

The captain of the Perseverance was too old a seaman to permit any of these petty traders—proverbially the greatest thieves in India—to set foot on board his ship. The barter was carried on briskly by means of cords let down from the sides, to which the natives attached their baskets, when they were drawn up again, the sailors throwing them empty soda-water bottles—articles much prized—and the passengers money, in exchange.

In the midst of the confusion, screaming, quarrelling, and shouting inseparable from such a mode of transacting business, a boat with a European in the stern put off from the bank, and rowed rapidly alongside. The gentleman stepped upon deck, and shook hands with the commander.

"Why, it is scarcely a month," he exclaimed, "since we received our letters by the Overland Mail. Ten days, at least, before we expected you—short passage. Glad to see you."

"Thank you, Mr. Sanford," replied the captain.

Although he had schooled himself for the meeting, Richard started at the name. Fortunately his emotion was unnoticed by all but the lieutenant, who began to observe the visitor attentively.

The managing clerk of the house of Chutnee and Company appeared to be thirty-eight, or at the most forty years of age, and was rather good-looking than otherwise; an advantage, judging from his dress, he seemed perfectly aware of, for his costume would not have disgraced Bond-street or the Park. Light gray trowsers, evidently of European cut, fitted faultlessly over a well-made boot; even the fastidious Brummel might have worn the morning frockcoat—black, of course—which incased his wiry but not inelegant figure; whilst the waistcoat and gloves were of the same colour as his nether garment.

So much for the outward man, whose real portrait we find somewhat more difficult to sketch in a manner not to convey an exaggerated likeness to our readers.

Mr. Sanford's features, though regular, lacked both the refinement and harmony which constitute the type gentleman; and yet few would have ventured to pronounce him vulgar: sensual, perhaps, and something of a bon vivant. The true expression of his countenance was exceedingly difficult to catch, being so seldom in repose: an eternal smile upon the lips, and the eyes—blue, and small—restless as those of a newly-caged bird,—at one instant flashing carelessly, the next contracting the pupils, and concentrating their light into a glance piercing as if it would read you through.

As one of the letters he had alluded to concerned our hero intimately, we shall take the opportunity of giving an extract from it, for the benefit of our readers.

It was written by the head of the great Indian firm of Curry and Sons, to their correspondents in Calcutta, Chutnee and Company, to whom the good ship, the Perseverance, had been consigned.

After a detailed account of balances, commissions, consignments of indigo, and acceptances, followed by columns of figures perfectly unintelligible to any but City men, the writer proceeded thus:—

"I invoice you by the same ship"—the word "invoice" had been struck out and "send" substituted—"my ward, Richard Tyrrell, a youth in whose welfare I take great interest. The introduction may ultimately prove advantageous to you, seeing that he will one day become the possessor of an immense fortune, and has a decided inclination for commercial affairs. You will oblige me by paying him every attention, giving him a desk in your counting-house, and initiating him into business habits; also by honouring his draughts upon me, according to this, my letter of advice, to the amount of two thousand pounds per annum. Not that I, by any means, limit his credit to the above-mentioned sum: you need not, therefore, be alarmed if, at any time, he should wish to exceed it."

Mr. Herbert Chutnee read the letter of his valued correspondent twice, and carefully examined the signature. There was something rather unusual in a clerk being sent out from England possessed of such extensive private resources, and for several minutes he felt both surprised and annoyed.

"Must ask him to my house," he muttered: "can't do less. And yet—"

As British merchants in India are, generally speaking, exceedingly hospitable, it may be as well to explain at once the cause of the speaker's hesitation.

Herbert Chutnee, although in the sixtieth year of his age, had lately married a young and beautiful girl not yet out of her teens—the daughter of English parents, who, dying, had left her without fortune. Like most husbands between whom and their wives so great a disparity of age exists, the old gentleman was not only passionately fond of his bride, but inordinately jealous of her.

One word, however, in his correspondent's letter somewhat reassured him; it spoke of his ward as a youth; and he ultimately gave orders to prepare an apartment against his arrival, directed his managing clerk to proceed on board as soon as the Perseverance should arrive, and bring the boy on shore.

"By-the-by," said Mr. Sanford, as soon as the first congratulations with the captain were over, "you brought out a lad for us."

"A what?" demanded the commander of the Perseverance, glancing at our hero.

"A boy named Tyrrell, whom old Curry has consigned to us."

It was a pity the speaker did not notice the quiet smile which curled the lips of the party designated.

"There is Mr. Tyrrell," said the captain, with a marked emphasis upon the word "Mr." "I shall be happy to introduce you to him."

The two gentlemen advanced towards the bows of the vessel, where Richard and Fred Wharton were still standing together, and the ceremony of introduction was gone through.

"Not such a boy, after all," thought Sanford, as he shook the hand extended to him with a certain amount of cordiality; for he too had read the letter from the head of the great London firm, and indulged, probably, in more than one speculation as to the way the ward of the writer would spend his income—a task in which he had not the slightest objection to assist him.

The hero of our tale at the period of his arrival in India, although only eighteen, was tall, exceedingly well made, and gave promise in his finely-rounded limbs and breadth of chest, of great future strength. His features, as might be expected from his age, were still boyish, but regular and Antinous-like, in a certain seriousness of expression, unless when he smiled, or anger or indignation excited them, on which occasions few faces could be more joyous or animated.

Mr. Sanford, rather inclined to like his new acquaintance than otherwise. One thing, however, puzzled him—the decided resemblance to someone he had seen before. Fortunately, he could not recollect to whom.

Richard was like his father.

"You must allow me," said the managing clerk, in his off-handed, careless manner, "to drive you to the governor's. I mean old Chutnee's, your guardian's correspondent," he added, seeing that our hero did not quite understand him. "Hooker will see to your traps, and send them after us."

"With pleasure," replied the captain, turning to give the order to one of the mates to see to them.

The young traveller's adieux to Fred Wharton and the rest of his fellow-passengers were speedily made. He had previously taken a private one of the lieutenant. With a heart trusting in the success of his enterprise, he stepped into the boat, and in a few minutes set foot on shore.

A tilbury with a spirited horse, whose small head, distended nostrils eagerly sniffing the perfumed air, and delicate limbs, proclaimed its Arab blood, were waiting on the bank. So impatient had the animal become, that the syce, or native groom, could scarcely hold him in.

"Jump up!" exclaimed the owner of the vehicle.

In an instant our hero was seated, and the speaker by his side.

"That will do," said Mr. Sanford to the Hindoo boy; "let go his rein."

Off they started, at a rattling pace, the sycs following leisurely on foot.

The morning was a most lovely one, and mild, as it invariably is in November, after the four months' rains, when the thermometer rarely exceeds 70°.

Despite the busy thoughts which crowded on his brain—the heart-engrossing filial motives that brought him from England to India's land of dreams—the young adventurer much enjoyed the drive, which extended to a considerable distance along the banks of the Hooghly. It was another world to him, with an unknown vegetation waving in fairy-like beauty, spangling earth's carpet with a thousand flowers, above whose perfumed heads the various species of palms rose in regal grace. Nothing could exceed the wondrous contrast of foliage, whose darker shades were relieved by the bright leaves of the neem and the peepul. The magnolia and the babool are both common in the neighbourhood of Calcutta, and the golden-coloured buds of the latter scented the air for miles around.

The river was now left for the Maidoun—the plain lying between the stream and the city. Here the driver drew rein, to enable his companion to contemplate for an instant the receding banks, breaking occasionally into lofty promontories, clothed to the summit with trees, now sinking into graceful undulations.

"Beautiful!" murmured our hero.

"I dare say it is," exclaimed Mr. Sanford; "but I have seen it so frequently that I scarcely notice it now. The charms of a landscape we are familiar with are something like those of a wife."

"I do not understand you," said Richard.

"We cease to appreciate them," added the former, drily.

"Coarse," thought the youth.

"He is a boy, after all," mentally ejaculated the managing clerk, who had fully expected that a hearty laugh would reward what he considered the wit of his observation.

"The horse you drive is an Arab, is it not?" demanded the traveller.

"Right."

"How fleet and graceful!"

"Something like the women of the country, very showy."

"Our racers, I suppose, would stand but little chance in India," observed Richard, who did not choose to notice his last remark.

"There you are wrong," replied his companion, at the same time giving the animal the rein. "The superiority of the English thorough-bred is so well understood that we do not allow them to be entered on any of our race-courses. They'd beat everything," he added, "that ran against them. You seem fond of horses."

"Very."

"Are you a judge?"

"Only of what pleases me."

"I am," continued Mr. Sanford; "can't do me. Many have tried it on, but found it no go. Of course you will keep horses. With your means it would be ridiculous to hire a palanquin, or drive about in a buggy,—all very well for junior clerks or green griffs."

"May I ask what are griffs?" inquired our hero.

"It's the name we give to the cadets when they first come out," answered his new acquaintance, "who in return revenge themselves by calling us civilians Pekins. I shall be most happy," he continued, "to render you any service in my power—introduce you to a capital set of fellows; but you must keep your weather-eye open."

"Must I?"

"Some of them play high."

"I never play," observed the youth.

"Then, in the purchase of horses," resumed the elder, and, as he doubtless considered himself, far the more knowing speaker of the two, "can't be too careful. Nothing is so deceptive as a horse. Men whose bills upon 'Change are good for a million of rupees, think nothing of jockeying their own brother in the sale of one. Take my advice," he added, "never buy a horse of a friend, or purchase a horse without the advice of one."

"Provided he is a judge," observed his companion, greatly amused.

"That of course."

"And happens to be a little more honest than the vendor."

"Hem! Yes, certainly."

By the time the two gentlemen drew up at the residence of the merchant, directly opposite the Sudder Dowanee Adawlut, or supreme court of justice, Mr. Sanford began to doubt whether the greenhorn was really so very green as he had taken him to be.

Mr. Chutnee did not feel quite so satisfied when he beheld his expected visitor. He secretly wondered what his old friend and highly-valued correspondent Curry meant by designating him as a youth. He considered him a man in person, if not in years; and began to regret the hospitality he had proffered. To do him justice, however, he received him cordially, and directed the kahsumah, or butler, to conduct him to his apartment, where the bath was already prepared.

It was not till "tiffin," or luncheon, that our hero was introduced to the lady of the mansion, who, as is usual in India, did not quit her private apartment till a much later hour of the day. Instead of the middle-aged, matronly person, which, judging from the husband, he naturally expected to see, he beheld a beautiful girl reclining on a sofa near an open verandah. A Hindoo child, seated on a cushion at her feet, was busily engaged in arranging flowers, on which, from time to time, her mistress deigned to cast a languid look; while an ayah, in the picturesque costume of her country, stood at a short distance waving a fan of feathers, with a slow, graceful movement, above her head.

"Zamora," said Mr. Chutnee, "I have brought our expected guest to introduce to you."

His wife, without moving from her position, quietly extended her hand to her visitor, and in a low musical voice, bade him welcome to India.

Never had so much loveliness met the gaze of Richard Tyrrell; a loveliness that was heightened by the simple muslin dress without ornament of any kind, unless the single crimson bud where the folds crossed over the bosom could be considered one. We are of opinion that it might, for it contrasted both artistically and coquettishly with the pearly whiteness of her skin.

The face of the youthful bride—she had been married only three months—presented that perfect oval Raphael loved to paint—a type of beauty rarely seen out of Italy. The expression of its features in repose appeared somewhat cold. Few would have suspected, from the lady's habit of keeping her eyes half closed, the world of passion and sensibility veiled beneath their soft and drooping lids, or have read in her delicately but deeply chiselled lips, the energy and devotedness slumbering in her heart, dreaming as it slept,—feelings which a word, a look, might one day awaken.

When animated, the countenance of Zamora resembled the landscape of her own sunny clime, so full of light and life, with rich contrasts, laughing eyes, and jet-like hair, falling in massive curls down her pale cheek, not pale with the hue of sickness, but that pure, healthy, intellectual paleness poets and painters worship.

What the expression of her face might be in sorrow none could tell. Her tears had hitherto been so quickly chased by smiles, that, like the morning dew, they only added fresh perfume and beauty to the flower on which they fell.

One gift—and there are few of our male readers who have not felt its spell—the lady possessed to perfection.

"Her voice was ever soft,
Gentle, and low—an excellent thing in woman."

Soft as the song bird's note wooing its coy mate, or the murmuring wood dove's to her callow young.

"And what think you of India?" she demanded.

"I have scarcely had time to analyse my impressions yet," replied the young man; "everything is so new and strange to me."

"Analyse them!" repeated the lady, with a marked emphasis upon the word; "that is so like you men. Why seek to analyse them? All pleasurable emotions are as evanescent as these poor flowers. Pick them to pieces, and the spell is gone."

"The perfume of the flower lasts but for an hour," observed Richard, modestly.

"Well?"

The eyes of the fair speaker for the first time were directed towards him, pouring a flood of light that set his young imagination wandering.

"I could wish my pleasures to leave something for the heart to dwell upon."

A low musical laugh, joyous as that of a spoiled child, broke from the lips of the fair Zamora; and yet there was nothing mocking in its tone.

"Hearts!" she repeated. "What do men know about hearts?—selfish things!"

"Not all, I trust."

"All!" repeated his hostess, emphatically.

Here the merchant interrupted the conversation by observing that Mr. Tyrrell had letters to present, amongst others one to his Excellency the Governor—

General, and hinted that it was time to take his leave. Probably the husband of sixty did not admire the dissertation upon hearts.

"Letters!" said his wife, waving her little hand impatiently. "Yes, I understand—bits of paper by which Noodle One recommends some unfortunate victim to the kind offices of Noodle Two. But I am glad you have an introduction to the Governor," she continued, addressing herself to our hero: "Send it."

"Will that be respectful?"

"Quite; and what is better, convenient. I know the entire routine—the etiquette—of such affairs. You will receive in return an invitation to a stupid dinner and a pleasant ball. By-the-by, there will be one on the tenth. I shall be delighted to introduce you to the beauties of Calcutta."

"I thought," said Mr. Chutnee, "you had decided on not going."

"Had I?" demanded Zamora, listlessly.

"Positively."

"I have changed my mind, then," replied the spoiled beauty, in the tone of one who felt her will to be law. "Besides, Lady Bell Fourreau tells me that it will be the most splendid one of the season."

"I thought you disliked splendour?"

"So I do," replied his wife, looking round the room; "it costs so much."

The gentleman bit his lip in silence.

At this moment a servant entered the room to inform his master of the arrival of visitors.

Sir Charles Fourreau, the commander of the 61st, Lieut. Dawlish, and several gentlemen were below.

"I suppose I must see them."

"Of course you must," replied Zamora; "probably Sir Charles brings me a message from Lady Bell or dear Lillian?"

These were names perfectly unknown to our hero.

"Go," added the fair speaker; then, fearing that she had pained her husband, whose greatest fault was in having loved her, not wisely but too well, she playfully added, "and take Mr. Tyrrell with you."

The countenance of Mr. Chutnee cleared instantly.

"The opportunity of introducing him to Sir Charles is too valuable to be lost," said the mistress of the mansion. "You will like him, you must like him; he is such a fine soldierly fellow; no wonder his wife chose him in preference to the crowd of beaux who pestered her with their admiration."

Her husband thought she had never spoken so sensibly, or looked more lovely, since the day that made her his.

"And Dawlish?" said Richard, who felt amused and interested at the graphic style in which his fair hostess hit off the character of her friends.

"Oh, I have no opinion to give of him," replied the lady. "Chutnee does not like him; but, understand me, his feeling respecting him is not to be taken for an indication of mine. The women all think him handsome."

The merchant bit his lips.

"And is he?"

"Very handsome," answered Zamora; "and so is my little pet Tiny. Are you not?" she added, in a playful tone.

This was addressed to an Italian greyhound, reposing on a cushion in the verandah. On hearing its name the graceful animal sprang upon the couch of its fair mistress, and expressed its joy, barking and caressing her.

"There, that will do; down, Tiny, down!"

Our hero once more touched the delicate, childlike hand extended to him, and followed his host to the saloon, where Sir Charles and the visitors were waiting for them. From his wealth and high position in the commercial world, Mr. Chutnee was very much respected, and received in the best society of Calcutta, although only a Pekin.

CHAPTER XLII.

'Twas instinct then, that made me shudder as I looked upon him.

ORRESTES IN ARGOS.

"You have seen my wife," observed the merchant to his guest, as they quitted the room together; "and appear likely to become a favourite with her."

"She is very kind," replied Richard.

"And beautiful," observed the jealous husband, fixing his eyes upon him with an uneasy expression.

"Most beautiful!" exclaimed the youth; "in fact, the loveliest woman I ever beheld." Then blushing at the warmth into which he had been betrayed, he added, "I should not have presumed to make such an observation, perhaps."

"Why not?" demanded his host, affecting a gaiety he was very far from feeling.

"It may appear presumptuous—"

"Modest, or artful, which is it?" mentally asked Mr. Chutnee.

"In a mere boy," added the speaker.

The last observation dissipated for the moment any unfavourable impression, and the merchant began to think that the ward of his old friend and correspondent was not likely to prove, after all, a very dangerous inmate of his establishment, especially when he reflected on the womanly tact with which Zamora had divined his wishes, and avoided being left alone with him.

Jealousy is frequently represented as lynx-eyed: ought it not rather to be painted blind,—mistaking dreams for sight, sunlight for darkness?

Sir Charles Fourreau and the visitors in the saloon welcomed the introduction to our hero with true English cordiality; Dawlish alone held back, and acknowledged it by bowing somewhat stiffly, for he had heard of his friendship with Wharton.

"A young officer who has lately joined my regiment," observed the baronet, as he shook Richard warmly by the hand, "speaks of you enthusiastically. I trust to have the pleasure of cultivating your acquaintance."

Major Plinlimmon, struck by the manly appearance and unaffected bearing of the new-comer, invited him to dine on the following day at the mess.

"It is a pity you are not in the service," observed Dawlish, feeling that he must say something.

"Great pity," repeated the major, eyeing the well-knit figure and broad shoulders of the youth complacently.

"Why so, major?"

"It would have opened the government house to you," replied the first speaker, in a tone so delicately supercilious that, although the impertinence was felt, it was impossible to resent it.

"Mr. Tyrrell will not find the doors of his excellency closed against him," said Mr. Chutnee, who cordially detested Dawlish, "although he is a civilian."

"Indeed!"

"My young friend brought excellent letters of introduction with him."

"Of whose value," replied Dawlish, "no one can be a better judge than yourself."

"They were not all commercial ones," continued the merchant, delighted to annoy him. "I have known many a man esteem himself fortunate in being able to quit the service in India after thirty years' service on only half the income our young friend commences life with. His letters to the Governor-General," he added, "are from the Commander-in-Chief and the Chairman of the Company."

The lieutenant bit his lips, and began to consider whether it might not be worth his while to cultivate the friendship of our hero.

Here the visitors took their leave.

"I need not ask the impression your new acquaintances have made," observed Mr. Chutnee. "I can read it in your countenance. You like Sir Charles."

"I think him a perfect specimen of an English gentleman," replied our hero.

"And the major?"

"Kind-hearted, but impetuous and choleric."

"You have a quick perception of character," said his host. "There is but one more."

"I'd rather not express any opinion of that one yet," answered Richard, thoughtfully—a sure sign that it was unfavourable.

It was not without a vague sense of uneasiness that Dawlish beheld the brother of Alfred Wharton join his regiment, and for several days he watched him narrowly; but nothing could be more unpretending than the manners of the new-comer, or coldly polished than the few brief phrases which professional duty compelled them to exchange occasionally; but there all intercourse between them ended. Not a word or look on the part of Fred betrayed the slightest allusion to the past. An impenetrable veil seemed to hide his feelings—the recollection of the outrage, and the bitter sense of wrong which rankled in his heart. The tyrant of his school-days had much rather that he had betrayed impatience, appeared restless in his presence, and been less guarded in his language. The studied impassibility of his former victim annoyed him.

"Curse him," he repeatedly muttered to himself, "his presence will revive the old tale again, and occasion me all kinds of annoyance. If he would only once speak out fairly I should know how to deal with him."

But Fred Wharton did not choose to speak out, for fear it should defeat the cherished design of avenging his brother's death. The officers of the regiment would have pronounced it a boyish quarrel, an unfortunate affair, and justified his former oppressor in refusing to meet him on such grounds. It was necessary, therefore, to find another quarrel, in which his own conduct should be so irreproachable that no excuse might serve to screen the man whom he looked upon as little better than an assassin.

Dawlish at last began to mistake this guarded conduct for cowardice, and his confidence revived with the supposition.

"The fellow has heard that I am one of the best shots in the service," he concluded, "and is wisely determined not to compromise himself by alluding to the affair. I shall dismiss it from my memory."

This, however, was far more easily said than done. The "affair," as he heartlessly termed it, was not to be forgotten. It haunted him in his dreams, and not infrequently arrested the jest upon his lips, in his waking hours, especially if he detected the calm, thoughtful eyes of Wharton fixed upon him.

They reminded him of his brother's.

About a week after his arrival, Richard had been invited to tiffin at the mess of the gallant 01st. On rising from table, one of the officers proposed an adjournment to the riding-school, in order to try their skill at the target. This was the opportunity Dawlish so ardently desired of displaying his skill and overawing Fred; he therefore seconded the suggestion eagerly.

It was at once agreed to, and the major, who had a soldier's love for every martial exercise, accompanied them. The target was soon raised, and the choleric little Welshman commenced by making an excellent shot, which put him in great good humour.

"I don't think you need be ashamed of that," he exclaimed, complacently, addressing his subaltern.

Dawlish smiled. Plinlimmon's good humour vanished in an instant, and he turned exceedingly red.

"Certainly not," replied the duellist, perceiving the error he had committed.

"My hand is still steady, sir," observed the major, looking him very hard in the face.

"Exceedingly steady, major."

"Glad to hear you think so."

Here the speaker turned angrily away.

Dawlish called for a pack of cards, and selecting from it the ace of hearts directed one of the men to fix it in the centre of the target.

"You will never hit that," observed one of the officers.

The distance was thirty paces.

"Won't I?" replied the vainglorious marksman, at the same time raising his pistol slowly and firing. An involuntary burst of admiration broke from all present, except the two friends. The bullet had struck the card exactly in the pip.

"Hit it, by Jove!" exclaimed the major, forgetting his ill-humour in admiration of the shot.

Dawlish looked round him with a triumphant air, till his eyes encountered those of Fred. Could he believe the evidence of his senses? There was positively a smile upon his lips, and it stung him to the quick.

"Perhaps," he said, pointing to an exquisitely finished weapon—the fellow to the one he had so lately discharged—"Mr. Wharton will favour us with a specimen of his skill?"

"Willingly," answered the youth, taking up a revolver; "if you desire it."

"Not that!" cried several of his brother officers; "you will never hit the mark with that."

"It will suit me," was the reply.

The speaker fired six times in rapid succession. When the smoke cleared off there was a general laugh; but one bullet-mark appeared in the card.

"My dear boy," observed Major Plinlimmon, "that is not the way to fire. You must ask Dawlish to give you a lesson."

The gratified duellist bowed satirically as he assured the marksman of his willingness to do so.

"Take one, you mean!" shouted the senior captain from the bottom of the riding-school. "Never saw such a thing in my life!"

Great was the astonishment of every one present when the speaker informed them each of Wharton's shots had capped the one fired by Dawlish—that is to say, struck the mark in the same place. So extraordinary did it appear, they could not believe it, till examination proved the correctness of his assertion.

The major seized the hand of Fred and shook it warmly, as he pronounced him a credit to the regiment.

"You must have practised from your very infancy," he said.

"On the contrary," replied the young man, "four years since I had never pulled a trigger."

Dawlish turned exceedingly pale: it was exactly the period which had elapsed since the death of Alfred, and he began to suspect that he had mistaken the character of the speaker, with whom, from that day, he resolved to be doubly on his guard.

"It was, indeed, a wonderful shot," he said. "Mr. Wharton has evidently no need of my instructions."

"I should say not," observed the major, emphatically.

It was Fred's turn to bow ironically.

"I should like to make a match with you," added the duellist.

"Delighted."

"For a thousand rupees."

"For any stake you please."

"You have been admirably brought up," exclaimed Plinlimmon, who could not forget the shot.

"By my widowed mother, major," answered the young man.

"Evidently a strong-minded gentlewoman," said his superior officer, "who knew her duty to society, her country, and the army."

Our readers will please to recollect that these are the opinions of a cavalry officer of the old school, and not confound them with those of the author, who, like most writers in painting scenes of life, describes much that he disapproves of.

The party quitted the riding-school, the young men laughing thoughtlessly as they chatted over the amusement of the morning; the elder ones looking rather serious: they began to suspect that the scene which had been acted before their eyes had a hidden meaning, and naturally sought the key to the enigma.

Richard was more strongly impressed than any one of the spectators with this opinion, but he forbore to make any observation on the subject till he had reached the quarters of his companion.

"I am glad you took the conceit out of that fellow Dawlish," he said, as the burdar placed the hookah on the table before them.

Fred faintly smiled.

"I should not like to have a quarrel with you," added our hero.

"You might, with perfect safety."

"How so?"

"Because there is only one being in the world against whom I could ever be induced to employ the proficiency I have attained at the expense of so much time," answered his friend.

"And that one, I suspect, is Dawlish."

Wharton made no reply.

"I cannot comprehend this," exclaimed Richard, painfully impressed by his silence, "and must speak my thoughts, even at the risk of forfeiting your friendship. You have never deliberately acquired this devilish skill with the intention of—No, no!" he added; "forgive me—my thoughts have wronged you!"

"With what intention do you imagine Dawlish acquired his skill?" demanded Fred Wharton, calmly.

"His motives cannot justify yours," observed our hero. "Fred, this is some extraordinary hallucination of your better reason. There is something so horrible, so repugnant in your design, that reflection, I feel assured, must lead you to abandon it. If he has wronged you, leave him to that future to which we all are responsible. Why burden your youth with a remorse, or stain the nobility of your nature by a crime?"

"I have never yet sought a quarrel with him," resumed the young soldier, deeply moved. "But I am prepared for it."

"With the assassin's skill," answered his friend, reproachfully.

Wharton started from his seat, and paced the room in violent agitation. A terrible contest was taking place within him.

"You do not know the provocation I have received," he muttered, hoarsely; "the irreparable agony this man without a heart has inflicted on me—how bitterly he has wrung me. I had a brother—a generous, devoted brother. Dawlish murdered him."

"Murdered him!" repeated his horror-stricken hearer.

"Killed him for defending me."

"Leave him to justice, then."

"Justice!" interrupted the excited young man, passionately. "Think you it was one of those coarse, brutal acts which bring the perpetrator within the reach of laws! No: they fought at school. Alfred was predisposed to consumption, and—spare me the sickening details—he died and left me alone in the world. Had Dawlish expressed sorrow for the deed—felt it as he ought—as any one human would have done—I could have—yes, I think I could have forgiven him: Alfred did before he died."

"From that day," resumed the excited youth, "I devoted myself to acquire the skill you blame. At first I triumphed in the attainment of it, in the thought of striking the assassin—"

"And so becoming a murderer like him."

"Right! right! it would be murder," gasped his friend. "Fool that I am! the means by which I sought to secure retribution has baffled it; for it would leave my enemy without an equal chance of life. I have endeavoured to close my heart to the conviction, but in vain; conscience repeats, and reason confirms it."

"You abandon your intention, then?" said Richard, taking his hand. "I am sure you will: a soul like yours was never framed for crime."

"Yes," answered the young man, solemnly, and the cold drops which started on his brow bore witness to the agony the resolution cost him. "Unless provoked by such an outrage as, even in your opinion, will justify me, the life of Dawlish is safe."

"Thank heaven!" exclaimed our hero; "reason has triumphed over passion. Believe me, I feel your wrongs, and sympathize with all you have endured."

"Do not praise me," murmured Fred Wharton. "It is not for me to praise you," replied his friend.

"To your better angel, who witnessed the contest, belongs the right to hymn the victory."

Although it had been arranged, in order to avoid all suspicion on the part of Sanford, that our hero and Lieutenant Marsh should appear in society as mere casual acquaintances, they contrived to meet regularly and exchange notes of the several proceedings. Sometimes it was during a ride on the banks of the Hooghly; on other occasions at the club, or the saloons of their mutual friends.

Mr. Bently could not have made a more judicious selection of a guardian and adviser for his grandson. Marsh was one of those men whom disappointments had sobered, not soured; who, caring little for society, enter it with their eyes open, and keenly appreciate the tone and character of passing events.

Such a friend, to one so young and inexperienced, with only high principle and generous impulse to guide him, was indeed invaluable.

On the evening after the scene we have just described had taken place, Richard and his mentor met by appointment on horseback at the ghaut or landing place, on the banks of the river, directly opposite the ruined temple dedicated to the goddess Sheva. The sun was setting in a flood of golden light at the back of the crumbling fane, whose broad shadows extended to the marble steps leading to the water's edge.

Both drew rein at the same time, and stood for several minutes contemplating the landscape, whose foliage darkened into deeper and still richer hues as the parting orb descended.

"Well, Richard," said the ex-dragoon, after looking around him to ascertain that they were alone, "have you anything to communicate?"

"Unfortunately, nothing."

"And yet you have been regular in your attendance at the counting-house of Mr. Chutnee?"

"Not a day has passed without my spending several hours there," observed the young man; "but I have not obtained the slightest clue."

The lieutenant looked dissatisfied.

"You do not suspect me of indifference?" exclaimed the speaker.

"I could as soon suspect you of a crime, my dear boy," answered his friend. "If I appear disappointed and impatient, and I confess my feelings partake of both disappointment and impatience, it arises from the state in which I find this magnificent, but long misgoverned land."

"I do not understand you."

"India," continued the soldier, "is on the eve of a convulsion. An outbreak, a storm, to which the simoom's desolating blast is as the spring's first breath, threatens to overwhelm her; and yet our rulers, although daily—nay, almost hourly—warned, remain obstinately blind or impotently incredulous. You doubt my words, and smile at my prophecy," he added. "I am not the first who has acted the part of a Cassandra. All I dare hope is that our mission may be accomplished before the tempest breaks."

"You must cultivate the acquaintance of Sanford," continued his adviser, "more than you have hitherto shown an inclination to do—entertain his project of hiring the house he recommends: this will bring you in contact with its owner, Al Moorad."

"Willingly," answered Richard, "if you advise it; but I cannot see the utility of associating with the Hindoo merchant."

"If rascality has been committed, he possesses the clue to it," replied Marsh. "I have made inquiries, cautiously, of course, respecting his character. Like most of his countrymen, he is extremely avaricious; is only honest so far as the law compels him: in short, is one of those leeches which prey upon the unwary and inexperienced, on their first arrival in this country. Many a man, whose brow is frosted with age and service, is still toiling," he added, "to pay the penalty of having believed in the disinterested offers of Al Moorad."

"Such a man is capable of any crime," observed our hero.

"With the clue I have given, you need not fear him," observed the lieutenant.

At the word "fear" the countenance of his ward and pupil flushed.

"Understand me," added the speaker; "I speak of that fear which honour, integrity, and purity of heart may feel when first they come in contact with avarice, selfishness, and vice—the warning loathing by which virtue protects her image in the heart of youth. Now let us turn our horses' heads towards Calcutta. The theme has not been a very pleasing one; it is time we changed the subject."

"What can break the might of England?" demanded Tyrrell, referring to the previous observations of his friend. "Not the weak, effeminate Asiatic. In a contest it would be lead against steel."

"You forget," observed his friend, "that even lead becomes a fearful weapon when molten. I said shake, not break it. I still retain my confidence in the Saxon race. It is the suffering, not the end, I dread. I have been more fortunate than you."

"And discovered—"

"A thread—a hair—for I darescarcely call it a clue," interrupted Lieutenant Marsh. "Before quitting England your grandfather informed me that the securities stolen from his house in London were negotiated in India through the native firm of Mooze, Hafaz, and Moorad."

"Yes."

"Have you seen their names in any transactions with Chutnee and Company?"

"No."

"And yet you examined the books?"

"Most carefully."

"Of the three partners, when the transaction took place, one only now survives; the younger, Al Moorad, and he is the intimate friend of Sanford."

"The fellow he has been tormenting me to hire a house of!" exclaimed Tyrrell, "but I have not seen him yet; as if I were not much happier where I am."

"No doubt," observed the soldier, drily, "but that is not the point. The advice I am about to give you, must be followed to the letter; and yet it is the last I should offer, but for that iron yoke, to which we all must bow—necessity, for I fear it will prove distasteful."

"Not from you, my dear sir."

"You must make the acquaintance of Al Moorad, and watch him closely."

"It shall be done," answered our hero, with a sigh. (To be continued.)

MY FLORA.

TELL me, gentles, have you seen

My Flora pass this way?

That you may know the Miss I mean,

Her briefly I'll portray.

No bonnet on her head,

But on her neck she wears:

An oyster-shell, 'tis said,

In size with it compares.

Its shape no eye can brook,

Its use is doubtful, too;

It but imparts a barefaced look,

And brings much cheek to view.

Her dress may please the Swell,

For its swollen exuberance:

She looks a Monster Belle,

In such Big Ben expanse.

Those air-tubes filled with gas,

Might lift her to the moon;

The small boys mark it as they pass,

And screech out, "Ah balloon!"

A parasol she bears

For ornament, not use;

For comfort, gloves she wears

Too tight, and sleeves too loose.

Behind her hangs a hood

Just level with her chin,

An Indian squaw might find it good

To put a baby in.

Of her hair she shows the roots,

Sham flowers the rest conceal;

And she's crippled by her boots

With the military heel:

Streets off, you hear them stalk

Whene'er she ventures out;

And she seems to waddle more than walk,

Her hoops so sway about.

Her figure may be good,

But that no eye can tell;

A mere lay-figure would Show off her dress as well.

She may have ankles neat,

But they're concealed by skirt,

Which chiefly serves to hide her feet,

And gather up the dirt.

Then, gentles, have you seen,

My Flora this way come?

She cannot have unnoticed been,

She takes up too much room!

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

IMPULSE.

DANGERS OF IMPULSE.

On the outposts of the human soul a sentinel is stationed, whose duty it is to watch for danger. When faithful, it warns of both physical and moral danger. Its eye is as an eagle's, and its heart sensitive and easily alarmed. But, strange as it may seem, many youths have deemed it cowardly to listen to the warnings of the sentinel till he has ceased his cry, and the citadel has been overrun by enemies from without and within.

Youthful reader, are you one of this unwise number? Does the cry of this sentinel ring through the arches of your soul, warning of the danger of impulse, and rehearsing in your ears the miserable results of its impetuosities? If not, call him to duty; for above all things else, you need his friendly admonitions.

The dangers of impulsiveness are not chimerical. They are real, positive, and awful.

All very impulsive persons live perpetually among thorns. They do and say, almost daily, things that cause themselves, or somebody else, sore disquietude. When they are so stupid as not to see the improprieties of their own course, they may be causing frequent and deep wounds in the hearts of all who love them best. How often an impulsive person wounds the feelings of his truest friends! His thoughtless words, poisoned, it may be, with the gall-drops of a fit of anger or jealousy, envy or pride, or a momentary flash of displeasure, may cut like two-edged swords to the heart's core. Or, wanting that sweet refinement given by self-control, their very roughness and harshness may "grate horrible discord" in the ears of those that love him, and would gladly be charmed by his sweet words of wisdom and goodness.

UNGOVERNED PASSION.

How much unhappiness is thus caused by the uncontrolled waywardness of impulsive natures! If we were to probe the hearts of all refined and sensitive beings, and express what we should find, we should reveal a great world of misery that is at present unexposed to human gaze. In the secret, silent chambers of the purest, loveliest souls, these sorrows are felt, and felt with a keenness all unknown to less refined and sensitive minds. And what is worse, we thus cause our loveliest and most truly excellent friends to suffer. How mortifying is the thought that such friends are pierced with anguish, occasioned by our want of self-control, by the reckless impulses we nurse within us.

Go into the homes of men where the world's eye cannot enter, and see the desecration of love's hallowed sanctuaries; see companions estranged; see brothers and sisters living as strangers to each other, performing none of those little offices of love that are so sweet and delectable; see children growing up in an atmosphere of icy coldness, and learn the evils of ungoverned passions.

Go again into the world, and witness the strifes, animosities, quarrels, and deplorable scenes of neighbourhood disturbances, and another similar lesson may be learned. Friendships are broken, which long years of faithful confidence and good offices had cemented; and affections are estranged which a thousand cords of tenderness had bound. There is hardly a danger to which youth is exposed, to which the great avenue does not open from the fruitful source of passion.

Read the history of criminals, of all the most unfortunate classes of beings, and you will find that impulse was the rock on which they split. Their first digressions from rectitude were not premeditated. They were the work of haste, of thoughtless impetuosity. They were often yielded to as innocent, were even regarded as sprightly, as evidences of wit, or genius, or strong affection, and not unfrequently they have been imitated by admiring companions. There is a wild, untamed beauty about these impulsive feelings, that often cause youth to admire and imitate them. And they frequently have much the appearance of virtue in their exhibitions, when they are fast leading those who are nursing them on to ruin.

Look at the thousand sorrowful cases of intemperance, spread like wrecks on the ocean's bottom, all over the length and breadth of our land; look at the thousand victims of profligacy of both sexes still more disgusting and degraded; at the unfortunate victims of criminal desire and unhallowed passion who are a confirmation of what has been said. Almost every circle of youth exhibits examples of unbridled impulses. A want of reflection, of thought, of moral force, is visible almost everywhere.

RESTRAINT OF ANIMAL PASSION.

It is necessary that impulse should be held in check, that our animal passions should be put under restraint; necessary not only for our own happiness, or the happiness of those immediately about us, but for the welfare of the world. We talk of reformation, of progress; but little can be our advancement, till youth are taught a strong and vigorous resistance of the rude dominion of the passions. Here is the very place to begin. First of all come the appetites, the general feeders of animal desire. These are pampered in a thousand ways and forms from earliest childhood. They foster a pervading animalism. They stimulate the propensities. They feed the fires of passion. The influence of pampered appetite is a viewless miasma of disease, bringing the entire mind under its death torpor. To make a character what it should be, the moral and intellectual nature should be enthroned. The man should rule the animal. To establish and preserve such a government within us, is the noblest work of human attainment. To resist strong impulses, to subdue powerful passions, to silence the voice of vehement desire, is a strong and noble virtue. And the virtue rises in height, beauty, and grandeur in proportion to the strength of the impulses subdued.

SELF-GOVERNMENT.

One of the prominent missions of this age seems to be to develop the individual man. The individual in times past has been lost in the mass. Now he is beginning to be recognised. Man is a microcosm. He has a world in himself. He is an epitome of the universe. To develop a race, each individual must be developed. The development of the individual effects the development of the race. So the government of the individual effects the government of the race. Government is at the bottom of progress. The state or nation that has the best government progresses most; so the individual who governs best himself makes the most rapid progress. Progress is a necessary result of true government. The native energies of the human soul press it to activity. Activity is its primal law. When these energies are controlled, they rush onward in the path of progress with the celerity of thought. Nothing prevents their movement. Like the calm rolling river, they press onward, filling full the channel in which they are destined to move. No counter-currents of passion and back-eddies of disorderly impulse keep them back, or prevent their steady career.

Government is but another name for harmony; and harmony but another name for heaven. Mental harmony is the goal of human perfectibility. It is the balance of all the mental powers in subjection to the will. It is the result of the self-control we are so earnestly recommending. Individual harmony is necessary to effect the social harmony of the masses. We complain of the antagonism of society, the distrust, animosity, and degradation, which pervade the social compact. This is wrong; the fault is with the individual. The discord is in the single soul. Make the individual harmonious and you make the community harmonious. Is the water of the river bitter? It is so because the springs from the mountains send forth bitter streams. Clide not the river till the springs are sweetened.

Does society need reorganising? Is its present organisation base and antagonistic? It is because antagonisms exist in the individual. Organise society upon a closer basis; it will be but bringing firebrand in closer proximity with firebrand, and raising higher the flame of discord. Society is wrong in its organisation, fundamentally wrong. But it is so because of the wrong in its individuals. Our social organisation is on a level with the individuals composing it. Organise a true government in each individual soul; make harmony there and social harmony will follow, and follow just in proportion to individual progress.

Where shall we begin in the great reformation, except with youth? Society is daily passing into their hands. Its great concerns will soon all be theirs. To reform it they must reform themselves; to reform themselves they must control themselves. Reform means control. The drunkard reforms when he controls his appetite; the libertine, when he controls his passion; the thief, when he masters his covetous desire. The great work of human reform, in all its length and breadth, its height and depth, its magnitude and importance, is comprehended in the self-control here recommended to youth. Oh, youth of England! See you the vast importance of this enthronement of reason and conscience, this establishment of law and order within the realms where you are the rightful rulers? See you that your own prosperity, peace, and happiness, that the harmony and progress of the social compact, and the usefulness, power, and glory of your country, are to be measured by the degree of wisdom and moral force with which you control and direct the mighty and immortal powers which God has placed in your hands?

MY LAST BALL.

I ALWAYS hated balls. I may as well say at once that I am not pretty—not even good-looking. I am small, with small eyes, and neither a good figure, nor an attractive face. There, it is said.

Men don't ask me to dance as often as I would like. I have often sat for an hour talking to old Mrs. Grimsby about her daughters, who never miss a dance, or thinking how much I would like to be in my own room reading my favourite books, or playing with little Rosa down stairs in the drawing-room. When first I went out, I suffered more agony of mind than I can describe from the humiliation of being neglected, and especially from the cutting compassion of my girl friends; but I have got over that now, and balls only bore me.

Why do I go out? Good reader, if you had a mamma and a papa, and brothers and sisters, who refused utterly to believe you when you protested your dislike of society; if it were once or twice hinted to you that your wilfulness in staying at home was prejudicing your prospects of a "good settlement in life," you too would gulp down your squeamishness, and throw yourself under the wheels of the fashionable Juggernaut (I know this is an absurd and hackneyed expression, but let it pass).

I will not pretend that I did not know—when I promised mamma to go to Mrs. Schellering's ball on Tuesday—that John Hunt was to be there. I knew it perfectly, for he had told me so. I did not go to meet him, however, for he came to the house every other day to see me, and our quiet talks suited me far better than any ball-room conversation possibly could. Still I went, and I confess that I looked for him.

What suggested to me to examine his face more closely than usual I cannot tell: but I did scrutinise him, and I fancied—yes, I felt certain—that I saw a smile of triumph there.

"Is the fair recluse really here?" he asked, in a tone which certainly seemed to me to border upon a sneer.

"In the flesh, at all events," I answered, flippantly.

"For the spirit I cannot say as much."

"If the former will honour me with her hand for the next polka, we will try to conjure the latter."

All through the dance I fancied him saying to himself, "How self-sacrificing I am in dancing with this plain little creature, when I might have the belles of the room." Glances from lovely eyes which I intercepted on their way to his seemed to reflect the same thought. He was very agreeable, certainly; but then his agreeableness had an affability about it which almost enraged me.

At the close of the dance we walked through the rooms, and found ourselves sitting at last in a library window. I insisted in vain on his going to dance. He made the usual civil reply, but I could see in his face that he was dying for some one to take me off his hands. There was a cutting sarcasm—at least, I fancied so—in every word he uttered. My feelings at length became so ungovernable that I was ready to cry.

If there was a man I despised it was Fitz-John Q—. He was, or is, a type of the under-bred, coarse, cunning, fashionable "swell." Still I knew him very well; and seeing him pass that way I called him, and pretending that I had something to say to him, asked him to take me off. I felt a mountain-load off my heart when I was alone with him. It was a real pleasure to see his agony at my clinging to his arm. He had engagements, no doubt, which I prevented his fulfilling; but he was so coarse and vulgar that it was delightful to torture him.

John Hunt was in the middle of a story about an adventure of his in the Alps when I left him. He had got as far as where, in pursuit of a chamois, his guide told him that "four feet further on that ledge and he would be a dead man." Had it not been for my thorough consciousness that he was only telling the story in order to increase my obligations to him, I should have been greatly interested.

Half an hour, at least, after the interruption of the story by my departure, I passed the library window. He was there still! Sitting on the same seat, looking out through the half-opened window into the darkness, with a very sombre and gloomy look. He was so handsome—so intellectual.

"Wouldn't you like to sit down?" said my cavalier, Fitz-John, in his increasing desire to get free.

"Not for the world!" said I; and I began to interest the little creature by telling him fanciful stories of the impression he was making on the ladies of our set, till he really enjoyed my society. I began to be perfectly happy, and to enjoy the ball thoroughly. When I caught, at our next turn, John Hunt's eye severely fixed on our two laughing faces I was almost cured of my aversion for society.

I liked it still better when, a few minutes afterward, I noticed John Hunt dancing the Lancers with one of the prettiest girls in the room. She looked so happy—well she might be! He was enjoying himself at last.

Little Fitz-John finally got his liberty, and ran to the refreshment-saloon to recover his spirits. I then fell to the care of Judge —, of the Common Pleas, who, with his gray hairs, makes it a point of duty to "do the civil" to some one lady at every ball. I sat down where I could see the dancing, and while the judge was explaining to me the merits of some promise-of-marriage case, I watched John Hunt dance with three or four ladies, after which he returned to his first partner—the very pretty girl I have mentioned—and, after a dance, walked through the rooms with her on his arm. It suddenly flashed upon me that I had heard, long before, that she was rather disposed to like him. There certainly was something very marked in her way of listening and talking to him. She was so pretty, too.

When they disappeared, I made the judge take me through the rooms; and there, in the identical library window, were John Hunt and his partner, my friend Emma B—, in close conversation. I began to be very angry.

The judge left me to go home at an early hour. I could see nothing of John Hunt. I knew that he was still at the same window with his companion. Mortimer Craddock sat down beside me. I ought to have said before that he was an old friend—a very sensible man of thirty-five, with an ample fortune, and unmarried—a well-known catch, in short. He had, at one time, been supposed by my family to have a partiality for me; but I had always regarded that as a delusion.

This evening he began to converse very earnestly on serious matters. He talked about my family, and my affection for them; about himself, and his weariness of the life he led; and so on. I answered mechanically. Neither John Hunt nor his companion had reappeared in the ball-room.

I asked Mr. Craddock to take me through the library, as I found the air of the ball-room rather close. There, in the same corner, were John Hunt and Emma. She actually had her hand in his, and I saw him draw down the curtain, to hide them as we passed.

It was very quick and sharp, that knife-thrust through my heart; but it was soon over.

We went to supper. By the time we returned (John Hunt and his friend were standing outside the door of the supper-room, and gazed very earnestly at us as we passed) I was in tolerable spirits.

"Miss Blanche," said Mortimer Craddock, when we took our seats on a sofa in a deserted room up stairs, "this is perhaps neither the place nor the time to make the avowal which is on my lips. But I have waited a long time, and as I do not expect an answer now, it matters little when or where you hear it. I love you. I wish to make you my wife. I would try to make you happy. I think I could. Will you marry me?"

Without a moment's hesitation, I answered, "Yes."

"Miss Blanche," pursued Mortimer, slowly and gravely as before, "I am not a young man. I have very little romance in my character. Permit me to ask you to withdraw that answer of yours. I should feel happier if it had been preceded by more reflection."

"This is trifling with my feelings!"

"On the contrary, I do not wish you to hazard your happiness without ample consideration. This day month I will ask you for an answer."

So saying he left me. I was a little bewildered. I had never had an offer before. Mortimer Craddock I had never thought of in the light of a lover. Now, it seems, I was engaged.

I was trying to make out whether the chandelier which overhung the room had been raised or lowered to its present position, when I was startled by a "Blanche, darling!" in my ear.

It was John Hunt's companion—the pretty girl—my friend Emma.

She had come, of course, to confide in me her triumph, and to enjoy the little feminine satisfaction of sympathising with me—for she knew how regular a caller John Hunt was at our house. I put on my liveliest and kindest manner.

"Well, dearest Emma, you have enjoyed the ball?"

"Very much, indeed; and you?"

"Excessively."

"Has Mr. Craddock been amusing?"

Strange to say, during the first words of our conversation, the startling avowal he had made had passed away from my mind; at the mention of his name it rushed upon me, and I blushed scarlet.

"Why," said she, laughing, "one would suppose there was something between you! Blanche, dear, don't look so cross. I have a secret for you. I have made all sorts of promises not to tell it; but I couldn't keep it if my life hung upon the balance."

I knew the secret very well. She was going to say she was engaged to John Hunt. So I answered, with as much of a smile as I could muster, and holding my breath—

"I am ready to hear it."

"You know John Hunt?" I nodded, and a sickening sensation came over me. "Well—he is going to propose to you to-morrow!"

"Say that again," I gasped, in a cruel agony, and doubting whether I had heard her correctly. She repeated the same words.

"Too late, too late!" I sobbed, and felt as though my heart would break.

I fainted, I believe. At all events, the next recollection I have is of being surrounded with kind people near an open window, and of seeing—of all others—John Hunt's face, very anxious and very pale, on the outskirts of the little throng which crowded around me. I shut my eyes. I could not look at him. I went home directly, wishing that I was dead.

When I awoke next morning the following note was handed me:—

"Mr. Mortimer Craddock presents his compliments to Miss Blanche—, and begs to say that, circumstances obliging him to leave the country for a period of years, he is under the necessity of withdrawing the inquiry which he made last evening. He hopes he may be permitted to tender his best wishes for Miss Blanche's happiness in life."

"Wednesday morning."

That day, as Emma had said, John Hunt called, proposed, and—was accepted. I have only just learned that Mr. Craddock, who had remained in the ball-room, had overheard the conversation between Emma and me. I suppose there was no mistaking the tone in which I cried "Too late!"

Inventions and Science.

PREVENTION OF DRAUGHTS FROM DOORS AND WINDOWS.—This simply consists of a slight beading, screwed or nailed round the door-frame, with a narrow slip, or ribbon, of vulcanised india-rubber, fixed in a groove at an angle, so as to form an elastic spring to press against the door when closed, and thus to make the joints air-tight all round. The beading at the foot of the door is so hinged and affixed to the door itself, as to open much like one of the pieces of a parallel ruler, only protected between the two slips, and having a spring between its two pieces and the india-rubber ribbon running along the outer edge, so that as the door closes, a protruding heel of the bead, as it were, is caught by the frame and pressed so as to open the parallel slip and cause its rubbered edge to press upon the floor or carpet, thus efficiently preventing all access of air or draught. Not only draughts, but dust and noise can thus be readily excluded, either by windows or doors. The beading can be had, it appears, either by the foot or yard, or applied where wanted.

USE OF COAL TAR.—A discovery of importance to horticulturists has just been made by a gardener near Bordeaux. The frames in his garden required painting, and, knowing that black was a better colour for attracting heat than any other, he made use of some coal tar which he had purchased at the gas-works, instead of common paint. Since the operation, which took place about two months ago, the gardener has found that all the spiders and other insects which had before infested his frames had disappeared, and the plants which had become feeble, are now perfectly strong and healthy.

VALUE OF THE WILLOW.—The importance of the willow to man has been recognised from the earliest ages, and ropes and twigs were probably among the very first human manufactures in countries where these trees abound. The Romans used the twigs for binding their vines, and tying their reeds in bundles, and made all sorts of baskets of them. A crop of willows was considered so valuable in the time of Cato that he ranks the salicetum, or willow-field, next in value to the vineyard and the garden. In France the leaves, whether in a green or dried state, are considered the very best food for cows and goats; and horses, in some places, are fed entirely upon them from the end of August till November. Horses so fed, it is stated, will travel twenty leagues a day without being fatigued. In the north of Sweden and Norway, as also in Lapland, the inner bark is kiln-dried and ground, for the purpose of mixing with oatmeal in time of scarcity. The bark of the willow and the leaves are astringent; the former is much used in tanning.

TEA-PARTY POLITICS.

I AM glad you are getting acquainted,
I knew you'd be struck by her charms;
But don't say I told you she "painted,"
We're on such very intimate terms.

She's had sweethearts, of course, by the dozen,
"Engagements," some dozens of girls;
But one can't say sharp things of one's cousin—
We're on such very intimate terms.

Of course you are charmed with "the Heiress,"
Whose "grace" is all wriggle and squirms;
They say she's engaged to young Morris—
They're on such very intimate terms.

Her smile 'twould bewilder a nation,
Or break ten poetical firms;
But I know it is all affection—
We're on such very intimate terms!

There's that snaky-eyed belle from the city,
Whose "dad" deals in blubber and sperms,
You'll think her both pretty and witty,
'Till you get upon intimate terms.

And that widow-bewitched, who will weave all
Her weeds into bean-etching forms;
But then we are sisters (in Eve) all,
And must keep on intimate terms.

And thus the "inquiring" stranger
Gets "cramm'd" by those gossiping firms;
B. Biting and D—g—in the Manager,
Who will keep on intimate terms.

But one soon puts 'em "down" if one chooses—
I've a rule to dispel all their "charms;"
Cut each jade, and with those she abuses
Grow at once upon intimate terms!

Chemical Experiments.

WE will this day amuse ourselves with some operations of dyeing and calico-printing, not that we can prosecute these beautiful arts very far, owing to more than one impediment. Firstly, I shall have to bear in mind that many people who read what I write may not have chemical substances at their command, without purchasing them; and though any dyestuffs may be purchased in this civilised land of ours, nevertheless, they cost money. Let us begin with indigo; and, first of all, let us dye with indigo a piece of woollen cloth—a bit of white flannel, for instance. Observe, firstly, that indigo will not dissolve in water; at least, not blue indigo. This circumstance considerably limits the application of the substance, but is conducive to permanency of colour when once imparted.

Strong oil of vitrol dissolves indigo, and generates what is designated by the name of Saxon blue. It is a very useful colour, fixing itself upon woollen without any difficulty; but it does not fix well on cotton or linen; wherefore, in the cotton printing operation, when indigo is employed, a particular process must be had recourse to. In order to make Saxon blue, a piece of indigo must be rubbed in a wedge-wood or glass mortar, with enough oil of vitrol to form it into a paste; this paste being incorporated with water, a piece of white woollen tissue dipped into the latter, a deep blue dye colour is permanently imparted; the sort of colour, indeed, we find in many kinds of blue woollen cloth. Saxon blue, moreover, is employed in the process of dyeing black hats. Every person in the slightest degree acquainted with the harmony of colour is aware that a dead black is very ugly. Most of the blacks we see in fabrics have been dyed on blue for a ground. You will perceive on trial that pieces of woollen fabric dipped into a solution of Saxon blue are permanently dyed. They may be washed, or even boiled, with water, and the colour will remain; not so, however, with respect to linen or calico, as on trial you will soon discover. Indeed, linen is a most ungracious fabric for the reception of any sort of dye.

I will show you now how cotton fabrics may be dyed with indigo. Firstly, we must render the indigo soluble, which we do in a very peculiar way.

Take a lump of indigo, about the size of a bean, grind it in a mortar with an equal bulk of lime and sulphate of iron (the latter you had better ask for under the name of green copperas). Throw the whole into a small physis bottle, fill the bottle with water, cork it, and place it in a warm place, as, for example, the hob of a fireplace, for some hours. Gradually you will perceive the original deep blue of the indigo has given place to a green, more or less light in colour. This greenish liquid holds indigo dissolved, which becomes blue on exposure to the atmosphere; and, in becoming blue, also becomes insoluble. So it follows then, that if a piece of cotton tissue, calico, for instance, be immersed in this partly decolorised indigo, and subsequently exposed to the air, a permanent blue is the result.

This is a very beautiful process, without which cotton cloths could not be dyed with indigo. Its use is attended with difficulties, however, in the process of calico printing. It is easy enough to impart an indigo ground, but when indigo patterns on ground of some other colour is required, the case is far more difficult, owing to the rapidity with which decolorised and soluble indigo changes to coloured or insoluble indigo when brought into contact with atmospheric air.

Cotton-printing experiment.—Having dyed a piece of calico blue in the manner just described, washed out all superabundant colour, and dried the tissue, I will show you how to remove white patches from it by an ingenious bleaching process. Take some powdered chloride of lime, mix about a spoonful of it with water; next add a few drops of spirit of salt (not more than a few drops, however, or the resulting smell will be very offensive). This done, take a portion out on the end of a glass rod or a piece of wood, and dropping it on the fabric, the indigo blue will be bleached and leave a white spot. Here it may be remarked that one of the most usual methods of making white spots on coloured calico grounds—whether the colour be blue or otherwise—consists in discharging the original colour by means of bleaching agents.

I will next show you how to make scarlet spots on a black ground. Take a few chips of Brazil wood, pour boiling water upon them and make an infusion; or still better, boil them with water in a saucepan, and make a decoction. Next procure some acetate of iron; or what is still more instructive, make it by keeping some vinegar in contact with bits of iron for a few days. The third substance, however, I shall have to mention, you must purchase under the name of dyer's muriate of tin. The ingredients being at hand, as already described, boil a piece of calico with acetate of iron; next remove the calico, dry it, and when dry, immerse it into the Brazil wood-decoction; the tissue will become black. Remove it from the decoction, wash it in pure water, and dry it. Next, dropping a drop of muriate of tin upon the tissue, a scarlet spot will be generated; and you will easily perceive how scarlet patterns might be depicted on black grounds, if means were devised for laying on the muriate of tin by a stamp.

Notwithstanding the variety of colours to be seen upon a piece of printed calico, comparatively few of the colours in question are laid on directly. Many patterns are generated by bleaching the original tint out, to use an intelligible word, or by a discharge process, to use the term employed amongst calico printers. Other patterns are made by stopping out, in a manner which you will readily understand. If before immersing a tissue into a dye solution, certain patches of the material be covered with a hard paste, through which the dyestuff cannot perforate, then necessarily there will be a white spot.

Many patterns are again generated by changing the original colour into another colour by contact with a chemical material; as, for example, the black of Brazil wood, and acetate of iron by contact with muriate of tin into scarlet. I may remark, that most probably a process of cotton printing, not materially different to that employed by us, was known to the ancient Egyptians, whom Pliny describes as using a wonderful sort of dyeing process, by means of which a tissue dipped into one liquid came out in patterns of different colours.

HOGARTH.—The great moral satirist, Hogarth, was once drawing in a room where many of his friends were assembled, and among them a very young woman. As she stood by Hogarth, she expressed a wish to learn to draw caricature. "Alas, young lady," said Hogarth, "it is not a faculty to be envied. Take my advice and never draw caricature; by the long practice of it I have lost the enjoyment of beauty. I never see a face but through a distorted medium; I never have the satisfaction to behold the human face divine." We may suppose that such language from Hogarth would come with great effect; his manner was very earnest, and the confession is well deserving of remembrance.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT HON. THOMAS BABINGTON LORD MACAULAY. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAULL & POLYBLANK.

LORD MACAULAY.

THE elevation of Thomas Babington Macaulay to the peerage is a graceful compliment to literature. The army, the navy, the pulpit, and the bar have their representatives in the House of Lords. The road to such honours is open to all the members of these professions. Literature, art, and science have been scarcely recognised, and much of the versatile genius of our age and country has been utterly neglected by the state. Indeed, such distinction as titles of nobility can bestow, is of little importance to those great and gifted men, who, like Macaulay, have won for themselves an undying and universal reputation. Genius possesses a nobility of its own, shining bright and calm as the stars of heaven, its glory is neither diminished nor increased by the names by which it may be called. At the same time it indicates right feeling and a proper appreciation of the power of genius when honour is rendered to its possessor, and rewards which the state can bestow are freely given.

In general literature Macaulay holds the highest place. He is a ripe scholar, a rhetorician of great power, a statesman of no ordinary ability, a lyrical poet, and historian. Surely such a man is worthy of a peerage!

Lord Macaulay was born in the year 1800, at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire. He graduated at Cambridge, was elected to the Craven scholarship in 1821, gained a fellowship in 1822, and was called to the bar in 1826. In 1830 he was appointed a Commissioner in Bankruptcy, and obtained a seat in the Commons. He subsequently figured as secretary to the Board of Control, and in 1834 proceeded to India, and was about three years a member of the Supreme Court at Calcutta. In 1839 he accepted the office of Secretary at War. In the following year he was elected member for the city of Edinburgh. In 1846 he was appointed paymaster to the forces, with a seat in the cabinet. He lost his seat for Edinburgh in 1847. In 1848 he was chosen Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow. In 1849 he was nominated Professor of Ancient History in the Royal Academy. In 1852 he was re-elected for Edinburgh. In 1856 resigned his seat; and in September, 1857, was raised to the peerage.

But the life of Lord Macaulay, as a statesman—versatile as are the offices which he has filled, laborious as are the duties which he has discharged—conveys but a very inadequate conception of his ability, or of the extent of the work which he has accomplished. He has won laurels enough in the forum and the senate to satisfy ambition, but his eminent success as an orator and a statesman are eclipsed by his reputation as an author.

Before he was called to the bar he had entered on his literary campaign. He had contributed several poems to "Knight's Quarterly Magazine," and to a periodical called the "Etonian." In 1826 his success as an essayist was established by his article on Milton, in the "Edinburgh Review."

Lord Macaulay's best contributions to "Knight's Quarterly" are "Lays of the Roundheads" and "Lays of the League." Like Scott, says one of his critics, vaulting between Claverhouse and Burley, and entering with equal gusto into the souls of both, Macaulay sings with equal spirit the song of the enthusiastic cavalier and that of the stern Roundhead. His "Lays of Ancient Rome" are said by some to fall under the same category, and to indicate that the artist's sympathy was more with poetry than principles.

The essays, of which "Milton" was the finest, are singularly brilliant—so brilliant, indeed, that the imagination is intoxicated and criticism disarmed. "Milton" was his first-born—the beginning of his strength. It was gorgeous as an eastern tale. His article on Croker's "Boswell" is written in his strongest sarcastic vein—withering up Croker, scorching Boswell, and even touching Johnson himself. His paper on Byron is light and sparkling; and in the essay on Bunyan he discourses most eloquent music of the poor preaching tinker, who in Bedford Gaol composed that immortal book, the "Pilgrim's Progress." His visit to India suggested those magnificent sketches of Clive and Hastings, which have added so much to their author's fame.

His English History is usually considered his best production. It is minute, curious, learned; sparkling with genius, warmed by enthusiasm, and abounding in grandeur of description. His parliamentary career, official insight, lengthened experience, and extensive reading, eminently qualify him for this work;

SUNDAY MORNING. FROM A PAINTING BY WILLIAM COLLINS, R.A.

SUNDAY MORNING.

SUNDAY morning in the country is more pleasant and peaceful than Sunday morning in town. There is, or there seems to be, a hallowed serenity over everything, in harmony with the sacred associations of the day. The broad, green fields, in which horses, loosened from the plough, are enjoying the warmth of the sunshine, and the sweetness of the grass, together with the lounging kine, blinking their dreamy eyes in the light; the silvery stream, that murmurs around the motionless wheel of the old mill; and the long herbage and the wild flowers that bend before the clover-scented wind; the rustics, in their Sunday clothes, encountered here and there upon the country road, enjoying the luxury of doing nothing, the sunburnt children who are not so noisy in their sports to-day; the distant chiming of bells, spreading their Sabbath music over the land, all increase the calm and peaceful delights of a Sunday in the country.

Going to church in the country is far pleasanter to the senses than turning into a pent-up edifice—no matter how splendid its architecture—in a populous city. To walk between the sweet-smelling hedgerows, to look on the smooth, velvety fields dotted with cattle, or the upland, with golden crops ripening for the sickle, or the distant winding of a river, or the cluster of poor men's homes, or the old farm, or the old pond shadowed by old trees, where the horses cool their fetlocks in the dusty summer, or to walk through the corn-fields on the Sabbath day—is far more likely to attune our hearts for worship than the sights and sounds of a city street.

And then what a delightful place is an old country church, with its square tower, its casement windows, through which the trees are peeping all the service-time, and its plain simple fittings, old and worn, suggestive of those worshippers whose quaint epitaphs are carved on the stones outside.

Going to church on a Sunday morning in the country is the subject which the artist has chosen for the exercise of his genius. It is a very simple subject, naturally treated, and consequently very attractive. Simplicity and nature have charms which elaborate artifice can never equal.

Filial tenderness is a marked feature in the picture. The aged woman, supported by her children, is going to the old church, where she worshipped when she was a girl, and where she was married. Dobbin is to bear her on the journey, and is fitted with a pillow for that purpose. He looks as if he was not unmindful of the attentions of his little playfellow. Final preparations are being made for the start. One boy is placing a chair to serve his granddame for a mounting-block, a girl busies herself with the adjustment of her brother's boot-lace, the young gentleman, so honoured, holds his prayer-book in his hand, while his more careful sister has placed her books in a handkerchief, so as to wrap them up neatly and save the covers.

An umbrageous perspective stretches out before the observer, and two or three people are seen upon the road; while the white tower and spire of the old church are defined against a background of green trees.

There is an indescribable charm about the picture; it is one of those productions which suggest more than they display. It reminds us of similar scenes, recalls bygone events, and wakes up old memories, deep and tender.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XXII.

Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased;
Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow;
Raze out the written troubles of the brain,
And with some sweet oblivious antidote
Cleanse the foul bosom of that perilous stuff
Which weighs upon the heart?—SHAKESPEARE.

ADA grew very pale as Ellen's fleet ponies carried them swiftly towards the scene of the last night's murder; but before they reached the "Good Intent" Ada exclaimed, "Surely that is Mr. Goodman!" and Ellen drew up to speak to him.

He was evidently watching for their approach. He was dressed as he had been the night before; but he did not look so bright, and fresh, and spruce.

His eyes were red, his cheeks pale, his open brow clouded with care,—anxiety had made him look almost old and haggard. He had spent the whole night at the station-house with Tippling Ben. And such a night,—when that miserable being had slept off the stupefying effects of the drugged liquor he had swallowed (and how much of the liquor the poor imbibed was drugged with deadly, maddening poisons), Jem Goodman had the dreadful task of enlightening his still muzzy and bewildered mind as to what had really happened.

Ben had a notion that he had done something very savage and very dreadful; but he did not know what, or if he did, with that sort of cunning which belongs to clouded intellects—(whether clouded by intemperance or idiocy)—he pretended not to know that he had even assaulted his wife.

Whether his ignorance was assumed or not, his agony of mind when compelled to realise the hideous, ghastly fact that he had killed his Esther, was only too real.

The policemen in attendance, and who were answerable for his safety, and who dreaded his attempting his life, insisted on his being handcuffed.

It was partly through their kindness and intercession, and partly through the high character and well-known philanthropy of Jem Goodman, that the latter was allowed to spend the night in Tippling Ben's cell at the station-house. It was, indeed, a terrible night. For Ben's remorse was now vented in wild, fierce cries, now (as he thought of better days and early love) in a low wail, or choking sob.

Now, he reproached Jem Goodman, bitterly reproached him, that he had not forced him to give up strong drink; and then he thanked and blessed him, and, but for his handcuffs, would have hugged him for his constant kindness to poor Esther and the little ones.

The little ones! There was another dreadful thought. Poor little Nussy, he remembered her pleading for her mother and the baby. He never knew before how he loved his blue-eyed Ben. Often in the surly, gloomy reaction and nervous irritation that at morning succeeds to a night of drunkenness, he had cursed baby Ben's clamorous outcry for more than the miserable mother had to give him. How he wished he could hear that cry now. Once he had struck the child in the mother's arms; that was the only time Esther's anger had been fairly roused against him, and then, with flashing eyes and flushing cheeks, she had told him that he was a coward, a brute, a beast, and that she bitterly repented she had disobeyed her father, and slighted her brother Natt's warning, and she wished she had never seen his cruel face; and he had slunk off abashed.

Jem Goodman gave him what comfort he could about the little ones. He told him Apple Blossom was nursing blue-eyed Ben, and that little Nussy had slept warm and snug between Merry Blossom and little Hope Evermore.

"Aye," said the wretched Ben, "warmer than she's slept of late in our poor, bare hole, since I forced poor Esther to pawn the good warm blankets her old maiden-aunt had left her when her marriage, and the large knit lambs'-wool counterpane for winter, and silk patchwork for summer, the old lady had worked at so many years, and left by will to her pretty niece named after her; and who, poor vain old body, she thought the picture of herself. They were all left by will to Esther for her bridal bed; and I made her pawn 'em all; and I've never lied warm since. She stood out a long time, and cried bitter, she did; but I'd had a drop too much, so I swore at her; and the landlord came threatening for his rent, and so she pawned them to pay the rent. But I, brute that I was, got hold of the money, and drank! drank! For three days and nights I never went home; and the landlord put in a distress. O Esther! dear, blessed wench!" he cried, "thou'rt better off now. 'Thine was a bitter lot, indeed! Thy brother Natt said to thee, when first thou toldst him we kept company, 'As thou mak'st thy bed, so must thou lie on it, lass!' And that was when Esther Stone was the pride of the old village of Stoneleigh," he added, sobbing bitterly.

"The baby took kindly to Apple Blossom," said Jem Goodman, trying to comfort him, and turn his thoughts a little. "She'd buried her own baby the day before; and she's such a nursing mother! Little Ben'll pick up, now; he looks as fresh as a rose this morning."

"She ain't a better nuss than my poor gal wor with her fust, and would have been with her last, but for me and the drink,—cuss us both!"

Poor wretch! he was proud of what she had been. She, whom he had slain; she, who lay cold and stiff, and the ghastly gash in her temple! The wife's mortal remains awaiting the verdict, on which, in all probability, the husband's life depended!

"I wished to see you, miss," said Jem Goodman to Ada, "to tell you not to be confused or daunted. Of course I don't wish you, as I know you would not for the world, to say one word in Ben's favour, out of favour to him, or to save his miserable life; but not to be bullied by her brother or worked upon by the piteous things he, poor fellow, says, to refrain from telling the jury boldly that you are sure Ben did not mean to kill his wife—leastways, if such is your conviction, miss."

"That is indeed my conviction, Mr. Goodman," said Ada, earnestly.

"Why is Esther's brother so anxious Ben should be found guilty?" asked Ellen.

"Well, miss," said Jem, "it's partly human nature, and what a grand writer calls 'the wild justice of revenge,' but it's partly his own nature, too. There were but those two, Natt and Esther Stone, and only a year between them. Old Stone was a farmer, and a widower; his wife died at Natt's birth. He was well-to-do; and the brother and sister were like love-birds, so fond. Esther, being a year older than Natt, was a little mother to him. He doated on her. He was a poor hump-backed fellow, violent in love and hate, as such generally are; delicate, too, and not fit to play with rough boys, who called him 'My lord,' and 'Humpy,' and 'Hunchback,' and made fun of him. One of these was Ben Darrell; but he soon gave over chaffing Natt to please Esther, and licked the boys that bullied Natt, too. And in time he was, from being employed to 'keep birds,' as it's called in Somersetshire, taken as farm servant by old Stone; and when Esther was seventeen, she, the prettiest, neatest lass, and he, the handsomest, best-grown lad in the place, fell in love with each other. Old Stone wouldn't hear of its being a match, and Natt, he was brooding mad over it; and he found out that 'Beau Ben,' as he was called, loved a drop, and cast that up to him. However, 'love will still be lord of all.' Esther went to London. The squire's lady at Stoneleigh was very fond of her, and took her as her own maid; and old farmer Stone and Natt hoped London and high life might put Ben out of her mind and heart. But Esther's was true love; and do what you will, miss, there's no uprooting that, leastways in a true female heart. Before long, Ben left Farmer Stone's service, pretending he was going to emigrate; but he went up to London to take leave of Esther, and that ended, of course, in their getting married."

"Old Stone never forgave her, and, when he died, Natt, who had not forgiven her either, let the farm as it stood for five years, and went out as a farmer to Australia. Well, five years passed, things went wrong: Ben took to drink; and Natt, coming home, heard, from a friend, who pointed out their wretched home, how matters were, and went to the hole where his sister lived. Bare it was; that very day there had been a distress, and Esther and her little ones, not having broken their fast, were sitting on a few bricks, all huddled together for warmth. Ben hadn't been home for three days and nights."

"Well, miss, Natt, it seems, went on his knees to Esther to leave Ben at once and take the two children, and go back to the old place (which was all ready for her) with him. Just then Ben came in tipsy, and, overhearing Natt trying to get his wife and children away, he went up to him and struck him in the face with his open hand, saying, 'You're a poor, hump-backed cripple, or I'd pummel you well; but I'll do for both of ye yet, if I see any more of this; and now get out, or I'll kick ye out.' It seems that Natt, in spite of this drunken violence, in Ben's presence repeated his offer to his sister to share his home with her and her children, treating Ben with a silent scorn that stung him more than any words could have done; and Ben, becoming more and more excited, seized a brick. There was nothing else in the room, for there'd been a distress put in that very day. Now, it seems, miss," said Jem, drily, "leastways, so Ben told me this morning, that when that distress was threatened, he told his wife to send for me, and she wouldn't, no ways."

"No; I can well understand that," said Ellen, "for I am almost sure Darrell was the name of the people whose things Mr. Stephen told me you had twice saved, by paying their rent and all expenses; how could she send to you?"

Jem coloured and proceeded.

"Well, with this brick in his hand, he began swearing he'd do for them both, Esther and Natt Stone; and, perhaps, he would have struck Natt with it, and killed him, had not Esther cried 'Murder!' and two or three neighbours rushed in and parted them. Natt then went his way, intending to consult a lawyer or a magistrate, and Ben slunk back to 'The Rose and Crown.' This happened on the very day of Esther's death; and when Natt returned, primed with advice, and with money, and comforts for his sister, she was a corpse."

"Now, miss," continued Jem Goodman, "you cannot be much surprised to hear that the brother, when he saw the dead body of the sister who, from his cradle, had been all the world to him, and knew that she had been killed by the very man her love would not allow her to leave (the man who had struck him in the face), that he should have yielded himself up to those demons of hate and revenge, which were never yet cast out of any man's heart but by the Son of God himself, and his great ministers—Faith, Grace, and Prayer. I did not see Natt Stone, miss—I'm thankful I didn't—when first having vainly sought his sister and her little ones in the bare back garret where they had all but starved, he, by dint of inquiries and the police, traced her to the parlour of the 'Good Intent.'

"Being her brother, he was admitted to see the body. They say when first he saw her stone dead, he gave a loud cry, or rather yell, and fell down as if he had been shot. They'd hard work to get him to; and when they did, the landlady (and she ain't soft-hearted in a general way) cried like a young girl, to hear him call upon the dead, cold, wasted woman, that lay so stiff and frozen, and remind her of long nights, through which she had watched and nursed him—of happy days—of wild woods and summer flowers—and merry Christmases, and yule logs, and plenty at home! And then he took out of his poor, crooked breast, a thick, glossy plait of bright, chestnut hair. It shone in the morning sun like bronze, the woman said, and was a good yard long, and tied with blue ribbon; and he matched it with the thin, ragged, dusty hair on Esther's blood-stained temple, and said, 'Ben Darrell made this change!' And then he took out an oval miniature of the sweetest village beauty ever seen, and he said: 'This is what she was when she was content with the love of her poor, hump-backed, crippled brother! Look at those soft, bright eyes; that open brow; those round, peach-like cheeks; those red and laughing lips, and that fair young bosom!'

"And then look here!" he cried. And the woman shrank back; she feared he was going mad, he was so fierce and wild; for, pushing aside the thin, old shawl and faded gown, he bared the neck, through which the bones seemed starting, and there, on the lean bosom, were bruises; some recent, some of paler hue and more ancient date. And she tried to make me believe he never struck her!" hissed Natt. "Look at those marks!—look at the lines on her brow!—the hollow cheeks!—the wasted bosom!—the blue, parched lips! Oh, Esther! oh, my darling!" he cried; "hear me swear that thou shalt be avenged! That brute shall swing for this! I'll see his vile carcass hoisted into the air, amid the shouts and groans of thousands and tens of thousands! For this I'll live; and then—oh, darling!—kind, darling sister!—angel of a dark and troublous life!—sole sunbeam of a cheerless sky!—thou to whom the hunchback was so dear till that brute came between us!—I will join thee, where the drunkard and the murderer can never part us more, since they are not admitted where thou art dwelling now!" He then bound himself by an oath, too terrible to record, to compass the destruction of his sister's murderer."

"But surely the jury, while pitying his anguish, will not be influenced by his passion," said Ellen. "Oh, Mr. Goodman!—oh, Ada!—let us pray that the wretched man's punishment may be one that admits of repentance!"

"Imprisonment for life—transportation; anything but death!" urged Ada. As if Ben's fate were in Jem Goodman's hands.

CHAPTER XXIII.

"E'en Adam, the first o' monkind, was a coof
Ond a coward, that kept fra' the danger aloof;
But when thirsting for knowledge, Ewe pluck'd of the tree,
Oh then was sa' greedy, sa' ready as he!
But mark! the birkie mon
Made a cat's-paw o' her hon,
Ond slunk awa' when a' was dune,
That she the grief and shame might dree."

COURTESHIP AND WEDLOCK.

"THEY'RE just average specimens of the unfair sex," said Mrs. Golightly, "are both Ben Darrell and Natt Stone. Adam himself was a poor, weak creature; and his eldest son was Cain, the first murderer."

"But, madam," said Jem Goodman, smiling, for he knew this old maid and her crochets well, "Mother Eve was the first culprit, surely!"

"I cannot deny that Eve was guilty of the thirst for knowledge," Mr. Goodman. Her intellectual cravings are, in my opinion, nobly contrasted with Adam's dull content; but when Eve had plucked the fruit and tasted, he who could not originate could imitate, and then turn round on her and say, 'The woman tempted me, and I did eat.' I'm more proud, sir, of being a daughter of Eve than of being obliged to own that there is a good deal of the old Adam in me, as in us all. But, as I said before, such men, or rather fiends, as these—this Ben Darrell, who kills his wife, and this Natt Stone, who, if he can, will get him hanged, out of revenge—are just the sort of instances I require for my pamphlet—'The Rights and Wrongs of Woman.' They say woman is too much the slave of her passions to be intrusted with power. From Cain, downwards, it's man who shows himself unfit to govern woman, since he cannot control himself. But I'll not detain you now, Mr. Goodman; you shall have a copy of my pamphlet as soon as it is out."

Jem Goodman bowed, Mrs. Golightly bridled; and at this moment a little group approached, on their way to the ragged school in Green Fields.

Trotting along, laughing merrily, one hand in Merry Blossom's and the other in Hope Evermore's, was the little unconscious orphan, Nussy, the child of Esther and Ben Darrell.

"I fear," said Jem, "that the little Nussy, who was present when Ben threatened to do for Natt and Esther, will be called by Natt to bear witness to the fact."

"Oh, how dreadful!" cried Ellen, shuddering. "The child may, in that case, cause the father's death."

"I hope it may not be so," said Jem Goodman; "but I know Natt has sworn she shall be called, and a boy, too, who lodges in the next room; Stunning Steenie, they call him."

It was long since Nussy had been so tidy. Hope Evermore had washed and dressed her, and patiently, without hurting her, combed out the tangles of her chestnut hair; while, from her own little scanty wardrobe, she had selected several tiny articles, which she had herself outgrown, and had adapted them to the proud and delighted Nussy. Larky Grigg, too, the most handy and kind-hearted of boys, who, when not led away by Stunning Steenie, or some other idle chap, was—as his mother, Apple Blossom, said—"worth two maids as a help," he had proved her words true.

Larky Grigg had all that faith in, and fondness for, his mother, which, in a boy, generally—nay, always—accompanies great intellect and warm feelings. Considering his frolicsome, fun-loving nature, it was beautiful to see how tender and watchful he was where his mother was concerned. When she came home tired on Saturday evening, looking sadly forward to the domestic duties, so wearisome after a hard day out, she would find Larky on all fours, charring the room, or dollying the clothes; and a tear would sparkle in her fine, large hazel eyes when she saw that this boy, reputed so thoughtless, had fetched all the water, sifted the cinders, chopped the wood; and that among them (Hope Evermore being the presiding genius) they had so managed matters that Apple Blossom could enjoy a rest and a cup of tea.

Larky Grigg had not been idle. He had mended Nussy's little worn shoes; and no cobbler need have been ashamed of that "mend." But Larky Grigg had a great friend a cobbler. This cobbler was a cripple—"Lame Luke," as he was called. He had been a sailor, and had lost one leg, while the other was distorted and impaired.

Lame Luke was not a very good companion for Larky Grigg. He was of wild, roving habits, and often worked hard three days together, that he might drink the rest of the week. But his "long yarns" delighted Larky Grigg; and it was agreed that he should teach Larky Grigg to mend shoes, and Larky should teach him to read and to write, when Larky had mastered that art himself. Larky could sole and heel tidily before Lame Luke could spell c-a-t, or d-o-g. But that was not Larky's fault; it was Lame Luke's misfortune. He could not apply, and Larky could. Larky wanted to get Lame Luke to the "Green Fields Ragged School," to join the adult class; but Lame Luke would not be persuaded to go.

However, we have nothing at this moment to do with Lame Luke, except as explaining how Larky Grigg had learnt to cobble.

Proudly little Nussy strutted and stamped along in the shoes to which Larky had added very thick soles, studded with nails, and proudly Larky, behind (carrying blue-eyed baby Ben to the Ragged School Nursery), heard the ring on the pavement of the nails he had inserted.

Ada thought little Hope Evermore looked lovelier than ever in her almost maternal care of little Nussy.

Merry Blossom was getting a little tired of Nussy, and the trouble of minding her. She wanted to look in at the shops, and gambol and sport; but Hope seemed to have but one thought, and that was "Nussy."

"Why don't you help Hope?" said Jem Goodman to Merry Blossom. "You'll never be half the woman your mother is, if you're so wild and frolicsome!"

"Please, Jem Goodman," said Hope, "Merry have been a great help to me. I don't know what I'd have done without she. She've washed and ironed my old frock for Nussy, and took it in and tucked it up. Oh! Merry's been a very great help to me! And so have Larky Grigg! He've soled and heeled Nussy's shoes. Hold up your foot, Nussy dear!"

And proudly Nussy held up the little foot, with its thick, hob-nailed sole; and proudly Larky Grigg said, "I can sole and heel a sight better than that 'ere, only Hope wor in such a hurry!"

"You did it very well, Larky; and was very kind and willin'," said little Hope, with a condescending patronage of which she was quite unconscious; and Larky Grigg, great, bold, merry, handsome, clever boy, blushed crimson with delight at little Hope's praise, as he said—

"Well, Hope, if you're pleased, so's I."

And as the little girls dropped a curtsy to the ladies, Hope teaching Nussy how to make one, and Larky Grigg giving a pull to his thick black forelock, he shouldered "blue-eyed baby Ben," and the little group went on to the ragged school.

"It is almost time to attend the inquest, ladies," said Jem Goodman.

"Perhaps, as a crowd has assembled outside the 'Good Intent,' you would be less noticed were you to get out of your carriage, and let me pilot you on foot?"

"How interesting and how very curious is the power little Hope Evermore seems to have over those wild spirits, Larky Grigg and Merry Blossom," said Ellen St. Ange.

"It is moral power," said Jem Goodman. "That child is born good. She has no idea of the influence she exerts, nor have they. I hope it will last as they grow up; if so, it will save that fine, clever, wild boy, Larky Grigg, from much evil, and pretty nut-brown Merry from many a snare."

"There's a great deal of the old Adam in Master Larky Grigg," said Mrs. Golightly. "He'll require a tighter hand than little Hope's; and as for Merry Blossom, if she grows up as pretty as she promises to be, the sons of Belial that swarm in this 'City of the Plague' will spread snares not merely for her, but for little Hope herself; but long before that I hope to see a good change wrought by the means of that only magic wand, the pen, and woman protected, and man coerced to some purpose."

All this was to be effected by Mrs. Golightly's "Rights and Wrongs of Woman."

As she spoke, they mingled with the crowd; and Ada trembled violently, and grew very cold and pale, as amid the whispers, and nudges, and elbowings of that crowd, they made their way into the "Good Intent."

CHAPTER XXIV.

One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.
SHAKESPEARE.

THERE was an expression of anxiety and concern on every face.

It seemed a terrible thing to take the first step towards dooming to a violent and ignominious death a man whom most of those present believed to have been quite guiltless of any intent to murder, and to have struck the fatal blow only as a man intoxicated by passion and drink might have done, without even knowing what he was doing. But wife-murder and wife-beating (the first step to wife-murder) had become so prevalent, that the legislature, the country, the public—all felt that wives must be protected, brutal husbands punished, crime prevented, and that examples must be made.

The jury were respectable tradesmen, anxious to do their duty. They were very courteous and polite to Ada.

The coroner was a very gentlemanly man, earnest and thoughtful.

A surgeon was present, who had made a post mortem examination of the body. These and the witnesses were the only people present, save Natt Stone, who was unperceived at first, as, cowering in a dark corner, he bided his time, his head bent on his breast, and his hump rising above it, but the whole figure imperceptible, from his dwarfish height, among the sturdy figures assembled.

Ada, although very pale, and trembling violently, gave her evidence clearly and firmly. She said she had seen the blow struck, and, so far from imagining that it was given with murderous intent, she had been surprised to see the woman fall, and had not even supposed that she was seriously hurt.

"You feel convinced, then, in your own mind, that it was a chance blow of drunken passion?" said the coroner.

"Perfectly. I am certain the wretched man scarcely knew what he was about, and had no intention to inflict even a serious injury."

A buzz of satisfaction was heard; several persons rubbed their hands; but a low groan issued from the dark corner where Natt was hidden.

The next witness was the surgeon, Mr. Probyn. His evidence proved clearly that death had been caused by the blow on the temple, which Ben had inflicted with a quart measure; this fact he enveloped in a mesh of scientific terms and learned speculations and theories; but the coroner elicited it. "Still, that did not amount to much, for every one present was aware that Esther Darrell had died from the effects of a blow given her on the temple by her husband with a pewter-pot; but other facts, also elicited, had a startling effect, very unfavourable to Ben Darrell's cause. One was, that he, Mr. Probyn, had found the body much emaciated; marks of violence on many parts of it; traces of blows or kicks, some recent, some remote; and no food of any kind in the stomach."

Yes, the wife was starving, so were the children; while the husband was getting mad by drink with what would have kept them all well fed and warmly clothed at home. And this is not a very uncommon case; but it is some chance or accident alone that brings it to light.

In answer to a question from the coroner, the surgeon said that, in all probability, the extreme exhaustion of the deceased aided the effect of the blow.

A person of ordinary strength, and who had been properly fed during the day, might have received that blow, and have rallied.

The effect of Mr. Probyn's evidence was very unfavourable to the prisoner.

The jury then proceeded to view the body. The surgeon had already made the post mortem examination.

The evidences of the habitual use to which that room was put, were around and about everywhere. A sickening smell of old tobacco, beer, and spirits was in the air. All felt it was the very temple of intemperance.

That table was the altar, and upon it lay the victim; and in many parts were discoloured circles showing where glasses and mugs of different sizes had stood.

Some of the jury who viewed that pale, slight form, so wasted, wan, and so thinly, miserably clad, were men who themselves loved their glass. There were some whom a still small voice within, the voice of conscience, convicted at that moment of having sometimes so exceeded, that they owed it more to God's mercy than their own merits that they were not in Ben Darrell's place.

One man, and he, perhaps, the least temperate of that "sworn twelve," as he gazed on the murdered wife, recorded a vow in his heart, then and there, in that solemn presence—the presence of the Dead—that he would in future avoid, as he would the deadliest poison, all liquor fermented and distilled; and, as he kept his vow, he had the satisfaction of seeing another convert, made by this dread tragedy, in the person of his own wife, who had before been as much addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors as himself.

But to return to the jury. Accustomed as many of them were to sad and ghastly sights, they could not look on that young, emaciated, and devoted wife without a shudder; some grew pale, some sick, and some gazed at the poor hollow cheeks, shadowy form, and long, thin hands through their tears, and turned cold and shuddering away.

A stream of bright sunshine came in and seemed to settle on the small, oval face, and very soft and pretty features of her who had some few years before been the belle and the pride of her native village. The hair, ragged, dusty, neglected, and dishevelled, had once been of rare beauty, and still here and there amid its ripples, a gold light reflected the sunbeams. The long eyelashes looked wet, as they rested on the hollow cheeks; alas, when had they been dry? The expression was calm—a mournful calm. The Wife was gone to her rest; but one could almost have fancied the Mother still mourned for those left to the cold, cold world without her love and care.

There was no ring on her wedded finger. Ben had pawned that for drink.

She was delicately and beautifully formed. The thin, damp, insufficient clothing disclosed a figure, which

"Given to marble, would immortalise a name."

She had been proud of it once; so had troops of friends; so had the poor hunchback brother, who was even so morbidly ashamed of his own, and who was sobbing so bitterly in the adjoining room; and prouder than all, at one time, of her many girlish beauties, was the wretch who had destroyed her and them.

When the jury returned from viewing the body, the expression of every face seemed to Ada, Ellen, and Jem Goodman, to translate itself into a verdict of "Wilful Murder."

Jem Goodman was then examined. He said, in reply to a question put him by the coroner—"I have always set my face and raised my voice—and will, while I've a face to set and a voice to raise—against drunkenness, and that cruelty to women which drunkenness engenders. No; the object of my life is to put down drunkenness; but—though the poor young woman who lies dead in that room was my friend, and her husband, now trembling for your verdict, and heart-broken for the loss of the very wife he has slain, was for his vice hateful to me, inasmuch as he was an habitual drunkard (for I am a foe to drunkenness and all its votaries)—I will speak up for him so far as this, that I believe he had, when he struck his wife, not only no intention to injure, still less to kill her, but that he was scarcely conscious at the time that he had struck her at all. That guilty wretch, Mr. Coroner, though a fiend to her when drunk, loved her dearly, deeply, truly, when sober. I know that her bereaved brother is here to prove that Ben Darrell had threatened to do for his miserable wife."

"I am, and I will prove it," cried the poor hunchback, energetically, starting to his feet.

These words caused considerable excitement and commotion, and, when order was restored, Jem Goodman continued, in reply to further questions—

"Mr. Stone (Esther Darrell's brother) will speak in his turn, as he is a witness also; but I will first give my evidence in full. I will read you a letter written to me, not quite a week ago, by the very man whom your verdict will certainly send to Newgate in any case; but whether it sends him to the gallows and the bar of judgment, will depend, perhaps, on what power is given me to force upon you the conviction of my own mind. These are the words written to me by Ben Darrell when out of work, penniless, and sobber; and they are in answer to an earnest entreaty of mine, that he would do what my experience has convinced me is the only thing to save a man, who cannot of himself resist the temptation to drink (and how few working men can), namely, that he would take the pledge. This man who, last night, as you all know, killed his wife, wrote to me, five days ago, thus—

"MY DEAR FRIEND,—Forgiv the fredum, butt i knows you be my frend. Guv me one weke to make upp my mind, you've amost prevailed. It brakes my art to see Ester, as i luv's beter nor my own sole, look so pittiful, and go so bear. She, blessed wench, as wor so plumb and rossy, and so neat and smartt, and guv upp a cumf'table home, and faith, and brother, and frends, for the likes of i. I see she think i don't luv her now. Oh! Mr. Goodman, culd she and you rede my art when sobber, you'd see i dotes on her as much as ever i done; and so i does on my babbies; and, by God's help and yourn, i'll turn over a new leaf yet. I'd zign this blessed day, only Joe Jiles, and Pat, and Davie's accumin to Lunnon to look out for work, and i don't want 'em to think i'm turned teetotaller, which us a thing we olls despised. But onst here, they'll get work, maybe in the Dox, and then i sha'n't see 'em, and out of sight, out of mind; and ples let me off till they's gone, and then i'll zign, and make my poor blessed old gal smile as she uzed to do on your greatfull suvvant, "BENJAMIN DARRELL."

There was silence for some moments after Jem Goodman had read that letter.

The coroner held out his hand for it. The jury-men examined it. The features of all relaxed.

Jem Goodman's heart and spirits rose. His cheek flushed. He said—

"Is it possible that any man can believe that the writer of that letter deliberately, and with malice aforethought, murdered his wife? Oh!" he added, clasping his hands, and tears gushing from his eyes; "had I but grasped him then—then, when good thoughts were stealing into his heart, and the old love was glowing there again; had I said, 'now! now! What are the jeers of Joe, and Pat, and Davie compared to the blessing of God, the smile and kiss of Esther, and the approval of your own conscience?' Had I clung to him then—knelt to him if needful—compelled him to sign—Esther would now have been a happy wife, and Ben Darrell a rescued man."

Jem Goodman here sat down, and covered his face with his hands.

Natt Stone was the next witness. At another time his almost ludicrous deformity might have raised a smile, but no one was in a smiling mood then, and the agony of his earnest features arrested attention far more than the shortness of his stature or the size of his hump.

In answer to the coroner, he said he was brother to the deceased. He was six-and-twenty, Esther Darrell a year older; that Ben Darrell owed him a grudge because he had opposed the marriage of his sister—a respectable farmer's only daughter, an angel, he said, and his voice grew husky, "an angel of beauty and goodness—with a farm servant, already fond of drink. He ill-used her, sir, from the first; for from the first he spent at the public-house what ought to have kept her decently, at least. Mr. Goodman—doubtless a credible witness, and whom I for one love and honour, for he was very good to my murdered sister—has tried to prove that the brutal man loved his wife and was kind to her when sober. As he never was sober to speak of, that does not go for much; but there are marks on her poor body more convincing, more condemning than any words of mine can be; and while he had been guzzling for days and nights, and was a perfect barrel of liquid fire, she—oh! how can I speak the words?—she was dying of hunger: no food of any kind was found in her stomach. The blow took greater effect from her previous debility. What of that? That debility was the result of inanition—a cruel, slow, but certain form of murder."

Natt Stone then went on to prove his return after seven years in Australia; his finding his sister in a back garret, in which a distress had just been put, sitting on a few bricks, her children clinging to her; and that, while he was urging her at once to leave her ruffian husband and come with him and her children, first to an inn close at hand, and then home to the dear old farm, the brute came in and struck him in the face; that he still urged his sister to accompany him, when Ben swore if she ever spoke to him again he would do for them both; that he wished he'd done for them before (great excitement); and, seizing a brick, he swore he'd make an end of it then; that Esther cried murder! and people in the adjoining room rushed in and parted them; and that the brute, taking advantage of his vile strength, kicked him (Natt) out of the room; that he hastened to a lawyer for advice, and hearing on his way back with a policeman that Ben Darrell had returned to the public-house, he bought some wine and sandwiches to take to his sister, resolved at all risks to remove her, though she had refused to leave her tyrant, and had said she loved him still.

The room was deserted, and presently a man came rushing in with news that Ben Darrell had killed his wife; and, added he, "he meant to kill her." He had said, nay he had sworn he would do for her. He had regretted he had not done for her before, and when he saw her again he fulfilled that threat; and if ever justice, Mr. Coroner, demanded a verdict of 'Wilful Murder,' it demanded it now at your hands. The prisoner's little daughter, and a boy who lives in a room adjoining that of the deceased, and overheard all that passed, are here by my desire to substantiate what I have said."

As he spoke, the door opened, and little Nussy Darrell was handed in.

She was an intelligent child of seven, but so small for her age, an average child of four would have been taller and stouter, and have appeared older till you looked in the face, where that precocity and quickness peculiar to the lower classes, convinced you she knew what she was about—and she did, too.

She was on her guard. Her poor mother had taught her always to speak well of her father, always to conceal his faults, his drunkenness, his violence, always to praise him, and to pray for him.

The child could not love that savage drunkard; but she idolised her mother, and whatever that mother told her to do the brave child would have done had she perished for it. She did not know that her mother was dead, or her grief would have been terrible to behold—for the children of the lower classes, unlike those of the higher, know death betimes; but she saw that the questions put to her might criminate her father, and she even assumed stupidity to evade them. To all their astute queries, she constantly replied with the sentences her mother had taught her—

"Dad's a good dad; dad don't drink only a drop or so; dad's so good to mammy, and babbie, and i; dad's a good dad."

As nothing could be made of this witness, she was restored to Apple Blossom who waited for her outside, and two men and a boy who lived in the room adjoining Esther Darrell's, were examined. They confirmed all Natt had said, and the boy, who was no other than Stunnie Steenie (waistcoat and all), swore he heard Ben say he would do for them both (Natt and Esther) yet, and regret he had not done for them afore."

With Stunnie Steenie ended the examination of witnesses.

The jury retired to consult, and at the end of twenty minutes—hours, they seemed to Jem Goodman and Natt Stone—the foreman announced their verdict to be "WILFUL MURDER AGAINST BEN DARRELL."

Natt Stone, as he heard it, uttered a loud cry of exultation, and the next moment fell from his chair in a death-like swoon.

(To be continued.)

THE PILOT'S WIFE.

Bravely the Pilot sailed to sea,
Down the Bay and out of the Narrows;
His sails were trim, and the wind was free,
And his crew were merry as morning sparrows;
But none was blither of heart than he,
As he went sailing out of the Narrows.

He sailed to meet the mighty ships,
From distant countries across the ocean,
With a jolly sea-ditty upon his lips
That sang of a sailor's brave devotion.
So with trolling tongue, and hands on hips,
The Pilot went sailing over the ocean.

But by-and-by the sky grew black,
And he heard the growl of the fierce nor'wester;
So he looked to his boat, and altered her tack,
And cried, "Now, boys, we're about to test her;
For, sure as I float, we're right in the track
Of a tearing, swearing old nor'wester!"

The clouds came down like a wild-fowl flight,
And the north-winds roared their awful chorus;
The lightning flashed through the stormy night,
Till the skies themselves seemed split and porous;
And the brave boat sank in that ocean white,
While crew and captain prayed in chorus!

But the Pilot's wife, from red sunrise,
Sits at the battery, waiting gravely
To see her husband's number arise
When he shall sail through the Narrows bravely.
Ah! how patient and calm her eyes,
As she sits at the battery, waiting gravely!

The boatmen loafing on bench and grass,
As they look on her feel their heart-strings soften;
They touch their hats when they see her pass
To the sad look-out where she sits so often.
"Poor thing!" they cry, "she is crazed, alas!"
And their rough old hearts on a sudden soften.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

THE DEATH OF ROLAND

Oh! for a blast of that dread horn
By Fontarabian echoes borne—
The dying hero's call,
That told imperial Charlemagne
The swarthy sons of Paynim Spain
Had wrought his rearguard's fall.—SCOTT.

On the threshold of the middle ages, midway between the rude barbarism which had overwhelmed the Roman empire and the struggling light of civilisation that burst forth in the institution of chivalry, the art of printing, and the extension of navigation, stands a tall and gracious figure, that of Charlemagne, the great German Caesar. The German historians tell us this famous emperor was seven feet in height. His crown, preserved at Vienna, is of such gigantic size as to favour the supposition. Strong and active in person, expert in the tournament and in all warlike exercises, his arm was as resistless as his genius. The ponderous iron lance and the weighty sword, that none but he could lift, were wielded like toys in his powerful grasp. Warlike in presence, majestic in mien, every heart throbbled higher, every head was bowed in reverence when he approached. Never was a man more formed by nature to enforce submission and obedience among rude and warlike races. Wisdom and command sat enthroned on his broad forehead. Every eye sank beneath his piercing, unwavering gaze. Simple in his habits, plain in his attire, he walked forth "every inch a king," in his garment of the fur of the otter, among the gayer and more sumptuous costumes of his courtiers. The handle of his mighty broadsword served him as a seal, and he was wont to say, "What I seal with the sword-hilt I maintain with the blade."

Whatever men of learning Europe could boast of flocked to the court of Charlemagne,—Alcuin, the Anglo-Saxon monk; Turpin, the writer of chronicles; Warnefried, the celebrated Lombard historian; young Eginhard, the biographer of the great Emperor, whose son-in-law he became. It is from the chronicle of Bishop Turpin that we take the following account of the death of a famous knight,—of the paladin whose deeds have won him a deathless fame as the strongest, the bravest, the most generous of the great conqueror's warriors—the emperor's nephew, Roland.

This hero had a sword of such weight and sharpness, that it had become famous throughout the whole empire; it was called Durandal.

THE DEATH OF ROLAND.

He had a horn of ivory, wherewith to summon his vassals in war and in the chase. The sound of this was well known in the army of Charlemagne—and the enemies of the emperor learned to distinguish its tones but too well.

Now it happened that the Frankish emperor set forth on an expedition into Spain. He conquered all the land between the Pyrenees and the Ebro, and the swarthy Paynims were fain to do him homage. But they bowed with angry hearts before his footstool, and meditated revenge.

Charlemagne set his face toward the north, and would return across the mountains to France.

Then said Roland the brave: "Sire, go forth with the main body, and I will stay behind, at a little distance, with the rearguard, to watch lest the Saracens meditate treason against you." Thus they departed from the land of the Saracens.

The Paynims did indeed meditate treason. They had assembled their army, and were in readiness to fall upon the rearguard. But one of their spies returned to them in haste, saying, "Take heed how you attack the Christians, for Roland is with them!"

So they were unwilling to hazard a battle; and the Paynim leader said, "Wait till they have entered the narrow valley of Roncevalles. Then we will bar the passage, and kill them with our arrows and our javelins."

Roland and his companions advanced, not suspecting the design of the foe, through the long and narrow defile that separates Spain from the Frankish land. The lofty peaks of the Pyrenees cast a deep shadow upon the narrow valley, and the wind moaned through the dark pine forests.

Suddenly there was a noise louder than the moan of the wind through the pine branches. Roland lifted his eyes, and lo! the tops of the mountains were covered with armed men, and in the midst floated the red standard of the infidels.

"We are betrayed!" cried he; "good friends, let us die like men." And he set his horn to his mouth, and blew a blast that stirred the courage of his men, as the trumpet stirs the dying war-horse

Now Charlemagne was riding on, and had reached the valley of Argeles. Suddenly he checked his steed, and said to his son-in-law, the faithful Eginhard, who rode at his side:

"Eginhard, didst thou hear nothing?"

"Sire, I heard the echo of the herdsman's horn, as he calls together his flocks on the mountains, for the evening is at hand."

The king continued his way; but he rode more slowly, for the sound seemed to him like the horn of Roland; and a heavy foreboding of evil was upon him.

Meanwhile Roland and his brave comrades were assailed by a storm of arrows and javelins, hailed down upon them by the Saracens on the heights. They strove manfully with the foe, throwing back the weapons on their assailants. But what could they do against so many?

One by one the brave heroes fell—until at last none were left alive save only Roland and his cousin Oliver.

The chief of the Saracens called from the heights, and summoned the two knights to yield.

"I will not yield," cried Roland, "till these firmest rocks shall crumble from their base, and roll into the torrent below."

"Yield thee, then!" shouted the infidel; "for, lo, they are rolling down."

And an immense crag, torn from its resting-place by the Saracens, crashed, with a sound like thunder, into the valley.

With a mighty bound, the two knights sprang aside, and escaped being crushed. "I thank thee," cried Roland; "thou buidest me a ladder," and, aided by Oliver, he sprang on the fragment, and attempted to climb the rock.

With yells of rage, the Saracens rolled down stone after stone upon the two heroes, and the arrows and darts fell around them like hail. Wounded and bleeding, they yet strove gallantly to scale the rocky wall, till, at length, a great fragment, too surely aimed, fell crushingly upon them.

Then the brave Oliver gave up the ghost; but Roland, setting the horn to his mouth, blew a long and wailing blast.

The dying call resounded afar, through the valleys, and, for the second time, the king checked his horse.

"It is my nephew Roland," he cried. "If Roland calls us, he must be betrayed, he must be dying. Back, comrades, back, to help our brother Roland!"

When the returning army reached the dark valley of Roncevalles, the Saracens were in full flight. In the pass lay the corpses of the brave rearguard. Then Charlemagne wept, and cried to his son-in-law—

"Eginhard, dost thou see nothing?"

And Eginhard replied, "Alas, sire, I see two knights crushed under a rock. One is dead—the other still moves, and he holds in his hand a horn of ivory. It is he—it is Roland, who has twice called us to aid him!"

The noble knights were buried where they fell. And for three days the army of the king tarried at Roncevalles to mourn for the brave warriors, and above all for Roland. And by the valour of Charlemagne's brave nephew the valley has become famous to this day.

Such is the account the chronicler gives us of the death of the Paladin Roland.

The Matron.

NO. XVI.

We ended our last number with Cotton's description of domestic bliss. Alas! there is no bliss without alloy. "Some flowers of Eden we yet inherit, but the trail of the serpent is over them all." The most watchful affection cannot ward off all diseases from children. They are almost certain to be attacked; sooner or later, by measles and whooping-cough. The symptoms of measles are as follows:—Shivering, hoarseness, cough, and water flowing from the eyes, which often assume a red appearance. These symptoms precede the eruption. I will furnish a few directions about treatment, in case medical aid cannot be immediately procured; but I advise you to have recourse to professional advice as soon as possible, because mistakes in managing measles often cause this complaint to terminate fatally, although it need not occasion alarm, if judiciously attended to. In the first stage of this complaint, as in those that follow, great care is necessary; as one great danger is exposure to cold, which would drive in the eruption, I advise you to keep your child in a warm, not a hot room, for fear of increasing the fever that always accompanies measles. Another very important point is to maintain the system cool. Aperient medicine must be given and repeated if it does not take effect in due time.

Give a teaspoonful of castor-oil. It might be so mixed in milk as to be hardly perceptible. By a little management, medicine may be rendered almost palatable. Thus senna-tea, if taken with a little sugar and milk, has almost the same taste as tea from China. By way of an aperient for a child with the measles, the following quantity would suffice:—Put of senna leaves a teaspoonful (not heaped) into a tea-pot, and pour on the leaves a quarter of a pint of boiling water. Do not let it stand more than two minutes. Pour off the infusion, adding sugar and milk, and your child will take it, when sufficiently cool, without experiencing any disgust. To prevent disgust is very important. All unnecessary pain retards recovery, while comfort and quiet promote it.

During the fever there will be no inclination to eat, but cooling drinks should be given freely. Tea, apple-water, or toast-and-water, may be taken. That which the child prefers should be prepared for him.

This disease, viz., the measles, will take its course—and, sometimes, a very tedious course it is, even under the most judicious treatment,—but while such treatment is followed, there is seldom much danger to apprehend; but convalescence requires nearly as much care as the illness itself. After the measles, a child should be carefully protected from cold and draughts; and the most digestible and nourishing things should be given to him. The following beverage would prove very soothing, if the symptomatic cough should continue:—

Take of pearl-barley, figs, and raisins, two ounces each, add to this half an ounce of liquorice-root, and boil all together in a pint and a half of water. Strain it off, and take two tablespoonfuls occasionally.

The whooping-cough is more troublesome but less dangerous than the measles; still, it may prove fatal if neglected. For this very distressing cough, I can recommend nothing better than the following mixture:—One tablespoonful of syrup of squills, two teaspoonfuls of paregoric elixir, and one tablespoonful of liquid gum-arabic. A teaspoonful of this, taken when the cough is most trying, will give relief.

Mind the children attacked with this complaint have thick-soled shoes, and warm stockings and clothing, and let them only go out when the weather is decidedly fine. If their appetite is good, they may have their usual fare; but give them neither beer nor wine. Their drink should be of the most cooling kind—barley water, or raspberry vinegar and water, for instance. A saline draught is a very good thing when the whooping-cough produces sickness; but when there is pain in the chest or side, I advise you to consult a medical man, as this pain is a symptom of inflammation, and it must be checked immediately. But, in mild cases of this cough, you may safely treat your child yourself; and I can assure you that you may find the most excellent results from using the embrocation of which I here give you the receipt:—Mix equal parts of turpentine and sweet oil, and rub this well into the chest and between the shoulders before your child gets into bed.

To assist expectoration you may give him half a grain of ipecacuanha powder, in either jam or jelly. The whooping-cough is a wearisome complaint, and it tries the patience both of the patient and the nurse. Sometimes change of air shortens its painful reign; but, at any rate, it yields to time and perseverance in good remedies.

All the illnesses of children rank among the greatest of the unavoidable trials of domestic life; but good may be extracted from evil. How much a parent endears herself to a child by tending him through an illness! It is she who has alleviated his pain, calmed his fears, and soothed and cheered him during tedious sleepless nights. Will he not recollect all her invaluable care through the life she has assisted to preserve?

To turn to a less serious subject, I must warn you (as I did on a different subject in a previous number) not to trust to old sayings in managing children. Among the most delusive of these old sayings is the following:—"Cram a cold, and starve a fever."

In the first place, all severe effects of cold are attended with fever; therefore the cramming system would increase the cold, instead of curing it.

Bathing the feet in warm water on going to bed, putting on an extra blanket to promote perspiration, and abstaining from stimulants, will generally cure a simple cold. Never have recourse to spirits as cures. Yet we know ignorant people have great faith in them.

To a neighbour of mine, who had the influenza, and who was suffering from pains in her head and chest, I recommended a mustard plaster, by way of counter irritation. On seeing her the next morning, I asked her if she had tried it. She replied she had not; for she had been advised to take some rum-and-water instead. Of course she, like so many others, relied on the efficacy of "something hot;" and something hot may do no harm, provided it is hot tea, hot barley-water, or hot gruel; but if "something hot" is hot water with either gin, brandy, or rum, it is likely to increase the fever attendant on a cold.

REPENTANCE.—A good husband will repair his house while the weather is fair, not put it off till winter; a careful pilot will take advantage of the wind and tide, and so put out to sea, not wait till a storm arise. The traveller will take his time on a journey, and mend his pace when night comes on, lest darkness overtake him; the smith will strike while the iron is hot, lest it grow cool, and so he lose his labour; so we ought to make every day the day of repentance; to make use of the present time, so that when we come to die we may have nothing to do but to die.

HANDSOME JOHANN.

TRANSLATED BY MARY HOWITT FROM THE GERMAN OF BERTHOLD AUREBACH.

"He was once a gay and elegant guest, at whose call the landlord was attentive, and the obsequious waiter ran hither and thither, bowing in his short jacket. Now he is himself a waiter, and endeavours with alacrity and attention to fulfil the wishes of the guests." It is a very creditable calling, that of waiter; and, in fact, there is not any honest calling which is not creditable. But the way in which Johann became a waiter was peculiar, so I will relate it for the benefit of my readers.

Johann was the only son of the landlord of "The Three Kings," in a large trading town. "The Three Kings" was much frequented by carriers and country people, who attended the weekly market. The father was a well-to-do, sociable man; he understood the art of entertaining his guests, without giving himself much trouble in so doing, and it was done in a very simple way. He merely let everybody talk as they liked, and he himself listened attentively. This pleased most people greatly, and they said, speaking of him, that he was very entertaining. But at the same time the landlord of "The Three Kings" used his eyes to very good purpose, and the moment he saw the glass of a guest empty he had it immediately filled. In this way he had a very good business, and was liked by every one. The mother also was a very sensible and active woman, who knew how to give good counsel to everybody. In one respect only she was not sensible, nor did she know how to advise herself, at all events, as regarded her son, Johann.

While yet a lad, Johann was self-willed and up to all sorts of mischief. The mother excused and concealed his tricks and his follies whenever possible, and thus he seldom had to suffer sufficiently for his misdeeds. Johann was a lively fellow, and therefore he was destined by his parents to be something better than they, according to the estimate of such people, who always call that better which is different to what they possess. Johann, therefore, was to go to the university and study for one of the professions, or to become a merchant; and Johann accordingly studied. In the meantime, the host of the "Three Kings" died; and when his funeral sermon was preached, Johann very coolly said that he did not listen to a word of it.

The mother felt it deeply that Johann was not prepared to assist her in the business. Nor was it likely that he would concern himself about carriers and country people. He now wore smart, primrose-coloured gloves, and made his observations on the world through an eye-glass, which he held fast under his eyebrow in a very elegant and artistic manner.

Johann went into France; and after a few years returned home still more polished and elegant; and by this time he had no inclination to devote himself to any business whatever. With a set of dissipated companions, he might be seen strolling about the town and neighbourhood; sometimes, also, driving, and at other times riding, and always in pursuit of pleasure, so-called. He was a handsome young man, and was known universally as "handsome Johann," which appellation was very agreeable to him.

Among his other "pleasures" he indulged in drinking. From drinking he fell into debt. His mother did not venture to deny him anything. When she was angry with him he laughed at and ridiculed her, for he was not devoid of wit.

Many a time, when the champagne corks were flying at his places of resort, he would say, "It will take a long time ere we have exhausted even one of the Three Kings."

When on any occasion his money was all spent, one of his merry comrades thus aided in obtaining a fresh supply:—

He would take a piece of paper, scribble something upon it, and go to the Three Kings. "Is not Johann here?"

"No; why—what's amiss?" the anxious mother would inquire.

"I hold a bill of Johann's for so much, which is now due. If I cannot have the money he must go to prison," said the false creditor.

With that the mother would weep and lament; but yet she had been known to pay such a demand three or four times over.

Often, for many weeks together, Johann would never make his appearance at home, spending his nights and days in all kind of riot and dissipation, drinking, singing songs, and telling merry stories. And many a time whilst so sitting, long past midnight, he would glance half compassionately, half smiling elegantly, at the waiters on the opposite side of the room, who sat nodding each in his corner waiting for his call and command, but who did not dare to strike in with the songs, nor yet laugh at the merry stories, but must ever wait with patient, silent, and assiduous demeanour.

When, however, the mother died, it was ascertained on the sale of the "Three Kings" and all their effects, that Johann had already exhausted the coffers of two of them. He now took the clear sum of money that remained to him, and went to a fashionable watering-place, where he could sit at the gambling-table with every elegant and wellbred gentleman.

Before he well knew what he was about, however, there was an ebb in the tide of his money, and an amazing flow in an account of debt which stood against him.

What was to be done? He would have fled away from the place, but he had not a single crown piece left. On this he made himself known to the landlord of the hotel where he lodged. This man had a second hotel a little way from the baths, but where the guests were accustomed to resort for pleasure.

Johann was handy and clever, and understood thoroughly the business of a waiter. It was soon arranged, therefore, with the landlord, and he became waiter at this second hotel.

"He was once a gay and elegant guest, at whose call the landlord was attentive, and the obsequious waiter ran hither and thither, bowing in his short jacket. Now he is himself a waiter, and endeavours, with alacrity and attention, to fulfil the wishes of the guests." When, in the silence of night, a drinking party sits around the wine, singing, and joking, and laughing, he sits nodding in his corner, waiting for their summons; yet daring not to laugh with them, nor joke with them, nor sing with them; and a deep sigh often escapes him.

THE BRIDAL.

BY A DECIDEDLY CONFIRMED BACHELOR.

Nor a laugh was heard, nor a joyous note
As our friend to the bridal we hurried;
Not a wit discharged his farewell shot,
As the bachelor went to be married.

We married him quickly to save his right,
Our heads from the sad sight turning;
And we sighed as we stood by the lamp's dim light
To think him not more discerning.

To think that a bachelor free and bright,
And shy of the sex as we found him,
Should there at the altar, at dead of night,
Be caught in the snare that bound him.

Few and short were the words we said;
Though of wine and cake partaking;
We escorted him home from the scene of dread,
While his knees were awfully shaking.

Slowly and sadly we marched adown
From the first to the lowmest story,
And we never have heard from or seen the poor man,
Whom we left alone in his glory.

Small Change.

"GENTLEMEN," said an orator the other day,
"listen to a few words from me, who have been a working man ever since I was born."

QUESTION—What is the proper dinner hour?
Answer—For the rich, when they choose; for the poor, when they can.

"HERE, my poor fellow," said a charitable lady to a beggar, "you can have this loaf, but it's rather stale." "Thank you, ma'am; to get stale bread is something new to me."

MONTAIGNE gives as one reason why borrowed books are so seldom returned, that it is much easier to retain a book than the passages in it.

"WIT," said a facetious lawyer, "is like a pension that is given to me,—a good thing well applied."

"I THINK," said a wife who could not agree with her husband; "I think, Mr. Jones, we had better divide house: You shall live on one side and I on the other." "Very well, my dear," replied the wretch;
"you take the outside and I'll have the inside."

"THE ministry have thrown me overboard," said a disappointed politician, "but I've strengthened to swim to the other side!"

HUMAN affections are the leaves, the foliage of our being. They catch every breath; and, in the burden and heat of the day, they make music and motion in a sultry world. Stripped of that foliage, how unsightly is human nature!

ease was because he had Troy weight upon his back,
instead of avoidpoids.

This young Dacotah wins the heart of the maiden by flinging upon her form the sunbeams reflected from the little mirror he turns in his hand. So far, how much happier this world would be if we were all Dacotahs, and each, with a trap to catch a sunbeam, should fling the light on paths and hearts that in this cloudy realm it cannot always reach direct from heaven.

MR. PEPPER's house was on fire. A large crowd was soon on the spot, when one of them remarked,
"We've muster'd enough to save Pepper." So it proved.

did not bring them back again.

A GENTLEMAN wrote as follows to a female relative—

"How comes it, this delightful weather,
That U and I can't dine together?"

To which she replied:

"My worthy coz, it cannot B; U cannot come till after T."

"DON'T rob yourself," as the farmer said to the

In musing upon the wonders of steam, we have often thought it strange that there should slumber in yonder tranquil pond a power so tremendous that, could we condense and direct its energies, it might cleave the solid earth, and yet so gentle that it may be governed and made to perform its stupendous miracles by a child.

"Ah, would to heaven," says graver Sue,
"What's right were fashionable too!"

"Upon whose stomach?"

VANITY, like laudanum, and other poisonous medicines, is beneficial in small, though injurious in large quantities. No man, who is not pleased with himself, can please others, for it is the belief of his own grace that makes him graceful and gracious.

An adventurer recently made quite a large speculation in our city by extensive operations on time—he stole twenty or thirty watches.

"Who's there?" said a patrol to a passing figure, one dark night. "It's I, patrol, don't be afraid," kindly replied an old woman.

It has been remarked as a singular fact that when people come to what are called high words, they generally use very low ones.

A BAD FARCE, called "Fire and Water," was offered to Garrick. "I know what will be the fate of this piece," observed the manager. "What can fire

"Boy, boy, where does this road go to?" "I don't think it goes anywhere. I always see un here every morning."

"HAVE you anything else here that's old?" languidly asked a stroller through the ruins of Pompeii.
"Yes, signor, two things," answered a sharp-looking lazarone; "my grandfather and my shirt."

YOUNG LADY: "Pray has that cookery book any Problem No. 33. By MONA.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

ENIGMA.

No. 13. By Mr. WM. M'KENZIE.

White.—K at Q 8, Kt at Q Kt 8, B at K 8, P at Q Kt 4.
Black.—K at Q Kt sq, Ps at Q B 2, and K R 5.

White to move, and mate in five moves.

Solution of Problem No. 28.

WHITE.
1. B to K 3 (ch)
2. Kt to Q sq (dble ch)
3. Q to K 3 (ch)
4. Q mates

BLACK.
1. K takes B
2. K takes B (best)
3. K takes Kt

Solution of Problem No. 29.

WHITE.
1. Kt to Q Kt sq (dis ch)
2. B to Q R sq
3. Q to Q B 3
4. Q mates

BLACK.
1. K takes Kt (best)
2. P takes Kt
3. Any move

W.—The game shall appear next week. The encounter, however, is rather brief. We had already corrected the errors to which you refer.

W. SOUTHEY.—Our space will not permit us to give solutions of the Problems to which you refer. The solutions will be forwarded to you if you will favour us with your address on a stamped envelope. The work you refer to is not now of any authority on the subject of chess.

J. P. COURTENAY.—We regret to say that we have mislaid the Problem which we proposed to submit to the Juveniles.
MONA.—Your variation in the solution of Problem No. 14 is correct. We are always glad to hear from you.

D.—I.—As a first attempt your Problem, although below our standard of merit, is creditable. You cannot do better than study the positions of such composers as Messrs. Kling, Turton, Wormald, and, though last not least, our old contributor "Domino."

DELTA.—Problem No. 15 is quite sound. R to Q Kt 7, as we have already observed, is of no avail. You overlook the fact that Black at this third move can Knight his Pawn and give check at the same time.

J. PALMER.—We regret that we have not been able to give your Problems an earlier examination. Problem No. 1 shall be submitted to the Juveniles. No. 2 is defective;
Black can escape at the third move by playing Kt to Q 3, threatening mate. No. 3 is a very easy mate in three moves, commencing with R to K Kt 7.

WILLIAM MARTIN (Trowbridge).—If against a sound defence on the part of Black, a Problem can be solved in less than the stipulated number of moves, the position is defective; but this you have not shown to be the case in the Problem to which you refer. The answer to your first move is R takes R or Q takes R; even then, all Black's defences are not exhausted. The Chess Lessons which we published in the earlier numbers of the old series of the Paper, will afford you the information suitable to the present state of your knowledge of the game.

J. LEB.—We do not understand your solution of Problem
No. 24. If Q to K R 7 is intended for the first move of White, all that we can say is, try again. Why not adopt the chess notation now so generally in use in this country.
With regard to the works to which you refer, apply to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, sending a stamped envelope.

GRAPES.—Your solution of Problem No. 10 did not reach us, or we should certainly have acknowledged its receipt.

J. B., W. Brett, T. S. H., Jutsum, G. F., and William B. are referred to an answer to L. E. B. touching Problem No. 22.

Our Editorial Table.

A CORRESPONDENT.—In apprenticing a young girl parents should consider her inclinations, and, if possible, let her follow the bent of them. If she evinces no preference, place her where you can know exactly how she is going on.

AN ANXIOUS SISTER.—Solitude is the nurse of hapless love. This being the case, you should do all in your power to induce your sister to seek the society of cheerful friends. Read amusing books to her; but avoid sentimental tales. Nevertheless, induce her to talk of her own sorrows, though they should all relate to love. It is better she should unburden her heart to an affectionate sister, such as you seem to be, than allow regrets to prey on her own spirits. We would send you the receipt you wish for, did we not think it would do more harm than good.

PHYSICIAN.—"Laura Leonora" wrote to us some weeks ago, and we gave her the best advice in our power. It was our duty to do so. Here the matter ended. If you have reason to believe that "Laura Leonora" is a young lady whom you met eighteen months ago, and whose acquaintance you desire to renew, you should apply to her, or rather to her parents, not to us. Lovers form a considerable part of the population, and we are willing to advise them for their good, but not to make our Editorial Table a means of communication between them.

ONE WHO IS ANXIOUS TO KNOW THE TRUTH.—In reply to yourself, and many others who are anxious to know what it is all about, we beg to state, that we are not aware that the Marquis of Clanricarde has ever been proved guilty of any specific charge brought against him. It appears that some years ago the Marquis of Clanricarde was subpoenaed as a witness in a chancery suit in Ireland, intitled "Handcock versus Delacour," and that an unfavourable impression was then and there created in the public mind against his lordship through the ex parte statements of the counsel for the plaintiff, who were anxious to defeat the provisions of a will which had been made in favour of the defendant. To these ex parte statements of counsel it must be borne in mind Lord Clanricarde had no opportunity of replying in court, as he was only a witness, and had not therefore the locus standi or privileges of either plaintiff or defendant. We would recommend those who feel an interest in the matter, and who are anxious to know both sides of the question, to read the Marquis of Clanricarde's vindication of his conduct in a pamphlet just published. It is certainly a dangerous principle to condemn a man unheard upon the ex parte statements of counsel, who are frequently interested in vilifying his character. We cannot enter into the particulars of the case; but the pamphlet, which can be had of any bookseller, contains the arguments which, we presume, Lord Clanricarde intended to have used in parliament if the rules of the house had not prevented him from making his statement.

CENTRE.—Your writing is good enough for a clerk in an office; but we advise you to devote less ink to the flourishes.

ANGLO-SAXON.—The "slogan" is a border war cry.

A SCHOOL-GIRL.—Bathists, as applied to the inhabitants of Bath, is an incorrect term. We advise "a school-girl" to avoid such expressions. Coined words are generally vulgar and affected.

JEAN.—You need not acknowledge wedding cards. But you should call on the happy pair, after the honeymoon. We advise you not to ask for the former portrait, on presenting a new one. As to the third question, we consider that one handsome bracelet would be a more elegant present than two of inferior value—besides, fashion rather disapproves of pairs in bracelets.

REDMOND.—The Emperor of the French was a bachelor when he proposed to Madlle de Montijo (his present wife). This lady is a Spaniard by birth, and no relation to the Emperor.

INTENDING EMIGRANT.—1. "The Model Copy-Books," to which reference was made in a former number, are published in numbers by Ward and Lock, Fleet-street. Nos. 1, 2, and 3 are now ready. 2. Apply to the Emigration Commissioners, Westminster.

E. H.—Perhaps the lady is only putting your affection to the test. You must have patience, and, by unwavering devotion, prove your love sincere. Should she continue to meet your advances with coldness, you can only arrive at the painful conviction that you have given your heart to a flirt. The discovery should call into action all your manliness and power of endurance. Be not tempted to despair. The maid, whose fickleness you deplore, is not the type of womankind. You will probably yet meet with a fond and faithful heart.

JAMES R.—You will find directions for painting slides for magic lanterns in No. 205, page 383.

ANNIE E. BEATRICE.—We have no recollection of having received any "specimen" from you. Had you favoured us with your private address, you would have been answered long ago.

N. E. K.—A courtship of ten years, which has led to no proposal of marriage, is a very unsatisfactory state of things, and is at once injurious to a lady's reputation and a hindrance to her prospects in life. "N. E. K." can, without any breach of etiquette, go to dancing parties unattended by the lady to whom he has been paying his lukewarm addresses, but as his ten years of hesitation show him to be "a laggard in love," it is to be hoped that no lady will grant him her hand, even for a dance.

PARIS.—In strict etiquette you must invite the guests separately. If on intimate terms with them all, the note which you submitted to us, would give no offence, but it is not what the French call en règle. In answer to your second question, we have only to say that, to preserve the harmony of tenses, were must be used instead of are. Therefore, the sentence is, "I was glad to hear that you were going on well."

LADY BOOTHROYD, BEATRICE CHALLONER, A PHOTOGRAPHIC AMATEUR, and A. F. VARLEY.—These are all manifestly from the same person. An answer to the first question can only be obtained, if at all, from those who are intimate with the royal personages to whom it refers.

CHARLIE.—We refer you to the answer given to "Carna."

A. J. C.—You may be assured we shall spare no pains to deserve the commendations you have bestowed upon us.

A. W. C.—We know of no mystical or peculiar meaning attached to the name you have mentioned.

THOMAS B.—You will find a portrait and memoir of the Earl of Shaftesbury in No. 18, New Series, CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER. To answer your other inquiries would require a small volume.

A YOUNG STUDENT.—The Gordian knot, according to ancient history, was a knot or harness of Gordius, a king of Phrygia, so very intricate, that there was no finding where it began or ended. An Oracle declared that he who should untie this knot would be master of Asia. Alexander tried to untie it in vain; and, fearing that this his inability might prove an ill augury, he cut it asunder with his sword. In modern language, a Gordian knot means an inextricable difficulty; and to cut the Gordian knot is to remove a difficulty by bold or unusual measures.

THOMAS B.—Jewellers' gold is a mixture of gold and copper, the proportions of which vary. The ordinary proportion is three-fourths of pure gold and one-fourth of copper. Pure gold is too soft for ordinary purposes.

MARY JANE.—The colour about which you inquire is sepie, a beautiful rich brown pigment, prepared from a dark juice secreted by certain glands of the sepia, or cuttlefish. Its use has almost superseded that of Indian inks.

AMY HERBERT.—You will find the following an excellent recipe for counteracting the bad effects your recent illness has had on your hair:—Make a hair oil, by mixing one part of liquid hartshorn to nine parts of cold-drawn castor-oil, and rub your head with this mixture every morning. Your writing is free and elegant.

ENGINEER.—The word journeyman is probably of French derivation. Were it taken from the old German practice of travelling on terminating apprenticeship, it would be associated with "Reisen," German for travelling. There is nothing Teutonic in the word journey.

HALLAM.—You have been rightly informed. Harold fell at the battle of Hastings; while his two brothers, fighting by his side, shared his fate. With Harold ended the Saxon monarchy in England.

Z. D. G. C.—You are in error. Marriages are no longer performed at Gretna-green, either with or without licence. But, were they as common as formerly, we should be among the first to dissuade you and the young lady you love from contracting a clandestine union, there or anywhere else. You are now in a dream of passion; but you will awake from this dream. And, in such a union as that you are projecting, will solid, confiding affection follow (as it should do) that sweet delirium of young love? No! Your wife will not confide in you when, stung by remorse, she thinks of you as the man who tempted her to defy her father. You will not confide in her, when you recollect how easily she yielded to that temptation. Mutual distrust—and, in all probability, mutual hatred—will embitter your lot; and a connection begun in sin will end in sorrow. In your perilous condition, we are unwilling to give only a warning. We will endeavour to counsel and strengthen you. Evil passions, though violent, are weak; but true love, though gentle, is very strong:

"It has been known
To burst a prison, and to shake a throne."

May not your persevering love, coupled with dutiful submission, shake the opposition of the young lady's father? We believe it may, supposing you to be an eligible suitor in other respects. And if you are not so, the marriage could come to no good under any circumstances.

C. M.—Your verses evince talent; but they are too crude for our paper. They are evidently from an inexperienced pen.

LILLIE, MIRIAM, and MARINA.—We thank "Lillie" for the high opinion she expresses of our paper; and we hope she may derive improvement as well as pleasure from its pages. "Lillie" asks what style of beauty we admire. We do not hesitate to answer—moral and intellectual beauty.

"These shall remain, while what fatigues the ring, Flaunts and goes down—a disregarded thing."

"Miriam" will find an excellent remedy for chilblains given in a recent number; and "Marina" had better purchase a pennyworth of salts of lemon. She should wet the part stained with iron-mould, and gently rub on it a little of the salts. When the stains are removed, wash out all the salts of lemon, as the acid is apt to wear holes in the stuff. Let her look up the acid, as it is of a poisonous nature, and might be mistaken for soda, or some innocent powder.

AMELIA.—If, by a full throat, "Amelia" means a tendency to a goitre, or to what is called in England a Derbyshire neck, it is neither singing nor abstaining from singing that will make much difference in the swelling. It requires medical advice. For "Amelia's" comfort, we can tell her that there are ointments that remove, or greatly diminish, goitres; but they are powerful applications, and must only be used under professional treatment.

WILLIAM TELL.—There are so many life annuity institutions, that we cannot decide which have the claim to preference.

G. H. X.—You will have to pay three-halfpence each for the numbers containing the "Arctic Crusoe."

THE PIPER O' DUNDEE.—What do you mean by an "ungrammatical error"?

ALBRECHT.—We do not know whether Dr. Cox be living; but the process to which he refers is only applicable to persons just recovering from the attack; in your case it would be of no avail.

CICERO. Excellent portraits of the Prince and Princess Frederick William and Victoria of Prussia were published in No. 188 of our paper.

ERIN GO BRACH.—Slice the sarsaparilla, put it in a suitable vessel, and pour over it a sufficient quantity of distilled water in a boiling state. Cover the vessel lightly, place it in a warm situation, and macerate it for four hours; then take out the root, bruise it, return it to the liquor, and again macerate for two hours; next, boil down to one quart, and strain. It must be made "fresh and fresh," as it ferments very rapidly.

JOHN CASSELL'S EDUCATIONAL COURSE.—We have had complaints from time to time respecting the difficulty of obtaining some of the parts and numbers of the works included in the abovenamed course. We beg it to be distinctly understood, that the whole of the numbers and parts are still in print; that if the least difficulty be experienced, it must arise from some neglect on the part of the country bookseller or his London agent. "The Educational Course" is published in various portions, to suit the convenience of all—namely, in weekly numbers, 1d. each, or in monthly parts, containing four numbers, 7d., or when five numbers, 8d. The volumes published are I. Science Popularly Explained, containing 4,000 answers to 4,000 questions upon general science, price 3s. 6d., bound in cloth. II. The English Language in its Elements and Forms, with a History of its Origin and Development, price 3s. 6d., bound in cloth. III. Astronography, or Astronomical Geography, with the Use of the Globes, 2s., bound in cloth. IV. Outlines of Botany; illustrated with about 300 engravings, 2s. 6d., bound in cloth. V. Mathematical Science; its Logic and Utility, 2s., bound in cloth. VI. The Elements of Political Economy, by Dr. F. Wayland, 2s., bound in cloth.

SUBSCRIBER.—We are not likely to publish the works to which you refer at present.

BILL SPUGGINS.—Mr. J. F. Smith's tale, "Dick Tarleton," began in No. 106, and was concluded in No. 146.

VIATOR is recommended to go either to Dinan in Brittany, or to Heidelberg in Prussia. In either of these continental towns he might bring up his family with economy, but the unsettled state of French politics is a drawback to the advantages of a residence in France. Heidelberg offers great facilities for the education of boys. Besides this, both German and French can be acquired there with ease.

CHAPEL HILL.—You can have the part you require by sending ninepence in postage stamps to our office, La Belle Sauvage Yard.

MIRIAM TAYLOR.—The Sibyls were certain women said to be endowed with a prophetic spirit. Varro states their number to have been ten.

E. L. H. L.—Your lines are inadmissible.

PLUMES.—Strictly speaking a lecture is a reading; but it may be either read or pronounced as the speaker or usage may determine.

R. B.—E.—You will find excellent lessons for "acquiring a knowledge of German without a master," in "The Ladies' Treasury," published monthly by Ward and Lock, Fleet Street.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The physiology of yawning is not very obvious: there is much about it that has not yet been explained.

AN AMATEUR CHEMIST.—Test paper is paper tinged blue by litmus or lacmus, a peculiar colouring matter procured from a lichen called Rocella tinctoria, from which also the purple dyes called archil and cudbear are obtained. Paper thus prepared is reddened by the feeblest acids.

WAT TYLER.—Apply to some skilful surgeon.

W. P. L.—We cannot undertake to furnish a receipt for brewing beer.

G. COOK.—Your pieces are more suitable for some religious periodical.

G. P. (Brighton).—The pamphlet, "Voices from Prisons, &c.," has long been out of print; but the greater portion of the matter, with much additional and very important matter, is contained in a recent publication, "The Great Obstacle to Education, &c.," by John Cassell, which may be had at our publishers, as may also the number you require of the "Educational Course."

MUNICH.—You are not at liberty to marry again, unless you have obtained a legal divorce from your first wife.

A COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER.—You are not at liberty to "do what you like with your own property," under the circumstances you name.

J. T. D.—Yes, perfectly legal.

A YOUTHFUL ASPIRANT.—We cannot undertake to decide character from handwriting.

H.—AQUAFORTIS is nitric acid diluted; the proportion of water must be determined by the amount of strength required.

TYRANT.—Much will depend on the terms of your agreement. The usual term is "reasonable hours;" but that must be regulated by custom, and the nature of the employment.

ANGELO FORRESTER.—Apply to some recruiting sergeant.

STIDDY.—It is the earth that moves, not the sun.

B. F.—The concertina is not a difficult instrument to learn. The price varies from a few shillings to several pounds.

W. P.—You can have all the numbers of our new series direct from our office, by sending, in addition to the price, the amount for postage. One penny stamp will secure the free delivery of three weekly numbers.

C. LLEWOD.—You can send three of our numbers with one penny postage stamp, provided you have the ends open. The word about which you inquire means, if used as an adverb, "before this;" if as a conjunction, "because that."

LILLY DALE.—Mr. Thomson, of America, is the composer of the air to which you refer. The alterations made by the English composer, and on the ground of which he claims copyright, are but few and trifling.

W. G. CAWOOD and D. D. D.—The work is out of print, and we fear you will not be able to complete your set. The reason why the "Apocrypha" is not, in general, printed with bibles, is that it is considered, as its name implies, of doubtful authority.

SERVUS.—We cannot interfere in misunderstandings between children and their parents; and we have reason to fear, from the very contemptuous terms in which you speak of both your parents, that they have just cause of complaint against you.

* We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Foul jealousy, thou turnest love divine
To joyless dread, and mak'st the loving heart
With hateful thoughts to languish and to pine,
And feed itself with self-consuming smart:
Of all the passions of the mind, thou vilest art.

SPENSER.

As Mrs. Chutnee had foreseen, our hero, having delivered his letter, received an invitation to the ball at the government house. It was his first introduction to society, and a more brilliant one could scarcely have been desired. Whether it was the safest remains to be seen; for, unhappily, the school of morals in India is something more than lax—a reproach, in which both sexes share. It is, however, by no means to be considered as a general one. Many of England's daughters retain, even in the hotbed of luxury and passion into which, on their arrival, they are cast, the same virtues and simplicity of character which render their native homes so sacred.

There were two persons who viewed his entrée in what was doubtless the highest circle of Calcutta with distaste—Sanford and Dawlish. They decidedly objected to it: the first from jealousy—the mortifying failure of his oft repeated attempts to penetrate the barriers of caste, for, after all, the Hindoos are not the only race who observe it most scrupulously; and the other from a species of dislike which he had conceived against the young stranger. Another, and yet stronger reason for Dawlish's distaste was Richard's friendship with Fred Wharton.

As for Mr. Chutnee, he had not quite made up his mind in what light to regard it. If the ward of his respected correspondent became popular—had what is called a succes de société—it might render him all the more dangerous; on the contrary, his failure would leave him with too much time upon his hands—too much at home.

That was what he particularly wished to be avoided.

The beautiful Zamora was the only person who felt particularly pleased on the occasion. She already felt a strong interest in Richard Tyrrell; his manners were so unassuming, so different from the vain self-sufficiency of the military beaux of the place; his conversation free from the over-strained compliments with which they almost without exception approached her.

Let us not be misunderstood. It was merely an interest such as a sister might feel for a brother—the sympathy of equal age, refined tastes; an interest indeed unmixed with passion, which but too often forms the alloy of friendship between the opposite sexes—the serpent that creeps and lies concealed under Eden's fairest flowers.

RICHARD AND LILLIAN AT THE BALL AT GOVERNMENT HOUSE.

In the simplicity, and, let us add, the purity of her heart, she contemplated the pleasure of witnessing his emotions on his entrée into the world—of assisting to form his opinions—of guiding them—perhaps of sharing his confidence.

"I must present you to Lady Bell," she exclaimed, the same day that the invitation arrived, "and Lillian."

"May I ask, who is Lady Bell?" demanded our hero.

"The most delightful creature in the world," answered the fair enthusiast; "so good, and as beautiful as she is good. Everybody loves her. She is quite the belle of Calcutta. There is not a beauty to compare with her."

"You must permit me to doubt the last assertion," answered the youth, with a frankness which caused Mr. Chutnee to feel exceedingly uneasy, for he observed that his wife slightly blushed at the implied compliment—a thing he had never seen her do before, even when she had received much more decided ones.

Not that there was the slightest occasion for her blushing, the speaker having made the remark in all the soberness of truth. He had noticed that Madam Chutnee was exceedingly lovely, and he admired her as he would have admired a gem or flower. The knowledge that she was a wife precluded in his heart any warmer feeling.

"You have described Lady Bell," said the husband, anxious to direct the conversation into another channel, "but not answered Mr. Tyrrell's question of who she is."

"It is your fault, Herbert," answered the mistress of the mansion; "you always allow me to run on without reflection. Her ladyship," she continued, "is the daughter of the Earl of Clayton, and the wife of Sir Charles Fourreau, who commands the 01st."

"The fine soldier-like man Mr. Chutnee introduced me to?"

"The same," replied the merchant.

"Having no children, she has adopted a very lovely girl, who was cast upon her protection under very peculiar circumstances, and treats her like her own child."

"People do say," observed the merchant, "that Lillian is the daughter of her husband."

"Ridiculous!" exclaimed the lady.

"Why so, my love?"

"Because, if that were the case, Lady Bell could not love and respect him as she does."

Mr. Chutnee felt gratified at his wife's belief in the sincerity of a young and beautiful woman's affection for a husband so many years older than himself.

"You cannot conceive," continued the speaker, "how perfect is the confidence which exists between them. From her rank, amiability, and talent, her society is generally courted. Enter a room, and, where Lady Bell is, there will you find the most distinguished men collected, hanging on her words, basking in the sunshine of her loveliness. If Sir Charles approaches, he regards her with a cheerful smile, nods, perhaps, and passes on; there is no restraint, no jealousy."

A more experienced listener than Richard would doubtless have remarked the slight emphasis upon the last word; but to him the absence of jealousy on the part of the colonel appeared only as the natural consequence of his being married. He could comprehend the jealousy of a lover, but not that of a husband.

"And is this Lillian so exceedingly beautiful?" he asked.

"Exquisitely so," answered Zamora. "So modest and retiring; not the overwhelming loveliness of her protectress, but the quiet grace which steals into the heart. You must guard yours," she continued, laughing, "for I have already written to Lady Bell to engage her protégée for the first dance with you."

"Is this art, now, or indifference?" thought Mr. Chutnee.

"I had hoped," replied Richard, "for the honour of another partner,—yourself."

"I seldom dance," observed the lady; "not that I will refuse you, but you will find plenty of time during the evening to dance with me. I am an old married woman," she continued, with mingled archness and demureness. "You must not compromise your chance of a success by walking your first quadrille with me."

As the fairy-like speaker uttered this, she smiled, and shook the long magnificent curls which hung half way down her shoulders.

"Decidedly I must get rid of this young man," thought Mr. Chutnee; "his being in the same house is intolerable."

Sanford, the managing clerk, entertained the same desire, and from a similar motive. He was already deeply in love, as he termed it, with the wife of his employer, who, had she been asked, would have felt puzzled to recollect there was such a person in her husband's counting-house, so slightly had she noticed him; and the cool, scheming libertine felt annoyed at the presence of one who might possibly become a rival under the same roof with him.

It was with considerable satisfaction, therefore, that he heard his employer that very same day, in the counting-house, ask him whether Mr. Tyrrell had ever spoken to him of setting up an establishment.

"Never, sir," he replied; "neither do I think he has the slightest desire to do so."

The merchant bit his lips.

"And yet he is quite rich enough?"

"Quite!" exclaimed the clerk; "but he appears so happy here."

This was not uttered without intention, and the shot told; the speaker saw the old man writhing beneath its effect.

"Of course," observed Mr. Chutnee, after a pause, "I cannot point out the propriety of his making his abode here a mere temporary affair. It might embroil me with my old friend and correspondent, Curry; but you might hint it to him."

"Certainly, sir, if you desire it."

"I do desire it!" replied his employer, emphatically;

"but without alluding to me."

"Certainly not," said Mr. Sanford.

"The old fool," muttered the last-named speaker, as soon as he was alone. "Jealous! jealous! but without a cause as yet—though how long it would continue so if this youngster remained, is more than I dare venture to speculate upon. His wife is susceptible—she must be, for it is quite out of the question that love was an ingredient in her ill-assorted marriage. Let me see: she is pure even in thought at present; proud and capricious, strangely capricious. If I could only excite the old man's suspicions—lead him to a remonstrance, a rupture—anger might do the rest. I wonder why he has never suspected me."

The last words betrayed the inordinate vanity and conceit of the man. They were the feelings which led him into expenses he could ill afford, and were the key to his character and designs, for it would be monstrous to suppose that aught like love ever entered into the selfish thing he called his heart.

But if love did not, desire and calculation did. He knew that the merchant on his marriage had settled a considerable portion of his fortune upon his bride, and doubted not but the rest would follow, in the event of her surviving him. Consequently, the death of the husband or the disgrace of the wife could only prove a gain to him.

Acting on the hint he had received, when Richard Tyrrell made his appearance at the counting-house, on the following morning, he began to sound him by asking how he liked Calcutta and the prospects of an Indian life.

"I have seen but little of either, yet," was the reply.

"And yet you have dined at the mess of the 01st," observed the clerk.

"O yes."

"And are invited to the ball at the government house."

"That is to come."

"True," replied the fellow, cunningly; "and as you remark, you have scarcely had time or an opportunity of forming your opinions yet. But you will have both as soon as you are established."

"How established?"

"In a house of your own. For, of course, you cannot invite your bachelor acquaintances to Mr. Chutnee's; and would not accept invitations without returning them."

Our hero began to reflect it was the second time Sanford had pressed him on the subject.

"I previously offered you my services," continued the speaker, "to assist you in your arrangements; permit me to renew them."

"Thank you," said Richard; "but really I feel no desire to change my abode; and as for the society you name, care very little about it. I wonder if I could without offence propose an arrangement that would obviate the necessity of doing so."

"Scarcely," observed the clerk, annoyed by what he considered the consummate coolness of the youth. "Mr. Chutnee, one of the wealthiest merchants in India, does not let lodgings."

"There is no mistaking that hint," he thought.

The young man coloured to the temples. Although comparatively ignorant of the world, he was not so simple as to suppose it very likely that the speaker would have ventured to speak thus plainly without a hint from his employer. He felt surprised—slightly hurt, perhaps—that such a proceeding should have been thought necessary; but angry only with himself, at what he considered his want of tact and ignorance of the world.

"You are very kind," he observed, "and I accept your offer; for really I have not the slightest idea of the necessary arrangements."

"Nothing more simple: a house near the artillery-ground—two salons, a dining-room, bath and sleeping-rooms—and, let me see, about five or six servants—"

"So many!" exclaimed his hearer, with surprise.

"Can't well do with less in India, even a bachelor," observed Mr. Sanford; "first you will require a khan-sumah, or butler, with a couple of khetmitgars, to attend at table, and a third to act as valet; a sirdar, to attend to the lamps; a bhustie, or water-carrier, and a aycee, or groom, to each horse."

"As for the sirdar, to keep accounts—"

"Stop, stop!" exclaimed our hero, laughingly;

"I can attend to those myself."

"Close," thought the clerk.

"How soon?" he added, speaking aloud.

"As speedily as possible," replied Richard; "I give you carte blanche."

Mr. Chutnee was delighted at the success of his clerk's tact, and congratulated himself upon having got rid, as he imagined, of a dangerous rival,—not that rivalry, in the proper sense of the word, can exist between youth and age: the advantages are too much on one side.

It was on the morning of the ball that Richard Tyrrell alluded in the course of conversation to his having taken a house near the artillery-ground, and expressed a hope to the merchant that he would honour it, by accepting an invitation to his first dinner.

Zamora looked disappointed.

"Are you really going to leave us?" she demanded.

"It is impossible, my dear madam," replied the youth, "that I should longer intrude upon your hospitality—a hospitality," he added, "which has been as graceful as kind. I may remain years in India, and shall doubtless make many friends, whom I must in turn receive."

"Could you not receive them here?"

"You overwhelm me—such kindness."

Mr. Chutnee, who secretly applauded himself more than ever for the resolution he had come to, now thought it was time for him to express his surprise and regret, which he did so naturally, that our hero believed him, and began to think he had acted precipitately.

"His wife did not believe him."

"Surely," cried the merchant, "a few weeks longer would have made no difference."

Richard bowed.

"How quick you have been about it," added the speaker.

"I had Mr. Sanford's assistance."

"And advice, no doubt," remarked his hostess, in a tone of vexation she did not care to conceal.

"And so you intend to form an establishment," she continued, after a pause—"be your own master. Perhaps you are right. Liberty of action, freedom from all control, is sweet at every age, but above all at yours."

This last observation was accompanied by a glance at her husband, who already began to repent of his manoeuvre. He had never heard his wife speak in so decided a tone before.

"Are you fond of horses?" she suddenly demanded, turning to our hero.

Richard modestly admitted that he was exceedingly fond of them.

"And intend to keep them?"

"Certainly."

"I am glad of that," exclaimed Zamora, joyously. "I am passionately fond of riding too; and now that I shall have a cavalier to escort me, intend to indulge in it. Herbert," she added, "you will see if Colonel Neville has sold the Arab mare he wished you to purchase for me a few days since."

"I thought, my love," observed her husband, deferentially, "that you had given up all idea—"

"I never give up my ideas," interrupted the lady, coldly; "I only postpone the execution of them."

The gentleman bit his lips in silence.

"Adieu," she said, extending her fair hand to the speaker. "I have my toilette to arrange—a care from which your sex is comparatively free."

Tyrrell took the hint and departed.

For several moments the ill-assorted pair—ill-assorted not only in years, but in disposition, for the lady was as open and confiding as her husband was jealous and suspicious—sat regarding each other in silence.

The merchant was the first to break it.

"You are dissatisfied, Zamora," he observed.

The beauty slightly elevated her shoulders.

"You suspect that I have exerted some influence to induce this young man to quit my house: you suspect me wrongfully."

He absolutely coloured beneath the glance of the pair of sparkling eyes that flashed for the first time indignantly, and somewhat contemptuously upon him.

"Not that I view his departure with regret," added the speaker, with an affectation of candour.

A low, musical laugh repaid him for the confession. "He is young and I am old."

"I knew that when I married you," replied the fair young creature, "and yet I gave my consent to our union; but I did not know that you were weakly, ridiculously jealous; had I suspected such to have been the case, I would have toiled, begged, starved, ere I pronounced the fatal 'yes.'"

"Fatal, Zamora?"

"Is it not, since it has destroyed my peace?"

"Gracious Providence!" murmured the old man, "are my suspicions, then, true? is it possible that you love this youth?"

"I know of no one more likely to win a woman's heart," was the reply.

"A mere boy."

"And yet you are jealous of a boy," retorted his wife, impatiently. "Love him! of course I do, as I love everything that is frank, generous, confiding, and truthful. How can I avoid loving him?—do I not love my flowers, my birds?"

"Better than your husband, I fear."

The tone of regret in which the words were spoken touched the heart of the angry beauty.

"Not better than I did love him till he doubted me. Herbert! Herbert!" she added, passionately, "what must Richard Tyrrell think? that I am one of those butterflies, that flutter round the flame of passion, mistaking its light for love,—that I am a creature lightly to be won. You have humbled me."

The repentant husband sank on his knees beside the couch on which as usual the fair monitress was reclining, and earnestly entreated to be forgiven.

"Could you see in my heart!" he exclaimed,

"you would pity me; its weakness arises from the bitter sense of my own unworthiness of such perfection, and the difference of our age. I love you, Zamora, not with the boyish feelings of inconstant youth, but the strong love of manhood; life has no hope in which you are not centered. You are my dream, my happiness," he added; "and like the miser I am jealous of my treasure."

"And like the miser would doubtless keep me under lock and key," quietly observed the lady, not in the slightest degree moved by his heroics. "No, Herbert, that will never do. Little as I care for liberty, deprive me of it, and I should pine for fresh air; my affections are only to be won by frank and open confidence,—suspicion withers them."

Mr. Chutnee vowed that he would never permit his suspicions to get the better of his judgment again, nay, even went so far as to propose requesting Richard to remain with them.

Zamora listened to him with a melancholy smile, and shook her head.

"Too late," she said, "too late; the mischief is already done. Our acquaintances will be surprised at his quitting us, at a want of hospitality so unusual in India; will talk, as they love to talk, for evil tongues are active in everything. Richard will hear these hints; and at last believe, perhaps, that he had only to woo and win me."

The excited creature coloured as she spoke, and her eyes, usually half-closed and dreamy, flashed with an expression her husband had never before observed.

"He dares not think so!" he exclaimed. "Should a word or look betray his thought, old as I am, I—"

"Shame!" again interrupted his wife; "it is you who merit the punishment, and not Tyrrell. What does he know of the world?"

"Not much," answered Mr. Chutnee, with a smile.

"I can read your thought," replied his wife, warmly, "as plainly as if you had uttered it. And what do I know of the world, you would have added; but you are wrong, Herbert, very wrong. An instant will sometimes serve to change the girl into the woman; and such a change has just taken place in me—wounded pride has wrought it."

The culprit once more sued for pardon; and this time pleaded his cause so eloquently that the justly offended lady relented.

"On one condition," she replied.

"Name, oh! name it! even though it should be to command me to request him to remain beneath my roof."

"It is now my wish he should depart from it."

Mr. Chutnee felt considerably relieved, and again entreated her to name the terms on which his forgiveness was to be sealed.

"That you do not accompany me to the ball."

He started from his knees as if a serpent had stung him.

"And let you accompany Mr. Tyrrell?"

"Yes."

"Alone?"

"Alone," repeated Mrs. Chutnee, emphatically.

"Never!" exclaimed her husband, passionately; "my heart would consume in its own fires."

"Unholy ones, I fear," was the reply.

"Be generous," he continued, without heeding the observation. "Why torture me uselessly—why ask what it is impossible I should grant?"

"I knew it was impossible," replied Zamora, mournfully, "for it implies your confidence, and that I now perceive it is not in your nature to bestow. Your refusal has shown me clearly the future which lies before me. Remember," she added, "the choice has been yours, not mine."

"What would the world say?" demanded her husband, hesitatingly.

"You have already given it occasion to speak lightly of me."

"What would Tyrrell himself think?"

"You have already given him the right to think lightly of me."

"What would you say yourself?"

Zamora drew herself up to her full height, and looked like a reproving angel, as the words which followed broke impetuously from her lips.

"I should say," she replied, "my husband is a man who has nobly redeemed his error; that if passion blinded his judgment for an instant, reason has restored it to its healthy tone; and if a thought, an unworthy thought, of another could gain entrance to my heart, the recollection of his conquest, his moral triumph, would chase it from me."

"Go to the ball alone," exclaimed Mr. Chutnee, yielding to the conviction of her sincerity and truth. "Do with me as you will. I am a fool to doubt you."

With these words he left the room.

Scarcely had he disappeared than Zamora clapped her hands and laughed like a spoiled child; and yet it was no part, no studied scene she had enacted; but truthful, every word of it truthful, as her own pure nature. She wished to love her husband; but felt, young as she was, that unless she could respect him all her desire to do so would be vain; and she rejoiced as the bird rejoices that has escaped a snare.

CHAPTER XLIV.

I wandered through the gorgeous rooms,

Mid silken robe and waving plumes,

And there were bright and living rays,

Darting from woman's love-lit eyes,

That far outshone the diamond's blaze,

Than ocean's pearls a richer prize.

AUTHOR'S SCRAP-BOOK.

From the variety of military uniforms, the mixture of Oriental and European costume—to say nothing of the loveliness of the women, that being understood as a matter of course—a ball at the Government House in Calcutta is rather a brilliant affair to a young man fresh from college, or the monotony of barrack life in a country town. He soon, however, becomes used to it—tinsel is so very common in the East; and a very little observation gives him the key to a state of society whose features have been stereotyped for the last century at least.

First, there is the Governor-General and his lady, if he chances to have one. In nine instances out of ten, the former is some noble nonentity, whom his party feel bound to provide for; and the latter, a ci-devant belle spirituelle, as most women are, in proportion as they are more or less passées.

Next follows the motley tribe of official personages—aides-de-camp, judges, secretaries, collectors; with here and there a dethroned rajah, and a sprinkling of native princes—pensioners upon the Company, who have relieved them of the trouble and responsibility of governing their territories.

Their Highnesses never dance; but they have no objection to display their diamonds, and indulge their scorn of the Feringhis, by gazing on the unveiled faces of their wives and daughters.

But what tends most to disenchant him is the knowledge that many of the fair girls, with complexions fresh as their toilettes and transparent as their tarlatan skirts, have been regularly invoiced out to the Indian marriage market by their speculative mammas.

As for the walt-flowers of society, we will not abuse the patience of our readers by describing them.

The characteristics are the same in all countries—ennui, scandal, and spleen; with an occasional dash of humour or manoeuvring.

There was a buzz of admiration when the merchant's beautiful wife entered the ball-room at the residence, leaning on the arm of Richard Tyrrell; the good-natured wondered where Mr. Chutnee, whose jealousy was so well known, could be: some applauded him for his confidence, others pitied him for the same cause.

"Pooh!" observed Dawlish, in reply to a remark from one of his brother officers; "he is only a boy."

"Such boys are sometimes dangerous," was the answer.

Having made her curtsy to his Excellency, Zamora proceeded at once to that part of the room where Lady Bell, surrounded by her usual bevy of beaux, was seated, and presented her young companion.

"Sir Charles speaks so highly of you," said her ladyship, in answer to our hero's compliment, "that I shall feel delighted to include you in my list of friends. Where is your husband, my love?" she added, turning to his companion.

"At his books and accounts," replied the lady; "at least, I suppose so, for he declined to accompany me."

This was uttered aloud, so that every one might hear it. Lady Bell repressed her inclination to smile; although she shrewdly suspected that there must be some little mystery concealed beneath her words.

At this instant the music was renewed, and she observed that it would be wicked to detain her from the dance.

"I shall not dance to-night," was the reply; "in fact, I should not have been here but for the pleasure of presenting my young friend, Mr. Tyrrell. You received my note?"

"Yes."

"And the reply?"

"Lillian must answer for herself. Here she comes."

Our hero turned as she spoke, and, to his great astonishment, recognised, as he thought, the original of the portrait which had so interested him during his brief sojourn at Weldon Park, in the fair girl who approached, leaning upon the arm of Sir Charles Fourreau—who both looked and felt proud of his fair charge. The orphan was now in her sixteenth year, the bud of promise opening to a flower, whose half unfolded leaves gave tokens of the perfections they would display when time had fully expanded them.

For the first time in his life the heart of Richard felt the spell of beauty; and we all know how delicious are the sensations it inspires.

Lady Bell presented him as the gentleman for whom Mrs. Chutnee had solicited her hand in the dance.

Lillian gave it with a smile.

As he was about leading her to the dancers, Dawlish came up, and requested to be honoured for the next set.

"I am engaged already," replied the fair girl, coldly.

The gentleman both looked and felt annoyed.

"For the succeeding one, then?" he added.

Lillian bowed in acquiescence; there was something in her air which convinced her partner she felt no inclination to dance with him.

"Too late!" observed one of Dawlish's brother officers, who enjoyed his mortification: "engaged."

"To a mere boy, too," added another, repeating the captain's words, when our hero and Miss Chutnee entered the ball-room.

"Such boys are sometimes dangerous."

It was the second time the observation had been made. Dawlish started, and, turning, beheld in the speaker Wharton.

His first impulse was to frown at the presumption of his former victim; but the recollection of the scene in the riding-school and the marvellous shots with the revolver, warned him of his danger. So he forced a smile as if he had only just recognised him.

"Hypocrite!" muttered the cornet to himself, as, faithful to the promise he had made of avoiding all occasion of quarrel, he turned away. "Contempt will soon replace my hatred of him."

There were two persons in the room who, during the dance, watched Richard and his lovely partner with equal curiosity, but widely different feelings. The first was Lieutenant Marsh; he too had been struck by Lillian's resemblance to the portrait, and wondered how the daughter of Sir Norman Boothroyd, as he supposed her, came to be present at a ball at Calcutta.

The second was a tall Hindoo, about thirty years of age, dressed in a caftan of magnificent cashmere, which fitted closely to his sinewy form. Unlike most of his countrymen, he had not even a jambea or dagger in his girdle, and the only jewel on his person was a solitary ruby in the turban.

It was Al Moorad, the wealthy native banker.

From the immobility of his features, the most curious observer could not have read a thought or feeling that was passing in his mind. With all our civilisation, the Asiatic far exceeds us in cunning mastery over his countenance, which not unfrequently wears a smile whilst the heart is torn by conflicting passions.

At the end of the dance our hero resigned the hand of Lillian, with reluctance, to Dawlish; the instant he had done so the lieutenant joined him.

"How singular," exclaimed the latter. "Has she explained by what extraordinary accident—"

"You are in error," interrupted the young man, with a smile. "Like yourself, I was startled at the resemblance to the portrait of Alice Boothroyd; but this young lady's name is Lillian."

Lieutenant Marsh repeated the name slowly after him.

"And she never heard of Meldown Park till I mentioned it this evening."

"Is it possible?"

"I would stake my life upon her truth," replied our hero, warmly.

Our readers must recollect that at the time of her short residence at St. Faith's the orphan spoke but few words of English.

"She is the ward or protégée of Sir Charles and Lady Bell Fourreau," added the speaker, "and was cast upon their care under peculiar circumstances."

"Who told you this?"

"Mrs. Chutnee."

"And did she explain those circumstances?"

"No. I question even if she knew them."

"I must learn them," muttered the lieutenant, as he walked away, "for there must be something more than accident in such a resemblance."

Several times during the evening Richard Tyrrell had again the happiness of dancing with Lillian. If the charms of her person had excited his admiration, he was still more captivated by those of her mind. Never had he met or conceived greater purity of thought and expression,—not an unkind word or ungenerous observation upon any of the many beauties in the room. Of Sir Charles and Lady Bell she spoke in terms of the deepest gratitude and affection.

When he resigned her hand for the last time, it was with a lingering regret that the evening was over; and he requested permission of her ladyship to call and inquire after her health on the following morning.

"Come when you will," was the gracious reply; "we shall always be happy to receive you."

Mrs. Chutnee, who had adhered to her resolution of not dancing, took his arm, and he escorted her to her carriage. During the dancing she had related to Lady Bell the conversation which had taken place between herself and her husband on the subject of our hero.

"You have acted rightly," replied her friend. "Jealousy is a monster that ought to be strangled in the cradle. If there is one thing I love Sir Charles for more than another, it is the unbounded confidence he places in me. I know that men in their selfishness call it love, but it is an error. You punished your husband very rightly."

When Zamora and her cavalier returned home, Mr. Chutnee received his wife with a burst of confidence so unusual that the lady felt quite surprised.

"Thanks!" he exclaimed, "a thousand thanks! You have cured me of my folly. You did not dance once."

"How know you that?"

"The unhappy man had sent a friend to watch."

"You have acted unwisely, Herbert," added the lady, coldly, as she retired to her apartment. "The proof of confidence has yet to be given."

The jealous husband turned aside and cursed himself for his folly.

Before leaving the ball-room at the government house, Richard Tyrrell had accepted an invitation to breakfast with his friend Wharton.

Breakfast in India does not mean the quiet domestic meal such as we understand it in England, but resembles more the déjeuner à la fourchette of our Gallic neighbours—a sort of early dinner, at which curries and highly-seasoned dishes are served up, with the accompaniment of wines and sherbets.

The young men naturally referred to the ball in their conversation. The cornet was far too generous and manly to repeat the words Dawlish had used in speaking of our hero—words which he sufficiently resented—but confined his observations to the ladies.

"She is indeed most lovely," he said, speaking of Lillian; "and I have no doubt as fascinating as lovely; for never did I see candour and purity more eloquently depicted upon the features of any human being. Save one, perhaps."

"Some fair girl in England, doubtless?" said Richard.

"No; the lady I allude to is in Calcutta."

"Indeed!"

"You saw her last night at the ball?"

"I do not recollect."

"Ingrate!" exclaimed Wharton; "I allude to Mrs. Chutnee. You must have been deaf not to have heard the buzz of admiration which greeted her appearance in the room; blind, not to have seen the glances that followed."

Our hero had indeed forgotten her: Lillian had absorbed all his admiration, and he blushed at what he considered his ingratitude.

"True," he said; "but Mrs. Chutnee is married."

"To an old man."

His hearer looked painfully surprised at the tone in which the words were uttered, and looked in his face inquiringly.

"There, do not regard me so seriously," exclaimed the young officer; "I merely spoke to try you. Many, last night, remarked upon the absence of her husband, who is known to be excessively jealous, and made observations which I will not repeat."

"Respecting Mrs. Chutnee?"

Fred nodded his head affirmatively.

"And me?"

"And you."

"Would I had heard them," said our hero, after a pause. "You cannot conceive how this information has annoyed me. I need not say the good-natured remarks were totally undeserved, for a more innocent being does not exist, than the woman, or rather girl—for she is not yet eighteen—they would calumniate. Oh, world, world!" he added, "what must I not expect to find in society, when such malice guards its very threshold."

"Perhaps it is because you are on its threshold," observed his friend. "Scandal is like a watch-dog; pass the entrance, and you are safe."

His visitor looked doubtful.

"I wish you would answer me one question," he said.

"Any," replied his host, "except the names of those who made the observations you complain of. To ask them were to doubt my friendship, to suspect me of moral cowardice in not resenting anything which you could possibly have been called upon to notice."

"I fear I must be silent, then."

The young men did not indulge very long over the luxuries of the table, but proceeded together to pay a morning visit to Lady Bell, who received them with her usual unaffected cheerfulness. Lillian, who was present, blushed slightly as her partner in the last night's dance inquired after her health.

It is astonishing how quickly time runs when passed in the society of those who interest us. Nearly an hour had elapsed before either of the visitors thought of departing, nor would they have done so then, but for the arrival of Sir Charles, Major Plinlimmon, and a party of officers.

Dawlish was one of the number.

"Now that you have arrived to entertain my guests, I shall leave you," observed the mistress of the mansion. "Neither Lillian nor myself have yet recovered from our fatigue."

"Do not let our presence drive you away," observed the major, bowing with all the stately gallantry of the old school.

"Your presence! certainly not," exclaimed her ladyship, laughingly, and at the same extending her hand to him. "How can you be so unjust to yourself to suspect such a thing?"

With a nod to her husband, and a slight inclination to Dawlish, she quitted the room. The last-named gentleman bit his lip. He perfectly understood whose was the presence that drove her away; and his ill-feeling was still further increased by the cordial manner in which her ladyship took leave of the cornet and his companion.

Sir Charles proposed billiards to his guests, but as neither Wharton nor our hero understood the game, a party could not be made up. Chess and a cigar were next suggested,—fortunately for the friends, who felt anxious to leave, the major hated chess.

"I always sleep over it!" he exclaimed.

One of the officers suggested a ride.

"Too hot," was the general reply.

"Well, gentleman," exclaimed their host, good-humouredly, "I have done my best; fix on something yourselves; my imagination is worn out."

Richard pleaded as an excuse for leaving them, that he had an appointment with Sanford to inspect a house he had taken; and Fred Wharton offered to accompany him.

"Away with you," said Sir Charles. "I plainly perceive that we shall not have any assistance from you, but may pass our morning as accident and the caprice of these gentlemen may direct,—every one for himself in the melée of opinions. What say you, Plinlimmon, to a game of ecarté?" he added.

The challenge was accepted, for the major being exceedingly stout, seldom felt disposed either to ride or walk unless upon service—that he never shirked. The two friends withdrew, and the rest of the party scattered themselves over the house, some to the billiard-room, others to the garden or library, as books and their counter attractions, cigars and the delicious nargil, prevailed.

The day being intensely warm, the two friends proceeded to view the new abode of our hero in a palanquin. The managing clerk—managing in more senses than one—had arrived before them, to preside, as he said, at the installation.

"Allow me," he exclaimed, with well-affected cordiality, "to welcome you to your own residence, where I trust you will pass many pleasant hours, and have sufficient friendship for me to allow me to share some of them with you."

Our hero smiled at the compliment: a smile pledged him to nothing.

"What think you of the arrangements?" added the speaker.

"I should be difficult to please, indeed," answered the young man, looking round him, "if I did not pronounce them perfect. What think you, Wharton?"

"Happy to change quarters with you," said the cornet, laughingly, "as soon as you are tired of your bungalow, I think they call it."

Mr. Sanford informed him that the word bungalow applied rather to a country residence, a building of less solid construction.

Fred thanked him.

"But who is your landlord?" he added, turning to his friend.

"Al Moorad, the native banker, I believe."

The officer shrugged his shoulders.

"Do you know him?"

"By sight only," answered his friend. "But I have heard no good of the fellow; he bears a bad name in Calcutta."

"Pardon me," observed the managing clerk, "but you must have been misinformed. There is not a more honourable man in the city. His signature is good on 'Change at any time for a lac of rupees."

"I did not speak of his commercial reputation, but his moral character. His cruelty, if the story related is true, to a poor Nautch girl, whom he deluded from one of the temples—"

"We never speak of moral character in India," interrupted Sanford, who evidently did not wish the tale to be related.

The young men regarded him with surprise, not unmixed with a feeling of contempt. There was something so revolting in his cynicism.

"That is," he added, perceiving the error into which he had fallen, "when conversing of the natives. They must not be judged by our standard, nor we by theirs."

"I should trust not!" emphatically exclaimed both the friends.

A tall man, about forty years of age, dressed in the costume of the East, approached the party, and saluted profoundly to our hero.

"Who is this gentleman?" demanded the latter.

"He is your gentleman, or any man's gentleman who pays him twenty-five rupees a month,—in other words, it is your khanumrah, or butler."

On hearing his office named, the man bowed yet more reverently than before.

"Humph! rather a remarkable looking person," observed Richard, regarding him attentively. "May I ask his name?"

"Hassan."

Richard repeated it.

"Hassan," said Mr. Sanford, speaking in Hindustani, "here is a pigeon for you to pluck—your new master."

"Ah, sahib!"

"Use him gently."

"As gently as if his feathers were those of a bird of Paradise."

Richard Tyrrell broke into a loud laugh; the clerk and the Hindoo looked surprised, especially the latter, mirth being considered as exceedingly undignified in the East.

"Excuse me, Sanford," said the young man, "but I was thinking what a capital sworn interpreter you would make."

"Is it possible that you understand Hindustani?" asked the clerk.

"Perfectly; do you imagine that I was so foolish as to come without a knowledge of it?"

The hypocrite bit his lips, and resolved to be more careful for the future how he spoke his mind before the boy, as he hitherto considered him.

"Being fleeced is the tax all Europeans pay on their arrival in the East," he exclaimed.

"So I presume."

"Old residents seldom escape it," added Mr. Sanford.

"Not when they have a friend!—a disinterested friend!—to advise them?" answered Richard.

"But what is this tale about Al Moorad?" he continued; "perhaps Hassan can inform me. I think you said that he lived with him?"

"True; but you will get nothing from him, he is fidelity itself to those whom he serves, or has served."

The Hindoo saluted at the compliment.

"I perceive, after all," said the new tenant of the place, "that I must trust to my friend Wharton's information; but my curiosity shall not make me forgetful of hospitality. Hassan," he added, "these gentlemen will dine with me; do your best for your master's credit and honour of the establishment."

"The sahib shall have no reason to complain of his servant."

And with this promise the native butler retired to make preparations.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

[TO OUR YOUNG READERS IN PARTICULAR, AND, INDEED, TO ALL OUR SUBSCRIBERS WHO ARE ANXIOUS TO ACQUIRE A KNOWLEDGE OF THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.—As one Branch of our Hopes and Helps for the Young, we purpose commencing a Series of Instructions in French. These will be on a plan which will enable them, with very little effort, to acquire a knowledge of that language, now becoming every day more and more important. These Lessons will be constructed on a plan so simple and perspicuous, that from the very first chapter a student will find that he has learned something, and will be thus encouraged to persevere.]

LANGUAGE.

CONVERSATION is an art. It is not obtained by intuition, but by careful attention and long practice. It is not the best thinker or most profound student that makes the best talker. Sometimes it is directly the reverse. Shallow people wonder at this as if they expected genius and talent to be as startling as Gog and Magog, forgetting that shy men are usually the keenest observers. But however this may be, conversational power is essential to those who mingle much in society. However highly we may value the ore of the mine, we want small change, current coin for daily use. Conversation is the minted coinage of polite life—the circulating medium.

The man who really knows how to talk agreeably is a prize. The requisites for a good talker are general information, clear perception, familiarity with the topics of the day, command of language, and an aptness for listening. A man may possess an immense amount of information without being able to communicate it to others—thus, for want of a clear perception, they may have all their information in one miscellaneous heap—an encyclopedia without alphabetical arrangement. Or, they may be exceedingly well-informed on things remote, while they are totally ignorant of current events. Or, they may have treasures of knowledge of men and things—they may have observed them in all their bearings, but fail, for want of appropriate language, to convey that knowledge to other minds. Lastly, they may know much and talk well—so well, indeed, that they fall in love with their own voice, and forget that other people may not entertain the same strong partiality.

POWERS OF LANGUAGE.

The capabilities and powers of language are great and wonderful. It is so flexible and yielding, so ready and susceptible, that it will take upon itself all the varieties of thought and modes of feeling, all the states of mind and heart which are found in the existence of the human soul, and convey them to others with the utmost ease and simplicity of expression. It will convey our warm impulses of tenderness and love, our earnest sympathies for the sick and sorrowing, our glowing thoughts, and the live embers of our philanthropy. It will fill our minds with the radiant light, and our hearts with the sparkling joy of others. It will open to us treasures of wisdom, which are around us, and which have accumulated in immense profusion, during the slow lapse of centuries in which it has been employed to chronicle the thoughts and deeds of men. It will bring around us the great and the good of all past ages for our friends and companions, and familiarise us with what they saw, and heard, and thought, and felt; and will inform us of the world as it is. Comprehending, then, the importance of the use of language, we cannot fail to see the necessity of making it a perpetual study. Ordinary thoughts, and the common conceptions of mankind, when clothed in the comely garb of pure, refined, and flowing words, become to us truly delightful, and awaken the sweet and tender sensibilities of our better natures. The conversation of a person of only common abilities and attainments is deeply pleasing, and often thrillingly interesting, when words joined in harmonious relations, and expressive of real refinement and sensibility, are chosen as the symbols of thought and emotion. "Words fitly spoken are like apples of gold in pictures of silver." Charmingly delightful are they to a soul of refined and tender sensibilities. They fall upon it like notes of music, and thrill and tremble there in cadences which bring the soul into harmony with all beautiful things.

Therefore, it is incumbent on us all to study the powers of language and to employ it in all its purity and beauty.

HOME THE PROPER SPHERE OF STUDY.

At home, we should accustom ourselves to use pure and appropriate language. Home is not only the proper place for pure and refined language, but it is the place to learn that language which we wish to use abroad.

Home is the place where we form many, if not the most of our habits, both of action and speech. These habits we carry into the world. The vulgarities which we use at home we shall use abroad. The coarse sayings, the low jests, the vulgar phrases, the grammatical blunders, all the verbal improprieties which go to form a part of our home conversation, will enter into our conversation at all times and in all places. If we permit cant sayings, street rignaroles, and clownish vulgarisms to stain our tongues at home, we shall be sure to have them blistered with these same idle, worse than idle, things, in places where we shall be mortified to hear them fall from our own lips. There is but one way to have a pure and chaste speech; that is, to cultivate at home the common use of those words which are at once appropriate and graceful. To be successful in this, we must first cultivate pure and refined thoughts and feelings, and then give the freest, easiest, and most agreeable expression to them that our knowledge of words will permit. Strive always for the most pleasing and musical forms of expression; those which are clear simple, having no double meaning, and at the same time so appropriate and chaste that they would sound equally well anywhere.

In doing this, we need not seek pompous words, great swelling phrases. These, as a general rule, are gross vulgarisms, as offensive to a refined taste as many of a coarser yet simpler nature. What is required is a child-like simplicity of speech, united with a purity of word and diction which cannot offend the ears of the most ardent lovers of literary refinement. We would not recommend any stiffness of speech, or a long, round set of phrases, which come and go like the tide, or that soft, silly, simpering affectedness, which is so strangely precise that each word must be pinched out, by rule, between the tongue and the lips. These are forms of vulgarity as truly detestable as any other. We would have language come from the tongue as easily and as purely as a song from the throat of a bird, and have such language always chosen as shall dress in the most becoming manner the idea to be delivered. To secure this most desirable end language must be our study—our practical everyday study. We should learn, by perpetual practice, to clothe our common ideas in a simple, easy dress, a purely chaste expression, and clothe them with a gracefulness of manner and an elegance of diction which is proper for all places.

MISUSE OF LANGUAGE.

Some people fall into one kind of error, and other people into other sorts of error when they begin talking. Among these we may notice the introduction of inappropriate topics. Forgetting that words cut sharper than knives, they, in the utmost simplicity, utter sentiments and express opinions which lacerate the feelings of those who hear them. There may be circumstances connected with the occupation, the appearance, the personal or family history of another, which, recklessly to touch, is to open up a source of pain and disquietude. There is nothing more intolerable in ordinary conversation than a political squabble, except a religious controversy. Both—but especially the last—should be carefully avoided, or approached with the greatest amount of delicacy.

Some people exaggerate in their conversation, and this is as annoying as it is pernicious. Everything they see or hear is swollen to gigantic proportions. "All these geese are swans," till you see the birds.

Perhaps from an indefinite consciousness of inability to engage attention by their dearth of interesting realities, they work up the commonest materials into the most showy romances, stirring up the smallest homœopathic sediment of truth into colouring matter, enough for hogsheads of the adulterated article. This is a species of moral petty larceny, as disreputable to the delinquent as it is detrimental to society.

Equally objectionable, though not so morally guilty, is the man who adopts the motley; a weak-minded disciple of the comic school, who regales you with the jokes of the week-before-last's Punch, and laughs very heartily at them himself; who is always labouring with a pun, and inflicts a host of poor gray-headed Joe Millers without the slightest remorse. It is a mournful sight to behold a specimen of this class trying with might and main to set the table in a roar! We always look at a man of this sort as the Turk would have his son regard a Frank: "My son," said the Moslem, as he directed his boy's attention to a Frenchman in full costume—latest Paris fashion—"look at that infidel; if you forswear the Prophet, you may live to look like him!" Of course we would not argue that no man should be witty or humorous, that everybody should be staid and solemn; but there are many degrees of difference between a mourning dove and a chattering magpie.

We may remark also that the use of slang terms is highly offensive to good taste. We need not enumerate the sort of phrases to which we refer: unhappily, they are too common. Surely none will contend that there is any sense in these thousand good-for-nothing words and phrases. We ought to strike the whole family of these verbal monstrosities from our vocabularies of usual words. They are incorrigible vulgarisms, black spots on the fair face of our beautiful English. What are they worth? Of what use are they? Whom do they benefit? Who likes us any the better for using them? Who regards them as an evidence of either wit, sense, or refinement? What ear do they please? To what taste do they administer? What sense do they gratify? Can you give any respectable, any decent apology, any one of which you yourselves would not be ashamed for their use? Then why use them? Why not cut them out of your conversation, your language? At once determine to use none but chaste, pure, sensible words—words which express clearly and forcibly your thoughts, which are evidences of inward purity and a refined taste?

There is still one more abuse of language to which we wish to refer. We mean profane swearing. Of all useless, worthless, and totally depraved habits, to which men bow in willing, voluntary bondage, the habit of profane swearing heads the list, and crowns the whole. For nearly all evil habits there can be some apology offered, some faint semblance of an excuse, some dim outline of the shadow of a reason, but for this we have never heard the first feeble attempt at a defence. This stands out a monstrous deformity in human language, with none to plead for its life or tell of a single merit belonging to it. In the use of profane language, no idea is to be expressed, no object is to be attained, no end secured, no ear to be pleased, no taste to be gratified, no friendship to be obtained, no appetite to be administered to, no passion to be fed, no title to be acquired, no wealth to be earned, no possible good, either real or imagined, is had in view. They mean nothing. They are wicked cheats, playing a game of deception, attempting to palm off a blustering sound for a substantial thought. Profanity is surely a good witness of a terrible dearth of wisdom, a frightful scarcity of ideas. Nor will any one pretend that there is any good in profanity; for besides being an arrant cheat, it is an idle and wicked use of the names of the greatest and best Being in the universe, the best and truest friend of every human creature.

Every one would be most heartily ashamed of himself should he, by an unlucky slip of the tongue, use profane words in a refined circle of acquaintances.

The utter silliness of profane swearing is well shown in the anecdote of a good Quaker. He had by some accident offended one of his neighbours. The neighbour, to vent his wrath, wrote him a long and most terribly blasphemous letter, being about half made up of profane words. The good Quaker wrote him a very mild reply, of about the same length, in which he interspersed very thickly, in parentheses, the phrase, "bottles and tongs," to supply the place of his neighbour's profanity. Now, if all profane swearers would do as the Quaker did, use the phrase "bottles and tongs," instead of profane words, they would see what a pigmy atom of sense is found in profane swearing, and what a terrible outrage to pure language it is.

Let us regard these things in a proper light. We dress our bodies with care and taste. We decorate and adorn them. Are not our thoughts of much more value? Whatever ornaments we may give to our physical frame, let us not fail to attire our thoughts in the most chaste and tasteful garments, adorning them with the refined gold and jewels of our language.

THE FIRST QUARREL.

They never loved as thou and I,
Who vindicate the moral—
That aught which sweetens love can lie
In true love's lightest quarrel.

"It is certainly very disagreeable to love another so much."

This original remark was uttered as a stage soliloquy, the little dressing or sitting-room having no other occupant than the very pretty woman who laid down her book with a yawn, and took up a pattern in crochet, lazily netting a few stitches. To one who had never suffered from this excess of idolatry it might be considered rather a singular complaint; but the case stood thus: Flora Hastings had been a wife the very long time of three months and a half. Her wardrobe and house being in complete order, her husband very much at leisure in business, and with ample means, they had found nothing better to do than the modern and very selfish occupation of "living for each other." That is, they had declined all party invitations after the first gloss of the bridal dress was dimmed, and, when seen at all in public, were always together, she leaning upon his arm with an enviable air of self-satisfaction, looking up into his face with a most adoring glance whenever he chanced to speak, and he in turn bending down to catch her most trivial remark with a devotion that would have become a just-engaged lover. If at a concert, he fanned her, he supported her opera-glass, he carried her hood and shawl. But even music, in which they both professed to be amateurs, seemed to have lost its accustomed charm, and they were certain to leave at the end of part first, no matter what were the attractions of the bill to less absorbed spectators.

In short, everybody said—and everybody, when turned gossip, is not over civil or complimentary sometimes—that "they were making fools of themselves, and it could not last for ever." Some people are so envious of anything in which they do not share!

They did not live in the city in the summer season, but at Mr. Hastings' little country-house; large enough, however, to be thoroughly comfortable, and well-fitted, and with a head servant who never bothered her mistress by asking instructions, which were sure to be comprehended in one sentence, "You know best, Margaret." So they lived an idle, fond, and, as they imagined, a perfectly happy life, with flowers which the gardener cultivated, a little music, and the new books of the season. They did not invite any company to Brookside; they did not wish any. Mr. Hastings rode to town between nine and ten, returning by three, and from that time they were constantly together, reading, walking, or driving in the low carriage, one of their late acquisitions.

At first, they thought it delightful to sit together on the verandah, Mr. Hastings enjoying his after-dinner cigar and the newspaper, Flora with the last new novel and an exquisite silver paper-cutter, that had been one of the engagement presents. But they did not get on very well, there was so much talking to do between times, and at last they conceived the happy idea of reading aloud. Four whole days this had been considered the height of enjoyment. They scarcely tasted the dessert, so anxious were they to resume the thread of the story. Then the sewing-chair and the work-basket table took their place outside the casement window, and Flora, with the prettiest and most becoming air of industry, listened to Mr. Hastings, who sat with his feet supported at a considerable angle on the trellis of the porch, his chair artistically balanced, and his head adorned by a broad-leaved straw hat—not because he needed it, but Flora considered it particularly becoming to his dark, Spanish, melodramatic style of face and figure.

And then those little episodes of comment and criticism, the hero and heroine being in all cases judged and tested by their individual experience, and pronounced wanting, if the scales were not poised to the most minute equality.

"A quarrel! My dear Alfred, how can any woman speak unkindly to her husband? I should be ready to bite my tongue off if I could be guilty of it to you."

"My precious love would never think of such a thing, I am sure. But all women have not such angelic tempers, dearest."

"And then some men are so provoking, not in the least like my Alfred. How did it ever, ever happen you should care for me?"

Considering Miss Flora Willis was the prettiest, most admired, and wealthiest young lady of Mr. Hastings' acquaintance, it was rather singular.

"Angel!" It was well the thicket of sweet-briar formed such a perfect screen, as the heavenly epithet was emphasised with a most enraptured kiss.

"How long have we been married, love?" inquired the angel, in the most captivatingly thoughtful mood, her hand looking so very white and small as it rested on his jet-black whisker.

"Three months, fourteen days and a half, my pet," responded the happy husband, with the precision of a country tombstone or obituary notice. "Fifteen weeks to-morrow since I was made so very, very happy."

"And we love each other as dearly as ever. How strange!"

"Yes, more dearly. Very. And they told us we should change!"

Such sarcastic repudiation of the charge as was conveyed in that tone and glance! "They" would have been withered by it; even the blossoms of the sweet-briar shook and trembled.

"You could not be unkind to your poor little Flora?"

"Never, my own darling! And she would not give her husband—"

"Never—never—never!"

The reader is to suppose the blanks filled by an accompaniment between the murmur of an Æolian harp and the coo of a wood-pigeon. And so the poor book fell to the floor; and then it was too dark to see. A walk was proposed through the shaded lanes; and, when they returned, Flora was too weary to listen. The love-quarrel in the tale was left without denouement. Our actual lovers were so happy that they could afford to linger over it.

So it happened that the young wife was reduced to the occupations before described, this warm summer afternoon. Her watch, again and again consulted, was held for at least three-quarters of an hour in her hand, the moments creeping by, and still Alfred had not come. She went out on the verandah and peered through the thickets of shrubbery; but there was no sign of either horse or rider; and, while she stood there disconsolately, she saw the book half hidden by the newspaper just as it had been dropped the night before. "What could keep Alfred so long?" They might have read several chapters before dinner, and found out how the quarrel was made up. But the book must not lie there; and, as she stooped to raise it, the leaves whirled over, opening most invitingly to chapter sixteenth. She could not resist reading on a few pages, still leaning over the railing of the verandah, and then, more absorbed, sat down in the little sewing-chair, and finished the exciting scene. She did not recollect until then the strict agreement they had entered into not to read this particular book separately; but a chapter or two could make no possible difference, she thought, walking up and down the garden path, and listening to every sound.

"It was full an hour beyond the usual time. What could have happened? That horse, she was sure he was not to be trusted, and going so near the railroad especially. Oh, how dreadful it would be if he were brought home dead, or very much injured! How horrible to watch him suffer pain! And then he was obliged to go down to those dreadful wharves. Oh, if he was anything but a shipping merchant! She was kept in such constant fear of small-pox, or typhus fever, or some other shocking disease, all so prevalent this season. He must be ill; yes, he had complained of a headache in the morning. If he did not come in another quarter of an hour, she should certainly go to town in the evening train in search of him." And then she imagined herself driving about in fearful haste, in a very desolate-looking cab, so infinitely wretched that the tears came into her eyes at the very thought.

Imagine her joy, then, at the sound of horses' feet, just as this frantic resolution was taken, and she flew down to the gate to meet Alfred just as he dismounted to open it, receiving as a reward for all her anxieties a shower of kisses and loving epithets, with fond chidings for her unreasonable fears for his safety.

She forgot to inquire for the headache. "Oh, what a warm, disagreeable, uncomfortable day it had been! If people could only live without eating on such days!" And yet the two managed to make a very comfortable dinner, in spite of heat and romance, with a plentiful dessert of strawberries and cream. It was later than their ordinary hour, so much so that it was nearly dark by the time Alfred's cigar was finished. Flora thought he was much longer than usual in smoking, and discovered, with some impatience, that he had indulged himself in a second; a rather unusual and selfish proceeding, she thought, considering he was so very late, which, by the way, was not yet accounted for. The "angel" had managed to work herself into a slight nervous fever, with the heat and afternoon's restlessness. It even seemed possible, for the instant, that the "king could do wrong." However, the pouting lip was kissed into its full roundness again, as the unconscious offender proposed an adjournment to the dressing-room and lights.

"Don't you think it rather too warm, dearest?" was the mild expostulation of the husband, as Flora prepared to make his knee her easy chair as usual.

"They would never quarrel! Oh, no; they had not even disagreed as yet."

Not a word was uttered in reply; but one weather-wise might have dreaded the portentous silence more than the most abrupt retort, as the injured wife deposited herself on an ottoman instead. After she had been worrying about him all the afternoon, too! She was fairly sick with anxiety; and this was all her thanks!

"And now what shall we do this evening, my precious? Do you feel able to sing to your husband?"

Exerting herself to sing such an oppressive evening! It was just as thoughtful as men usually were. What a selfish, exacting, indifferent race!

"It was too hot." Well, men are only mortal, and even they may feel hurt or startled at an abrupt answer to an ordinary question. But perhaps he had been mistaken; Flora certainly could not have used that tone to him. "Perhaps my darling would rather have me read to her?"

My darling vouchsafed to hand the book, open at the close, instead of the commencement of the sixteenth chapter.

"We did not get quite so far as this. Let me see—about half through, I think."

"I finished it this afternoon."

"Oh, Flora, you remember our agreement. How could you?"

"You did the same thing yesterday!"

"One little paragraph when the cook called you, dear."

"Well, I can't help it. You can read up to me."

"What if I don't choose to?" And Alfred's tone was certainly approaching the key at which Flora maintained the duet. There may have been an added sharp.

"You can do as you please, my dear!"

It was not so much the words as the smile of mock courtesy, and the flash of her eyes as she rose and left him. She had not intended to speak so: she could not tell what evil spirit possessed her; nor did she feel how much expression that single sentence conveyed until she heard—

"I certainly shall, my love!" in a tone he had never used before; so firm, so compressed it seemed; and he, too, deserted the centre-table, and went out into the night air.

She threw herself on the bed, intending at first to go back to his side in a moment and "make it all up." But, as she heard his retreating footsteps, a new resolve flashed through her mind. She would undress and pretend to be asleep when he came; that would punish him properly for attempting to resent anything she might say. It was scarcely an instant's work; the pile of snowy skirts, the light lawn dress, were crushed into a heedless mass of drapery, the little slippers flung carelessly away; and, before Alfred could have reached the gate, the white-robed figure was resting as quiet and calm as if never disturbed by an angry or fearful emotion. One thought troubled her, notwithstanding this outward composure. Perhaps he was seriously angry, and might stay away for a long walk; but no, whatever his intentions, he returned almost immediately and sat down beneath the shaded light. Her heart throbbed with secret exultation; he evidently wished her to come back and allow him to read. He should try a little suspense. She glanced beneath the hand that concealed her face. He looked sad and troubled; but he had resumed his book. Perhaps he thought she would return by the time the chapter was finished; but she would teach him a lesson; he should ask forgiveness, for he had spoken as crossly as herself.

Ah, what had become of all the loving fears and anxieties of that little heart, the fond, restless yearnings of the afternoon, when she thought that to see him safe and well again would be all she could ask of earthly happiness? Where was the self-sacrificing devotion that had then been ready to nurse him through the most frightful illness, regardless of fatigue, exposure, or contagion? She knew he was not happy; she heard him sigh unconsciously as he turned the pages, and that one word, one sigh from her could make him cheerful again; and yet she withheld it. She did not feel really angry; but he would be sure to come soon and sue for a reconciliation, and then she would tell him she was very sorry, and it would be ten times pleasanter than before. Still he did not come, and she was growing very sleepy. She had promised herself never to sleep at variance with her husband, and never before since their marriage had she missed the good-night kiss upon her forehead, or the whispered blessing, their last parting word. She would doze a few minutes, and then go to him, perhaps she thought; he surely would not think of sleeping so. She was very tired, and it was very warm, and then one white, round arm was thrown over the fair linen sheet, and, with flushed cheek, and lips slightly apart, the little lady forgot her ill temper and her vexation together.

She woke from an unhappy dream with a feverish start, a moment after, as she thought at first. But the rooms were quite dark; and there was no sound but the monotonous ticking of the watch under her pillow. A rush of recollection succeeded the troubled waking, and she put out her arms to be sure that she was not dreaming still—that it was really so late. Her husband's pillow was empty! She thought of the sofa by the window in the dressing-room; he certainly could not intend to sleep there, away from her all night! A grieved, sorrowful feeling took the place of the first resentful thoughts; and then pride came back again, as a sound from the next room confirmed her suspicions. It was her husband turning restlessly upon the sofa, with a long, sobbing sigh, as if even in his sleep he felt their estrangement. The first impulse, to go to him, to kneel down and wind her arms around him, and ask his forgiveness, was resisted. It was certainly unkind in him to go to sleep without kissing her a good-night; she should have wakened if he had, and then it would have been all right. A long, rolling crash of thunder broke in upon her reverie; the glare of lightning which accompanied it revealed the sofa and its occupant; and then came a deluge of rain, and she heard the wind beating down the shrubbery before the window. The casements were both open, the rain came drenching in upon the new Brussels carpet, the books upon the centre-table, her work-basket, and there was Alfred, for whose health she had been so anxious, exposed to the wind and dampness. Should she go and close the casement? No; that might waken him, and he would think she had given up to him; besides, she shrank from crossing the rooms at midnight, lighted only by those lurid flashes in the black, angry heavens. Poor, wretched little wife, miserable indeed in her self-torture, lying upon her "widowed marriage pillow," and listening with straining eyes to the crash of the storm without, and the heavy breathing of the sleeper near her! Harder than all to bear was the upbraiding conscience, and the dreary loneliness of the empty room. But, with all this, she sank again into a disturbed, uneasy sleep; and, when she woke again, the cold, sickly daylight was stealing through the room.

At first, she could scarcely recollect what had happened; but, as she sat up leaning upon her elbow, she saw her ornaments thrown in confusion upon the dressing-table, her dress upon the carpet, Alfred's deserted pillow, with the smooth fold of the linen undisturbed, and there he was lying, breathing so heavily that her fears overcame her self-will, and she called him to her side. But there was no answer but a half moan of pain as he threw his arms out wildly, as one in delirium. She was at his side in a moment, lifting the damp masses of his hair, kissing his eyes, his feverish cheeks, calling him by every endearing name; but the submission had come too late, he did not know her; and though he opened his eyes, it was only to close them again, as if the light was painful, with an indistinct, incoherent mutter. She had never seen violent illness before; but she realised in a moment that the fever she had so dreaded was upon him. The headaches—and he had been detained in town only by a visit to his physician, which he did not like to explain to her, fearing to alarm his darling—had been the precursors of a threatening malady which the heat and sudden change of temperature, lying since midnight by the open windows, had developed rapidly. The curtains, the couch, his clothes, his very hair, were drenched in the driving shower, through which he had slept heavily.

Poor little wife, indeed fearfully punished, as she watched many a long day and lonely night ere reason returned, listening to his beseeching tones, begging her not to turn from him, not to be angry at such a trifle, to kiss him once more. And she did rain tears and kisses upon his burning forehead, his lips, his hair, without hushing those pleading entreaties that almost broke her heart. It was a long, long trial; but reason came at last, and she sobbed with joy and thankfulness, as she had done with anguish and remorse, when she caught the first conscious glance, so full of love for her, the first faint murmur, "My own precious wife!"

Henceforth they lived more wisely; and years after, when the wife was tempted to give utterance to impatient moods, fretful and angry words died away on her lips, rebuked by the remembrance of that terrible agony, lest her husband should die with the words of forgiveness unspoken.

Chemical Experiments.

PROCEEDING with our dyeing operations, I shall now show you how to dye with Prussian blue. This beautiful pigment, like indigo blue, is insoluble, therefore it can only be employed as a dye pigment by an ingenious contrivance, of which, before performing the dyeing operation itself, I will give you some idea by a preliminary experiment. Procure some prussiate of potash;—a yellow salt which, though prussic acid be obtained from it, is not itself a poison. Dissolving a little of the prussiate of potash in water, and adding a few drops of any common solution of iron (acetate of iron, employed in the preceding operation, will answer perfectly well), the whole liquid will assume a lovely blue appearance owing to the formation of Prussian blue. The young operator working at these experiments, will now easily recognise how Prussian blue, though itself insoluble, may be employed as a dye stuff to impart its colour to woven fabrics. The dyer has only to imbue the fabric with an iron-salt in the first instance, afterwards dipping it into solution of prussiate of potash, or the reverse, and the blue colour, being generated within the tissue itself, will be permanent.

The fact may be here remarked, that there are several kinds of Prussian blue, though the sort just mentioned is the most commonly known and the most important.

These few experiments in dyeing, which the reader has now gone through, will have prepared him to understand that the tints which can be permanently imparted to fabrics by direct processes are comparatively few. Direct dyes, or those which take without the aid of any second substance, are called substantive dyes: those which require a second substance are called adjective dyes; a perfectly appropriate term, which will be easily understood.

Though the ancient Egyptians appear to have been acquainted with the process of calico-printing, it must have been a very rude process when compared with those now employed. Calico-printing could not have been brought to any great perfection, or dyeing either, until the advancement of chemistry beyond what was known to the ancients, and until the discovery of more raw dye materials than were at their disposal. Many of our most beautiful dye substances come from America, wherefore it follows that they could not have been known until subsequent to the year 1492, when America was discovered. Most of the beautiful dye-woods are American, and the animal substance cochineal is also American. Cochineal, by-the-by, is the foundation of most of our modern scarlets and purples—the latter particularly beautiful. The reader will here perhaps ask himself what has become of the much celebrated Tyrian purple, which during the Roman imperial epoch was so greatly valued, and held to be so exclusive, that no one, except he were of the imperial stock, was allowed to wear it. When I record that a pound of wool dyed purple with the celebrated Tyrian pigment fetched a price no less than forty pounds of our money, the reader will perceive in what great estimation it was held. Compared with purples which we possess now, the celebrated dye of Tyre must have been dull and unattractive. I need not write thus doubtfully; I may say is dull and unattractive—seeing that the process of purple dyeing in the old Tyrian way is perfectly well known, and might be followed, if we moderns thought it desirable.

The celebrated Tyrian purple is nothing more than a juice which exists in a particular vein of certain shell fish, found on our coasts and on the coasts of Ireland even more plentifully than on the coasts of Tyre. The jealousy of the Roman emperors limited the knowledge of working in Tyrian purple to certain families; the jealous policy being transferred to the Greeks of the Eastern Empire, a period occurred at last when only the members of one family knew how to perform the operation, and a little later the process was lost entirely.

Curiously enough, an English gentleman, named

Cole, discovered the process in the reign of Charles I. It should be mentioned that a Byzantine princess, Maccrombolitessa by name, happened to see the process of purple-dyeing, and left a record of it; meagre enough, however, inasmuch as the lady mentions little more than the fact that the colour was produced from a shell fish, and that the juice only became purple after exposure to air.

In the reign of Charles I., Mr. Cole, a gentleman resident at Bristol, became acquainted with the circumstance that a poor woman residing on the coast of Ireland, got her living by marking names, in a delicate purple colour, on the corners of pocket-handkerchiefs. Subsequently Mr. Cole became aware of the fact that the Irishwoman marked the pocket-handkerchiefs with the juice of a shell fish. Following out this germ of knowledge, Mr. Cole eventually re-discovered the whole process of using the Tyrian dye, and M. Jussieu, in France, confirmed the discovery of Mr. Cole.

The Tyrian purple was valued so much, because it was a substantive colour, and the only purple then known. There is a tale about the manner of its discovery, which I fear is more pretty than true. The Tyrian Hercules had a sweetheart, it is said, and the lady had a little dog. One day, as the story goes, the little dog went wandering about on the sea shore, and came back with his lips all covered with purple stains. The lady taking a fancy to the colour, told Hercules she could never see him again, until he presented her with a robe dyed with the same purple dye. The dog had been eating the shell-fish. Hercules set himself about discovering the source of the purple, and fortunately succeeded.

As regards scarlet, the ancients had a substitute for cochineal in a little Spanish insect, called the kermes insect. It was a very sorry substitute for cochineal, however; the more particularly, as the ancients could not by chemical methods bring out the colour either of kermes, or (if they had possessed the latter) of cochineal. Our fine scarlets are made by steeping the fabric to be dyed, first in a decoction of cochineal, then in a solution of muriate of tin.

LIFE'S MORNING, NOON, AND NIGHT.

A GOLDEN-COLOURED sky—bright, sunny rays,
Falling upon a garden filled with flowers,
In which fair, laughing childhood gaily plays,
Chasing the fleeting minutes into hours,
While all around is gladness;
Pure, blushing blossoms still untouched with blight;
Bright leaves still bending 'neath the pearly dew;
All prickly briars hidden from the sight;
All things around unfading, all things true;
Unknown the touch of sadness.
Such is Life's Morn!

A warmer glow the sky now wears—a sultry breeze
Is sighing through the groves and shady bowers,
Tinting with many hues the shrubs and trees;
The sparkling dew has vanished—and the flowers
Are slowly dying.
A leaf falls here and there—a thorn is seen;
Content, with trust and childhood, pass away;
Ambition glides upon the altered scene,
And Avarice asserts her powerful sway,
All rule defying.
Such is Life's Noon!

Dark clouds are banishing the lingering light,
And throwing all around a heavy gloom;
Desolate is the garden once so bright,
For at its end is found a yawning tomb.
Death is its keeper!
Yet the clouds scatter, and a Star appears—
A brilliant light it sheds upon the grave,
Disclosing an entrance into heavenly spheres,
And One upon a Throne with power to save
Each dreamless sleeper.
Such is Life's Night!
But ah! when this has passed away,
We dwell in realms of light.

JAMES WHITESIDE, ESQ., M.P.

IRELAND has always furnished her full share of the ranks of those celebrities who have contributed to the power and glory of the British empire. She has given us soldiers and statesmen, lawyers and divines, poets and painters, whose reputations will last as long as our language. The wit and wisdom of Ireland have rendered England good service, as well as added to the lustre of our sister isle. Among these celebrities we may fairly place the subject of our present sketch. As a clever lawyer, an able speaker, a gifted writer, Mr. Whiteside deservedly occupies a high place in public estimation, and his acceptance of office under the new ministry has given general satisfaction, totally irrespective of political views.

An Irishman must without doubt be the best able thoroughly to appreciate Irish affairs. He must therefore be far better qualified to discharge official duties in connection with his own country than any other; and the appointment is certain to afford gratification. Although we have come to look upon Ireland as an integral part of the British empire, there is still a feeling of patriotism which does not extend beyond its shores. There is nothing in this which is not referable to the local interest excited in any part of the United Kingdom by the elevation to a place of trust of any local celebrity. It is perfectly natural that we should be gratified at the success of our own countrymen, and especially when the individual is universally esteemed.

Mr. Whiteside was born at Delgany, county Wicklow, in 1806. Delgany is a neat specimen of a pretty Irish hamlet, close to Bellvue, and to the Windgate-road by Bray, and within a mile and a half of the sea. His father was the Rev. William Whiteside, and his brother holds the vicarage of Scarborough. He was educated at the University of Dublin, where he graduated M.A. with honours; he also obtained premiums in the first law class formed in the University of London. In 1830 he was called to the bar, and afterwards attained the rank of Queen's Counsel.

In 1833 he married the daughter of the late William Napier, Esq., of Belfast. In 1851 he was returned as M.P. for Enniskillen, and in the following year was appointed Solicitor-General for Ireland. He held this office from March till December, 1852.

The appointment of Attorney-General for Ireland was offered to him by Lord Derby, and accepted, on the formation of the present ministry. In consequence of this, he resigned his seat for Enniskillen, but was re-elected on the 19th of March last.

Mr. Whiteside is favourably known as an author.

His works on Italy and ancient Rome are valuable and interesting. In politics he is a Conservative, and he has taken a very decided part in opposition to conventual establishments in England.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

THE CHRISTIAN ROMAN WARRIOR.

WITH the idea of the old Romans the notion of strength will always be associated. Whatever they built was solid and firm; whatever they wrote was terse and practical. Look at the ruins of their great buildings, and at the sculptured heads of their celebrated emperors and generals. Square, solid, massive strength is everywhere their chief characteristic. The Greeks were distinguished by the polished intellect and the active brain; the Romans by the valiant heart and the strong hand.

It was in a military direction that this strength chiefly manifested itself. When the Romans had lost almost every other quality that distinguished them from the barbarians whom they first despised and afterwards hated and feared—when the Roman patriotism had been undermined by luxury, and the Roman independence sold for the bribe of a sum of money or a lucrative appointment—the old undaunted valour still clung to the national character, and for centuries the Roman empire continued to exist by means of its army alone.

The Roman legions under the empire were very different, both in constitution and equipment, from their ancestors under the republic. Everything depended on them; and consequently no measure was omitted that could increase their efficiency or render them more formidable. They were better paid, too, than most of our readers would imagine. Already, under Domitian, A.D. 81, the pay of the common soldier was raised to twelve pieces of gold (about ten guineas in our money) annually. The prætorians, who had privileges corresponding with those of our brigades of Guards (though they did not live on boiled beef), received double the pay of the other troops; and, as the wealth of the empire increased, the emolument of the troops rose also. After twenty years' service, each veteran was entitled to receive three thousand denarii (about £104), or an equivalent in land. Altogether, the Roman soldiers were the best remunerated portion of the whole community.

The weapons and accoutrements of the Roman soldier are shown in the accompanying illustration. The Roman soldier, in general, despised all but the most necessary defensive armour. He wore an open helmet, strongly made and of a graceful shape; a breastplate of iron, so contrived as to leave his arms perfectly free, and underneath this a stout cuirass of leather; light boots, sometimes strengthened with iron plates, but so formed as not to hinder the wearer in running, completed his defensive equipment. His weapons of attack were few but formidable. First must be mentioned the Roman pilum, or javelin, a most effective kind of spear about six feet long, heavy, and furnished with a head of tempered steel, from fourteen to eighteen inches in length. Against this weapon, hurled by a strong and skilful hand, no cavalry could maintain itself, and even a brave body of barbarian infantry has frequently been thrown into irremediable confusion by a single discharge of Roman pila. When the soldier had thrown his spear, a second and still more formidable weapon came into play—the short sword to wit, with which he followed up his first attack. The cavalry among the Romans used broad swords, like the one represented in our engraving. The infantry had short blades of Spanish steel, hard and sharp, and adapted either for cut or thrust, though the thrust was the mode of attack generally preferred, as inflicting severer wounds on the enemy, while the body of the attacking soldier was less exposed. The shields carried by the infantry were made of light wood covered with a bull's hide, and strengthened with brass plates.

Thus fully armed and accoutred, and taught, moreover, to depend implicitly on themselves and on each other, it is not to be wondered at that the Roman soldiers should long keep the foes of Rome at bay; and one great and important circumstance must be mentioned, which increased the efficiency of many among these warriors, and retarded, for a time, the fall of the giant city and empire.

From the precincts of a province considered as one of the least important among the Roman possessions, there went forth, by divine command, a number of ardent, devoted men, commissioned by a merciful dispensation to go forth into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. Christianity, persecuted by the earlier emperors, and looked upon with disfavour by the best among them down to the time of Constantine, had spread far and wide among all classes; humanising the worst, softening the most ferocious, and shining with increased brightness through each dark cloud of persecution. At first sight it will seem marvellous how the Romans, who believed in such a multitude of deities, should have persecuted the Christians so violently for worshipping their one God. But it must be remembered that the Christians not only abstained from heathen worship, but righteously denounced it as unholy and abominable.

Very rapidly the number of converts increased, and gradually some of them found their way into the army. Here they were at first persecuted, furiously, rigorously. A Roman cohort of Christians was decimated three times in succession by a cowardly imperial despot, whose jealousy was aroused by the assertions of the soldiers, that their obedience to the Saviour came before their oath to the emperor. But after a time even the heathen despots at Rome saw that they could no more stop the spread of Christianity than they could arrest the course of the sun; and thus it was that the army became impregnated with some of that spirit which the language of Scripture forcibly defines as "the salt of the earth."

Martinus, afterwards St. Martin, Bishop of Tours, was one of those men who, to undaunted physical valour, joined a real and fervent spirit of piety. The incident depicted in our engraving forms a well-known episode of his life. Called to active service by an edict of the Emperor Julian, he was passing with his troop near Amiens, when the wail of a desolate mendicant by the roadside arrested his attention. "Let him that hath two coats give to him that hath none," says the unerring precept book. St. Martin had but one cloak. It was, however, a large and ample one, according to the military fashion of his day. One cut with the gallant broadsword and half the cloak was in the beggar's possession; and Martin rode on, richer than before; for that one deed of real charity formed the foundation-stone of his fame; and not one of the many who have written his subsequent life has forgotten to mention it as a memorial of him.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XXV.

Weak and irresolute is man;
The purpose of to-day,
Woven with pains into his plan,
To-morrow rends away.
The bow well bent, and smart the spring,
Vice seems already slain;
But passion rudely snaps the string,
And it revives again.—COWPER.

"It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good." The dreadful tragedy that doomed Esther Darrell to an early grave, and sent Ben Darrell to Newgate to await his trial for the wilful murder of his wife, had produced, at least, one good effect.

It had startled into temporary sobriety many of the associates of "Tippling Ben."

It had strengthened the hands, and sharpened the tongues, of several of the wives in the immediate neighbourhood of the Darrells' late wretched home. If a man took a drop too much, or raised even his voice when his wife reproved him, he was reminded of the murdered Esther and the guilty Ben. Many of the women now had it all their own way. Wages were brought home regularly and cheerfully on Saturday night; the cupboard was no longer bare; the Sunday coat, the best gown and shawl, and the warm blankets of the family bed were redeemed. The family bed, indeed! since in many cases the household boasted no other, and the poor man might have said, like him of old, "My wife and my children are with me in bed." Yes, all were taken out of pawn. There was tea in the caddy, sugar in the basin, bread, butter, and bacon nicely arranged, on a clean though coarse cloth; a cheerful fire threw its ruddy blaze on the poor walls, making them look bright and pleasant, and lighting up the wife's new happy eyes, and the children's now clean, chubby, rosy faces.

The pot boiled, with something good and savoury inside—the kettle sang merrily; and on Sunday the "measter"—not groaning in bed, with sickness and head-ache (the result of Saturday night's debauch), but up betimes, cleanly shaved, and dressed in his best—took his children to some place of worship; the wife the while getting the room "tidied up a bit," and the dinner ready, and herself neat and nice for the afternoon service.

Then was placed on the table a savoury bit of roast pork, stuffed with sage and onions, and sailing in rich brown gravy; or the half-shoulder of mutton and apple-turnovers; or the bit of brisket of beef, baked with a nice, rich, tempting Yorkshire pudding, its brown blisters showing how light and rich it was.

While several of the men thus abstained from drink, and brought their wages home, what comfort reigned, and what plenty love provided?

The long-neglected, dowdy, faded wife, old before her time, lean and sallow, began to take a little pride in herself and her children.

Soap and water, a comb and brush, a cheap but pretty cap, a clean white apron, and, above all, a hopeful, loving, happy heart—converted many a miserable trollop into a bright, neat, pretty woman, and made many a man who had been ashamed of the ragged, wasted being he had made such a wreck, exclaim, "Why, Sally," or "Bet," or "Sukey," or "Jenny," or "Molly," "fine feathers make fine birds. I hasn't seen thee look like that since—"

"Since thee took to drink, measter. But I won't cast that up to thee now. If this sober fit do but last, we'll let bygones be bygones. I wonder how it'll go with Tippling Ben? Hard, I fear. They say poor Esther's brother's sworn he shall swing for it if it costs him every shilling he's worth."

"He never meant to hurt her," the husband would say, looking very sheepish. "He wor drunk, he wor, and struck at random like."

"And ain't that a lesson, measter, to all men not to get drunk? But come, Bill, tea's ready; and a'ter tea I've got such a nice book I wants you to read me. It's called 'Ten Nights in a Bar-room;' for that be pleasant reading."

And so on, in many a humble home.

And in none more than in the two little rooms where Bob and Apple Blossom dwelt, with their children, Larky Grigg and Merry Blossom, and their sweet little foster daughter, Hope Evermore. "Blue-eyed Ben," the luckless Esther's baby, and little Ness, the precocious child, were still at the Blossoms'.

Apple Blossom had grown very fond of the baby, who was nearly twice the size he had been when he first nestled in her fair, full, warm bosom; and Hope and Merry doated on little Nessy.

Bob, being sober, did just what Apple Blossom chose; but Apple Blossom was a good wife and a prudent woman. She had no wish to abuse her influence over Bob, or make him work to maintain any children but his own, Hope excepted. Hope was to her as her own. She loved her so tenderly that she often forgot that she, Merry, had greater claims on her affection. Hope was more like a daughter to Apple Blossom, and a sister to Larky, than the joyous, thoughtless, wilful Merry could be. Merry's motto was, "Pleasure first and business afterwards;" Hope's, "Business first and pleasure afterwards." Merry was too often selfish—thoughtless people generally are; Hope was the most unselfish little creature in the world.

Any idle sport would make Merry forget the fire, the kettle, the bread, and even Truelove, a beautiful white kitten, whom Merry alternately hugged, lugged, coaxed, and teased, but whom Hope loved dearly, and cared for tenderly, both for its own sake and Larky's.

Larky Grigg had rescued it from a group of bad, idle boys, thoughtless, and therefore cruel, with Stunning Steenie at their head.

They were killing it by inches, smothering it in a gutter.

Larky Grigg hated cruelty. With his thick, curly black hair on end, his dark eyes in a blaze, his cheeks flushed, his white teeth set, his breast heaving, and his fists doubled, he had dashed in among these young English Sepoys—Sepoys because at once so cowardly and so cruel—and punched their heads, keeping in chancery the while Stunning Steenie's. He had knocked Priggling Peter and two others over, in the very gutter in which they had been holding the poor kitten down, and then he had rushed home to pitying Hope, with the gasping, half-drowned victim.

Hope's care saved its life. It was so fond and gentle, that she called it "Truelove," and it was always called Hope's kitten, although Merry often declared she had as good a right to it as Hope.

Merry often played with Truelove, they were two kittens together; but Hope always fed it. Hope made it a little bed at the foot of her own. Merry often forgot Truelove, Hope never! Truelove was snow-white, with very thick long fur, one blue and one pink eye, and, in short, it was of the Persian breed; and as it grew fat and sleek, its beauty was the theme of all the blind lanes and dark alleys which were "the world" to those who lived in them. Little Nessy, too, grew fond of Truelove, and blue-eyed Ben would crow, and stretch out his rosy, dimpled hands, and clutch Truelove's fat, furry back or long bushy tail.

Apple Blossom could not find it in her kind heart to part with little Nessy and baby Ben till after their mother's funeral.

Natt Stone (the hump-backed brother of the hapless Esther) had as yet taken no notice of the children of that sister whom he had loved so passionately, but he had buried her like a lady. He had caused little Nessy to be arrayed in deep mourning, and had sent the mourning coach for her.

He went in it, too, and officiated himself as chief mourner.

His grief was terrible. He sprang into the grave when the first shovelful of earth rattled on the coffin, and it was only by main strength he was pulled out and forced back into the coach.

The general impression was, that grief had turned his brain; so inconsistent was his love for Esther Darrell, with his indifference to the wants of her poor little ones.

But if he was mad, "there was method in his madness," as was quite clear from the manner in which he set about compassing the ruin and death of him who had killed his sister.

Bob Blossom, who, when sober, was not deficient in common sense, had said to his wife, "I say, Apple Blossom, thee talks of getting little Ness into the Infant Refuge, likewise baby Ben; and in course, thof they're kindly welcome, poor innocent creturs, as long as you deems it advisable, I knows you do not wish 'em to bide here. But thee've got a wise head thof thee hasn't a still tongue, old gal; and thee can wheedle the buds off the bushes, when thee'st a mind, old gal."

"And what o' that, Bob?" said Apple Blossom, smiling and delighted; "what if I can?"

"Why, I thinks if thee took baby Ben in thy arms, and little Nessy by the hand, and found out that 'ere vindictive, hump-backed chap, as is so well off, and has got houses, and lands, and farms, and money laid by, and if thou wast to say, 'Measter Stone, if thou didst really love thy poor sister, show that love by taking care of her babbies, not by hanging her husband'—but put it to un in thy own pleasant, winning way—maybe he'd take to 'em, and they'd be well off, and have a good home, and perhaps come into all his property. He'll never marry—'tain't likely: thee'd not have said 'yes' to him, though thee did ready enough to poor Rob Blossom, thof he wor only a working man."

"Not so over ready, Bob," laughed Apple Blossom; "I led thee a pretty dance."

"A wild-goose chase, missus, only I caught the goose," grinned Bob, "or rather the duck, and plenty of sarse I got with har, too. But what dost say, Apple Blossom? 'tain't a bad idea, is it?"

"No, 'tain't: I'll sleep upon it," said Apple Blossom. "We shall miss 'em, poor dears."

"Yes, that shall us," said Bob, who was nursing "baby Ben," while Apple Blossom was frying a rasher and some cold potatoes for his supper.

"And as for Hope, she's quite a little mother to Nessy."

"Hope's a little mother to us all," said Bob; "I wish our Merry'd take after her. With them little, delicate, pink fingers of her'n, she've patched my breeches beautiful. If I hadn't seen her do it, I'd have sworn 'twas thy work, lass."

"She's made Nessy quite another child—she've cleaned and mended her up so; and baby Ben, too, surprising. But I'm afraid she'll take on when they goes, she have such a loving heart!"

"Where is 'em all?" said Bob; "at the ragged school?"

"Yes, measter; and Jem Goodman's promised to come home with 'em and take a cup of tea."

"He's kindly welcome. I ain't ashamed to see him now," said Bob.

"He wants thee to join his temperance society, measter," said Apple Blossom, shyly, blushing quite scarlet, and the tears sparkling in her eyes.

"No need of that, lass, as he'll see. I can keep sober without a pledge."

"I'd rather thee'd take it, Bob," said Apple Blossom.

"And I'd rather not," said Bob, turning very red.

But Apple Blossom rose, kissed him, and he grew merry again.

Meanwhile Larky Grigg, in spite of his wild, fun-loving nature, had been so influenced by little Hope Evermore's entreaties, by the still small voice within, and by Ada, who was become a regular "voluntary teacher" at the Green Fields Ragged School, that the master began to have very great hopes of him, and, knowing well Larky's singular abilities, to turn over in his own mind what was the best course to pursue to secure the welfare, temporal and eternal, of a boy so wonderfully gifted, but whose very genius, if not guarded by religion and virtue, might (his pleasure-loving nature considered) become a snare.

Jem Goodman was, as usual, at the Green Fields Ragged School, on the Sunday evening to which we allude. But a great sorrow clouded his earnest, noble brow, and weighed down his honest heart. Tippling Ben was in Newgate; Esther was in her grave; Nessy and blue-eyed baby Ben were orphans; thirsty revenge was driving Natt Stone (the murdered woman's brother) mad; and Jem Goodman, with the sensitive conscience which so often belongs to the highest order of virtue, accused himself for all this. At early dawn, when he rose from a restless couch to go to his grimy work; at noon-day, when he sat down with little relish to his lonely meal; even in the ragged school, and during the night watches, he was haunted by the thought that had he resolutely turned a deaf ear to Tippling Ben's silly entreaty for another week's respite, and then and there compelled him to sign the pledge, Ben and Esther might now be happy together as those couples where the men had ceased to drink had already become. The brother's wealth might have surrounded them with blessings. Natt Stone had sought them, and with kindest intentions, on his return from Melbourne. The little ones would not now be orphans, and Jem Goodman would never have known remorse.

When Ada and Ellen, to whom he spoke freely on this subject, tried to comfort him, and to prove to him that he was better, far better than any one else they had ever known, and that to them he seemed a saint, Jem would shake his head, and say—

"Ah, ladies, it is not what a man seems, but what he is. To myself, when I think of Ben Darrell, his probable doom, and his murdered wife in her early grave, I seem to my own heart a very lukewarm hypocrite."

"You a hypocrite!" cried Ada.

"Yes, miss: either a hypocrite, who professes what he does not in his heart believe, or a cold, unfeeling being, who could stand by and see a brother perish, when he might have saved him."

"But you tried to save him," said Ada.

"If," said Jem, "I had seen Ben Darrell falling into fire or water, or on the brink of a precipice, I should have listened to no idle words of his, I should have snatched him, plucked him back—ay, even if he had struck me to the ground. Drink, to such a man as 'Tippling Ben,' is a far greater peril than fire, water, or a precipice; and yet I let him parley with me—I connived at a delay which was destruction. Do I not, then, believe what I preach? Is my life one long lie; or, believing him in peril far greater than death, did I let him bargain for a delay which was destruction to soul and body? . . . No, no, miss, you cannot comfort me; 'The heart knoweth its own bitterness,' but I am not going to yield myself up to a remorse which will paralyse me, and shorten my hand where others are concerned. I have thought much, miss, of what you have been so condescending as to confide to me, about your own dear father."

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Goodman," said Ada; "and what do you advise?"

"When I have pondered on it another day or two, miss, I will let you know," said Jem. "I am going now to take the children home to Apple Blossom's, and take a social cup of tea with them."

"Now the funeral is over, will you ask Apple Blossom what day I may call and see her?" said Ada. "I want to ask her about little Hope's mother, and to consult with her about that darling child, whom I love more and more every time I see her. Look at her now—look, Ellen."

Ellen turned to look at Hope. Nussy was in her new mourning, not the very handsome black silk uncle Natt had given her for the funeral, but still one very remarkable in that ragged assembly, and in strong contrast to the thin, old, faded cotton frock, her usual wear.

Nussy was a child of precocious intellect, great vanity, strong passions, and strong affections. She was very proud of being so well dressed. She was stroking down her fine, Orleans skirt, and pointing out, to Merry Blossom and "Potato Heels," the crape folds that trimmed it.

It was affecting to see the little child so proud of that livery of woe, of which she had yet to learn the dreary, desolate meaning. It is not at seven years of age we know what the word "orphan" means. Nussy had doated on her mother, and, when first she understood that she was dead, her violent grief terrified all around her; but, in a few days, it wept itself away. The new mourning and a long ride, in a mourning coach, to that distant village where Esther Darrell was born, and where she was buried—yes, buried, by the good old vicar who had christened her, and in the vault where, for centuries, the old yeoman family of the Stones had been laid,—that long ride had—so impressionable is infancy—let in countless new images, and banished, for a time, that of the thin, pale, tender, ever-weeping mother.

Little Hope, only a few months older than Nussy, but head and shoulders taller, was not only carefully pinning a warm shawl round the orphan's neck, just as a fond mother might have done; but, having wrapped Nussy well up, she was shaking her pretty head with its wealth of golden tresses, and raising her rosy forefinger to warn the little, bright-eyed Nussy of the danger of beauty, while, in a low, sweet voice, she said—

"How proud we are, how fond to show
Our clothes, and call them rich and new;
When the poor sheep and silkworm wore
That very clothing long before."

"The tulip and the butterfly
Appear in gayer clothes than I.
Let me deck, fine as I will,
These worms and flowers exceed me still."

"Then will I set my heart to find
Inward adornings of the mind.
Knowledge and virtue, truth and grace,
These are the richest Christian's dress."

"It never fades, it ne'er grows old;
Nor fears the rain, nor moth, nor mould;
It takes no spot, but still refines—
The more 'tis worn, the more it shines."

"You must learn that little hymn, Nussy," said Hope. "I will teach it thee; Jem Goodman taught it me."

"Are you angry with I, Hopy?" said little Nussy, looking up with a bead-like black eye, round and glittering as a cockatoo's.

"No, no, Nussy," said Hope. "You don't know no better—you never wor taught better; but if you'll be a good child and learn that hymn, and never be proud of your clothes, I'll ask Larky Grigg to take us into the park next Saturday afternoon, and maybe we'll find some daisies."

Here Hope looked up, and seeing that all one party and many others were watching her, she blushed "celestial rosy red," dropped the prettiest little curtsy in the world to the gentlefolks, kissed her little hand to Jem Goodman, held up her finger to Larky, who was slyly—

"Coffee-milling care and sorrow,
With a nose-adapted thumb"—

in other words, furtively "taking a sight" at the broad tartan back of Miss Golightly, who, quite unconscious of the indignity, was pouring eloquent passages from her pamphlet on "Woman's Rights and Wrongs" into the unwilling ear of a voluntary teacher.

Hope, then, in her turn, followed the other children, who always pass in file before the master previous to leaving the school; and they were no sooner outside than, in spite of Potato Heels' efforts to walk with Larky—whom she loved, not wisely, but too well—he caught little Hope in his strong arms, and, in spite of all resistance, ran with her, kissing her repeatedly as he went, all the way back; Jem Goodman leading little Nussy by the hand, and Merry taking care to walk through every puddle as she danced and skipped home.

CHAPTER XXVI.

'Mid pleasures and palaces though we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.
A charm from the skies seems to welcome us there,
Which, seek thro' the world, is not met with elsewhere.
Home, home, sweet, sweet home!
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.

HOWARD PAYNE.

LARKY GRIGG, who had caught up this popular melody from that great patroness of gaffs, penny hops, and ditto concerts, Potato Heels, and who had a good ear and very fine voice, rushed into his mother's tidy little room singing it merrily, in spite of Hope's, "Hush! Larky Grigg. Remember, it's Sunday. If you must sing, Larky dear, sing a hymn."

"Well, Hope," said Larky, putting her down at last on her tiny, pretty little feet, "it's almost as good as a hymn; it's all about home; and a good home on earth is the next place to heaven."

"At any rate, my boy," said Jem Goodman, who had entered, "it's the best place to learn how to prepare for heaven."

Apple Blossom and Bob cordially greeted Jem Goodman, telling him he was kindly welcome, and begging him to make free and fall to.

Merry began at once to help herself furtively to such "waifs and strays" as came in her way—now a pinch of sugar, now a tempting excrescence of the nice home-made loaf, which she contrived to dip unseen in the savoury fat of the bacon.

Hope, who always thought of others first, had meanwhile taken off Nussy's shawl and bonnet, and put them carefully by. She had whispered to Apple Blossom, "Can I help you, mammy?" and had been commissioned in consequence to cut a plate of bread and butter: such a little, delicate hand! and such a great, sharp, buck-handled knife, sharpened and cleaned by Larky, who never did things by halves, and had invented a rude but very efficient machine for sharpening knives.

With this knife, which, in the hand of Merry, and, indeed, most children, would have been a very dangerous weapon, neat-handed Hope had cut the bread and butter to perfection; and she was just finishing off the last slice, when her eye fell on Merry stuffing some brown sugar she had filched into her mouth.

Hope left the table and her task, and, stealing up to Merry, said in a soft whisper, "O Merry! thee knows thee should keep thy hands from picking and stealing; oh! thee knows thee should. Did thee not say to-night in the commandments, 'Thou shalt not steal?'"

"Thee ain't my missus," said Merry, angrily. "Dont let me have none of thy jaw; 'tain't thy sugar, is it?"

"No," said Hope; "I never said it wor. If it wor, Merry, thou'd be kindly welcome; but it's mammy's and dad's, and they've forbid thee to take it; and mammy said if she ever caught thee at it again, she'd hit thee and send thee to bed. Don'tee, Merry, there's a dear, don'tee."

"I'll take care not to be caught out again," said Merry, little thinking that Apple Blossom, who seemed busy at the fireplace, had her eye upon her all the time.

Merry passed the table as if thinking of anything rather than the sugar, and, as she did so, quietly slipped her hand into the sugar-basin, and was withdrawing it full of "brown moist," when, to her own alarm and Hope's dismay and distress, Apple Blossom seized that hand. Soundly she boxed the ears of the convicted and shrieking Merry; and then, taking her by the shoulder, she said, "Honest people don't like the company of thieves and such like. We are all honest here; so get to bed with thee, Merry, and pray God to forgive thee and make thee a better girl."

"I'm so hungry," sobbed Merry, "and it's so dark in there!"

"They love darkness more than light, because their deeds are evil, Merry," said Apple Blossom; "and thy deed wor evil."

"Oh! Jem Goodman," said Merry, clasping her hands, "do beg for me. I'll never do it no more!"

"'Tain't of no use, Jem," said Apple Blossom, very resolutely. "Twice she've been let off, promising never to do it no more. I ain't agoing to be like old Eli; nor I won't spare the rod and spile the child, neither,—going again Solomon, the wisest man as ever spoke, though he wor a king, and them ain't mostly like to set the Thames a-fire."

"Father," sobbed Merry, "let me stay."

"Not if thy mammy's agin it, lass," said Bob, glancing imploringly at the pale but determined mother.

Hope was very white, and tears stood in her large blue eyes; but she saw it was no use to interfere then. And as Merry still implored and resisted, Apple Blossom with a strong arm shoved her into the little inner-room; and Merry was alone in darkness and tears.

This little incident threw a gloom over the party.

Hope so loved the faulty Merry, and had a heart so full of sympathy, she would not eat, or laugh, or talk, or enjoy herself, while Merry was fasting, alone, and in trouble.

Hope sat apart, her tears dropping fast on the long white fur of Truelove. Truelove, being unluckily a white cat, would, in black, sooty, greasy London, have been a great eye-sore to such a worshipper of cleanliness as Apple Blossom, had not little Hope accustomed him from the first to be washed. After that cruel ducking he got in the gutter, Hope gave him a bath of warm water and a lather of soap; and as habit is second nature, and Hope made this a daily habit, Truelove got to like and look for his warm bath.

Truelove was quite a poor man's cat, and almost omnivorous. Nothing came amiss to Truelove, and he thrived upon fare never intended for his feline incisors.

However, it was generally from little Hope's bread and milk that Truelove breakfasted and supped; and Larky Grigg, who was a rare combination of fun and frolic, facts and figures, had by a calculation which Hope was in no situation to refute, not being much of a ready reckoner herself, proved to her that at the rate of one halfpennyworth of milk per day, pussy, who was considered to be no expense at all, would at the end of twelve years—the average life of a cat, barring accidents—have cost pretty nearly the sum of ten pounds!

"How do thee make that out, Larky, dear?" said Hope, opening her large blue eyes in wonder and dismay; "that my darling pet, Truelove, would have costed eight ten pound in the course of twelve year? Thee can't make that out, no ways, Larky Grigg, that thee can't!"

"Yes, I can, though, Hopy; werry easy, too. Listen, lass: in twelve year, there's four thousand three hundred and eighty days. Well, thee can't give the poor dumb creter less than a ha'p'orth a day, can thee, Hopy?"

"Why, no, Larky, one drap wi' another, it makes up all that 'ere."

"Werry well, then, four thousand three hundred and eighty quarters of pints, is one thousand and ninety-fove pints, and that 'ere, at tuppence a point, comes to noine pound two and sixpence; and if thee reckons on the interest o' that 'ere, at fove per cent., thee won't find it much short o' ten pounds, lass, I can tell thee."

Hope sighed, stroked Truelove, and, looking up with tears sparkling in her loving eyes, said—

"I didn't ought to keep her unless I could earn her keep, Larky Grigg."

"Didn't thee? then I says thee did ought; for rather than even to stint the creter thee loves, Hopy, I'd give up play-work and set-to to reg'lar hard labour, that I would, so don't go for to fret about that, Hopy; and don't go for to think, neither, that I tells thee this, my lass, because I begrudges thee the cost of thy Truelove. I'se as fond of Truelove as ever thee's; and I wouldn't say as much to feather or mother, 'cause these here figgers sets people a-thinkin', and a-reck'ning, and saving, maybe. But I does want thee to listen to me; and when I've worked somethink out in my own head, just let I tell the totle. Why, I've reckoned that what dad spends in liquor, when he go reg'lar like to the 'Good Intent,' would feed and clothe three children comfortable—aye, and pay for their schooling too. We'll say feather tosses off half-a-dozen glasses of gin a day at twopence per glass, and that, Hopy, comes to no less than eighteen pound five in the twelvemonth. So what d'ye say to that, lass?"

"We'll say no more about it, Larky Grigg," little Hope would interpose, with her raised forefinger awing the great, bright, beaming boy. "Honour thy father and thy mother."

"Well, Hopy, don't I honour 'em by showing him what he must be wuth?"

"No, thee don't, by making out he ain't wuth nothink, which no drunkard is. In the Bible you can read what they're worth, Larky; and dad ain't one of 'em. He never dranked all that ere, I'm sure; and now he've leaved off, and don't drink nothink; and 'tain't well in his own son to cast up what he has a-drinked, and so I tells thee. And now, Larky, I must put baby Ben and Nussy to bed."

"I'll help thee, Hopy," said Larky Grigg, who was almost as handy and much stronger than Hope. "I don't mind what I does, lass, if thee'll come when the children's in bed, and sit along of me, and read the Bible with me, and I'll tell thee the value of all the money that's mentioned in Scripture. I made it all out, from a shekel or a talent down to a mite; and the weights and measures, too—cubits, and homers, and ephahs, and all; I've made 'em all out, Hopy, and I wants so to explain them to thee."

"Very well, Larky," said Hope, with that little, weary sigh with which we all prepare to mount another's hobby. "If thee'll be a good lad, and not go about with Stunning Steenie, and Prigging Peter, and the Fox, and them bad boys, I'll try to understand all thy figures. Though I can't say I'm fond of 'em, I'll try to like 'em for thy sake."

Larky and little Hope then put baby Ben and little Nussy to bed. Merry had cried herself into so sound a sleep that she was not disturbed even when little Nussy was laid by her side.

Nussy was in reality only a few months younger than Hope Evermore; but so thoughtful, steady, and motherly was little Hope, and so much was she accustomed to wait on and think for others, while Nussy had always been kept a baby by her poor mother, that, for all practical purposes, Hope was a little woman, and Nussy, in spite of a very precocious cunning, was a mere baby.

(To be continued.)

MARCH ON!

HEAVY and thick the atmosphere,
The prospect narrow, dark, severe—
Yet a few steps the path is clear,
For those few steps, march on!

Dark rocks that frown as if in wrath,
Like giants ranged across the path—
Be sure the gorge some outlet hath,
So trustfully march on!

A deep, wide stream that shines like glass,
Flanked by steep banks of slippery grass—
There is some bridge by which to pass,
So watchfully march on!

A tempest rattling in the wind,
The sun in thunder-robcs enshrined—
Doubt not some shelter soon to find,
Still hopefully march on!

The day goes out—the fog upcrowsds,
Darkness the face of heaven enshrouds—
A voice shall guide thee through the clouds,
So patiently march on!

If Duty set you on the way,
You need not fear—you must not stay;
Still faithfully her word obey,
Still loyally march on!

Let but your aims be high and true,
Your spirit firm, but patient too,
A Titan's strength shall go with you,
Still fearlessly march on!

In one of our London wildernesses, a ruffian, recently, without the slightest provocation, fired a pistol, with apparently deadly intent, at a fashionably-dressed lady. The bullet passed through the huge crinoline, but didn't touch the lady within. "Hang it," said the fellow, "I might as well shoot at random into the top of a big tree, in the expectation of hitting a small squirrel, hidden away among the branches!"

The Matron.

NO. XVII.

In the following chapter I bring to a conclusion the treatment of children, but I shall return to the subject in a little while, for, directly or indirectly, it is interesting to every one of us.

I am now going to treat of children's maladies that are distressing, though not immediately dangerous. I allude to rickets and scrofula. The first-mentioned complaint deprives childhood of its bloom and elasticity, and brings pallor and sickliness in their stead. Rickets are often caused by indigestible food. Light and nutritious diet (such as I recommended in our last number) should be given to all children, but especially to those afflicted with rickets. The greatest cleanliness should also be observed. In mild weather, cold bathing works wonders in this complaint. We are not speaking of infants but of children from two to six or seven years old. However, you should not allow a child to begin cold bathing without first giving him a little aperient medicine. The following tonic should be taken three times a day, after the use of the cold bath has commenced.

A tea-spoonful of syrup of cinnamon, with three grains of the precipitate of the sulphate of iron.

I proceed to consider scrofula, that scourge of our island, that complaint from which hardly any family in England is entirely free. It is a curious fact, that a complaint called king's evil, from the superstitious idea that the monarch's touch could cure it, should at length have carried its devastation into the royal family. So we must think of other remedies for king's evil besides the king's or queen's touch.

Scrofula is an ill that may not only be inherited, but superinduced. That which superinduces it in a child is neglect, bad food, and impure air, and the means that counteract it, where it has come down as a sad heritage from the authors of our being, are the following:—The most digestible and nutritious food, gentle friction on the surface of the body, applied night and morning with a soft flesh brush. Peruvian bark taken occasionally, and above all, sea-bathing, and as protracted a residence by the sea-side as circumstances will allow.

Another source of suffering to children is the presence of worms in the inside. Such attention to diet as I have recommended will generally keep them off; but, where weakness, a pale cheek, a swelled stomach, and a voracious appetite prove the existence of this disease, I recommend the child being taken to a judicious medical man, because calomel is generally necessary in removing worms, and calomel is too strong a medicine to be meddled with excepting by members of the profession. There are some worms that bitters only will expel. Of course the gentleman you consult will try all remedies till he has relieved your child of an evil that might prove fatal, by undermining his strength. Therefore, lose no time where this lamentable complaint exists, and, when once eradicated, be doubly careful about your child's diet.

I now turn from the physical to the moral evils of children, and mind the latter are never fostered by your example; and pray let the following observations sink deep into your heart. You will never teach your child to be truthful by deceiving him, nor make him wise by talking nonsense to him.

I caution you against deceit in training your little boy or girl, not merely because it is wrong, but because it is inexpedient. A child's perceptions are acute. He finds you out, and, to your dismay, soon displays the cunning you have taught him by example.

Never coax children into obedience by false promises. Follow the directions I gave you in a preceding chapter. Teach obedience as soon as reason dawns, and it will become easy because it will be habitual. The false promise system is full of evil. "Come with me, my dear, I've something so pretty for you upstairs," says the silly mother, and when the child gets upstairs and finds nothing at all, what evil feelings are quickened in his little breast, what disappointment, anger, distrust, and revenge; and, besides all this, what a lesson he has had in deceit. That such lessons soon take effect, I will illustrate by a little anecdote that must interest those who, like myself, are intimate with children's ways. It may serve as a warning to those who are not.

The hero of my story is a little fellow, about four or five. He is just recovering from an illness. A lady brought him a toy, rather an injudicious one, for it consisted of a little tin pump, which required water to make it amusing, and Master Georgie was not to play with water.

A servant, who stood by pitying the child's distress, he being refused water for his pump, "tried on" the favourite deceptive system, assuring the boy that if he only pumped and pumped, water would come. For a few minutes attention was diverted from Master Georgie. He made use of his time, and supplied his pump with water from a jug in the bed-room. "Oh, you naughty boy," was soon heard from the maid-servant's lips; "where did you get that water?" "I didn't get it," says the apt pupil, "it came of itself. You told me, if I pumped and pumped, water would come, and you see it has come."

What more need I say? Never deceive your children unless you want your children to deceive you.

The nonsense-talking system is not as injurious as the deceptive one, but it does harm nevertheless. When a child can understand you, and can express his own feelings, likings, and dislikings, he should not be treated as a baby.

Be as cheerful, aye as merry with a child as you please, the more so the better, but do not be silly. At three and four a child can listen to reason, then why treat him to folly? You should cultivate, not check his reasoning powers. A child's mental capabilities left unemployed prey on himself, and make him wearisome and teasing. "Give me something to play with," "Amuse me," "What shall I do?" are requests mamma's often find it difficult to satisfy. They are prompted by ennui, by craving for occupation. This craving should be satisfied. Mothers answer "How? What can a child of three or four do?" "Many things," I reply; but do not suppose I want a child to do wonders. Forced plants are always delicate, and parents should never aim at making their children prodigies. The intellect should be encouraged, but not forced. A mother may do a great deal for her child's improvement and happiness, by a judicious selection of toys. Of these, some so completely fail in their object that they do not even amuse after the first few minutes. A box of wooden bricks, which exercises a child's ingenuity in forming different structures, and nine-pins that also call forth his skill, are among the toys that charm and occupy children month after month. Those who have had much to do with little children, will agree with me, that it is no trifling advantage to find everything that harmlessly occupies them. But there are things that may occupy them beneficially also; the ivory box of letters may become (through a mother's good management) a little boy's favourite toy. What pleasure he may be taught to take in bringing the letter called for, in making up syllables and adding daily to his stock of words.

Another feeling that may easily be cultivated in little children is pleasure in being made of use. "If you will pick up all the litters, you will be a help to mamma." With this inducement, how the little prattler will bend all his energies to accomplish the task; and how many things might be thought of that would occupy him pleasantly were a similar hope held out to him.

Both boys and girls at three or four, may learn to amuse and occupy themselves in various ways: for instance, with winding string, threading beads, and plaiting (in three) cords or rushes; and, if their mother is wise, she will make a point of putting her children's little work to some use, and of showing them they can do good. The string wound up into a ball, should be put in the closet ready for use; the beads strung should be made into looped fringe, for a teapot stand; and the twisted cord or rushes, sewn together, should be made into mats. Point out to children their own work made serviceable for "papa" or "mamma," and you will foster their love of being useful, a love that should grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength.

ALWAYS BUSY.—The more a man accomplishes the more he may. An active tool never grows rusty. You always find those men the most forward to do good, or to improve the times and manners, who are always busy. Who start our railroads, our steamboats, our machine shops and our manufactories? Men of industry and enterprise. As long as they live they keep at work, doing something to benefit themselves and others. It is just so with a man who is benevolent—the more he gives the more he feels to like giving. We go for activity—in body, in mind, in everything. Let the gold grow not dim, nor the thoughts become stale. Keep all things in motion. We would rather that death should find us scaling a mountain than sinking in a mire—breasting a whirlwind than sneaking from a cloud.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH ON THE CONTINENT.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

ROGERS, the poet, meeting a contemporary of Goldsmith, asked him on one occasion what sort of man Goldsmith really was in conversation. "Sir," replied the wiseacre, "he was a fool. The right word never came to him. If you gave him back a bad shilling, he would say, 'Why, it's as good a shilling as ever was born.' You know he ought to have said coined. Coin, sir, never entered his head. He was a fool, sir."

Poor Goldsmith! it was always his fate to be misunderstood. There were plenty of people ready to give currency to his bulls and his blunders, and but few to appreciate his real merit. They only looked at the false side of the man's character, and made his guileless simplicity a butt for their sarcastic shafts. His unfortunate blunders were declared to be a picture of his whole life. But they who said so were wrong. The character of Goldsmith exhibited many excellent qualities, but not one of them fully developed: he was generous, but at the expense of justice; benevolent, but lacking discretion. Paradoxical as it sounds, his great characteristic was that he was without a characteristic. He was a creature of impulse, and this impulsive action may be traced all through his chequered career.

Oliver Goldsmith was born at Pallas, county of Longford, Ireland, in the year 1728. His father was the Rev. C. Goldsmith, very poor, and very improvident—

"Passing rich on forty pounds a year"

It was a characteristic of the family that the less they had to spend the more prodigally they spent it. In 1730 Goldsmith's father, having been presented to the rectory of Kilkenny West, removed to Lissoy, in the county of Westmeath, and there Oliver commenced his education under the fostering care of Mrs. Elizabeth Delap, and was remarkable for his extreme dullness.

At six years of age he was removed to the sterner government of Mr. Thomas Byrne, where he was again remarkable—chiefly for idleness and illness. But here he began to evince a knack of making verses, and this soon ripened into something above mediocrity. His friends took him for a genius. They contributed—especially his generous uncle, the Rev. Thomas Contarine—towards his being sent to college, and so to the university he went. There he trifled away his time and fooled away his money; pawned the books he should have studied, and gave dances and dinners with the money he should have saved. On one occasion his company—a curiously mixed multitude—were abruptly dismissed by college order, and this so enraged Oliver, that he quitted the university with the intention of embarking for America, or any place that offered; but he loitered in Dublin until his resources—derived from borrowing and pawning, and scribbling street ballads for the booksellers at five shillings each—were reduced to one shilling.

Through the mediation of his brother Henry, he afterwards returned to college, but it was only to linger out two years in preparation for a profession for which he had no liking—namely, that of the church. To be obliged to wear a long wig when he liked a short one, or a black coat when he generally dressed in brown, he thought such a restraint upon his liberty, that he was inclined to reject the proposal. He, however, consented to qualify, but spent most of his time in miscellaneous reading or miscellaneous company at a public-house called the "Three Jolly Pigeons;" and when his time came for appearing before the bishop, in the hope of getting ordained, he paid his visit in a pair of scarlet breeches, and had his application refused.

Uncle Contarine, whose faith in his nephew nothing could shake, obtained for him a situation as tutor in a family named Flinn. He did not long retain this post of honour, for, thinking he had been cheated at cards, he threw up his hand and his place together, and went off in dudgeon. He was, in his own estimation, a wealthy man when he received his salary, for after purchasing a horse, he had still thirty pounds good sterling money. So he set off on a rambling expedition, and returned home after three or four weeks with no money, and a pony that he called Fiddleback, the most wretched little pony that ever man beheld.

Having failed in divinity, he now turned his attention to the law. He had made up his mind to cut a figure at the bar. His friends applauded his resolution, uncle Contarine filled his purse, and he set off for London. But London he did not reach, for falling in with some "good fellows" at Dublin, he spent every penny, and threw himself again on his uncle's generosity.

Medicine still remained, and Goldsmith determined to be a physician. He went to Edinburgh, and from thence to Leyden. There his funds were soon exhausted, more were borrowed, and rapidly spent. As nothing but beggary stared him in the face, poor Noll resolved to turn his musical talent to account, and started as a wandering minstrel on a sentimental journey, with "one shirt, one guinea, and one flute." To play at the doors of cottage homes, to gather around him a little group of delighted listeners, to win their love by his good humour and affection, and thus earn supper and bed,—such was the life he led for many months. At last, after a variety of adventures, he found himself in the great metropolis, leaving hardly a kingdom unvisited or a city where he was not a debtor. The real business of his life had still to begin. As yet he had only been collecting materials for his profession. His last effort to get bread by anything but literature was in the capacity of school teacher, and from this he threw himself heart and soul into the tempest-tost ocean of letters, to sink or swim as the fates should will it.

Literature was in a transition state. The system of patronage was dying out, and the reading public had not yet grown up. The author was at the mercy of the booksellers. It was the period when Grub-street garrets became famous, and when literature as a profession acquired that character for hardship and precariousness which it has never since recovered. He who then adopted it had a bitter cup to drink, and Goldsmith drank it almost to the dregs.

But he had found his true vocation: the round peg was no longer in a triangular hole. He was adapted for his profession—his profession was adapted for him, and he was happy in the discharge of its duties. He loved his labour, whether in Green Arbour-court he was writing with an aching head and a weary heart, clothed in a patched and worn-out suit, beside a rusty grate unconscious of a fire, or whether entertaining his friends in the Middle Temple, surrounded by sofas, card-tables, curtains, mirrors, and Wilton carpet, his own person clothed in a suit of Tyrian dye, lined with silk and furnished with gold buttons. Whether in shabby guise and dejected spirits he was slinking out of his lodgings under cover of night, or whether, with bag-wig and sword, he was strutting in the sunshine in the Temple Gardens, he was still the same genial companion, the same kind friend, and, when he had it to give, the same cheerful giver. No matter whether he gave a pound or a penny, he did it with the same heartiness. Widows sat on the stairs and wept when he lay all "a-cold" in the Temple. The poor had loved him living, and shed honest tears when he died.

One of the most natural of our English writers is Goldsmith. His poems are free from false sentiment and faulty construction. He wrote easily, but corrected laboriously. His two comedies have held possession of the stage for almost a century. His "Vicar of Wakefield" is the most touching and truthful novel in our language. His essays are warmed by genial humour and irradiated by sparkling wit. Even his "hack" work for the booksellers, his histories of empires and animals, of kings and crocodiles, are admirable for their purity of style. Whenever he wrote he wrote well. He presented no operatic fairy land, but took nature for his scenery, and men and women for his actors. Wandering with his "Traveller," or resting in his "Deserted Village," involved in the perplexities of the "Good-natured Man," or enjoying the humour of "Tony Lumpkin," listening to the good vicar in his laudable zeal for monogamy, watching the sturdy Burchell striding over the fields, or Moses going to the fair, or Sophia and Olivia discussing the merits of the young squire, and not at all of Mr. Jenkinson's opinion that the world is in its dotage,—we recognise familiar faces—people with whom we have been acquainted or with whom we could associate.

And all through Goldsmith's works, and all through his life, there was a love of home, such as a genuine, simple-hearted man like him could alone feel. Says he:—

"In all my wand'rings through this world of care,
In all my griefs—and God has giv'n my share—
I still had hopes, my latest hours to crown,
Amidst these humble bowers to lay me down;
To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flames from wasting by repose;
I still had hopes—for pride attends us still—
Amidst the swains to show my book-learned skill;
Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt, and all I saw;
And, as a hare, whom hounds and horns pursue,
Pants to the place from whence at first she flew,
I still had hopes—my long vexations past,
Here to return, and die at home at last."

Goldsmith died on the 5th of April, 1774. With all his blunders and strange doings, he was a gifted, kind-hearted, affectionate man, and one whose literary compositions will ever retain their hold upon the public.

Inventions and Science.

ARTIFICIAL WHITE LIGHT.—The light produced by wax and tallow candles, and by oil and gas under combustion, is yellow in colour; this is the reason why we can scarcely distinguish between blue and green colours at night by artificial illumination. A correspondent of a contemporary makes an inquiry regarding the possibility of obtaining artificial white light, by making it pass through a series of glasses tinted according to the prismatic spectrum, neglecting the yellow ray, of course. A very great improvement in the colour of the artificial light could easily be effected by employing globes or shades of a very faint purple colour. Purple is composed of the red and blue rays of the spectrum, which, properly combined with the yellow ray, produce white.

IMPROVEMENTS IN ORNAMENTAL GLASS BOTTLES.—By this process the bottles are blown as usual, whether of one colour or of glass of two or more colours; and in order to ornament such articles, parts of the surfaces thereof are to be coated with a solution of gutta-percha, &c., and from such coated surfaces parts of the coating are to be removed so as to produce thereon an ornamental device. The articles are then dipped in fluoric acid, combined with sulphuric acid, and the effect will be, that parts of the surfaces of the glass will be dissolving away, and yet both the ornamental design and the other part of the glass will be left clear and bright.

THE GREAT COMET OF 1556.—The question of the identity of the comets of 976 and 1556 has recently formed the subject of an investigation by

M. Hock, of the Observatory of Leyden. M. Hock is of an opinion that the orbit of the comet of 1556 has been determined with tolerable precision, but that the orbit of the comet of 976 is liable to much uncertainty; the calculation of the elements being mainly based upon Chinese observations. He maintains that the discordance between the orbits of the two comets is too great to be accounted for, either by errors of the observations or the effects of planetary perturbation, and, consequently he infers that the two apparitions cannot refer to the same body.

MANUFACTURE OF PAPER FROM RHUBARB FIBRES.—The stalk of the rhubarb plant is passed between rollers to express the juice. The fibre then is well washed, to get therefrom as much of the acid property as possible. The fibre should then be bleached by chloride of lime, &c. To prepare the paper pulp from the fibrous part of the stalk the fibre is placed in a vessel, boiled, and then beaten or torn to pulp by any of the usual methods of reducing rag to pulp. For the manufacture of wine, the juice is taken and boiled, and poured upon lump sugar, yeast is added sufficient to make it ferment; which will take three or four days. It should be then strained and placed into a cask, and the bung not fastened down till it has finished working. The wine should remain for four months, and then be sweetened with fine lump sugar. For spirits the juice should be treated in the same manner as in the first stage of making wine; after the fermentation is ceased it should be placed in a still.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION.—Any means by which passengers are enabled to communicate with the guard during railway travelling, is of the greatest importance, and we are glad, therefore, at a recent invention admirably adapted for the purpose. Here a bell is fixed in the guard's box, and hung on a spring as low down in the carriage as practicable, and when at rest is supported in a socket in a board. The board or support is so arranged that when a weight falls upon it, or upon a lever connected with it, the board falls, and the bell, being set free, rings. The weight is supported by a cord passing along the train of carriages within reach of the passengers.

THE MOON.—The French Moniteur announces that photographic experiments were made in France during the late eclipse of the sun, and these are said to have established the fact that the moon has an atmosphere of about 25 miles in height.

ROBERT BURNS.

THE name of the peasant bard of Scotland is worthy of honourable mention among those who have won for themselves a distinguished place in history. The time has at length come when his biographer may introduce him to public notice without an apology; his virtues are now more readily remembered than his vices. His early sorrows and distresses have made men charitable in respect to the latter, and eloquent about the former.

Robert Burns was born on the 25th of January, 1759, in a poor hut in Ayrshire. The outward world frowned upon his birth; wild storms raged around the clay-built cottage in which he first saw the light, and shook its walls to the ground, exposing the newborn child to the cold, rough blasts of winter. He used, in after-life, with mock gravity to say that it was no wonder he was so wild, seeing he was born in so wild a time. He was blessed with good parents; he had a mother who could not easily be provoked, who had tender eyes and a loving smile, who could tell her boy old legends, and stories of dark troublous times, and sing to him the lays which had fired the hearts of his ancestors to deeds of daring and of victory. His father was a stern, yet withal tender-hearted man, who had battled with the world, and experienced many of its sorrows and difficulties; the very soul of integrity and honour, but one who could not with all his strivings make much headway in the world, or gain a comfortable subsistence for his family. Things always went wrong with him and his poor seven acres of nursery ground, and he was constantly receiving letters about arrears and debts, which threw the whole family into tears. But in the delight of educating his children, he forgot the troubles of life; with the utmost solicitude he endeavoured to train them aright, and to fit them for an honourable and useful career. Of an evening he would gather his children around him, and teach them all he knew himself; particularly dwelling upon the battles and combats of which their own land had been the scene, and upon the men who had been worthy sons of Scotland. Books, too, he would sometimes read to them. Bunyan's pilgrimage from death unto life, Milton's glorious measure, and Herve's pious musings were among his favourites.

Nor did he neglect set religious instruction. The man who would listen delightedly to three sermons, each of two hours' length, on the Sabbath, was not the one to neglect theology. Theology meant something to him: it was higher in his estimation than all the learning of the schools. The schoolmaster he chose for Robert he selected, not so much on account of literary, as theological attainments. It was Robert's father who inspired that beautiful picture of family religion presented to us in the "Cotter's Saturday Night;" that song which comes over the mind like a slow and solemn strain of music, and in which the soul of the poet aspires above this scene of low thought and care, and reposes in trembling hope on "the bosom of its Father and its God."

In his younger days the poet was much indebted to an old woman of the name of Jenny Wilson. She was the very incarnation of superstition: she had the largest collection in the country of tales and songs concerning ghosts, fairies, brownies, witches, elf-candles, apparitions, giants, enchanted towers, and dragons, who required so many virgins per annum to keep them quiet and respectable. Over the soul of Burns, notwithstanding his boyhood's bravery, Jenny Wilson's stories had mighty influence. They haunted his solitary rambles, and his imagination saw many a ghost in harmless trees or white cows, and heard awful warnings in the rustling of leaves and the sighing of the wind. But her stories did more: they stirred the latent seeds of poesy in the boy's heart—they gave wings to his fancy, and peopled the unseen with shapes of glory and magnificence.

Burns, while yet a youth, had desires and hopes which were but a fore-feeling of his capabilities. He was a quick boy at school, he had a good memory, and, to use his own words, "a sturdy something in his disposition." His conduct as a lad was counted rather old-fashioned. If he could not beat a boy in a playground fight, he would challenge him to an argument upon some question, and beat him in that. He took no delight in the games of his school-fellows: he preferred taking long walks by himself. He used to wander in his play-hours along the coast, watching the ships sailing over the deep, and now and then entering into conversation with the bold smugglers who frequented the region in which he was brought up. So his boyhood glided away.

At nineteen years of age he was a tolerably well educated youth. He had picked up an education, as the saying is. By scraps of time well employed, by conversation with those who knew more than himself, by the reading of books when the day's farming work was over (for his father's circumstances obliged him to put Robert to the plough at an early age), and by the diligent use of such aids to mental culture as were within his reach, he had gathered together a considerable fund of information. But long before the age of nineteen, Robert Burns had shown himself a true poet. He was born one, the faculty within him grew as he grew, and uttered itself in words more and more distinct and forcible as he drew near the age of man. His conscious entrance into the world of poetry was a great era in his life. In short, "twas falling in love that caused the soul of Robert to burst forth into song. 'Twas on an autumn day, and in a field waving with golden corn, while gentle airs were blowing, and the heavens looked down with blessing, that our poet became the subject of emotions which he had never experienced. He was not quite fifteen years of age, and was reaping in the harvest field with a nut-brown maid, a year younger than himself, for his companion. She was binding into sheaves the corn which fell under the sickle of Robert, and her artless disposition and manners bewitched his heart. She had a good voice, and sang sweetly; she had a beautiful little hand, but the cruel nettles and thistles used to sting it, and Robert had to pick out the stings. Returning home in the evening he found himself awkwardly loitering about her path, and the tones of her voice made his heartstrings thrill like an Æolian harp, and his pulse beat a furious ratan when he took her hand to see if there were any more stings in it; and Robert was in love. And oh, lack-a-day! she praised a piece of poetry that a young laddie had made, which caused the fires of jealousy to blaze in her companion's soul, and he exclaimed, indignantly, "But I can make poetry, and I will do it." Thus with him began love and poetry, so true it is, that when one thing is discerned to be beautiful, the eye sees objects of beauty everywhere.

The serious reader will treat this boyish attachment of Burns with contempt; but it must be remembered that it exercised great influence over his nature; it stirred up the earnest within him, and gave him, while it lasted, something to live and work for. It did not last long, and time would fail to tell of all the Nannies and Peggies which captivated him ere his beard was grown. His heart was as tinder, and was eternally lighted up by some goddess or another; and every one, while her reign lasted, was to be the goddess of his life. And here we ought to mention one in whose memory Burns wrote one of his noblest songs, entitled, "Mary in Heaven." Had she lived, no doubt she would have been Robert's wife. Her name was Mary Campbell, a peasant's daughter, and holding no higher office than that of a dairymaid, but so beautiful and good that she won the esteem of all who knew her; and she loved Burns, and plighted her troth to him. One Sunday, in May, they met on the banks of the Ayr, where they took farewell, ere Mary embarked for the West Highlands to arrange for her married life. The lovers stood on each side of a small brook; they laved their hands in the stream, and, holding a bible between them, pronounced their vows to be faithful to each other. They parted, never to meet again. In a few days a malignant fever hurried Mary to her grave, before even Burns had heard of her illness. To the end of his life he kept the anniversary of her death sacred as a sabbath, and on one of these occasions wrote the hymn to which we have alluded.

Early in life we find Robert Burns complaining that it was his great misfortune to be without a distinct idea as to what he was to be and do in life. He had early felt some stirrings of ambition; but, he says, they were as the blind gropings of Homer's Cyclops around the walls of his cave, and at the age of twenty-two he was in despair of ever making a figure in the world, and he longed to bid an eternal adieu to all the pains and disquietudes of his weary life. In the future he only saw poverty and obscurity awaiting him, and he did not feel himself possessed of sufficient courage to do battle with them.

He attempted a variety of things by which to gain a livelihood. He betook himself to flax-making and farming, he read books upon agriculture, and tried to settle down as a son of the soil, but all without success. His heart was not in his work. At any time he would stop the plough to look upon a daisy, or to watch the clouds sailing in massive grandeur over his head.

His life at this time was far from pure and upright. He was guilty of the most heartless immorality, and committed sins that in after life he looked back upon with horror. Those sins are now too well known, and we need not direct particular attention to them. In consequence of their commission, and the retribution which was about to fall upon him, he resolved to quit his native land and take ship for Jamaica. It was with an almost broken heart that he prepared to sever himself from the scenes of his childhood, and to give up the hopes of being a poet to his countrymen. He could not but see that he had brought ruin and shame upon his own head, and that the bitter harvest he had to reap was of his own sowing.

But the remainder of his life, and the estimate we have formed of his character, must be reserved until our next number.

EPITAPH IN PÈRE-LA-CHAISE CEMETERY.—"Here lies M. N., the best of husbands and the tenderest of fathers. His inconsolable widow still carries on the business in the Rue Richelieu."

A GRIEVANCE.—"I am a fat man, and require room. I had to travel by diligence from Macon, in France. I sent the rascally garçon from the hotel, to book two places for me, and paid for them. When I came to the office to take my place, I found they had booked one seat for me inside and one out. Mem. To learn French before I travel in France again."

WHY is a reporter like a pickpocket?—"Because he takes notes, and must have quick fingers to insure success."

A GENTLEMAN asked a poet to write some verses on his new carriage. "Certainly," replied the latter; "a carriage is an excellent subject for the news."

MATRIMONY.

Cries Sue to Will, midst matrimonial strife,
"Dark was the hour I first became your wife."
"By all the powers," cries Will, "but that's too bad, You've banned the only quiet hour we've had."

"Ah, Jones," said a most intolerable bore, "I passed your house yesterday, and thought of looking in." "I am very glad you did pass it," said Jones.

"Bless me," said Miss Tabitha, as she prepared her cup "that cheers but not inebriates," "I have absolutely forgotten to put the tea into the pot." "You are mistaken," answered Birchenhall, the schoolmaster, "a pot without a t is impossible."

WHY are sailors badly off in first-class ships?—Because they're expected to serve three masters.

CURIOS CALCULATION.—If one pin was dropped in the hold of the Leviathan the first week, two the next, four the next, eight the next, and so on, doubling the number each time for a year (fifty-two weeks), the number deposited would be 4,509,599,627,370,495; the weight of them, allowing twenty pins to one ounce, would be 628,292,358 tons; and the number of Leviathans, of the tonnage of 22,500 tons each, required to carry them would be 27,924.

A GENTLEMAN was asked to give a definition of nonsense. "Sir," he replied, "to bolt a door with a boiled carrot is nonsense."

How many minds has Julia got?
It's really hard to say—
But she must have a precious lot,
She changes one each day!

SOME men are like tea. You can't get any goodness out of them, till they have been for some time in hot water.

WHY is first love like a potato?—Because it shoots from the eyes, and becomes less by paring.

LADY-DAY is said to be the only lady whose age is accurately known.

CURIOS FACT.—You must go through three springs before you get to a leap year.

FLOWERS are not trifles, as one might know if he would only think how much pains, so to speak, God has taken with them everywhere; not one unfinished, not one bearing the traces of brush or pencil. Fringing the eternal borders of mountain winter, gracing the pulseless breast of the old, gray granite—everywhere they are humanising. Murderers do not often wear roses in their button-holes. Villains seldom train vines over cottage doors.

In the "Talmud" there is a forcible figure descriptive of the depth of the sea. "Step not in there," runs the passage, "for, seven years ago, a carpenter dropped his axe, and it hath not yet reached the bottom."

A MISSISSIPPI STEAMER.—"Stranger, you know nothing about steamers in the old country. We do the thing here rale smart. The stoker gets orders to pile on lots of wood; the clerk goes round mighty brisk, and collects the fares; the flames come roaring out at the chimney like snapping turtles; the captain sets down on the safety-valve, and we goes right ahead!"

A SPANISH writer remarks of a lady's black eyes, "They were in mourning for the murders they had committed."

SLANDER.—The expansive nature of scandal is told by the poet thus:—

"The flying rumours gathered as they rolled;
Scarce any tale was sooner heard than told,
And all who told it added something new,
And all who heard it made enlargement, too;
On every ear it spread—on every tongue it grew."

CHARLES II.'s politeness did not desert him even in his last moments. He apologised to the courtiers around his deathbed for having "been an unconscionable time a-dying, but hoped they would excuse him."

AN Arab, talking to a French soldier, in Algeria, used the following laconic argument against duelling: "If a man insults you," said the son of the desert, "you may kill him on the spot. But is it not foolish to give him an opportunity of killing you as well as of insulting you?"

BEAR-BAITING, a cruel sport which has become almost obsolete in England. It is still occasionally exhibited in the debates in the House of Commons.

"PATRICK, darlin', you shall dine with me soon, on eggs and bacon." "Sure, Jem, dear, then I'll come to ye on a Fry-day."

ADVICE to a man not noted for truth-telling:

"Lie on! and my revenge shall be,
To speak the very truth of thee."

ENERGETIC master to lazy servant—"John, John, get up, the day is breaking." "Very well, sir, let him break; he owes us nothing."—(Interval of twenty minutes)—"John, John, here's the sun up before you!" "Very well, sir, he has farther to go than we have." (John receives notice to quit.)

A CELEBRATED Italian miser was carried to the grave at midnight with a procession of torches. A bystander wrote on a slip of paper—

"What numerous lights this wretch's corpse attend,
Who, in his lifetime, saved a candle's end!"

"THE wind's getting round," observed one chilly East Indian to another, after one of our Easters had been blowing for three weeks. "I'm glad of it," replied the shivering friend, "for it has been sharp long enough."

Our Editorial Table.

E. RAYMOND and some other correspondents complain that they have looked through our columns in vain for replies to their inquiries. In the first place, we repeat what we have more than once stated, that, in consequence of our very large and continually extending circulation, three weeks must necessarily elapse, even with the most approved appliances, before a reply to any question can be published. In the next place, our correspondence has become so large, we might say, so overwhelming, that it is next to impossible to keep pace with it, though we devote an entire page to that purpose. Notwithstanding this, every communication that is deemed worthy of notice, and especially those which relate to matters of public utility, receive the earliest possible attention. At the same time, we respectfully hint to our correspondents—1. To study brevity. 2. Not to overburden us by sending a great number of questions in one letter. We have on our table one letter containing seventeen questions, relating to as many different subjects. 3. Not to require us to answer questions which concern no individual but the writer. 4. Not to put questions to us which any neighbour or acquaintance could easily answer, or answers to which have been more than once given in our columns. 5. Not to write to us on matters which their own good sense must tell them are highly objectionable.

A POOR PARSON.—Black revive, to restore the colour of black cloth, is prepared thus:—Blue galls, bruised, 4 oz.; logwood, copperas, iron filings, and sumach, of each 1 oz.; vinegar, one quart. Macerate in a close vessel, with heat, for twenty-four hours; then strain off the clear, add the fillings and copperas, and shake it occasionally for a week. Keep it in a corked bottle.

ROVER.—You should be prepared to answer any question put down in the paper, as you cannot tell which of them the Examiners may select.

HIBERNIAN.—Apply to Mr. Mayall, 224, Regent-street, London.

ALLAN SPIERS.—You may get "The Class Examiner in Euclid," for a few pence, at our publishers.

UTTOXETER.—The tale of "The Soldier of Fortune" began in No. 68, and was concluded in No. 105. You can have these at three-halfpence per number by sending to Messrs. Petter and Galpin.

SNAPDRAGON.—The mixture will be equally efficacious without the otto of roses. As to soft corns, the simplest and best remedy is to wear upon the toe or part affected a small circular piece of soft leather, spread with diachylon plaster, and having a hole cut in its centre the size of the corn.

T. CROFT.—The first volume of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, New Series, will be completed in twenty-six weekly numbers. Suitable covers for binding will be ready in due time.

A. W. L.—Acquire in the first instance the art of making a good bow. By the time you have done this you will, probably, have found out something to say without our prompting you. However, we do not like to give your request a flat refusal, for if you should happen to be a bashful man, in the agitation of making a new acquaintance all your ideas and all your presence of mind may be scattered to the four winds. On a first introduction put questions to the lady; you will find she has plenty to say, and her loquacity will remove all awkwardness. As you cannot immediately dash into any very interesting topic, begin by asking her opinion of the place, then find in what estimation she holds the last most remarkable work of some popular author. The proceedings of our volatile neighbours across the channel furnish also inexhaustible themes, and when once you enter upon France and the French your mauvaise honte will disappear as if by magic.

CORA.—Supposing the gentleman to be no gay deceiver, you might infer from his wishing to dance the whole evening with you, that he wishes for your company every evening of his life.

MARIA.—We cannot counsel you to betray your own sister, but do not cease to warn her affectionately and earnestly. You must then rest satisfied with doing your duty yourself, and with offering up prayers for your sister's reformation.

JULIET.—Your giving a bible to the gentleman with whom you are on terms of intimacy, is perfectly consistent with propriety. It is possible he may consider the gift as a proof of interest in his welfare, but it is not a kindness on which he could presume.

W. B. S.—The secretary and treasurer of the society you name are at perfect liberty to engage in as many speculations as they please, provided they are not specifically forbidden to do so by the articles, and provided they do not tamper with the funds.

IRISHMAN.—The princesses and princes of England can only marry those of royal blood.

POOR LABOURER.—You must have misunderstood some particulars of your friend's case. No magistrate could have acted as you state.

R. SINNOTT.—You forget that, not only were "all the fountains of the great deep broken up," but "the windows of heaven were opened."

A DEANSTOWNIAN.—A reply to your inquiry would involve us in political discussions, which we are careful to avoid.

PERIPATETIC.—We believe that all the individuals who have aimed at the life of our beloved Sovereign are confined in Bedlam.

HOPE.—We have given your case our best attention. The wig being light and ventilating, is not likely to interfere with the growth of your hair, to promote which you had better persevere in your present plan of washing your head and using friction afterwards. In addition to this, make a point of rubbing your head twice a week with the following mixture:—One part of liquid hartshorn to nine parts of good olive oil.

LADY ETHEL.—As the company which your lover keeps is respectable, we do not consider you justified in dictating to him the exact period of time he is to spend with his friends. We can assure you, Lady Ethel, that if instead of being an affectionate, cheerful companion, you become a severe lecturer, you will see less and less of your lover.

ADOLPHUS.—You are very wrong to pour over small print by candle light. No wonder your eyes are affected. The following wash may afford relief. Put into a common sized phial fifteen drops of laudanum, add two-thirds of rose-water, and for the remaining third fill the bottle with rectified spirits of mildererus. Sponge your eyes with this mixture.

A. H.—In the county of Kent, ladies can dispose of landed property at eighteen years of age; but in other counties of England, men and women attain their majority at the same period, namely, twenty-one years of age. The hair you forward for our inspection would, in a mass, appear auburn.

WILLIAM.—At twenty-four years of age, and in a comfortable business, you require no assistance from us to procure a wife. Determine on cultivating female society. In preceding numbers of the New Series of this Paper you will find advice how to proceed.

DOLLY DORDEN.—The gentleman whose awkwardness occasioned (in the railway carriage) the fall and dispersion of the provisions in your basket, should have offered his assistance in picking them up, but should not have persevered if you had shown any objection to receive his aid.

AN AMATEUR.—Succinic acid is obtained from amber by distilling it. When pure, it is a white, crystalline substance. It was formerly called salt of amber. The mode of procuring ferro-tartaric acid would require more space than we can spare.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—Read the foregoing.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—We do not know the agent's name. Any bookseller would, we should think, procure them for you. If you have any further difficulty, send by post direct.

BELLA TRELAWNY.—It seems your lover is jealous, and, we must own, not without cause. You did very wrong in allowing your suitor's brother to become so familiar. He has punished you, and lowered himself by boasting of your foolish proofs of kindness, thus creating angry feelings between you and your lover. You must have patience, and, by much greater attention to propriety, endeavour to obliterate the recollection of your past error.

GRISY.—You are mistaken about a right hand marriage. There is no such expression. You must be thinking of a left hand marriage. This is a connection (of no very reputable nature) which is sometimes formed by German princes with their inferiors in rank, and is called a morganatic marriage. For full particulars respecting St. Valentine, we refer you to "Cassell's Illustrated Almanac for 1858."

BLACK HOOPE.—The Maynooth Grant is a grant of funds from government to the Catholic College of Maynooth.

A. Z.—It is not our intention at present to furnish further details of the fire-escapes used in London. See Nos. 1 and 2 FAMILY PAPER, New Series.

F. CLERK.—Consult a chemist.

W. A. NASTRICK.—"Oblique" pronounced obleek.

J. COOPER.—We do not know; it must be a mere tradition.

F. W. CROXDON.—Yes; without the aid of a master.

FRANK ROVER.—The hair sent for our inspection is light auburn, though spiteful people might say, "Cela tire sur le roux,"—broadly translated, "It has a tendency to red."

A READER OF THE FAMILY PAPER.—"The Educational Course" contains a variety of interesting and useful information, and is well adapted to your purpose. The whole six volumes complete will cost 15s. 6d.

HARRY WITH THE HEART-ACHE.—Judging from your communication (which is well worded and well written), we have come to the conclusion that the young lady is attached to you, and that what may appear coldness results merely from maidenly reserve. Persevere, by all means.

HINSUTE, A YOUNG RECRUIT, and SIMPLE DAISY.—The question how to remove superfluous hair has been twice answered in the New Series of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER. Our correspondents must carefully examine the editorial columns of the preceding numbers.

ANNIE.—Your verses are pleasing, and evince talent, but your metre is not quite correct. Study prosody, and send us another little poem some time hence. But in the meantime take the advice of a friend. Do not neglect any lucrative employment to devote yourself to poetry. Only give your spare time to the muses.

M. A. BELLE, A MUSIC GIRL, LIMA.—We will endeavour to advise these ladies for the best. "M. A." and "Belle" wish to be told of a remedy for scurf in the head. Washing the head in soft water and Castille soap is the most efficient remedy, and by giving the preference to Castille over other soaps, there is less danger of changing the colour of the hair. Perseveringly brushing the head and hair every night is necessary in conjunction with washing the head once a week. By following this system, a lady whom we know, and who was greatly troubled with the complaint in question, got rid of it completely. "A Music Girl" and "Lima" wish to know of a remedy for scurvy. For this tormenting disease eating carrots has been found efficacious. In fact a ship's crew were cured of it by partaking freely of carrot marmalade, or carrots well boiled down in sugar.

SOPHIA.—A flushed face often proceeds from an irregular circulation of the blood. We recommend you to use the flesh brush freely before going to bed, and on rising in the morning.

CESAR.—You have placed yourself in a very painful situation. We really feel for you, because we perceive you suffer much more than you choose to own. "Take it easy" (one of Marryat's maxims) is all very well, but you have taken things rather "too easy." Your remark to the lady you were addressing, "That you might be courting her merely for her money," was worse than injudicious. As a matter of course, you lost your chance of her. This punishment did not suffice. You went on till you made enemies of every one around you, and lost a good appointment. You ask us to console you in your trouble with a "hint of encouragement," and with sympathy. The latter we cordially give; the former only to an entirely different plan to that you have hitherto adopted. The "don't care" system is sure to lead to bad results. In the present state of society, caution and earnest endeavours can alone insure success. But do not despond. If the loss of the young lady, and the appointment into the bargain, induce you to look into yourself, and to endeavour to effect a reformation in your character, you will not have suffered in vain. Those around you will soon perceive your improvement; and when next you are in possession of solid advantages, beware of throwing them up lightly.

ADOLESCENS, and a number of other lads, mostly under sixteen years of age, write, requesting to be immediately supplied with "something to make whiskers grow without injury to the skin." We advise them to "bide their time." We have before given receipts for hair oil.

ISOLINDA and CORDELLA.—The proposals you received in the shape of valentines cannot be considered regular offers of marriage; but very likely they were sent to try whether the suitors would have any chance of success on taking more serious measures to secure your hands.

H. E. F.—We advise you to advertise for daily pupils, and to state that you have not any objection to instruct little boys. By doing this you would open a wider field for your exertions. In needlework you would find competitors so numerous, and so well versed in their business, that we do not recommend you to try it until other things have failed.

A FOREIGNER.—In all probability the old saying, "Mind your P's and Q's," originated in the practice of tavern keepers scoring down the debts of customers, and placing p's for pints and q's for quarts.

A LADY'S MAID.—You should place your mistress's pearls in common dry magnesia, and you will restore their colour.

A BOY OF SIXTEEN.—A boy of sixteen, who, judging from his writing and orthography, has not made the best use of his time, is in a great hurry to know when young men should marry. We consider twenty-five a good age, generally speaking, but "as a boy of sixteen" is backward in his education, we advise him to wait until he is thirty.

J. P. WILD (Hull).—"The Educational Course" is an entirely distinct series, and can be obtained of any bookseller. We believe you will have no difficulty in obtaining the other work at the present time.

MARK RAYNER.—The tales by Mr. J. F. Smith which have appeared from time to time in our Paper are not to be obtained in any other form.

CURIOS.—We have given several receipts in former numbers for preparing invisible inks.

B. A. S., T. F. LOVETT, F. M. T., and ADOLESCENS.—"The Model Copy Books," published by Ward and Lock, Fleet-street, price 4d. per number, including postage.

C. WADE.—It was in the reign of William the Conqueror that the halfpenny first came into use. At the accession of this monarch the penny had on it a deep cross, so that it could be broken in two for a halfpenny, or into four for a fourth, or farthing.

LILLIAN.—You had better advertise in the most influential journal to the following effect—that you are anxious to find a situation in a respectable boarding-school, where your instructing younger pupils, and taking care of their wardrobes, would be deemed an equivalent for your board, and for further means of improving yourself. State that you are nineteen years of age, and that you can give good references. Head your advertisement with, "No salary required."

EMMELINE, STUPID CUPID, JOHNNY.—The letters of these three correspondents are now open before us. They all speak of the sorrows of the heart. Poor "Emmeline" is desperately in love; had believed the passion returned; finds out her mistake, and asks us "what she is to do?" She must do without the one she loves—that is pretty clear. To console her under this painful necessity, we remind her that there are plenty of beaux left, and that she would be very silly to make her eyes red with crying, and her heart ache with pining after one who is indifferent to her. Let "Emmeline" call to her aid all the dignity of womanhood, and force her thoughts into other channels. Let her give her energies to her business; and, when she meets the man on whom she foolishly doted, let her learn to say, mentally—

"Know, all disdainful and cold as thou art, My bosom is proud as thine own."

We suspect "Stupid Cupid" will have to cultivate the same degree of indifference we recommend to "Emmeline." As the object of his affections received his attentions, she had no reason to be offended when he entered on the subject of love. In our opinion she is a mere coquette unworthy of our correspondent's regards, and we advise him to banish her from his thoughts, and to fix his affections on a worthier object. "Johnny" must watch the course of events. When meeting the young lady in society, he cannot immediately enter on the subject of his preference, but he can discuss music, poetry, painting, and all subjects that appeal to the finer and softer emotions of the heart. He can propose sending any flower which she expresses an admiration for, and thus easily discover by the reception given to these respectful attentions, whether more serious proofs of regard would be listened to favourably.

MAGGIE.—In so important an affair as the choice of a companion for life, the gentleman is justified in taking his time for investigating the character, tastes, and habits of the young lady towards whom his heart leans. But there should be moderation in all things. After a few months' intimacy there must have been full opportunity of coming to a conclusion one way or the other; and if no declaration follows, there is reason to believe that the constant visitor is a mere trifler, and any girl of sense would withdraw from the company of one whom she had good reason to believe a vacillating, and consequently, a contemptible man.

BONNY MARY.—We advise you to use bran instead of oatmeal. In a muslin bag tie up about half-a-pint of bran. Let it soak in a large wash-hand basin full of tepid water, and wash your face, neck, and arms with it before it becomes cold. We consider honey soap is very good, but in our estimation Castille soap is the purest, though not the most pleasant.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARTLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XLV.

And still I looked upon their loveliness,
And sought their nature for similitudes
Of perfect beauty, innocence, and bliss;
And fairest imagery around me thronged.

POLLOCK.

It is now necessary to explain to our readers how Lillian came to be at the ball given by the Governor-General of India, chaperoned by Lady Bell Fourreau, and treated almost as a daughter by her husband.

When Rose had succeeded in conveying the rescued child on board the vessel which conveyed the gallant 01st to the East, she felt that it was impossible for her presence to remain long a secret from the colonel. An abrupt discovery might affect, not only the position of her husband, now a soldier and subjected to military discipline, but her own character for straightforward conduct and truth, qualities on which she had hitherto prided herself, and not without just reason. She resolved to take, therefore, the advice of Corporal Stock, and make a friend, if possible, of her new mistress.

Still it was not without misgiving and hesitation that she came to the conclusion; and, even then, did not put it into execution till the ship had passed the Land's End, and the possibility of sending the little intruder back no longer to be feared.

For the first two or three days, her ladyship had paid the usual penalty of those who venture upon the bosom of the ocean for the first time. Neither rank nor beauty are exempt from sea-sickness; fortunately, it did not last long. But, whilst it did, nothing could exceed the unwearied attention Rose paid to the sufferer. Night and day she remained by her pillow, anticipating every want. The most affectionate mother, watching over her child, could not have shown more devotion. No wonder that her mistress felt grateful, and esteemed herself fortunate in having obtained so excellent a nurse.

The mal de mer had passed, and Lady Bell was sufficiently recovered from its effects to dine at table with the ladies and officers of the regiment. Rose had waited purposely for the departure of Sir Charles, before making her appearance in the cabin to dress her ladyship's hair.

"You are ill, I fear," observed her mistress.

"It will soon pass," observed the poor creature, hesitatingly.

"I am sure you are. Your hand trembles, and your eyes appear red, as if with weeping. You have over-tasked yourself in your attentions to me. Never mind my hair," added the kind-hearted woman. "I can arrange it myself. You had better retire to your cabin, and I will send Dr. Burke to you."

LILLIAN ACKNOWLEDGES TO LADY BELL HER LOVE FOR RICHARD.

"I am not ill, my lady; indeed I am not," replied Rose; "at least, not in body."

"In mind, then. You have been weeping?"

"Alas! yes."

"And the cause?"

Rose remained silent. The moment had arrived, and she could not find courage to speak. The words she had arranged in her own mind vanished from her memory.

"What will she not think of me?" she mentally ejaculated. "That I have unworthily deceived her."

"Surely," exclaimed Lady Bell, fixing her eyes inquiringly upon the pale features and quivering lips of her attendant, "your husband has not spoken or acted unkindly to you, after all your patience and suffering? I see he has," she continued, "nothing less could have so distressed you. Oh! these men, these men. They treat our hearts as playthings. Like children, they first pine for our love, and when they have won it, neglect or trifle with us."

Of all the married ladies of our acquaintance, the speaker was about the last whom experience could justify in making such an observation, for her husband perfectly adored her. The only danger she had to dread was that of being spoilt by over-indulgence. How or why she formed such an opinion of our sex it is impossible to explain,—probably it was one of those intuitive perceptions peculiar to woman.

"No, no," sobbed Rose, anxious to exculpate her husband from a suspicion which he did not deserve; "Mark would not pain me for the world; in fact, he never did so willingly."

"And you have no illness?"

"Not of the body, my lady."

Her mistress regarded her earnestly.

"Of the mind, then?" she repeated.

"Alas! yes."

"And you wish to confide it to me?"

"You are my only hope," exclaimed the agitated woman; "for unless your goodness stands between Sir Charles's anger and my fault, I shall lose his good opinion, I fear, for ever."

Faith! It was getting serious; and, grateful as Lady Fourreau felt for the attention and devotion of her new attendant, she hesitated to compromise herself by any direct promise.

"It can't be anything very bad, Rose—morally bad, I mean—I think I may say that I feel assured of that—so confide in me at once. If I ought to befriend you, I will. I can say no more. Speak candidly—truthfully."

Thus encouraged, Rose informed her mistress that on quitting London she and Mark had brought with them the orphan child of a deceased friend, whom they had placed, as they thought, with those who would take care of her, but had been cruelly deceived.

"Was the child related to you?" demanded Lady Bell.

"No."

"Strange that you should have adopted it," was the reply.

Of course, Rose could not explain why they had taken Lillian: that would have been to have exposed the crime of her husband.

"He was the companion of Mark in childhood," she said; "and there were reasons, many reasons, why we could not abandon his orphan. Those whom I had left her with promised to protect her; but, instead of keeping their plighted word, they sold her, heartlessly sold her to a brutal mountebank and a fiend-like woman, who treated her cruelly. I knew not this—indeed I did not, when I entered your ladyship's service. It was not till after you had quitted the hotel in Southampton that I found her in the streets; I was on my way with Stock to embark. When I discovered her, impulse as well as duty prompted me to rescue her from her fearful fate; I concealed her beneath my cloak,—brought her on board—she is here."

"Here?" repeated her hearer, amazed.

"The wife of one of the soldiers has taken charge of her."

"Well," exclaimed Lady Bell, with a benevolent smile, "it is but one more in the vessel; I am glad it is no worse. I don't think Sir Charles will be very angry; if he should, I must intercede for you."

Rose, in the fulness of her gratitude, would have thrown herself at the speaker's feet and thanked her.

"Nonsense," interrupted her ladyship; "do nothing of the kind; it is not much good the best of us can do in this wicked world. There, dry your eyes, and finish dressing my hair. When my toilet is made, let me see your protégée. How old is she?"

"About nine years old, my lady."

"And pretty?"

"Beautiful as a young angel, my lady."

"And her name?"

"Lillian Gee."

In less than an hour after the above conversation, Lillian was secretly brought into the cabin of Lady Fourreau, who, despite her shabby, worn-out frock, felt struck, not only with the extreme beauty of the child, but with the extreme grace of her manner, and that air of distinction which even the poor weaver and his wife had observed. There was no awkward embarrassment in her manner; on the contrary, she looked up smilingly into the face of Lady Bell, and, reading an expression of interest and kindness in her eyes, advanced and placed her little hand in her.

"O Lilly!" exclaimed Rose, "you must not make so free. Pray, excuse her, your ladyship: she does not know that you—"

"Never mind my ladyship," interrupted the kind-hearted woman. "What does she know of such distinctions? You have not over-praised her: she is lovely. I never saw a more aristocratic air. I have no wish to be too curious, so you need not answer my question unless you think fit to do so. Who was her father?"

"Barry Gee, my lady."

"And his rank?"

"He had been a soldier. I never saw her mother."

We all of us are aware that nature certainly does indulge in strange caprices at times. Lady Bell was not one of those women who imagine beauty to be the exclusive privilege of birth. The loveliness of the orphan, therefore, did not surprise her, but her manners and air of refinement did.

"You had better," said her ladyship, "return her for a day or two to the woman who has taken charge of her, till we can make her presentable; then return, and we will arrange everything. Good-by," she added, holding out her hand to the little object of her benevolence.

Lillian took it, and held up her face to be kissed. There was something so natural and confiding in the act, it touched the heart of her protectress, who, with true womanly kindness, touched her cheek with her lips.

"Be a good girl," she said, "and you shall see me again."

"I am always good with those I love," replied the child; "and I am sure that I shall love you. I like to hear you speak; it seems as if I had heard your voice before."

"Indeed!"

"It must have been in my dreams, for I have no recollection of your face—oh, yes," she added, "I know now: it is like my mamma's—my own dear mamma's voice, who used to caress me, and sing to me, long ago, before I crossed the sea."

Lady Bell looked at Rose, inquiringly.

"She was born whilst her father was on foreign service, my lady," observed the latter; "the poor fellow died directly after his return to his native village, and we all supposed her mother to have been foreign too."

"Most likely," thought her mistress: "that may account for her peculiar style of beauty and graceful manner."

Before quitting the cabin, Lady Bell kissed her again, and Rose contrived to take her back to the corporal's wife unseen by Sir Charles. The heart of the poor creature was much lighter. She felt as if half the sin she and her husband had committed in the abduction of Lillian from St. Faith's, had been removed by having found her such a protectress as the wife of Sir Charles Fourreau.

Lady Bell was one of those warm-hearted, impulsive creatures who never perform a kind action by halves. Many persons in her position would have considered that they acted with liberality enough in forgiving Rose for having introduced the orphan on board without permission; but she did more: she resolved to protect her; and, with the assistance of her waiting-woman, actually commenced that same day a wardrobe for Lillian, by cutting up several of her own dresses, and working at them herself.

When completed, Lillian again was sent for.

The lady very naturally anticipated the delight of the child on being clad for the first time, as she imagined, in a frock of silk. To her astonishment, Lilly did not appear in the least surprised. She kissed her ladyship, and thanked her, but expressed neither wonder nor admiration at the beauty of her dress.

"One would really imagine she had been accustomed to silk dresses all her life," thought Lady Bell. "Are you not pleased," she added, speaking aloud, "with your new clothes?"

"I am pleased at being near you," was the reply.

"Can it be art?" mentally ejaculated the donor; "or has some one been tutoring her?"

Rose was too clear-sighted not to read the doubt passing in the mind of her mistress. She felt annoyed at Lilly's want of admiration.

"And do you not thank the good lady for her bounty?" she asked.

"I have thanked her."

"I did not hear you."

"Thanked her as I used to thank my own mamma, long ago, when she gave me a new dress, or brought me fresh flowers—there are no flowers where I have been lately—or sang to me: thanked her," she added, "with a kiss."

"And did your mamma often give you dresses?"

"Very often, when I was good, and had learnt my lessons."

"And what did you learn?"

Lillian pointed to the pianoforte which stood open in the cabin.

There was something so extraordinary in the wife of a common soldier having her infant daughter taught the piano, that Lady Bell began to suspect Rose had imposed upon her, as to the real history and parentage of the child, and was about to declare her doubts to her, till she saw by her countenance that the waiting-woman was quite as much, if not more surprised than herself.

"And so you can play?" she said, addressing her protégée.

The child smiled, and, walking to the instrument, run over one of Cruvelli's early airs, not without some difficulty, for two years at least must have elapsed since she had touched a piano. At first her benefactress suspected she played by ear, till, looking over her, she discovered the fingering to be correct, or nearly so.

"This is singular," she murmured.

Rose was equally puzzled to comprehend it.

"Ah, I have it!" exclaimed her ladyship, struck with a sudden idea. "Her father, no doubt, was a musician in one of the regimental bands."

She regarded her attendant as if to receive a confirmation of the supposition; but the right-minded woman, although it would have relieved her from an unpleasant suspicion, scorned to escape from their embarrassment, by even an indirect falsehood.

"I never heard that he was, my lady."

"And yet you knew him well?"

"From childhood."

"It is singular."

"It is singular," repeated Rose; "but he might have become a musician after he enlisted. His brother is reckoned the best bell-ringer in St. Faith's."

The supposition was plausible; still it did not convince or satisfy her mistress, or explain the silk dresses, which Lillian declared she had been accustomed to: and the lady looked not angry, but hurt.

"Rose," she exclaimed, "I think I have merited that you should deal truthfully with me. I should be sorry, very sorry, to change the opinion I have formed of you."

"Indeed, indeed, my lady, all that I have told you is the truth. I have known her father from childhood. We were born in the same village. He was of a family quite as humble as my own—perhaps, in the world's opinion, more so. He was a reckless idler, but not naturally a vicious man. But idleness is the source of crime. He became a poacher, and to avoid being punished by the lord of the manor, enlisted as a soldier. I was a mere girl at the time, but I recollect it as well as if it occurred but yesterday."

"He went abroad, you say?"

"He did, my lady. Last New Year's eve he unexpectedly returned, bringing Lillian with him. And died," added the speaker, hesitatingly, for she felt that she was treading upon dangerous ground.

"Suddenly?"

"Very suddenly, my lady."

"A natural death?"

Rose turned pale as death, but the natural love of truth did not desert her.

"He was shot," she murmured, "in an affray with the gamekeepers of the lord of the manor."

"And your husband?"

"Was with him," sobbed the terrified wife. "And now you know the tie which binds me to his orphan child. Do not betray him," she added, sinking on her knees; "oh, for pity sake, do not betray him."

There are accents whose verity cannot be mistaken; it is when they are wrung from the heart. Whatever else might remain inexplicable, Lady Bell felt that the speaker had spoken the truth. The rest, she felt, must be left to time—that great solver of all mysteries—to unveil.

Although she had, previous to her marriage, mixed but little in the world, she had seen quite enough of it to know that very unequal marriages, as well as unions of a less sacred nature, will sometimes take place; and to some such she attributed the birth of her new protégée.

"I am satisfied, Rose," she said, "quite satisfied that I suspected you unjustly. I shall not fall into the error easily again. If confidence is a plant of slow growth, it possesses great vitality, and that is a compensation. You had better leave Lillian with me. I expect Sir Charles in a few minutes; he generally comes half an hour or so before the doctor looks in to give us our morning lesson in Hindostani."

The still anxious and trembling wife of Mark Rayner gathered up the old frock and clothes which the orphan had previously worn, and withdrew.

It was in vain that her protectress, as soon as they were alone, questioned the latter respecting her name and birth. All she knew was that her name was Lillian; that her father wore a red coat with gold something on his shoulders, but she had forgotten the name of them.

"An officer," thought Lady Bell. Then she recollected that in the cavalry the brass wings worn by the privates might easily be mistaken for gold epaulettes by a child of the speaker's tender years.

The child next informed her that she had lost her mamma, and travelled a long way over sea; but could not recollect either the name of the country she left, or that of the ship she sailed in.

Lady Bell felt more and more puzzled, and knew not what to think. The excellent character she had received with Rose, and her own good conduct since she had been in her service, precluded all idea of her having been concerned in any crime. But she did not feel quite so assured of her husband; and, with true woman's instinct, jumped to the conclusion that if anything wrong had been perpetrated Mark was the only real offender, however the fidelity of his wife might induce her to remain a silent, and, as she believed, an unwilling witness.

Of the truth of Lillian's having been sold to mountebanks and exposed in the street there could not be the slightest doubt; for, no sooner did her ladyship allude to the circumstance, than the features of the child turned deadly pale, and she shuddered at the recollection of the horrors she had gone through. Bet and the whip, Fiddler Dick and his peculiar scowl, rose vividly in imagination before her.

"And were you very unhappy?" demanded her ladyship.

The orphan shuddered, and described how she had been beaten.

"And who sold you to them?"

Lillian did not know his name, "But Jack used to call him 'uncle Mike.'"

"Not Rose's husband, then?"

"Oh, no! he brought me from the other people who took care of me."

How far further the fair querist might have pushed her inquiries, or what would have been the ultimate result, it is impossible to state. Their further conversation was interrupted by the appearance of Sir Charles, who, after saluting his wife, observed that she had found a companion.

"And is she not a lovely one?" replied Lady Bell.

The old soldier, who was naturally fond of children, held out his hand to her. Lillian, who had never taken her eyes from him from the instant he entered the state room, ran to him, laid her little head upon his shoulder, and sobbed bitterly.

We need scarcely say that both husband and wife were exceedingly surprised. But the cause of her grief was easily accounted for. Sir Charles was in uniform, and her papa, her own papa, used to wear just such a coat and cap.

"Is she an orphan?" inquired the baronet, after soothing and kissing away her tears.

"Yes."

"Going out to relations in India?"

"She is under the charge of a person who is going out," replied his lady, evasively, for she wished to interest her husband in her protégée before relating her history to him; added to which, she was in momentary expectation of Dr. Burke, the surgeon of the regiment, who, having been in India many years, came regularly to give them lessons in Hindostani.

The learned gentleman speedily made his appearance. Lillian was directed to amuse herself by looking over one of Lady Bell's scrap-books; and the lesson commenced.

First, the instructor read a page from Kellart's work, and requested his pupils to pronounce the words after him. On hearing the sounds of the language of her childhood, the first in which she had lisped her little wants and fears, and which was far more familiar to her than English, tears started into the eyes of Lillian; and she sat gazing on the reader with breathless interest, but without interrupting him.

After the reading, next came the lesson from the vocabulary. Sir Charles repeated it almost without an error, unless that of pronunciation; not so Lady Bell, her mind and time had been too much occupied, she scarcely remembered a word.

"The day is a most lovely one," said the doctor, in English.

"Bohotee khoobsorat," replied her ladyship in Hindostani.

"I am delighted to see you well," he added.

"Ap bohote meherban ho," said Lady Bell.

"Thank you for your courtesy," continued the tutor.

"What is the first word?" said her ladyship; "only the first."

"Apke," whispered Lillian, who had crept near her. Her benefactress repeated it mechanically.

Suddenly she recollected from whom the prompting came. Surprise mastered every other feeling, and drawing the child towards her, she exclaimed—

"Why, Lillian! do you speak Hindostani?"

Dr. Burke and Sir Charles both questioned her. The former, after regarding her for some time with great earnestness, observed that he felt convinced of having seen her before, every feature of her face appeared so familiar to him.

"In England?" said her ladyship.

"No; it must have been in India," replied the gentleman; "and if I am not very much mistaken, I was the first who received her into this somewhat troublesome world. What is her name?"

"Lillian."

"Lillian what?"

"Gee."

"I certainly never attended a lady of that name," remarked the doctor. "Umph! how very extraordinary that I should not recollect the name of her parents; but something will doubtless occur to bring it to my memory."

When the speaker had taken his leave, Lady Bell related to her husband the story of Rose, concealing from him only that part of it which related to the poisoning of Mark Rayner, and the death of the supposed father. With all his many good qualities, she knew that her husband had an Englishman's aristocratic prejudice against all unlicensed sportsmen; added to which, she felt that it had been revealed to her in confidence, and she was far too honourable to betray it.

"You are not angry with me?" she asked, when she had concluded her singular and somewhat romantic narrative.

"Angry with you!" repeated the gentleman; "why should I feel anger? You have but followed the natural impulse of your benevolent heart. In fact, in the situation in which you were placed, I do not well see how either you or Rose could have acted otherwise—the child could not be sent back again."

"And you will allow her to remain with me?"

"If it will afford you pleasure, certainly."

"Oh, thank you, Charley!" exclaimed his wife, in a tone of delight; "you cannot think how exceedingly happy you have made me."

Here the speaker folded Lillian in her arms; then bade her go and thank Sir Charles for his goodness.

"Bell," said her husband, "I have but one observation to make—don't look so serious, it is not a very long one. In undertaking the charge of this child it is necessary that you decide at once and irrevocably the position she is to hold in the eyes of the world. It must be either that of a dependent or a ward."

"Of a dependent, never."

"In that case," observed the baronet, "you will do well to attend to her education as soon as the vessel arrives in Calcutta. She is gifted with the promise of a beauty which may prove fatal to her happiness, or secure it, according as she is trained."

"Fear not," replied the lady; "I will act kindly."

"That I am sure you will; but you must do something more—act wisely. In the first place, the persons who brought her on board, and who disclaim any tie of blood—were it otherwise, I would be the last to exact such a sacrifice—must forego all claim or authority over her."

"They will be but too happy, I feel assured, to do so."

"In the next, her story must remain a secret between ourselves and Dr. Burke."

"You answer for the doctor," replied her ladyship, "and I will undertake for Rose, her husband, and myself."

"Upon these conditions, then," said Sir Charles, "Lillian is henceforth your ward."

CHAPTER XLVI.

Love is a plant of holier birth
Than any that takes root on earth—
A flower from heaven, which 'tis a crime
To number with the things of time.
Hope in the bud is often blasted;
And beauty in the desert wasted;
But love shall live, and live for ever,
And chance and change shall reach it never.
LIBRARY MARG.

It was a fortunate thing for the heroine of our tale that the union of Sir Charles and Lady Fourreau was unblemished by issue: not that having children of their own would in any respect have altered the resolution they had come to of protecting her; but it must naturally have proved a bar to her creeping as she did into their hearts—engrossing their love and tenderness as an only child might have engrossed those of her parents.

There is something wondrously beautiful in the desire of loving and being beloved, which nature has implanted as an instinct in our hearts. We find it in every position in life: the ignorant and learned, the coarse and refined, are equally sensible of its influence. Even devotion is but a phase, though the holiest one, of this all-absorbing passion.

On the arrival of the baronet and his lady at Calcutta, a governess was procured, and masters of every kind engaged to complete the education of their adopted child, whose happy disposition rendered the course of instruction a pleasure rather than a task to those who taught her. Never had they encountered a richer or more docile intelligence; it was like one of those luxuriant plants which admit of being trained, but, bend them as you will, can only take a graceful form.

From being fond, Sir Charles became proud of her, and his wife felt a gratification so entire and unselfish in her opening beauty and expanding mind, that, had Lillian been her own child, it could not have been more sincere.

In India climate speedily develops girlhood into womanhood, although, from lack of proper education or mental discipline, too frequently a womanhood of passion, caprice, or ambition, without religion or principle to sustain it. No wonder that it quickly fades, as the flowers fade which art has forced into untimely bloom—an ephemeral existence which it cannot prolong, scentless, and useless but for mere ornament.

Lillian, at the age of fifteen, was almost womanly in her person; but that we have already described. We must now say something of her mind, which, thanks to the care and affectionate solicitude of her guardians, was stored with an amount of information, accomplishments, and that which is far better, high and virtuous principle, greater than nine-tenths of the men who breathed their flattering incense in her ear, could appreciate, or the beauties, who envied and hated her, believe had ever fallen to the share of any one of their sex.

We have already related the impression produced upon our hero by the loveliness of Lillian; no wonder, therefore, that he eagerly embraced the opportunity which the good opinion of Sir Charles and his lady afforded him, by visiting frequently at their mansion. Scarcely a party took place without him; and Lady Bell, at last, became so used to him that—to the great annoyance of Dawlish, who fancied himself in love with the orphan—he was consulted on every scheme of pleasure; no one being considered perfect without him.

Delightful as this intercourse was, and heartily as he appeared to relish it, there was one peculiarity which husband and wife more than once remarked, and that was his increasing attention to business. No matter how tempting the invitation, Richard Tyrrell never suffered himself to be drawn from the counting-house of Mr. Chumsee, where he worked with the assiduity of any paid clerk, during the usual hours. For one reported to be rich, this continuous application seemed remarkable.

To our readers, who are already aware of the holiness of his motive—the vindication of his father's fame—it will not appear in the least surprising. Mr. Seaton meditated, like others, upon this peculiarity at first; but soon found it so useful that he ceased to think of it. Evidently the boy, as he somewhat contemptuously considered him when he first had the honour of making his acquaintance, had a taste for commercial affairs; and as the volunteer wrote an exceedingly beautiful hand, a great portion of the correspondence was gradually left to him.

For one so young, our hero acted with no ordinary prudence: he never expressed a desire to be employed in any one department particularly. Actuaries, accounts, bills, securities, any duty which came in his way, he attended to them all.

On more than one occasion he had seen the confidential clerk change colour, and with difficulty suppress the annoyance he felt, whenever a certain Parsee bill-broker, named Haizen Mendrezdie, called at the office. No matter what affair might be upon the tapis, or how closely he was pressed, it was cast aside in order to attend to him. This obsequiousness at length became so remarkable that Mr. Chutnee one day observed it.

"Have you any private speculations," he demanded, "with that old rascal, Haizen?"

"You know, sir, that by the terms of our arrangements I am forbidden to enter into any transactions on my own account."

This was strictly true; but the head of the firm was perfectly aware that, like many other stipulations, it might be easily avoided.

"One would imagine," he added, "that you were partners."

Sanford looked confused, but remained silent. He knew the indolent habits of the speaker: that a suspicion might lie dormant for years, and, unless roused by opposition, be only alluded to—not acted upon.

Lady Bell and her adopted daughter were seated in the morning room. It was about three weeks after the ball at the government house. Lillian was occupied at her tambour-frame, and her ladyship reading, when the butler entered with a note, which he presented to his mistress. It was one of those pretty, three-corner ones, such as ladies are in the habit of writing to each other.

"That will do," said Lady Bell; "you need not wait."

The man left the room.

"From Mrs. Chutnee," continued the speaker, handing it to her companion: "an invitation for an excursion to her country house in the hills. I fear Sir Charles will not be able to accompany us."

"In that case," observed Lillian, "you will decline it."

"Well," replied her ladyship, "I can't see that the necessity exactly follows. I am quite old enough to venture into society with no other protection than my years."

"And virtue," she might have added.

"Would you not wish to accept it?"

The fair girl coloured slightly.

"I am answered!" exclaimed her protectress, laughingly. "When a young lady blushes, it is a sign that she is not quite so indifferent as she wishes the world to suppose. I have never spoken upon the subject to you before, but really Tyrrell's attentions are so marked, that it would be blindness to mistake them."

This time Lillian coloured more deeply than before.

"The other evening, when Dawlish engaged you to dance with him, he looked so miserable that I really pitied him."

"My dear mamma, dear and good as you are, may you not be mistaken? Mr. Tyrrell has never named the word love to me."

Lady Bell smiled.

"There are many things understood long before they are expressed," she made answer; "and love is one of them. I am right; I must be right; for to suppose otherwise would be to pronounce a young man whom I esteem—I will even go further, and say I admire—capable of the most heartless coquetry."

"Oh no, no," exclaimed Lillian; "Mr. Tyrrell, I am certain, is incapable of that."

Here she hesitated, and recommenced plying her needle far more assiduously than there appeared the slightest occasion for.

The kind-hearted woman rose from the settee, and, walking to her protégée, placed her arm gently round her waist, and kissed her on the forehead.

"Put down your work," she said, "and let us have a little conversation; by conversation, I mean confidence. Speak as mother and child should speak—freely, and without disguise; or, if you prefer it, like two sisters."

"As mother and child," replied the object of her bounty, hastily, and at the same time warmly returning her caress. "I can have no secrets from you."

"You love Richard Tyrrell?"

"I have never said I loved him," answered Lillian, modestly. "Perhaps I might do so if he were to ask me; but I do not feel assured that is ever likely to be the case. The other evening, at Lady Fourreau's ball, I overheard Dawlish remark to one of his brother officers that Tyrrell appeared very attentive to Mrs. Chutnee."

"Very ungrateful, my love, if he did not," observed her ladyship, with a smile. "Zamora is one of the most charming women of my acquaintance—clever, although her education has been most cruelly neglected, and good—do you mark that, Lilly, good."

"It was not the words, mamma, but the look that accompanied them; it was—"

"Yes, yes; I understand all that. Dawlish is not the first man I have met with who can look the lie he has not the courage to speak—sneer a woman's reputation away. I have encountered a hundred such butterflies in my time. I gave your penetration more credit. He is jealous."

"Of whom?"

"Of Tyrrell; and wanted you to hear his observations. Believe me, that, like everything he does or says, it was not uttered without a purpose."

"If you think so—"

"I know it, because I know him," interrupted the lady, indignantly. "But let us drop the captain for the present, and speak only of Zamora. Have you forgotten the note she sent to me a day or two before the ball at the government house? I am sure you have not—nay more, would wager you can repeat every word of it."

Lillian did not deny the accusation.

"She requested me to hold you engaged to dance with Tyrrell, stating that yours would be the loveliest face in the room. She was not wrong there," added the speaker, with almost maternal pride. "Recollect, she never danced herself once."

"I do remember it."

"And shall I tell you why she did not? Because she wished to avoid inflicting pain upon an old and jealous husband, whom she tries to respect if she cannot love. She has few secrets from me. Rely upon it, if she felt her heart touched by the approach even of an unworthy passion, she would fly the object of it. Mrs. Chutnee will never disgrace either the name of wife or the one she bears."

"Still, mamma, you cannot deny that Mr. Tyrrell appears much more free and unreserved with her than with me."

"A sign that he loves one and feels only a friendship for the other. You see no hesitation or reserve with me."

"That is a very different thing."

Lady Bell smiled gravely; then, breaking into a merry laugh, observed—

"Because I am an old married woman, I suppose."

"No," replied her adopted child; "but because Sir Charles is so good and noble that no man can stand comparison with him. You are the only person in the world I ever saw worthy to be his wife."

These words were uttered with a truthfulness and sincerity which rendered them really flattering to the heart of her hearer, who, as our readers are aware, felt no less proud than fond of her gallant husband.

"And is that all you have to say upon the subject?" she demanded.

"No, mamma; I may as well confess everything to you. Indeed I know not whether there is any merit in my candour; you are so clever that you read every one. I have more than once imagined that Richard felt attached to me. On several occasions he appeared upon the point of declaring his love, when some sudden recollection, like a shadow of the past, or a regret, came over him, and he changed the subject."

Lady Bell regarded her earnestly. She, too, had made a similar observation.

"And he has never declared to you?"

"Never."

"Then I will ask you no further questions," exclaimed Lady Bell. "The first ears that listen to a young girl's avowal of her love should be his whose lips have asked the question. We will accept this invitation," she added; "perhaps it is not made without a purpose."

Lillian faintly smiled.

"I will note his conduct even more closely than I have hitherto done. Trust me," she said, "he will not deceive me. If he really loves you, I shall read the secret from his heart."

"But are you sure he will be there?"

Her protectress pointed to the note. The writer had informed her that he would.

The same day on which the above conversation had taken place our hero had started early, in order to visit a vessel lying in the Hooghly consigned to Chutnee and Company. Sanford drove him down.

The name of the ship was the Caradoc.

As Richard stepped on board, he heard an exclamation of surprise, which caused him to look round; it proceeded from a group of sailors, but there was no face amongst them that he recognised; at the same moment the captain advanced upon deck, and with well-affected cordiality invited the visitors to follow him to the cabin.

We need scarcely say that the cry which had attracted the attention of Richard, proceeded from poor Jack, who, despite the years which had passed, recognised his former playfellow. But it was no wonder his playfellow of other days had failed to recognise him; the eye of a mother could scarcely have done so, so completely was he changed. Ill-usage and suffering had emaciated his features, and his black hair, which he formerly wore with a sort of terrier cut, now hung in almost elfin locks down his pale cheeks; added to which, he had grown exceedingly tall.

Caleb and Bunce, the only friends whom the unfortunate fellow had on board, noticed his agitation, and hinted that it implied the recognition of one who might befriend him.

"Do you know that craft?" demanded the old sailor.

"I believe I have seen him before," replied Jack; "but my memory is not so good as it once was. I may be mistaken."

Caleb saw, from the tears standing in his eyes, that the poor fellow did not believe that such was the case.

"How will you ascertain?"

"I dare not speak to him."

"Then I will for you," exclaimed his friend. "It is only risking a little rough usage if Gall should find it out. My time is nearly up."

"When will mine be?" thought Jack.

"What is the gentleman's name?"

"I don't know," answered the former, hesitatingly, for he feared to compromise our hero by entering into any particulars.

Bunce looked incredulous.

"If he is really the person whom I believe him to be, he will, I am sure, assist me; for his heart is as good as—"

"The captain's is wicked. All right," said Bunce, finishing the simile for him. "I and Caleb are in the captain's crew, and shall have to row him on shore. I'll ask him if he remembers Jack."

"There are so many Jacks," observed his comrade.

"That's true."

"Jack who?"

"Manders," replied the persecuted youth. "If he denies all knowledge of the name, do not trouble him with my sad story; if he remembers it"—and the eyes of the speaker flashed with something of their former brightness as he spoke—"tell him how I have been trepanned on board this floating prison—how treated. He will find means to release me."

"I'll do it," replied Bunce.

"But should the captain overhear you?"

"Let him!" exclaimed the old sailor. "I have long been tired both of the Caradoc and its commander, and, once on shore, don't mind telling him my private opinion of him—it would relieve my mind."

How the speaker could call it a private opinion can only be explained by himself, considering that not a man or boy on board but had heard it a hundred times.

The breakfast being over, and business settled in the cabin, Sanford and our hero prepared to return on shore; fortunately, the captain did not accompany them. Poor Jack crept to the side of the vessel, to witness the departure, and once more gratify his eyes and heart with the sight of his former friend.

"It is he," he murmured, as he saw him descend; and the hope that his rescue from the brutal tyranny he had so long endured was at hand, nearly overcame him.

As the boat was bearing round towards the shore, Sanford asked one of the men for a light for his cigar.

"Here is one, your honour," exclaimed Bunce, drawing forth a match from a little brass tinder-box.

"Thank you."

"Rather convenient, ain't it?"

"Very convenient, I should think," replied the managing clerk.

"You can't think how I value it, bless your honour; it was given me by one of the dearest friends I have in the world."

"Bill of Deptford or Portsmouth, I suppose," observed Sanford, laughing, for he felt slightly amused at what he considered a specimen of salt-water sentiment.

"No, it weren't."

"Your wife, perhaps?"

"I ain't got no wife as I knows on," replied Bunce; for he was rather a conscientious sort of personage, and never told a downright falsehood unnecessarily.

"To be sure, there was Susan, at Blackwall; but she afterwards married Pigtail Bill, of the Exeter; and Mary, who has had two husbands since we were spliced."

Both the gentlemen laughed.

"And which of them," inquired our hero, "made you that very useful present?"

"Neither of them; it was given me by an old shipmate, named Jack Manders."

Despite his habitual self-possession, Richard changed colour. Fortunately, the eyes of his companion were too completely enveloped in the cloud of smoke from his cigar to perceive the effect the name produced upon him.

Both Bunce and Caleb did; and the former, looking our hero in the face, gave him a knowing wink.

"Do you know," observed Tyrrell, "that I feel very much inclined to let the men row me as far as the ghaut."

"Can't trust that rascally groom with my trap so far," replied his companion.

"But you might drive round and take me up there."

The arrangement was agreed upon; and having thus, by a little presence of mind, got rid of the only person to whom it was dangerous his real name should be known, our hero very quietly ordered the men to pursue their way.

On reaching the watering place, he directed Bunce to quit the boat and follow him.

The old man did so.

"Now, you have something to say to me," he observed, when they stood together on the top step.

"I should think I has," answered the old sailor, knowingly.

(To be continued.)

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

MORAL CULTURE.

GRAND and noble as are the intellectual faculties of the human soul, the moral capacities are infinitely higher. Goodness, charity, constancy, magnanimity, justice, adoration, hope, faith, are among the virtues of the moral man. These are the flowers that bloom in the moral garden. If there is any beauty in them, any odour of heaven, they should be cultivated carefully—cultivated with deep and earnest zeal.

The great end to be attained in the cultivation of the moral powers is moral force—spiritual energy of soul.

Our moral capacity is our imperial crown. In this crown are five jewels, of which the finest and brightest is

VENERATION.

This capacity of Veneration associates man with his Maker: connects the creature with the Creator—things seen with things unseen—the temporal with the eternal. This is the grandest and noblest affection of the soul. It fixes its regards on the sublimest and holiest object in the universe. Its influence in every department of the mind is more salutary than any other. In loving that which is perfect it strives after perfection. It is the basis of religion. It is opposed to all that is evil, and to that which would debase the character or pollute the heart. Its will, so far as it can appreciate and understand it, is founded on the Divine will; it loves to render obedience to the Great Creator, and delights in dependence upon Him. It rejoices in every act of worship. It ponders with delight on the page of inspiration. Its natural language is prayer and praise.

BENEVOLENCE.

The second jewel set in the mental coronal is Benevolence, the love of our fellow-men, the humane, sympathetic feeling—that which seeks the good of others; that which would pour out from the treasures of its munificence gifts of good things upon all. It is that feeling that gave the world a Howard, a Fennell, a Fry. It is that feeling that leads on the reformer, which inspires the philanthropist, which blesses, and curses not. It is the good Samaritan of the heart. It is that which thinketh no evil, and is kind; which hopeth all things, believeth all things, endureth all things. It is the angel of mercy which forgives seventy-and-seven times, and still is rich in the treasures of pardon. It visits the sick, smooths the pillow of the dying, drops a tear with the mourner, buries the dead, educates the orphan. It sets free the captive, unburies the slave, instructs the ignorant, relieves the distressed, and preaches good tidings to the poor. Its look is like the face of an angel; its words are more precious than rubies; its voice is sweeter than honey; its hand is softer than down; its step as gentle as love.

But it needs no encomium; it is its own praise; its works are its plaudits. Whoever would be respected, whoever would be beloved, whoever would be useful, would be remembered with pleasure when life is over, must cherish this glorious feeling. Whoever would be truly happy, would feel the real charms of goodness, must cultivate this affection. It is a glorious affection, because of the number and extent of its objects. It is wide as the world of suffering, deep as the heart of sorrow, extensive as the wants of creation, and boundless as the kingdom of need. Its spirit is the messenger of peace, holding out to wrangling mortals the white flag of truce. It is needed everywhere, in all times and places, in all trades, professions, callings, which men can pursue with pleasure, profit, or honour. The world has too little of it. It has been neglected. It should now be cultivated much, and long, and well. The peace, the happiness, the prosperity of the world depends greatly upon it. Countries need it; communities need it; families need it; individuals need it. It is needed everywhere. Nothing gives a sweeter charm to youth than well-cultivated benevolence, an active charity, a disposition kind to all. Who can properly tell the power and sweetness of kindness? Would you possess them? Then cultivate the benevolent dispositions of your natures. Fail not to do it. Let a glorious activity of universal love mark all your actions and feelings. Be kind, be good, be noble, be generous always. Let your words, your looks, your acts, breathe the spirit of love.

CONSCIENTIOUSNESS.

The third jewel is Conscientiousness—the love of truth and right. It is the spring-source of integrity. It has been said that an honest man is the noblest work of God. It is the inspiration of this sentiment which makes him such, which crowns him with his real nobility. A great writer has said that the two most beautiful things in the material and mental creations are the "the starry heavens and the sentiment of duty in the soul." A sentiment most noble and true. If there is a being beneath the government of the Most High, who is worthy of the heart's esteem and high respect—to whom the soul should bow in willing reverence, and in whose presence it should feel as though by the side of an angel, who awes while he secures our love, it is he who has a strong, a ruling sense of duty in his heart. It appears to us as though there is something of God in the feeling. It fills our souls with heavenly images, and binds our hearts to its possessor. It has a ravishing charm, and works as though by miracle upon our inner senses. This sense of duty in the heart is inspired by conscientiousness. The ultimate end of the authority and office of this sentiment is to impart this sense of duty. The idea of obligation, responsibility, faithfulness to trusts, rectitude, justice, right, is conferred by this faculty. The voice of this sentiment is for right. It has but one law written in the heart of its being, and that is the rule of right. It is a stern, noble representative in man of the attribute of justice in God. It is communicative, like other feelings and desires, imparting itself to others. It wishes to inspire its own glorious spirit everywhere, and make all hearts redolent of its light and the sanctity of heaven. It suffers in the presence of wrong, sorrows at injustice, weeps when any creature fails in duty. How much of sanctity, of holiness, of God-like moral power this faculty, when strong, imparts to the human soul! It is the citadel of moral force, and should be guarded well. Faithfully should it be cultivated. Nothing should prevent a thorough and perpetual cultivation of this right arm of all morality. No luring bait of pleasure, no fancied interests, should prevent an active exercise of this spiritual power. Be assured, my young friends, that your real pleasure and interest are in harmony with this sentiment. Then injure it never; outrage it never; question never its teachings. Be true to its voice, heed its warnings, obey its dictates, walk by its counsels, comply with the letter and spirit of its law. Come what may, frown who will, hearken to the voice of duty.

HOPE.

The fourth jewel in this moral crown is Hope. It is that angel within which whispers of triumph over evil, of the success of good, of the victory of truth, of the achievements of right. "It hopeth all things." It is a strong ingredient of courage. It is the friend of virtue. It is the prophet of "a good time coming." It is full of glorious anticipation. It paints on the sandy wilderness a picture of tranquil beauty—and a picture that we feel assured is no fading mirage to vanish at our approach. It promises to veneration a time when people of all nations shall feel their dependence on the Giver of all good; and in the light of His love shall rejoice in unsullied purity and immortal youth. A time when that which is evil shall be banished for ever; when

"The right with the might and the truth shall be;
And come what there may to stand in the way,
That day the world shall see."

It breathes everywhere the idea of victory. Such are its religious sentiments.

Its morality is equally inspiring, rich, and benefi-cent. It encourages all things good, great, noble. It whispers liberty to the slave, freedom to the captive, health to the sick, home to the wandering, friends to the forsaken, peace to the troubled, supplies to the needy, bread to the hungry, strength to the weak, rest to the weary, life to the dying. It has sunshine in its eye, encouragement on its tongue, and inspiration in its hand. Rich and glorious is hope, and faithfully should it be cultivated. Let its inspiring influence be in the heart of every youth. It will give strength and courage. Let its cheerful words fall ever from his tongue, and his bright smile play ever on its countenance. Entertain well this nymph of goodness. Cultivate well this ever-shining flower of the spirit. It is the evergreen of life in the soul's garden.
